

Lives of the Irish Saints

Rev. John Canon O'Hanlon,
M. R. F. A.

Division

BX

Section

4659

.I7

04

1875

v. 3

Engraved by William Oldham.

RUINS OF DOMINICAN PRIORY, AND CATHEDRAL ON THE ROCK OF CASHEL, CO. TIPPERARY.

Drawn by John O'Hanlon, C.E., in 1834.

LIVES OF
THE IRISH SAINTS, WITH Special Festivals, and the Commemorations of Holy Persons, COMPILED FROM
Calendars, Martyrologies, and Various Sources, RELATING TO
The Ancient Church History of Ireland.

BY THE
✓
REV. JOHN O'HANLON, M.R.I.A.

---

VOL. III.

---

DUBLIN: JAMES DUFFY AND SONS, 15 WELLINGTON-QUAY, AND 1A PATERNOSTER-ROW, LONDON.

LONDON: BURNS, OATES, AND CO., 17 & 18 PORTMAN-STREET, AND 63 PATERNOSTER-ROW, E.C.

NEW YORK: THE CATHOLIC PUBLISHING SOCIETY, 9 WARREN-STREET.

[ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.]

CONTENTS.

First Day of March.

	Page
ARTICLE I.—LIFE OF ST. DAVID, ARCHBISHOP OF MENEVIA, AND CHIEF PATRON OF WALES. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Sources for illustrating St. David's Biography—Prophecies regarding St. David's Birth—Parentage of our Saint—Circumstances and Miracles preceding his Nativity—Birth of St. David—His Baptism	1
CHAP. II.—The Monastery of Rosnat or Kilmune—St. David nurtured in Old Menevia—The Dove, an Emblem of his Innocence and Holiness—It is probable, St. David and St. Finnian of Clonard were early Companions—St. David educated at first by Illtutus—Afterwards instructed by Paulinus—Ordained a Priest—He restores Paulinus to the use of Sight—Observations concerning Illtutus and Paulinus	10
CHAP. III.—St. David admonished by an Angel to commence his Mission—Restores Glastonbury—Builds a Chapel in Honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary—King Ina's Foundations for Irish Students—Death and Burial of King Arthur—Religious Erection at Bath by St. David—He blesses the Springs at this Place—Missionary Works undertaken by St. David, during the Saxon Incursions—Condition of Wales about this Period—King Ertig's Sight restored—An Angelic Monition—Many Disciples flock to St. David—Opposition experienced, and the Designs of Pagan Enemies frustrated	15
CHAP. IV.—St. David founds his Monastery—Rules there established for his Monks—Their Observances and austere Practices—Personal Example of our Saint—His Preaching and perfect Piety—Many illustrious Persons are attached to St. David's Rule of Observance—His Miracles—Various holy Irishmen become his Disciples—Ireland has always regarded St. David with a special Veneration	22
CHAP. V.—St. David, with St. Eliud and St. Paterone, visits Jerusalem—The Gift of Tongues—Hospitably received by the Patriarch—St. David's Consecration—Preaching of those holy Missionaries, and Numbers of People converted—Presents received on their Return to Britain—The Pelagian Heresy—Synod convoked at Brevi—A great Multitude assembled there, to whom St. David preaches—Miraculous Manifestations—He is created Archbishop over the Britons—The probable Succession of Bishops in the See of Carleon—The "Synod of Victory" there assembled—Its Decrees and happy Results—Removal of the See from Carleon to Menevia—St. Kentigern's Visit to the holy Archbishop	27
CHAP. VI.—Our Saint receives a Heavenly Admonition regarding his Death—His pious Resignation to the Divine Will—A Foreknowledge of his Decease con-

CONTENTS.

	Page
veyed to the People of Britain and Ireland—The last Hours of St. David—Discordant Dates regarding the Year when he died—His extraordinary Longevity—Opinions of various Writers—St. David died at Menevia on the First of March—His Interment—Local Traditions—Translation of St. David's Relics, in the Tenth Century—Canonization by Pope Calixtus II., in 1120—Welsh Custom of wearing the Leek on St. David's Day—Festivals in Honour of this holy Archbishop—Offices and Religious Services appointed	35
CHAP. VII.—Miracles attributed to St. David's Merits and Advocacy after his Death—Traditional and recorded Incidents—A Plague disappears, after St. David's Relics had been exposed—Description of St. David's Town and Cathedral—Pilgrimages made to our Saint's Shrine—A List of Rectories, Vicarages, Prebends, Curacies, Churches and Chapels dedicated to him in Wales and England—Naas Town and Church, in Ireland, have St. David as special Patron—Other Places in our Island commemorative of his Name—Conclusion	43
ARTICLE II.—St. Swibert or Suitbert, Bishop, and Apostle of the Frisons and of the Borctuarians. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ]	54
ARTICLE III.—St. Baitan, Abbot of Clonmacnois, King's County. [ Seventh Century. ]	58
ARTICLE IV.—St. Marnan, or Marnock, Bishop and Confessor, Aberkedor, Scotland. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ]	59
ARTICLE V.—St. Moinend or Maoineann, Bishop of Clonfert, County of Galway. [ Sixth Century. ]	62
ARTICLE VI.—Obituary Festival of St. Senan, Abbot of Scatterry Island, County of Clare. [ Sixth Century. ]	67
ARTICLE VII.—St. Cassan, Casyn, or Cassain, Son of Neman. [ Sixth Century. ]	68
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Enan Mac Nissi, Bishop	68
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Non, Nonna, Nonnita or Melari, Mother of St. David, Archbishop of Menevia, Wales. [ Fifth Century. ]	68
ARTICLE X.—Banfota	69
ARTICLE XI.—St. Columba or Colum, of Ceann Garadh, now Kingarth, in Bute, Scotland	69
ARTICLE XII.—St. Saran, Bishop	69
ARTICLE XIII.—Reputed Festival of a St. Fergana, Abbot	69
ARTICLE XIV.—Reputed Festival of St. Cedde	70

Second Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. CEDDA OR CHAD, BISHOP OF LICHFIELD, AND APOSTLE OF THE MERCIANS. [ Seventh Century. ]
CHAP. I.—St. Ceadda's or Chad's Acts—His Family and Birth—His early Education in Lindisfarne and in Ireland—He is placed over Lestingan Monastery—Owen or Owini becomes his Disciple—The Legend of St. Chad, King Wulfere and his Family	70
CHAP. II.—St. Chad consecrated Bishop—St. Theodore—St. Chad's missionary Career—His pious Practices while at Laestingaeu—He becomes a Bishop over Mercia and Lindsay—His Love for Prayer and Retirement	74
CHAP. III.—Miraculous Premonition of his Decease—The Day and Year of his Death—Notices in the Calendars—Translations of his Relics—Memorials—Preservation of his Relics—St. Chad's Catholic Cathedral, Birmingham—Conclusion	77
ARTICLE II.—St. Montan, or Mantan, Deacon, of Blaris, County of Down, and of Kill Mantan, County of Wicklow. [ Fifth Century. ]	80

CONTENTS.

	Page
ARTICLE III.—St. Ioava or Joava, Bishop of Leon, in Lesser Britany, France. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	86
ARTICLE IV.—St. Fergna Britt, Abbot of Iona. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	91
ARTICLE V.—Reputed Festival of a Monendabbis, or Movendas, as also of Tedgnæ, Tedquus, or Teugna, Tengus, Abbots ...	92
ARTICLE VI.—St. Lugadius, of Cluain-Finchuil, or Cluain-Fiacul, Clonfeakle, County of Armagh. [ Probably in the Sixth Century. ] ...	93
ARTICLE VII.—St. Slebhene, or Slebhine, Abbot of Iona. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	94
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Suibhne, Abbot of Iona. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	95
ARTICLE IX.—Dermot O'Mulrony, Martyr, at Gallbally, County of Tipperary. [ Sixteenth Century. ] ...	95
ARTICLE X.—St. Villeic or Willeic, Priest, at Kaiserwerth, on the Rhine. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	96
ARTICLE XI.—St. Finnian ...	97
ARTICLE XII.—Reputed Festival of St. Marnan, in Scotland ...	98
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Cuan Caein, Son of Tighernagh ...	98
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Conall ...	98
ARTICLE XV.—St. David, Bishop of Menevia, Wales. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	99
ARTICLE XVI.—Festival of St. Lucilia, Martyr ...	99
ARTICLE XVII.—Feast of the Birth of Old Paul ...	99

Third Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—St. SACER OR MO-SACRA, ABBOT OF SAGGARD, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	99
ARTICLE II.—St. Ereciacus, Priest of Rathmoain, now Ramoan, County of Antrim. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	101
ARTICLE III.—St. Foila or Foilenna, Virgin, and Patroness of Kill-faile, now Killeely Parish, County of Galway ...	103
ARTICLE IV.—St. Conna, Virgin ...	104
ARTICLE V.—Festival of a Reputed St. Haggard, Parish of Tomhaggard, County of Wexford ...	104
ARTICLE VI.—Deochain Reat, or St. Reat, Deacon ...	104
ARTICLE VII.—St. Modimoc or Modhiomog, Bishop ...	105
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Cele Christ, or Christicola, Bishop of Kill-Cele-Chriost, in Ui-Donchadha, in Fotharta, Leinster. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	105
ARTICLE IX.—St. Mochua, of Cluain Dobhtha ...	108
ARTICLE X.—St. Connall or Conaill ...	108
ARTICLE XI.—Reputed Festival of a Translation of St. Cedde's Relics ...	108
ARTICLE XII.—Reputed Festival of a St. Magor... ..	108
ARTICLE XIII.—Feast of the Monk Owen or Owini ...	109
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Fachtna, of Cre Beg ...	109
ARTICLE XV.—St. Concrada or Conchraidh, Bishop ...	109
ARTICLE XVI.—Reputed Festival of St. Patto, Bishop of Verden, and Abbot of Armarbaric. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	109
ARTICLE XVII.—Reputed Festival of St. David, Archbishop of Menevia, Wales ...	109
ARTICLE XVIII.—St. Cillene or Cillen, perhaps of Inis Doimle, now Inch, County of Wexford ...	109

Fourth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—St. MUKNA, MUICIN, OR MUKINUS, BISHOP OF MAIGHIN, OR MOYNE, COUNTY OF MAYO ...	110
ARTICLE II.—St. Adrian and his Companions, Martyrs, in the Island of May, Scotland. [ Ninth Century. ] ...	111
ARTICLE III.—St. Phillip, Bishop, of Cluain Bainbh ...	113
ARTICLE IV.—St. Owen or Owini, Monk, at Lichfield, England. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	114
ARTICLE V.—First Deposition of St. Fursey's Relics. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	114
ARTICLE VI.—Feast of St. Lucius, Pope and Martyr. [ Third Century. ] ...	114

CONTENTS.

Fifth Day of March.

	Page
ARTICLE I.—ST. KIERAN, OR CIARAN, FIRST BISHOP OF SAIGIR, KING'S COUNTY, AND PATRON OF THE DIOCESE OF OSSORY. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—The Acts of St. Kieran—Family and Birth—His Desire to become a Christian, and to visit Rome	115
CHAP. II.—St. Kieran's Ordination and Consecration—His Meeting with St. Patrick, and their Intercourse—He is recommended by the latter to preach the Gospel in Ireland—Conjectures regarding the Place where his Mission began	123
CHAP. III.—Former Extent of Ossory—Account of St. Kieran's first Mission there—St. Kieran's holy Well in Tubbrid—His Foundation of Saigir, and its Position—His Miracles	126
CHAP. IV.—St. Liadain and her Nun Bruinecha—St. Kieran restores Fintan's Son to Life—Ængus, Son of Natfraich, King of Munster—Restoration of his Harpers—The Queen, Ethnea Huathach—St. Patrick becomes the Guest of St. Kieran—The King of Temoria invades Ossory—St. Kieran's Rule—Miracles of the Saint—The holy Men who are said to have been his Contemporaries	133
CHAP. V.—Statements regarding St. Ciaran's missionary Career, among the Britons and Scots—His Learning and Virtues—His closing Years and Death—Places where he is regarded as special Patron—Memorials and Festival—Conclusion	139
ARTICLE II.—St. Carthach, or Carthage, said to have been Bishop of Druim-fertain, and of Inis Uachtair, in Lough Sheelin, County of Westmeath, or, of Sier-Kieran, King's County. [ Sixth Century. ]	148
ARTICLE III.—St. Colman, surnamed the Thirsty. [ Supposed to be of the Fifth Century. ]	152
ARTICLE IV.—Reputed Festival of a Saint Moggrudo, Muggins or Muckolinus	154
ARTICLE V.—Reputed Festival of a St. Kolanus, or St. Koianus, Bishop	154
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Feast of Finghin, Anchorite and Bishop of Iona, Scotland. [ Tenth Century. ]	154

Sixth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FRIDOLIN, THE TRAVELLER, ABBOT OF SECKINGEN, AND PATRON OF GLARUS CANTON, SWITZERLAND. [ Seventh Century. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Writers of St. Fridolin's Acts—His Country and Family—His Period—His Youth and early Training—His Education and pious Dispositions	155
CHAP. II.—St. Fridolin's Ordination, and his Apostolic Labours in Ireland—His Resolution to become an Exile—His Departure for France—Enquiry concerning the Period—He proceeds to Poitiers—His Discovery of St. Hilary's Relics—His Visit with the Bishop to King Chlodovæus—His honourable Reception—He restores the Church and Monastery at Poitiers—Two Priests arrive there from Northumbria	159
CHAP. III.—A Vision of St. Hilary warns St. Fridolin to leave for Seckingen—The holy Pilgrim builds several Churches and Monasteries, in Honour of St. Hilary, throughout the Territories of Metz, Alsace, Lorraine, Bourgogne, and Austrasie—He departs for Rhætia, and arrives at the Site of Seckingen—

CONTENTS.

	Page
Opposition of the People there—He obtains a Charter for Foundation from the King—A Nunnery is founded at Seckingen, and great Miracles are wrought by the Saint	164
CHAP. IV.—St. Fridolin makes Improvements, at Seckingen—His Right to the Island miraculously confirmed—His pious Works and Mission—He is said to have composed a Book of Exhortations to Sacred Virgins, and other Writings—His Death—Miraculous Occurrences after his Departure—Memorials and Veneration for this Saint—Conclusion	168
ARTICLE II.—St. Sezin, Bishop and Abbot, Patron of the Parish of Guic Sezni, Leon, in Brittany. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]	172
ARTICLE III.—St. Cairpre or Corpre Crom, Bishop of Clonmacnoise, King's County. [ Ninth Century. ]	176
ARTICLE IV.—St. Muadan, Bishop of Carn Furbaidhe	179
ARTICLE V.—St. Cadroe, or Hadroe, Abbot of Wasor, Belgium. [ Tenth Century. ]	181
ARTICLE VI.—The Holy Daughters of Leinin, Saints Drugenia, Luigenia, Luiella, Macha and Kiomthach, at the Church of Kill-na-ningean, now supposed to be Killininy, County of Dublin. [ Sixth or Seventh Century. ]	196
ARTICLE VII.—St. Bright, supposed to be of Killiney, County of Dublin. [ Sixth or Seventh Century. ]	198
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Maelruain, of Druim-Raithe	200
ARTICLE IX.—Feast of Victorinus and Companions, Martyrs	201
ARTICLE X.—St. Senanus, or Seranus, Confessor	201
ARTICLE XI.—St. Odhran, Odran, or Odranus	201
ARTICLE XII.—Reputed Festival of St. Adrian and Companions, Martyrs. [ Ninth Century. ]	201
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Maeldubh, Son of Berran	201
ARTICLE XIV.—Reputed Festival of St. Carthach, of Cill-Carthaighe, supposed to be Kilcarr, County of Donegal. [ Sixth Century. ]	202
ARTICLE XV.—St. Baldred or Baltherus, Hermit, and Missionary, in Scotland, and St. Bilfrid, or Bilfred, a Hermit, at Lindisfarne, in England. [ Probably in the Seventh or Eighth Century. ]	202
ARTICLE XVI.—Reputed Feast of St. Duthac or Dubthac, Bishop of Ross, Scotland. [ Eleventh Century. ]	205

Seventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCELLOC, HERMIT. [ Fourth and Fifth Centuries. ]	205
ARTICLE II.—St. Caritan or Cariotan, of Druim-lara	208
ARTICLE III.—Festival of St. Felicitas and of St. Perpetua, Martyrs, at Carthage. [ Second and Third Centuries. ]	208
ARTICLE IV.—Feast of St. Colman, Bishop of Lindisfarne, England. [ Seventh Century. ]	209
ARTICLE V.—St. Metan or Meattan, Virgin, of Tuaim-atha	209
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Festival of St. Willeic, at Kaiserwert, on the Rhine. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ]	209
ARTICLE VII.—Reputed Festival of St. Senan of Inse Cathaigh, or Inniscattery, County of Clare. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]	209
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Neastor	209
ARTICLE IX.—St. Beoathed, Bishop of Airdcarne, County of Roscommon. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]	209

Eighth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SENAN, OR SENANUS, BISHOP AND ABBOT OF INISCATTERY, COUNTY OF CLARE. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] CHAP. I.—Introduction—Manuscript and published Authorities for St. Senan's Acts—His Birth and future Great-

CONTENTS.

	Page
ness, foretold by St. Patrick—His Parentage and Nativity—Anecdotes of his Youth—Vocation for the Religious State—He studies under the Abbot Cassidus or Cassidanus ...	210
CHAP. II.—St. Senan studies at Kil-na-Managh, in Ossory—Miraculous Gifts while there—He removes to Inisconirthe, or Iniscoirthe, now Enniscorthy, on the River Slaney—It is said, he afterwards went to Rome, Gaul, and Britain—Senan returns to Ireland, and lands at Ardmeneadh Island—He goes to the Island of Iniscara—He removes from it to Inisluinge, and there he builds a Church—He founds another at Inis-Tuaischert—He visits Inismore, and there founds a Monastery—He builds an Oratory on Inis-Caorach—Again, on Inis-Cunla he constructs a Cell for his Disciples, Finan and Finnian ...	222
CHAP. III.—St. Senan is miraculously shown by an Angel the Place for his future Habitation—He expels the Monster Cathach—Description of and Antiquities on Scatterry Island—Mactail's Opposition to St. Senan, and his sudden Death—The Druid's Discomfiture—Two Boys, who were drowned restored to Life—St. Senan is visited by Saints Kieran and Brendan—The miraculous Bell sent to St. Senan—The holy Abbot produces the Well, afterwards known as Tober Sheanain ...	231
CHAP. IV.—The Question of St. Senan's Episcopacy, and his Office of Abbot, at Iniscattery—Enquiry as to whether he had been Archbishop of Armagh—His strict monastic Discipline—His miraculous Powers—Antiquities on Bishop's Island ...	241
CHAP. V.—St. Senan's Gifts of Prophecy—His latest recorded Actions—His Dormition and subsequent Restoration to Life—Date for his Departure—His Obsequies—His Burial in Iniscattery ...	245
CHAP. VI.—Posthumous Renown of St. Senan—Monuments and Memorials recording him—Miracles occurring after his Death, and attributed to his Influence—Local and Calendar Commemorations—Conclusion ...	248
ARTICLE II.—St. Liber, or Liberius, Abbot of Aghaboe, Queen's County. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	257
ARTICLE III.—St. Duthac or Dubthac, Patron and Bishop of Ross, Scotland. [ Eleventh Century. ] ...	259
ARTICLE IV.—St. Algnied, or Elgnied, Bishop of Ardbraccan, County of Meath. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	261
ARTICLE V.—Festival of a reputed St. Ducatus, or Duchatus, Bishop ...	262
ARTICLE VI.—St. Ciaran, of Foighde ...	262
ARTICLE VII.—St. Neman, or Noeman, of Dairinis, probably, in the County of Wexford. [ Supposed to be in the Seventh Century. ] ...	262
ARTICLE VIII.—Feast of St. Cathaldus, Bishop of Tarentum, Italy. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	262
ARTICLE IX.—St. Psalmod or Saumay, Anchorite, at Iamosin, France. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	263
ARTICLE X.—St. Libran ...	263
ARTICLE XI.—St. Conallus, Bishop, and Confessor ...	263
ARTICLE XII.—St. Cronan, of Airdne ...	264
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Conan, or Connanus, Bishop, of Eas-Ruaidh, or Assaroe, County of Donegal. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	264
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Mochonna, or Dachonna, of Assylyn, County of Roscommon. [ Supposed to be of the Sixth Century. ] ...	266
ARTICLE XV.—St. Mochonna, or Dachonna, of Daire, or Derry ...	267
ARTICLE XVI.—St. Derchairthinn, perhaps of Oughterard, County of Kildare ...	268
ARTICLE XVII.—St. Siadhal Ua Commain, Abbot of Kinlough, County of Leitrim. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	269
ARTICLE XVIII.—St. Beoadh, or Beatus, Bishop of Ardcarne, County of Roscommon. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	270
ARTICLE XIX.—St. Corcaria, Corcair, Curcach, or Cucagia, or Quorrait, said to

CONTENTS.

	Page
be of Cluain-Lothuir, or of Kill-Corcaige. [ Thought to have been of the Sixth Century. ] ...	271
ARTICLE XX.—St. Colmann Cirr, or Kearn ...	272
ARTICLE XXI.—Reputed Festival of a Mac Colaim chirr ...	272
ARTICLE XXII.—St. Molaïsse, Son of Aedh ...	272
ARTICLE XXIII.—St. Mochua, Son of Nemain ...	273

Fifth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SEDNA, OF KILL-AINE. [ Sixth or Seventh Century. ] ...	273
ARTICLE II.—St. Setna, Sidonius, or Sedna, of Druim-mac-ubla, County of Meath. [ Fifth or Sixth Century. ] ...	274
ARTICLE III.—St. Lughaidh, of Cill-Cuile, or Kilcoole, probably in the County of Wicklow ...	275
ARTICLE IV.—Festival of St. Mella, said to have been Abbess of Doire Melle ...	276
ARTICLE V.—St. Brigid, Daughter of Doma, in the Plain of the Liffy ...	276
ARTICLE VI.—St. Brigid, of Mona Milain ...	277
ARTICLE VII.—St. Colman, or Colmus, or Colmoc, Bishop of the Orkney Islands, Scotland ...	277
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of a St. Maccaldus, Bishop in the Isle of Man. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	278
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Carecha, Dergamensis, of Clonburren, Parish of Moore, and County of Roscommon. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	278
ARTICLE X.—St. Dioma, Dima, or Dimma ...	279
ARTICLE XI.—Festival of the Forty Martyrs of Sebasten, Lesser Armenia. [ Fourth Century. ] ...	279
ARTICLE XII.—Reputed Festival of St. Senanus. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	279
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Tosa, or Tossanus, of Droma Laidcinn, or, of Druim-Ladhgein ...	280
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Colman, or Cluana Tibrin, or Clontivrin, County of Fermanagh ...	280
ARTICLE XV.—Reputed Festival of a St. Kenneth, Kenzie, or Canice ...	280
ARTICLE XVI.—St. Sillan, Sillanus, or Sylvanus ...	280
ARTICLE XVII.—St. Bosa, Bishop of the Deiri, at York, England. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	281

Tenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SILVESTER, OR SYLVESTRUS, BISHOP, AND EARLY APOSTLE OF IRELAND. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	282
ARTICLE II.—St. Ferfugil, or Fearfughuil, Bishop, or Abbot, of Clondalkin, County of Dublin. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	283
ARTICLE III.—St. Kessog, Mackessog, or Makkessagus, Bishop, and Confessor, Patron of Lennox, Scotland. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	285
ARTICLE IV.—St. Setna or Sedna, Bishop, and Confessor. [ Supposed to have lived in the Sixth Century. ] ...	287
ARTICLE V.—Reputed Festival of a St. Sedonius, Bishop, and a Disciple of St. Senan, Abbot of Scatterry Island. [ Probably in the Sixth Century. ] ...	287
ARTICLE VI.—St. Hymelin, or Himelinus, Confessor, of Vissenaeken, Brabant. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	288
ARTICLE VII.—St. Colman, of Clontibrin, or Clontivrin, County of Fermanagh ...	290
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of a St. Saran or Seranus ...	291
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Bosa, Archbishop of York, England. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	291
ARTICLE X.—St. Emilian, or Emilianus, Abbot of Lagny, France. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	291
ARTICLE XI.—Reputed Festival of St. Congell, or St. Congell, Abbot ...	292
ARTICLE XII.—The Sons of Torman ...	292
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Feidhlímid, or Failbhe II., Abbot of Iona. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	292
ARTICLE XIV.—Reputed Festival of St. Bessogus, a Bishop ...	293
ARTICLE XV.—Reputed Festival of a St. Livenus ...	293

CONTENTS.

ARTICLE XVI.—Festival of St. Constantine ...	Page 293
ARTICLE XVII.—Reputed Festival of St. Kennocha, Virgin, Coila, Scotland. [ Tenth or Eleventh Century. ] ...	294
ARTICLE XVIII.—Reputed Festival of St. Attala, Abbot of Bobbio, Italy ...	294

Eleventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ÆNGUSIUS HAGIOGRAPHUS, OR ST. ÆNGUS THE CULDEE, BISHOP AND ABBOT AT CLONENAGH, AND ANCHORET, AT DYSARTENOS, OR AT DYSARTBEAGH, QUEEN'S COUNTY. [ Eighth and Ninth Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Sources of Biography to illustrate the Acts of St. Ængus—His Pedigree and early Life—He studies at the Monastery of Clonenagh—Monastic Training and Learning—St. Ængus retires to Dysartbetagh or to Dysart Enos—His Austerities—He visits the Church of Coolbanagher—A Vision of Angels—The Purpose it evoked ... CHAP. II.—St. Ængus proceeds to the Monastery of Tallagh—He seeks Admission there in Guise of a Servant—Manual Labour at agricultural Operations—His Humility and Mortifications—An Accident which befel him, and his miraculous Cure—The Incident which first discovered St. Ængus to the holy Abbot St. Melruan—Friendship thenceforth existing between them—St. Ængus was probably ordained Priest at Tallagh ... CHAP. III.—Literary Pursuits of St. Ængus—The Martyrology of Tallagh—He engages on the Felire or Festiloggy—Presents a Copy of it to Fothadius the Canonist—Probable Date, Origin, and Object of the Feilire—Treatise of St. Ængus, “De Sanctis Hiberniæ”—The “Saltair-na-Rann”—Pedigrees or Catalogues of Irish Saints, and Poems attributed to his Authorship ... CHAP. IV.—Modes of Life at Tallagh, until the Time arrived for Departure—St. Ængus returns to Clonenagh, where he is chosen as Abbot—Supposed to have been a Chorepiscopus—Occasional Retirement to Dysart Enos or to Dysertbeagh—His Death and Burial—Value of St. Ængus' Hagiographical Works—Conclusion ...	294 302 306 312
ARTICLE II.—St. Constantine, King and Martyr, in Scotland, and a Monk at Rahen, King's County. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	318
ARTICLE III.—St. Libren or Libern of Cluainfoda, now probably Clonsfad, County of Westmeath. [ Sixth or Seventh Century. ] ...	325
ARTICLE IV.—St. Liobran or Libran, said to have been Abbot of Iona, but more probably he was Abbot of Durrow, King's County ...	326
ARTICLE V.—St. Finchanus, Finnichen, or Finchan, reputed to have been Abbot of Ardchaoin ...	327
ARTICLE VI.—St. Cuanda the Blind ...	327
ARTICLE VII.—Reputed Festival of a St. Eudonus, or Endenus, Abbot ...	328
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Moshenoc, or Senocus, also called Senan, and Kessogus, of Beitheach ...	328
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Gellocus or Kellocus ...	328

Twelfth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MURA, MURUS, OR MURANUS, ABBOT AND PATRON OF FAHAN, COUNTY OF DONEGAL. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	Page 329
---	-------------

CONTENTS.

	Page
ARTICLE II.—St. Kennanack, or Ceannannach, of Inis Meadhoin, or Middle Island, of Aran, and Patron of Ballynakill Parish, County of Galway ...	332
ARTICLE III.—Reputed Festival of St. Garalt, of Maigh Eo, now Mayo, with his Companions. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	334
ARTICLE IV.—Reputed Festival of a St. Mochua, Ailiun, or Ailuin ...	334
ARTICLE V.—Festival of St. Culan, or Dachuaillen, Bishop, son of Guaire. [ Possibly in the Seventh Century. ] ...	334
ARTICLE VI.—Festival of Pope St. Gregory the Great, Confessor and Doctor. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	334
ARTICLE VII.—St. Melcoirgeas, or Maelcorghais ...	335
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Cillin, or Killian, of Lilcach ...	335
ARTICLE IX.—Festival of St. Dagan, Bishop of Achadh-Dagan, or Ennereilly, County of Wicklow. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	335
ARTICLE X.—Festival of the Blessed Bryan Boroimhe, King of Ireland and Martyr. [ Tenth and Eleventh Centuries. ] ...	336
ARTICLE XI.—Festival of St. Kessog, Mackessog, or Mackessagus, Bishop and Confessor, Patron of Lennox, Scotland. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	336
ARTICLE XII.—St. Coman, Commanus, or Corman, Presbyter of Iona, Scotland. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	336
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Fetchuon, Fiechnon, also called Fethuo, Fethchua, Fiechno and Fetno, Confessor and Missionary among the Scots and Picts. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	337
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Indrechtach or Innrechtach O'Finachtain, Abbot of Iona, Scotland, and Martyr. [ Ninth Century. ] ...	338

Thirteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCHÆMHOG, OR MOCHÆMOC, ALSO CALLED PULCHERIUS, ABBOT OF LIATH-MORE, OR LIATH-MOCHÆMHOG, NOW LEIGH, IN THE PARISH OF TWO MILE BORRIS, COUNTY OF TIPPERARY. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Various Acts of St. Mochæmoc—His Parentage, Birth and early Education—His Studies and Ordination, at Bangor—He is sent to found a Monastery, which he erects at Annatrim ...	338
CHAP. II.—St. Mochæmoc goes to Anatrium, which he leaves, and next proceeds to Helia—He visits Cluain-Mor, and a Chief, living at Raith-Eanaigh—The territorial King of Helia receives him, and bestows on him a desert Place—Here the Balban sounds—Liath-Mor and its existing Ruins—The Chief of Helia dies, and he is succeeded by Ronan—Miraculous Incidents recorded ...	342
CHAP. III.—The Chieftain Suibhne's Repentance—Failbhe Flann Beg, King of Munster, at Cashel—His Punishment and Vision—Various Miracles ascribed to the Merits of St. Mochæmoc ...	348
CHAP. IV.—St. Mochæmoc's Acquaintance and Transactions, in reference to Saints Canice, Dagan, Mochumba, Molua, Mofechta, Furse, Dyma, Cuancheir, and Cainer, as also to the Chiefs Colman, Ænguss, Feidelim, Cuan, and Scanlan—St. Mochæmoc's Death and Burial—His Festival and Memorials—Conclusion ...	353
ARTICLE II.—Festival of a reputed St. Kevoca, in Scotland ...	359
ARTICLE III.—St. Gerald or Garalt, Abbot of Eliteria, and Bishop of Mayo, County of Mayo. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	361
ARTICLE IV.—St. Conchenna, Conchend, or Coincheand, Virgin, of Kill-Slebbe, or Killevey, County of Armagh. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	366
ARTICLE V.—St. Cuangus, Abbot of Liethmore, or Leigh, County of Tipperary. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	367

CONTENTS.

	Page
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Feast of Colman, benedic., Cluana tibrinn, or Clontivrin, County of Fermanagh. ...	367
ARTICLE VII.—Reputed Feast of St. Canoc, or Canocus, Abbot and Confessor, of Brechinia, in Wales. [ Fifth or Sixth Century. ] ...	367
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of a St. Viganus. [ Tenth and Eleventh Centuries. ] ...	368

Fourteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. TALMACH, CONFESSOR. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	368
ARTICLE II.—St. Flannan of Cill-Ard ...	370
ARTICLE III.—St. Ultan, of H. Aignigh, or, of Maghnidh ...	370
ARTICLE IV.—Festival of St. Dionysius, the Bishop, and of St. Salvator ...	371
ARTICLE V.—St. Camhan, or Ceman ...	371
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Festival of a St. Medothus, or St. Methodius, Confessor ...	372
ARTICLE VII.—St. Cuimnech, Cuinnech, or Cuimnig ...	372
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of St. Kenoce ...	373
ARTICLE IX.—St. Brigida, or Brigid ...	373
ARTICLE X.—Reputed Festival of St. Comnanus, Abbot of Iona, Scotland ...	373

Fifteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—SAINTS DICHULL, MUNISSA, AND NESLUG, BROTHERS, OF INIS-MEIC NESSAN, OR IRELAND'S EYE, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	373
ARTICLE II.—Festival of the Apostles, St. Luke and St. James. [ First Century. ] ...	379
ARTICLE III.—The Three Daughters of Eltin ...	379
ARTICLE IV.—St. Eugenius or Eoghan ...	379
ARTICLE V.—Festival of St. Aldetrude, or Aldeturdis, Virgin and Abbess of Malbod, or Maubeuge, Belgium. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	380
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Festival of a St. Conlæth, or Conleatus, Bishop of Soder... ...	380
ARTICLE VII.—Reputed Festival of St. Fethno, Fetchuon, Fiechnon, Fethuo, Fethchuo, Fiechno or Fetno, Confessor and Missionary among the Scots and Picts. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	380
ARTICLE VIII.—Festival of St. Albuinus, Bishop, and Apostle of Turingia, Upper Saxony. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	380

Sixteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FINIAN LOBHAIR, OR THE LEPER, ABBOT OF SWORDS, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [ Sixth or Seventh Century. ] ...
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Acts of St. Finian—His Family and Place of Birth—His early Years, Education and Ordination—He founds a Monastery beside a Lake—And he performs many Miracles—Innisfallen ...	381
CHAP. II.—St. Finian leaves the Monastery by the Lake, and goes elsewhere—He visits Swords, and there receives Charge of its Monastery from St. Columkille—Miracles recorded—His Death—His Memorials, and Places said to have been under his Patronage—Conclusion ...	388
ARTICLE II.—Festival of St. Abban, Abbot of Magharnaidhe, said to have been Adamstown, County of Wexford. [ Sixth or Seventh Century. ] ...	394
ARTICLE III.—Festival of St. Eugenia, Martyr, at Nicomedia, in Bithynia ...	395
ARTICLE IV.—St. Feithmech or Felmac, of Cill-Toama, now Kiltoom, County of Westmeath ...	395
ARTICLE V.—St. Curitan, Bishop and Abbot of Ros-Meinn ...	396
ARTICLE VI.—Festival of a reputed St. Bairrionn, or Barrindus, Bishop ...	396

CONTENTS.

ARTICLE VII.—St. Deneg, of Inis Sedna	...	...	Page
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Aedhan, Bishop of Lismore, County of Waterford. [ Probably in the Eighth Century. ]	...	...	396
ARTICLE IX.—Feast of the Translation of the Saints, at Bobbio Monastery, Italy	...	...	396
ARTICLE X.—Feast of a reputed St. Abben, Hermit, of Abingdon, England	...	...	397
ARTICLE XI.—Supposed Feast of the Deposition of St. Patrick, Bishop and Confessor, at Auvergne, France	...	...	398

Sebenteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—THE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK, APOSTLE AND CHIEF PATRON OF IRELAND. [ Fourth and Fifth Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—The genuine and spurious Writings ascribed to St. Patrick, as serving to illustrate his Biography—Acts and Lives of St. Patrick yet extant, in various Collections and Manuscripts—The Biographies already published—Other Sources left, for investigating the Facts of his History	...	399
CHAP. II.—Various Conjectures as to the Country of St. Patrick's Birth—The ancient Extent of Britain—Different Localities assigned for the Irish Apostle's Birthplace—France, Scotland, Wales and England contend for this Honour—Examination of the Question	...	436
CHAP. III.—The Parents and Family of Patrick—Examination of their recorded Names, and of our Saint's Genealogy and Pedigree—Different Opinions regarding the Year of his Birth—His Baptism—Miracles then wrought—St. Patrick's early Childhood	...	469
CHAP. IV.—The early Dialects of the British Islands—Their disturbed social Relations—St. Patrick's Youth and his Errors—The Event which led to his first Captivity, about the Age of Sixteen—Niall of the Nine Hostages—Misfortunes occurring to St. Patrick's Family—He becomes a Slave to Milchuio, in the North of Ireland—His Manner of Life there—His Escape from Captivity and subsequent Adventures	...	484
CHAP. V.—St. Patrick's Age and the Time when he escaped to Gaul—His second Captivity—His Vision—His Resolution to embrace the clerical State—He seeks the Monastery of Tours, to prepare for it—Life at Marmoutier—St. Patrick's Promotion to Holy Orders—His heavenly Inspirations—He studies under St. Germanus of Auxerre—His Life in Italy—The Tyrrhene Islands—The Staff of Jesus	...	501
CHAP. VI.—St. Patrick's Reception of Holy Orders—His supposed missionary Labours at Boulogne—His Mission with Saints Germanus and Lupus to Great Britain—Their Return to Gaul—St. Palladius in Ireland—St. Patrick proceeds to Italy—His Consecration as Bishop—St. Patrick said to have been an Augustinian—Destined for his Mission to Ireland, by the Pope	...	518
CHAP. VII.—State of Society when St. Patrick arrived in our Island—Druidic Predictions—The Date for Patrick's Arrival—He lands on the eastern Coast of Leinster—Repelled by the Natives—He then sails towards the North—The Saint touches at Inis Phadraig—He arrives at Lecale—Enquiry regarding the Place of his Debarkation	...	534
CHAP. VIII.—The Irish Apostle's Arrival at Saul—Soothsayers' Predictions regarding his Coming—King Laoghaire's Instructions—Opposition and Conversion of Dichuo or Dichu—St. Patrick erects a Church at

CONTENTS.

	Page
Saul—Punishment of a Magician—St. Patrick visits his former Master, Milchu, but fails in effecting his Conversion—Territorial Position of the Cruithni and Dalaradians—St. Patrick returns to Dichu—He receives Ross, or Rus, into the Church—He instructs and baptizes Mochoe, afterwards Bishop of Island Mahee—St. Patrick releases the Sons of Dichu from Captivity ...	544
CHAP. IX.—The Holy Apostle resolves on setting out for Tara—His Journey thither—He proceeds to Slane—King Laoghaire and his Magicians—The Druids—The Feis of Tara—Antiquarian Remains there—The Hymn attributed to St. Patrick, on approaching Tara—He appears before the Assembly—Hercus or Erc does Honour to the Saint—Dubtach, the chief Poet, becomes a Convert—Arts of the Magicians—How King Laoghaire receives the Tidings of Salvation—The Shamrock ...	554
CHAP. X.—Religious Toleration accorded to St. Patrick—St. Loman or Lumman—St. Patrick visits Tailtean—His Reception by King Laoighaire's Brothers, Cairbre and Connell—St. Patrick's solemn Baptism—His reputed Foundations in Meath—His Mission in Westmeath—Usneach Hill—He visits Longford—He resolves to set out for Connaught—His Passage through Leitrim—Destruction of the Idol Crom-Cruach, at Magh Sleacht ...	565
CHAP. XI.—The Irish Apostle resolves to visit Connaught—He crosses the Shannon—The Druids Moel and Caplat—Patrick preaches the Gospel to those People, living in Roscommon—St. Ascicus—Conversion of Ethnea and Fethlimia, the Daughters of King Laoighaire—Labours of St. Patrick in Tir-Chairedha and Hy-Many ...	584
CHAP. XII.—St. Patrick advances to the Territory of Gregraidhe, where he founds two Churches—He next visits Airteach and Arnen, Conmaicne and Cera—Thence he proceeds towards Umail, where he built a Church at Aghagower—St. Patrick then engages in a spiritual Retreat on the Summit of Croughan-ailche—Afterwards it was called Crough-Patrick—Its Situation and Appearance—Legends regarding what occurred, at this Place—He celebrates the Pasch at Aghagower, and then goes successively to Corcathemne, to Mag-Mac-Erca, and to Tir-Amalgaidh—Great Success of his Mission—He founds Killala and other Churches—He journeys through Hy-Fiachrach ...	593
CHAP. XIII.—The holy Man visits Sligeach and Calraighe—He meets with Opposition, but overcomes it—He proceeds towards the Boyle River—His successive Missions about Druimdaire, Glinne, Druim-Cliahb and Magh-ene—He spends seven Years in preaching, and in administering Church Affairs, within the Connaught Province ...	618
CHAP. XIV.—St. Patrick leaves Connaught and proceeds towards Donegal—His Mission in Tir-Aodha—Favourably received there by the Dynast Conall Gulban—Lough Dearg and its Pilgrimage—St. Patrick leaves for Tir-Eoghain—Honourably treated by the Dynast Eugenius—He next visits Ailech—Churches Founded in Inishowen, and near Derry—The two Mac-Carthinns—St. Patrick advances towards the River Bann, afterwards so remarkable for its Abundance of Fish ...	626
CHAP. XV.—St. Patrick visits the Territories of Dalriada and of Dalaradia—He preaches in Dalriada—He founds

CONTENTS.

	Page
Churches there and in Dalaradia—His Mission near Lough Neagh, at Hy Tuirtre, and at Imchclair ...	644
CHAP. XVI.—The Irish Apostle founds Churches in Hy-Bruin, and at Tulach-Maine—He preaches at Finn-Abhuir—He visits the Oirgaillians—Eochaid Mac Crimthainn and his Children—Clogher and its Neighbourhood—St. Maccaerthenn is placed over the See, established at Clogher—Description of Altadaven—Mission in Hua-Meithtire—St. Patrick visits the People of Mughdornia—The Conversion of their Chieftain, Victor—St. Patrick is opposed, by the People of Fera-Rois ...	663
CHAP. XVII.—St. Patrick revisits Meath—The Hymn of St. Secundinus—St. Patrick is said to have passed from Meath towards Dublin—He visits Naas—Miracles recorded, in Connexion with both Places—His Journeys to Hy-Garchon, and through Magh Liffe—Churches said to have been founded by him, in the present County of Kildare ...	676
CHAP. XVIII.—St. Patrick approaches Leix—Design on his Life and providential Escape—He next visits Dubtach in Hy-Kinsellach—He consecrates St. Fiach as Bishop of Sletty—Crimthain, son of Enda Kinsellagh, patronizes his Efforts and founds many Churches—St. Patrick then visits the Ossorian District ...	689
CHAP. XIX.—Missionaries in Munster, before the Visit of St. Patrick to that Province—His Preaching at Cashel, and the Conversion of King Angus with his People—St. Patrick visits Muscraighe-Breogain and Hi-Cuanach—He goes to Arachliach and to Hy-Fidhgente, so far as the River Shannon, and then he returns towards Eastern Munster ...	697
CHAP. XX.—St. Patrick proceeds towards Southern Munster—His Mission among the Desii—He visits Muscraige-Thire—Results of his Labours in Munster—He blesses and takes leave of the People ...	707
CHAP. XXI.—The providential Escape of St. Patrick, while passing through Hy-Failge, and Martyrdom of his Charioteer, Odhran—The Apostle returns to Lecale—Judgment visited on Trian—Conversion of Machaldus, and his subsequent Mission in the Isle of Man—Drumbo—Euchodius, King in Ulster—His Son, St. Domangart—St. Patrick lays the Foundation of a Church, at Louth; but, he is warned by an Angel, to found his great Cathedral, at Armagh ...	713
CHAP. XXII.—St. Patrick is said to have presided over the See of Clogher—He is reported to have visited Britain, and the Isle of Man—Baptism of the Princess Munessa—St. Patrick returns to Ireland—He journeys towards Armagh, and receives from Daire the Site for his great Cathedral—St. Patrick measures out its Boundaries—Various wonderful Events are recorded, after its Establishment ...	722
CHAP. XXIII.—Enquiry regarding St. Patrick's Journey to Rome, after the Foundation of Armagh—Coroticus—Miraculous Occurrences—Reputed Resignation of the See, at Armagh, to St. Benignus ...	737
CHAP. XXIV.—The Irish Apostle's missionary Labours, Habits, and devotional Exercises—The Councils and Synods of St. Patrick—Various Miracles wrought by the holy Man—His Consecrations and Ordinations—Enumeration of his Officials and Disciples ...	747
CHAP. XXV.—Presumed Connexion of the Irish Apostle with the Monastery at Glastonbury examined—St. Patrick's Confession—The various prose Tracts and Irish

CONTENTS.

	Page
Poems attributed to him, or having Reference to his History ... ..	771
CHAP. XXVI.—St. Patrick's Prediction, that St. Benignus should succeed him in the See of Armagh—The Irish Apostle receives a Warning from Heaven, regarding his Death, and where it should take place—He departs this Life at Saul—His funeral Obsequies—Dispute concerning the Possession of his sacred Remains determined by a Miracle—His Burial at Downpatrick ... ..	778
CHAP. XXVII.—The Year of St. Patrick's Death—His Age—Churches, Chapels and Religious Institutions, dedicated to St. Patrick, in Ireland, and in distant Countries—Veneration accorded him in Calendars, Martyrologies, and Church Offices—Relics and Memorials of Ireland's Apostle—Conclusion ... ..	795
ARTICLE II.—St. Becan, Eremitic. [ Seventh Century. ] ... ..	831
ARTICLE III.—St. Nesson of Cork. [ Probably in the Fifth Century. ] ... ..	832
ARTICLE IV.—St. Conchend ... ..	833
ARTICLE V.—St. Gobban, son of Nascaín, and Bishop ... ..	833
ARTICLE VI.—St. Faltigern or Faoltigern, Virgin ... ..	834
ARTICLE VII.—St. Tigernach ... ..	834
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of Colonatus, Presbyter, and Totuanus Dianus, at Wurtzburg ... ..	834

Eighteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. COMMAN, OR CAIMAN, CONFESSOR. [ Possibly of the Seventh Century. ] ... ..	834
ARTICLE II.—St. Ercrect, or Egbert, a Saxon. [ Probably in the Eighth Century. ] ... ..	836
ARTICLE III.—St. Connal, Bishop of Killconnal, and of Aughrim, County of Galway. [ Supposed to be of the Fifth Century. ] ... ..	837
ARTICLE IV.—St. Moedoc, or Maedhog, of Cluain-esgrach ... ..	838
ARTICLE V.—St. Toman, or Thoman, Bishop ... ..	839
ARTICLE VI.—St. Christianus, or Giolla Criost O'Conarchy, first Abbot of Mellifont, County of Louth. [ Twelfth Century. ] ... ..	839
ARTICLE VII.—St. Caemhan, the Holy ... ..	842
ARTICLE VIII.—Natalis of St. Frigidian, or Frigidian, Bishop, and Patron of Lucca, Italy. [ Sixth Century. ] ... ..	842
ARTICLE IX.—St. Commaneth, of Kilcomenty Parish, County of Tipperary ... ..	842
ARTICLE X.—St. Finan ... ..	843
ARTICLE XI.—Festival of St. Timothy, and of his Companions, Martyrs ... ..	844

Nineteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. LACTEAN, OR LACTINUS, ABBOT OF FRESHFORD, COUNTY OF KILKENNY. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ... ..	844
ARTICLE II.—The Feast of St. Joseph, Confessor, the Fosterer of our Lord Jesus Christ ... ..	850
ARTICLE III.—The Feast of St. Gregory ... ..	850
ARTICLE IV.—St. Mella, Cluana hi, or of Cluain-hi ... ..	851
ARTICLE V.—St. Mochua, of Arasnai, or Airisna ... ..	851
ARTICLE VI.—Feast of St. Auxilius, Bishop of Kilossey, County of Kildare. [ Fifth Century. ] ... ..	851
ARTICLE VII.—Reputed Festival of St. Gero, Cologne, Germany. [ Tenth Century. ] ... ..	852
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Feast of St. Mansuet, a Bishop of the Britons. [ Fifth Century. ] ... ..	853

Twentieth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. CUTHBERT, BISHOP OF LINDISFARNE. [ Seventh Century. ] CHAP. I.—Introduction—Venerable Bede's Life of St. Cuth-

CONTENTS.

	Page
bert—Other Authorities and Acts relating to this holy Man—Question about the Country of his Birth—Traditions regarding the Irish Locality for his Nativity, Origin and Family ...	853
CHAP. II.—St. Cuthbert becomes a Shepherd in early Youth, and he is falsely accused of a Crime—His youthful Sports—Efficacy of his Prayers—His miraculous Vision and Vocation—He enters the Monastery of Melrose—He is afterwards appointed Guest-Master in a Monastery, founded at Ripon—Cuthbert's Deportment and Virtues—With other Monks, he is expelled from this House, and on the Death of St. Boisilus, he succeeds as Prior—His missionary Labours ...	868
CHAP. III.—Studies at Melrose—St. Cuthbert is transferred to become Prior at Lindisfarne—He chooses to lead an eremitical Life, in the Island of Farne—His Labours and Austerities—He is elected Bishop of Lindisfarne—King Egfrid's Grants to St. Cuthbert—The holy Man's Prophecy and Vision regarding the Death of King Egfrid—Cuthbert's Predictions and Miracles ...	879
CHAP. IV.—Prophetic Warning of Cuthbert's approaching Death—His Vision at Abbess Elfleda's Convent—He retires to Lindisfarne, in Preparation for his Departure—His last Illness and Instructions to his Monks—St. Cuthbert's holy Death—Deposition of his Remains, and various Removals of his Shrine—The Cathedral of Durham—Desecration of St. Cuthbert's Shrine in the Sixteenth Century—Subsequent Explorations to discover his Remains—Calendar Commemorations, Churches and Chapels built to honour him—Writings and Memorials—Conclusion ...	890
ARTICLE II.—Reputed Festival of Clemens, sometimes called Claudius Clemens Scotus. [ Eighth and Ninth Centuries. ] ...	904
ARTICLE III.—St. Himelinus, Confessor ...	909
ARTICLE IV.—St. Caman, or Conan, or Conarius, son of Corre ...	909
ARTICLE V.—St. Aedhan, of Cluain-maelain, probably, Clonmellon, County of Westmeath ...	909
ARTICLE VI.—Muccin, or Muccinus ...	910
ARTICLE VII.—St. Cathcan, Bishop of Rath-derthaighe ...	910
ARTICLE VIII.—Festival of St. Polycronus, and of his Companions, Martyrs ...	910
ARTICLE IX.—St. Elimia, or Felimia ...	910
ARTICLE X.—Reputed Festival of Lactinus, or Lacinus, a Bishop and Confessor, in Ireland ...	911
ARTICLE XI.—Reputed Festival of St. Mochta, Bishop of Lughmagh, or Louth, County of Louth. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	911
ARTICLE XII.—St. Cormanus, or Cornanus. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	911

Twenty-first Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ENDEUS OR ENDA, ABBOT OF ARRAN, COUNTY OF GALWAY. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.]

CHAP. I.—Introduction—Birth and Family of St. Endeus—He succeeds his Father as Regulus of Oriel—He is persuaded to become a Religious—He visits Rosnat and Rome—He is ordained Priest, and he returns to Ireland, where he founds Monasteries—From his Brother-in-Law, Ængus, King of Munster, he obtains a Grant of the Aran Islands...

CHAP. II.—St. Endeus leaves Cashel, and afterwards, he sets out for the Arann Islands—Killeany Church in

CONTENTS.

	Page
Clare—Endeus founds his Church and Monastery, on Aranmore Island, at Killeany—Ecclesiastical Divisions on Aran—Miraculous Gifts from Heaven—The numerous Disciples of our Saint	914
CHAP. III.—Strict Rule of St. Endeus—He visits the adjoining Coast of Galway, and afterwards he returns to Aran—His Death—Festival Day and his Commemoration—Conclusion...	918
ARTICLE II.—St. Isenger, Bishop of Verden, Saxony. [ Ninth Century. ]	921
ARTICLE III.—St. Luicheall, son of Ciaran	922
ARTICLE IV.—St. Momhanna, Virgin	922

Twenty-second Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FAILBEUS, OR FAILBHE, EIGHTH ABBOT OF IONA, SCOTLAND. [ Seventh Century. ]	923
ARTICLE II.—St. Darerca, Sister of St. Patrick. [ Fifth Century. ]	923
ARTICLE III.—St. Trien, or Trienan, Abbot of Killelga. [ Fifth or Sixth Century. ]	925
ARTICLE IV.—St. Molocca, or Molocus, son of Colman Finn, of Lilcach	926
ARTICLE V.—Feast of St. Secundus	926
ARTICLE VI.—St. Dimma, or Diomma	927
ARTICLE VII.—Egressio Familiæ Brendini, or Departure of St. Brendan, and of his Monks, from Ireland. [ Sixth Century. ]	927
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of Illinus	927
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Dagam, a Bishop	927
ARTICLE X.—St. Deghitché, or Deghitchi, Virgin	928
ARTICLE XI.—The Blessed Brianus, King and Martyr. [ Tenth and Eleventh Centuries. ]	928
ARTICLE XII.—St. Ibar, or Ibarus, Bishop and Confessor	928

Twenty-third Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MAIDOC, OR MOMHAEDOG, ABBOT OF FIDDOWN, COUNTY OF KILKENNY. [ Sixth Century. ]	929
ARTICLE II.—St. Trianus, a Roman Bishop. [ Fifth Century. ]	931
ARTICLE III.—St. Trenan, of Kill-daalen, Monk. [ Supposed to belong to the Sixth Century. ]	932
ARTICLE IV.—St. Darerca, a Virgin	933
ARTICLE V.—The Daughter or Daughters of Feradhach	934
ARTICLE VI.—St. Lassair, or Lassar, Daughter of Fintain	934
ARTICLE VII.—St. Mocholla, Virgin	934
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Mainchain, or Manchen	934
ARTICLE IX.—St. Fergusa, or Fergass	934
ARTICLE X.—St. Cairlain, or Cairlanus	934
ARTICLE XI.—St. Failbe, or Failbeus	935
ARTICLE XII.—St. Ciannat, Virgin	935
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Baetan, or Boetan, of Kill-Boedain, or Shilvodan, County of Antrim. [ Sixth Century. ]	935
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Fingar, or Guigner, and St. Píala, Virgin, with their Companions, Martyrs, in Britain. [ Fifth Century. ]	936

Twenty-fourth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. DOMANGARD, OR DONARD, PATRON OF RATH-MURBHOLG, OR MAGHERA, COUNTY OF DOWN. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]	936
ARTICLE II.—St. Caimin, Abbot of Inis-caltra, on Lough Derg, County of Clare. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ]	941
ARTICLE III.—St. Scire, or Sgire, Virgin, of Cill-Sgire, now Kilskyre, County of Meath. [ Sixth Century. ]	945

CONTENTS.

	Page
ARTICLE IV.—Reputed Festival of St. Montan, of Kill-mantain, County of Wicklow. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	946
ARTICLE V.—St. Lughaidh, son of Eochaidh, of Cluain-laogh, now Clonleigh, County of Donegal. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	946
ARTICLE VI.—St. Fergusa ...	947
ARTICLE VII.—Feast of St. Manchan, of Lemanaghan, King's County ...	947
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Cairlon, or Caorlan, Archbishop of Armagh, County of Armagh. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	947
ARTICLE IX.—St. Mochteus, or Mochta, Bishop of Lugmagh, or Louth. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	949
ARTICLE X.—St. Maccarthenn, Bishop of Clogher, or supposed by some to be St. Maccarthenn, Patron of Domnach-mor Muighe-tochuir, or Donagh Parish, County of Donegal. [ Probably Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	949
ARTICLE XI.—Festivals of Bishop Mac Cairthinn and of Maeldotus ...	949
ARTICLE XII.—Festival of St. Patrick, Archbishop ...	950
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Dunchad, or Donat, Abbot of Iona. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	950

Twenty-fifth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ENAN, OR ENANUS, OF DRUIM-INDICH, OR DRUMEENY, COUNTY OF ANTRIM. [ Probably in the Fifth or Sixth Century. ] ...	950
ARTICLE II.—St. Columba, Daughter of Baoit ...	952
ARTICLE III.—Festival of St. Cammin, Abbot of Innis-caltra, County of Clare. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	952
ARTICLE IV.—The Incarnation and Crucifixion of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Martyrdom of the Apostle St. James ...	952
ARTICLE V.—St. Lucella ...	953
ARTICLE VI.—Festival of St. Kilian, a Bishop, and of Theotmanus, a Deacon. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	953

Twenty-sixth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCHELLOC, OR CELLOC, PATRON OF KILMALLOCH, COUNTY OF LIMERICK. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	953
ARTICLE II.—St. Sincheall, Abbot of Cill-achaidhdromfota, now Killeagh, King's County. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	958
ARTICLE III.—St. Garbhan, of Dungarvan, County of Waterford, or of Aghold, County of Wicklow. [ Supposed to belong to the Sixth or Seventh Century. ] ...	960
ARTICLE IV.—St. Gobban, Abbot, of Ard-Dairinnsi ...	961
ARTICLE V.—St. Lappan, or Lappanus ...	962
ARTICLE VI.—Feast of St. Fintan, a Bishop ...	962
ARTICLE VII.—St. Mochta, of Inis-Mochta, now Inishmouthy, or Inishmot, County of Meath. [ Ninth and Tenth Centuries. ] ...	962
ARTICLE VIII.—Feast of St. Corbmacc. [ Fifth or Sixth Century. ] ...	963
ARTICLE IX.—St. Cillen, or Killenus ...	963
ARTICLE X.—St. Carthach, son of Erbthaidhe, Bishop ...	963
ARTICLE XI.—St. Montanus ...	963
ARTICLE XII.—St. Ceanannan ...	964
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Molocca, or Molaga, of Lilcach, County of Meath ...	964

Twenty-seventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. GELASIVS, OR GIOLLA-MAC-LIAG, ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH, COUNTY OF ARMAGH. [ Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Authorities—Youth and early Education of St. Gelasius—He becomes a Canon and

CONTENTS.

	Page
Clare—Endeus founds his Church and Monastery, on Aranmore Island, at Killeany—Ecclesiastical Divisions on Aran—Miraculous Gifts from Heaven—The numerous Disciples of our Saint	914
CHAP. III.—Strict Rule of St. Endeus—He visits the adjoining Coast of Galway, and afterwards he returns to Aran—His Death—Festival Day and his Commemoration—Conclusion...	918
ARTICLE II.—St. Isenger, Bishop of Verden, Saxony. [ Ninth Century. ]	921
ARTICLE III.—St. Luicheall, son of Ciaran	922
ARTICLE IV.—St. Momhanna, Virgin	922

Twenty-second Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FAILBEUS, OR FAILBHE, EIGHTH ABBOT OF IONA, SCOTLAND. [ Seventh Century. ]	923
ARTICLE II.—St. Darerca, Sister of St. Patrick. [ Fifth Century. ]	923
ARTICLE III.—St. Trien, or Trienan, Abbot of Killelga. [ Fifth or Sixth Century. ]	925
ARTICLE IV.—St. Molocca, or Molocus, son of Colman Finn, of Lilcach	926
ARTICLE V.—Feast of St. Secundus	926
ARTICLE VI.—St. Dimma, or Diomma	927
ARTICLE VII.—Egressio Familiæ Brendini, or Departure of St. Brendan, and of his Monks, from Ireland. [ Sixth Century. ]	927
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of Illinus	927
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Dagam, a Bishop	927
ARTICLE X.—St. Deghitche, or Deghitchi, Virgin	928
ARTICLE XI.—The Blessed Brianus, King and Martyr. [ Tenth and Eleventh Centuries. ]	928
ARTICLE XII.—St. Ibar, or Ibarus, Bishop and Confessor	928

Twenty-third Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MAIDOC, OR MOMHAEDOG, ABBOT OF FIDDOWN, COUNTY OF KILKENNY. [ Sixth Century. ]	929
ARTICLE II.—St. Trianus, a Roman Bishop. [ Fifth Century. ]	931
ARTICLE III.—St. Trenan, of Kill-daelen, Monk. [ Supposed to belong to the Sixth Century. ]	932
ARTICLE IV.—St. Darerca, a Virgin	933
ARTICLE V.—The Daughter or Daughters of Feradhach	934
ARTICLE VI.—St. Lassair, or Lassar, Daughter of Fintain	934
ARTICLE VII.—St. Mocholla, Virgin	934
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Mainchain, or Manchen	934
ARTICLE IX.—St. Fergusa, or Fergass	934
ARTICLE X.—St. Cairlain, or Cairlanus	934
ARTICLE XI.—St. Failbe, or Failbeus	935
ARTICLE XII.—St. Ciannat, Virgin	935
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Baetan, or Boetan, of Kill-Boedain, or Shilvodan, County of Antrim. [ Sixth Century. ]	935
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Fingar, or Guigner, and St. Piala, Virgin, with their Companions, Martyrs, in Britain. [ Fifth Century. ]	936

Twenty-fourth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. DOMANGARD, OR DONARD, PATRON OF RATH-MURBHOLG, OR MAGHERA, COUNTY OF DOWN. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]	936
ARTICLE II.—St. Caimin, Abbot of Inis-caltra, on Lough Derg, County of Clare. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ]	941
ARTICLE III.—St. Scire, or Sgire, Virgin, of Cill-Sgire, now Kilskyre, County of Meath. [ Sixth Century. ]	945

CONTENTS.

	Page
ARTICLE IV.—Reputed Festival of St. Montan, of Kill-mantain, County of Wicklow. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	946
ARTICLE V.—St. Lughaidh, son of Eochaidh, of Cluain-laogh, now Clonleigh, County of Donegal. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	946
ARTICLE VI.—St. Fergusa ...	947
ARTICLE VII.—Feast of St. Manchan, of Lemanaghan, King's County ...	947
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Cairlon, or Caorlan, Archbishop of Armagh, County of Armagh. [ Sixth Century. ] ...	947
ARTICLE IX.—St. Mochteus, or Mochta, Bishop of Lugmagh, or Louth. [ Fifth Century. ] ...	949
ARTICLE X.—St. Maccarthenn, Bishop of Clogher, or supposed by some to be St. Maccarthenn, Patron of Domnach-mor Muighe-tochuir, or Donagh Parish, County of Donegal. [ Probably Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	949
ARTICLE XI.—Festivals of Bishop Mac Cairthinn and of Maeldotus ...	949
ARTICLE XII.—Festival of St. Patrick, Archbishop ...	950
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Dunchad, or Donat, Abbot of Iona. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ] ...	950

Twenty-fifth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ENAN, OR ENANUS, OF DRUIM-INDICH, OR DRUMEENY, COUNTY OF ANTRIM. [ Probably in the Fifth or Sixth Century. ] ...	950
ARTICLE II.—St. Columba, Daughter of Baoit ...	952
ARTICLE III.—Festival of St. Cammin, Abbot of Innis-caltra, County of Clare. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	952
ARTICLE IV.—The Incarnation and Crucifixion of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Martyrdom of the Apostle St. James ...	952
ARTICLE V.—St. Lucella ...	953
ARTICLE VI.—Festival of St. Kilian, a Bishop, and of Theotmanus, a Deacon. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	953

Twenty-sixth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCHELLOC, OR CELLOC, PATRON OF KILMALLOCH, COUNTY OF LIMERICK. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	953
ARTICLE II.—St. Sincheall, Abbot of Cill-achaidhdromfota, now Killeagh, King's County. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ] ...	958
ARTICLE III.—St. Garbhan, of Dunganvan, County of Waterford, or of Aghold, County of Wicklow. [ Supposed to belong to the Sixth or Seventh Century. ] ...	960
ARTICLE IV.—St. Gobban, Abbot, of Ard-Dairinnsi ...	961
ARTICLE V.—St. Lappan, or Lappanus ...	962
ARTICLE VI.—Feast of St. Fintan, a Bishop ...	962
ARTICLE VII.—St. Mochta, of Inis-Mochta, now Inishmouthy, or Inishmot, County of Meath. [ Ninth and Tenth Centuries. ] ...	962
ARTICLE VIII.—Feast of St. Corbmacc. [ Fifth or Sixth Century. ] ...	963
ARTICLE IX.—St. Cillen, or Killenus ...	963
ARTICLE X.—St. Carthach, son of Erbthaidhe, Bishop ...	963
ARTICLE XI.—St. Montanus ...	963
ARTICLE XII.—St. Ceanannan ...	964
ARTICLE XIII.—St. Molocca, or Molaga, of Lilcach, County of Meath ...	964

Twenty-seventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. GELASIVS, OR GIOLLA-MAC-LIAG, ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH, COUNTY OF ARMAGH. [ Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries. ]
CHAP. I.—Introduction—Authorities—Youth and early Education of St. Gelasius—He becomes a Canon and

CONTENTS.

	Page
afterwards an Abbot at Derry—Called to the Primacy of Armagh—His Visitations and Works of Religion, Peace and Mercy	965
CHAP. II.—The Synods of Kells, of Mellifont, and of Brigh-Mac-Taidghe—Gelasius consecrates St. Laurence O'Toole—Synod at Clane—Convention at Athboy—Close of his Career—Death, Commemoration and Character	968
ARTICLE II.—St. Rudbert, or Rupert, Bishop of Saltzburgh. [ Seventh or Eighth Century. ]	972
ARTICLE III.—St. Suairlech, Bishop of Fore, County of Westmeath. [ Eighth Century. ]	978
ARTICLE IV.—St. Fintan or Fionntain, denominated, Mouth of the Psalms. [ Supposed to be of the Sixth or Seventh Century. ]	979
ARTICLE V.—St. Mochonna, of Magh-eo, now Mayo, County of Mayo	979
ARTICLE VI.—St. Siollan	979
ARTICLE VII.—Arrival of St. Sellan's Relics	980
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Archibaldus, Abbot and Confessor, in Anglia	980
ARTICLE IX.—Feast of the Re-collection of St. Wasnulp's Relics	980
ARTICLE X.—The Festival Day of Our Divine Lord's Resurrection	980
ARTICLE XI.—St. Cuniald, and St. Gisilarius, or Gillisanus, Companions of St. Rupert	981
ARTICLE XII.—St. Gumbert, or Gundibert, a French Martyr, in Ireland	981

Twenty-eighth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. CAIRNECH, BISHOP. [ Fifth and Sixth Centuries. ]	981
ARTICLE II.—St. Conald, or Conall, Bishop of Kilskyre, County of Meath. [ Ninth Century. ]	987
ARTICLE III.—St. Cassan, of Iomdual, or Imduall, and supposed to be of Donaghmore, County of Meath.	989
ARTICLE IV.—St. Sillan	990
ARTICLE V.—Feast of St. Mary Magdalene	990
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Feast of St. Fulartach, Bishop of Clonard. [ Eighth Century. ]	991
ARTICLE VII.—St. Kortillus, or Kortyla, Bishop of Verden, and Martyr	991
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of St. Chronanus	991
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Festival of St. Guthbertus	991

Twenty-ninth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FULARTACH, OR FULARTUS, BISHOP OF CLONARD. [ Eighth Century. ]	992
ARTICLE II.—St. Ferghas, son of Enda, of Inis-Caoim, Lough Erne	993
ARTICLE III.—Saints Eithene, Ethne, or Ethnea, and Sodheabh, Sodelbia, or Sodelvia, Virgins, of Tech-ingen-Baithe, near Swords, County of Dublin. [ Sixth Century. ]	994
ARTICLE IV.—St. Lasar, Lassar, or Lasseria, Virgin. [ Sixth Century. ]	996
ARTICLE V.—St. Eustace, or Eustasius, Abbot of Luxeu, France. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ]	998
ARTICLE VI.—St. Aedan, or Aedhan, of Derrybrughas, County of Armagh	1006
ARTICLE VII.—Festival of St. Gregory of Nazianzum	1006
ARTICLE VIII.—St. Mac Lubhnain, Physician	1007
ARTICLE IX.—Feast of a Reputed St. Lerra, Virgin	1007
ARTICLE X.—Reputed Festival of St. Baldred, Priest and Hermit, in Scotland. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ]	1007

Thirtieth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. TOLA, ABBOT AND BISHOP OF DISERT TOLA. [ Seventh and Eighth Centuries. ]	1008
ARTICLE II.—St. Fergus or Fergusius, Bishop of Downpatrick. [ Sixth Century. ]	1011

CONTENTS.

	Page
ARTICLE III.—St. Patto, Abbot of Amarbaric, and Bishop of Verden, in Saxony. [ Eighth and Ninth Centuries. ] ...	1014
ARTICLE IV.—St. Mochua or Cronan, Abbot of Balla, County of Mayo. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	1016
ARTICLE V.—St. Regulus, or St. Rule, Patron of St. Andrews, Scotland. [ Said to be of the Fourth Century, but, probably, he lived at a later period. ] ...	1021
ARTICLE VI.—St. Colman, son of Ronan ...	1025
ARTICLE VII.—St. Gobban ...	1025
ARTICLE VIII.—Reputed Festival of St. Attala, Abbot of Bobbio, Italy. [ Sixth and Seventh Centuries. ] ...	1026
ARTICLE IX.—St. Fiachna ...	1026
ARTICLE X.—St. Ferdacrigh, or Ferdachrioch ...	1027
ARTICLE XI.—Reputed Festival of St. Maritha, Virgin, of Cologne ad Gradus ...	1027
ARTICLE XII.—Reputed Festival of Claudius, a Bishop, and Founder of the University of Paris ...	1027
ARTICLE XIII.—Reputed Festival of St. Cronan ...	1027
ARTICLE XIV.—St. Liber, of Lethdumha ...	1027
ARTICLE XV.—Natalis of St. Colman of Linn Huachaille, or of Magheralin, County of Down. [ Seventh Century. ] ...	1028
ARTICLE XVI.—Reputed Festival of St. Olaf or Aulaf Kyrre, King of Norway, and Martyr. [ Tenth and Eleventh Centuries. ] ...	1028

Thirty-first Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MELLA, ABBESS OF DOIRE-MELLE, COUNTY OF LEITRIM. [ Eighth Century. ] ...	1029
ARTICLE II.—St. Machabeo, or Gilda Machai-beo, Abbot of Armagh. [ Twelfth Century. ] ...	1030
ARTICLE III.—St. Colman, of Camachadh ...	1032
ARTICLE IV.—St. Faolan, or Foilan, son of Aedh ...	1033
ARTICLE V.—St. Fethaidh, or Fecacius ...	1033
ARTICLE VI.—Reputed Festival of St. Regulus, or St. Rule, Scotland ...	1034
ARTICLE VII.—Reputed Festival of St. Patto, Bishop of Verden, Saxony ...	1034
ARTICLE VIII.—Feast of the Holy Anissus, and of his Companions, Martyrs, in Africa ...	1034
ARTICLE IX.—Reputed Feast of St. Caidoc and Fricor Adrien, Apostles of the Morini ...	1035
ARTICLE X.—Reputed Festival of St. Daria, Mother of St. Ursula ...	1035

SUPPLEMENTARY LIST OF SUBSCRIBERS.

Abbott, Right Rev. Lord, New Mellary, Dubuque, Iowa, U.S.A.

Casey, Rev. James, P.P., Athleague, Co.
Roscommon.

Cochrane, Thomas, Esq., 23 Molesworth-street, Dublin.

Coffey, Rev. Wm., C.C., Auhgrim, Co.
Wicklow.

Coleman, Rev. Matthew, Smartsville, Yuba County, State of California,
U.S. America.

Comyn, David, Esq., National Bank, College Green, Dublin.

Conner, James, Esq., 190 Sangannonstreet, Chicago, U.S.A.

Connolly, Miss Mary, N.S. Leckenerany, Killasnet, Manorhamilton, Co. Leitrim.

Conway, Rev. John (Dean), St. Malachy
O'Morgair's College, Belfast.

Conway, Very Rev. P. T., O.P., St.
Mary's Convent, Tallaght, Co. Dublin.

Corbett, Rev. Michael J., S.J., Church of the Sacred Heart, Chicago, State of Illinois, U.S.A. (Three Copies.)

Curran, James B., Esq., 16 Parliament-street.

De Lisle, Mrs., Onebarrow Lodge, Loughborough, England.

Dempsey, Rev. Andrew, P.P., Ballinakill, Queen's Co.

Donnelly, Rev. Eugene J., St. Michael's Church, Flushing, Queen's Co., Long Island, State of New York, U.S.A.

Donovan, Miss, Clogher House, Tralee, Co. Kerry.

Doyle, Rev. James John, D.D., C.C., 14 Halston-street, Dublin.

Doyle, Rev. Richard, St. Joseph's, Grosvenor-street, Liverpool.

Dunne, P. W., Esq., 478 Marshfield-avenue, Chicago, Illinois, U.S. America.

Egan, William, Esq., Moate, Co. Westmeath.

Feehan, Most Rev. Patrick, Archbishop, 278 Ohio-st., Chicago, Illinois, U.S.A.

Fennelly, Rev. Richard, The College, Thurles, Co. Tipperary.

Fitzgerald-Kenny, Mrs. James C., Ballinasloe, Co. Galway.

Fitzgerald, Most Rev. William, D.D., Bishop of Ross, Skibbereen, Co. Cork.

Gallagher, Rev. Joseph, Church of the Nativity, 1640 South Halsted-street, Chicago, State of Illinois, U.S.A.

Geraghty, Mr. Andrew P., 11 Blackhall-street, Dublin.

Glynn, Mr. Owen, Convent-road, Dalkey, Co. Dublin.

Goulding, John F., Esq., 14 Grafton-square, Clapham Common, London, S.W.

Guilfoyle, Rev. Patrick, All Saints Church, Cor. Kossuth and Wallace-streets, Chicago, U.S.A.

Hanrahan, Rev. James P., O.S.F., Franciscan Convent, Ennis, Co. Clare.

Healy, J. B., Esq., 4 Dame-street, and Dalkey.

Healy, Mr. P. J., No. 232 South Lincoln-street, Chicago, State of Illinois, U.S.A.

Helmick, Howard, Esq., Dangan Cottage, Galway.

Kelly, John C., Esq., 37 Fitzwilliam-square, West, Dublin.

Lady Superioress, The, Nazareth House, Hammersmith, London, W., England.

Lady Superioress, South Presentation Convent, Douglas-street, Cork.

Leyne, Mr. Richard, Registry of Deeds Office, Henrietta-street, Dublin.

Little, Rev. Robert, C.C., Duke-street, Birr, King's Co.

Lynch, Rev. Patrick, St. Bede's College, Alexandra-park, Manchester.

M'Nulty, Rev. William (Pastor), Paterson, New Jersey, U.S. America.

M'Shane, Rev. Hugh O'Gara, Wilmetton, Well. Co., Illinois, U.S., America.

Moray, C. S. H. Drummond, Esq., Blair Drummond, Sterling, N. Britain.

Murphy, Rev. Nicholas, C.C., Ballyraggett, Co. Kilkenny.

Murphy, Rev. P., St. Anthony's, Great Homer-street, Liverpool.

Nameche, Monsigneur, Recteur Magnifique de l'Université Catholique, Louvain, Belgium.

Nolan, Rev. William A., Rector, St. Paul's, Butler Co., U.S. America.

O'Connell, Rev. William, C.C., Parochial House, Lower Exchange-street, Dublin.

O'Connor, Right Rev. James, D.D., Vicar-Apostolic of Nebraska, St. Philomena's Cathedral, Omaha, Douglas Co., State of Nebraska, U.S. America.

O'Flynn, Rev. Denis, S.T.L., Pastor, St. Mary's, Saugerties, Ulster Co., New York, U.S.

Onahan, William J., Esq., No. 7 City Hall, Chicago, State of Illinois, U.S.A.

O'Reilly, Mr. Michael, 47 Amiens-street, Dublin.

Parochial Library, The, Killasnet, Manorhamilton, Co. Leitrim.

Parochial Library, St. Michael's, Kingstown, Co. Dublin.

Poole, James A., Esq., 29 Harcourt-street, Dublin.

Quinn, Hugh, Esq., Solicitor, 2 South John-street, Liverpool.

Quinn, Mr. James, 8 Leslie-avenue, Dalkey, Dublin.

Rector, Very Rev., Redemptorist Fathers, Limerick.

Reddy, Miss Catherine, 35 Philippsburgh-avenue, Fairview, Co. Dublin.

Rickard, Mr. Thomas, Waterfall View, Richmond-road, Fairview, Clontarf.

Robinson, Mr. John L. (Architect), 198 Great Brunswick-street, Dublin.

Rooney, Miss Teresa J., 48 Lower Dominick-street, Dublin.

Ryan, Rt. Rev. Stephen Vincent, D.D., Bishop of Buffalo, State of New York, U.S.A.

Shuley, Mr. John, 24, 25 and 26 Christ Church Place, Dublin.

Sister Mary Paul, Presentation Convent, Clondalkin, Co. Dublin.

Tinkler, Rev. John, M.A., Arkengarthdale Vicarage, Richmond, Yorkshire, England.

Tohull, Mr. Henry, Moy, Co. Tyrone.

White, Rev. H. F., St. Vincent's House, Emmetsburg, State of Maryland, U.S. America.

LIVES OF THE IRISH SAINTS.

---

First Day of March.

---

ARTICLE I.—LIFE OF ST. DAVID, ARCHBISHOP OF MENEVIA, AND CHIEF PATRON OF WALES.

[FIFTH AND SIXTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—SOURCES FOR ILLUSTRATING ST. DAVID'S BIOGRAPHY—PROPHECIES REGARDING ST. DAVID'S BIRTH—PARENTAGE OF OUR SAINT—CIRCUMSTANCES AND MIRACLES PRECEDING HIS NATIVITY—BIRTH OF ST. DAVID—HIS BAPTISM.

HUMAN thought can present no more gratifying remembrances, or examples, than those, which exhibit sublime grades of perfection, found in past living subjects. Brought carefully under our consideration, they should awaken our truest Christian sympathy. It is especially delightful and edifying for every well-regulated mind, to regard actions and virtues, which really ennoble our nature, when inwoven with the life of every great saint. And yet, it is by no means an easy task, to unveil those acts and merits, which God's holy servants are so careful to conceal from general observation. The hidden life of a saint is the more valuable and instructive, because it forms healthy and vigorous germs of production, whence spiritual flowers and fruit are known to bloom and ripen. But, it is also the most difficult to comprehend and expound. This difficulty is increased, when we are led back to a remote period, with only few sufficient or authentic materials existing, to aid our efforts for investigation. When dates are often conflicting, and when history or tradition appears in particular instances distorted or contradictory, even respecting public events; we must regard certain Lives of our early saints, in these Islands, as yet resting, partly in "a dim religious light," like the inner vistas of our grandest cathedrals, but more generally veiled by shadows, that have deepened far into remote antiquity. We should especially desire to have the facts of this biographical notice sustained by many accessible proofs or records, and its chief incidents elucidated, from every just and trustworthy point of view. Although, according to a modern French writer, in a Catholic sense, the legend may be considered as the life of a saint,<sup>1</sup> we are still more fortunate in finding some facts of St. David's career blended with public ecclesiastical events of his age. Therefore, they become a fairer and more easy subject for historic investigation.

It is usual on the part of every careful writer of biography, and satisfactory to the studious reader, that sources, whence information has been procured or may be sought, should first receive attention and consideration. Such a preliminary array of authorities—very many of which have been consulted and studied—may best occupy those few pages of an introduction. Some manuscript materials here designated were inaccessible to the author; but, he may venture to hazard a conjecture, that in the aggregate, these would not supply much additional or original information for the illustration of St. David's biography. To remedy possible defects, however, he has laboured to procure from other available and standard works, or from trustworthy informants, the substance of what has been collected and digested, under the heads of succeeding chapters.

Acts of this saint have been published by the Bollandists, at the 1st day of March.<sup>2</sup> They are preceded by a critical commentary, contained in two distinct sections. An attempt is there made to illustrate St. David's career, by giving an account concerning those biographies, that already referred to him. The places, with which he had been connected, the persons who were his contemporaries, with the period, when he lived, are severally investigated. Three different Appendices are found postfixed.<sup>3</sup> The whole is annotated by an anonymous learned editor. But this Bollandist commentator states, that while many Acts of St. David were extant, none of them seemed to have been written by coeval writers. Hence, it is not surprising, that some things depending solely on popular tradition were fabulous. Other accounts may have been carelessly or falsely inserted by transcribers, and altogether such statements are not quite authentic. Among the most ancient of those Lives, as supposed, was one contained in a MS. Codex, which belonged to the Church of Our Saviour, at Utrecht. This had been formerly brought from Great Britain. It seems to have been abridged from Ricemarc, and it had not been quoted even by Ussher, Colgan, or any other writer, to the time when the Bollandists undertook its publication. A Life of St. David has been written by Ricemarchus, or Ricemarc, called, by Ussher, son of Sulgen, about A.D. 1090. In Ricemarc's Life of St. David, there is no mention whatever of King Arthur. This is said to be a prolix and an affected work, while it formed a foundation for all subsequent biographies. A copy of it was preserved in the British Museum.<sup>4</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis,<sup>5</sup> about A.D. 1200,<sup>6</sup> produced another Life, as also John of Teignmouth, a contemporary

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i. Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, pp. 38 to 47.

<sup>3</sup> The First Appendix merely contains an account of the Rule, which St. David prescribed for his monks. It forms only an extract, taken from his Acts, as published by Colgan, and it nearly agrees with the legend, written by John Capgrave. The Second Appendix gives an account concerning miracles, wrought through the intercession of St. David, and occurring after his death. It has been extracted from Harpsfeld's "Historia Anglicana." The Third Appendix also relates to St. David's miracles. This statement has been drawn from John Capgrave's "Nova Legenda Angliæ."

<sup>4</sup> Cotton MSS. Vespasian A. xiv. ff. 60—696. Vel. 4to, xii. cent. In the Harleian MSS., 624 ff. 73—81, paper folio, xvii. cent., there is a transcript of Ricemarc's Life of St. David, made in the seventeenth century. It has been falsely ascribed to Giraldus.

<sup>5</sup> Archbishop Ussher formerly possessed an ancient MS. Life of St. David, by Giraldus. This he quotes in his "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates." It would seem, from a statement made by Pitseus, "De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus," that a MS. Life of St. David, attributed to Giraldus, had been formerly preserved in the public Library at Cambridge.

<sup>6</sup> Published first in Wharton's "Anglia Sacra," vol. ii., p. 628. It was taken from a MS. in the Cotton Library. Vitellius, E. vii. This MS. has since disappeared. It is supposed to have perished in a fire, which broke out in the library, A.D. 1731, and this destroyed many valuable papers and MSS. No other copy of the work is now known to exist.

<sup>7</sup> There is a Life of St. David, thus classed,

of Giraldus.<sup>7</sup> This latter has been inserted in Capgrave's collection. Leland, in the reign of Henry VIII., wrote one, and this has been published in his Collectanea.<sup>8</sup> There is, likewise, an ancient Welsh Life, extant in the British Museum;<sup>9</sup> and another in the College of Jesus, Oxford.<sup>10</sup> Colgan, at the 1st of March, publishes a Life of St. David,<sup>11</sup> which has been copied from a MS. belonging to the monastery of All Saints in Lough-Ree, county of Longford.<sup>12</sup> Some writers imagined it might be the same as that mentioned by Ussher, and which had been written by Ricemarchus. But they are evidently different; for, the lengthy passage, quoted by Ussher, is not given in the Life published by Colgan. Perhaps, the author of this tract was Augustin Magraidin, a member of All Saints' Monastery, and who wrote many Lives of Saints. It had been formerly communicated to the Bollandists, by Father Hugh Ward. This differs but little from a Life published by the Bollandists, and which was taken from a MS. of Utrecht. There are other Lives of St. David.<sup>13</sup> In the opinion of the Bollandists, Colgan's copy had been taken from more recent Acts of St. David; but, while an attempt had been made to polish style, certain false glosses had been inserted. The authors of St. David's old Acts, for the most part, are unknown. Therefore, are they often quoted as anonymous writers.<sup>14</sup> There seems to be no deficiency of manuscript and printed materials extant, for compiling the Life of St. David, the illustrious Patron of Wales. Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, Deputy Keeper of the Public Records, enumerates, and partially describes, no fewer than twenty-one distinct copies of biographies or fragments, relating to this saint.<sup>15</sup> Many of these, however, appear to have been composed from some common original. Nevertheless, verbal differences, and even whole sentences, abridged or interpolated, may be detected, on an examination of those several codices.<sup>16</sup>

MS. Bodl. Tanner, 15. f. 139, vell. fol. dble. cols. xv. cent. This is an abridgment of the MS. Cott. Vespas. A. xiv., with a very few slight insertions, and two late miracles, added at the end. It is found in Capgrave's "Nova Legenda Angliæ." Also, one similar, MS. Cott. Tiber. E. i. 22, ff. 48 b.—51 b. vel. large fol. This latter occurs in John of Teignmouth's "Sanctilogium."

<sup>8</sup> Vol. iv., p. 107.

<sup>9</sup> Cotton MSS. Tiber. D. xxii. ff. 136—182. vell. 8vo. Its subject is the Passion of St. David and St. Margaret.

<sup>10</sup> Classed, MS. cxix. f. 91.

<sup>11</sup> The copy he procured was taken from the Manuscript Codices, belonging to Rt. Rev. David Routh, Bishop of Ossory.

<sup>12</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. Vita S. Davidis Episcopi Menevensis, pp. 425 to 432, with accompanying notes.

<sup>13</sup> Concerning which the reader may consult Stillingfleet's "Antiquities of the British Church," chap. v.

<sup>14</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," A.D. DXXIX., p. 528.

<sup>15</sup> See "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland to the End of the Reign of Henry VII.," vol. i., part i., pp. 118 to 124.

<sup>16</sup> In addition to MSS. already mentioned, as serving to illustrate our saint's biography, the following are extant: One described, as

MS. Bibl. Pub. Cant. Ff. i. 27. 28. ff. 618—635 b. vell. xiii. cent. This appears to have been written by Ricemarchus, as stated towards the end. Apparently it is an abbreviation of the Cottonian MS. Vespas. A. xiv. There are enumerated, likewise, MS. Cott. Nero. E. i. ff. 364—368. vell. large fol. xi. cent., and MS. Bodl. 793 (2641.) ff. 221—236. vell. long 8vo, xii. cent. There are MS. Lives of St. David, known as, MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 505. pp. 217—223. Vell. fol. xiv. cent., and MS. Bodl. Rawl. b. 485. f. iii. vell. 4to, xiv. cent. These seem to have been abridged from MS. Cott. Vespas. A. xiv. (No. 356.) A similar copy has been printed by Colgan, for his Life of this saint. A MS. Reg. 13. C. i. ff. 171—174, Paper 4to, xvii. cent., is also known. A fragment of St. David's Life is found in the MS. Harl. 310. f. 166. Paper 4to, xvii. cent. It is only a single leaf, beginning and ending abruptly. An excerpt from St. David's Life occurs in MS. Lambeth. 585. f. 61. There is mention, likewise, of MS. Bodley Digby. 112. f. 99—114 b. vell. 4to, xii. cent. Apparently, it is the same as MS. Cott. Vespas. A. xiv. (No. 356.) Also, a MS. Sloane, 4788. f. 84 b. (olim MS. Clarendon, 39.) Paper. fol. xvii. cent. We meet with a MS. C. C. C. Cant. 161. vell. folio, xiii. cent. Likewise, a MS. Bodl. 336. (2337.) pp. 319—322 b. vell. folio, xiv. cent. In addition to these, there is a MS. Bodl.

In a collected edition of Giraldus Cambrensis' complete works<sup>17</sup> is to be found his Life of St. David,<sup>18</sup> reprinted from Wharton's text. It is collated with fragments, quoted by Ussher, and compared with older Lives, published by the Bollandists, and by other editors. In a Proæmium to this work, Giraldus declares, that he had been urged by certain canons and religious—notwithstanding his literary engagements, and almost against his own will—to undertake and finish this biography, in a style worthy of the subject. However, notwithstanding such assertion, this Life of St. David by Giraldus may be regarded as little more than an abridgment of Ricemarc's compilation. This latter, as a bishop, ruled over St. David's, and he died about A.D. 1096, or 1099.<sup>19</sup> Giraldus often retains Ricemarc's very words, inserting a few additions, of no great importance. Any alterations are chiefly confined to softening down ruder and plainer language, found in the more ancient Life.<sup>20</sup> The author says, that he supplied some unimportant omissions and rescinded superfluous comments, in earlier accounts referring to the holy Menevian bishop. This Life seems to have been undertaken by Giraldus, from a sense of duty he owed to that ecclesiastical foundation, from which his dignity and emoluments were chiefly derived. With expressions of humility, he declares an intention to exercise some judgment and discretion, in pruning or selecting materials for this work, and in treading his way through a difficult course. His Life of St. David is divided into Ten Lessons, with a collect at the close, and a Responsory for the Choir. Such an arrangement indicates, that it had been composed for an office or choral service, probably on the feast day of Menevia's patron saint and founder. This was in accordance with the usage of early British and Gallic churches; when the Lives of martyrs, confessors and writings of the Fathers, formed part of the daily lessons.<sup>21</sup> Such custom was a stimulus to literary exertion. Generally writers of known ability and piety were engaged, for the purpose of re-writing or emending ancient Lives or Offices of saints. The responsibility of composing or re-editing a saint's or a martyr's Life, to be inserted in a church office, usually urged an ecclesiastic to develop for such task his best mental efforts of thought and taste.<sup>22</sup>

In that invaluable archæological work of Rev. Rice Rees, where ecclesiastical antiquities of the Welsh principality are so admirably treated, there is a very interesting account regarding St. David, even although it be occasionally clouded with the author's peculiar prejudices.<sup>23</sup> However, in that spirit of provincial patriotism so honourable to them, the Welsh writers

285. ff. 136. b. vell. fol., dble. cols. xiii. cent. A fragment of St. David's Life, is found, as classed, MS. Bibl. du Roi. 5352. 40. olim Colbert. vell. xiv. cent. In fine, among the Lambeth MSS. 12, there is met "Legenda Davidis." The foregoing are all in the Latin language. It is quite possible, many other MS. Lives of this saint may still be discovered, in various British and Continental libraries.

<sup>17</sup> Published under direction of the Master of the Rolls, and edited by J. S. Brewer, M.A.

<sup>18</sup> See Giraldi Cambrensis' "Opera," vol. iii., pp. 378 to 404.

<sup>19</sup> See, "Annales Menevensis," MS. Harl. 838.

<sup>20</sup> See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland to the End of the Reign of Henry VII.," vol. i., part i., p. 122.

<sup>21</sup> See Martene, "De Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus," vol. iii., p. 13. This practice prevailed generally in the Western Church. St. Bernard wished that like readings should not be taken from modern and unauthenticated hagiologies; but, rather from such as gave edification, and were redolent of ecclesiastical propriety. He wished them, likewise, to accord with antiquity and veracity. See, Epistola ad Monachos Arremarensis, 312 [al. 398]. "Opera" S. Bernardi.

<sup>22</sup> "Novelty of style supplied the place of novelty and freshness of facts. And the new reading of an old Life proved an era in the literary career of a mediæval author, not to be forgotten." See J. S. Brewer's Giraldi Cambrensis "Opera," vol. iii. Preface, pp. xlii. to xlv.

of all denominations have cherished a great respect for their patron saint. They have not failed to investigate, likewise, with considerable research and accuracy, particulars having a special or an indirect bearing on his biography.

The birth of St. David was foretold or indicated to his father. St. Patrick, who was in Wales, thirty years before it happened, had a like revelation.<sup>24</sup> The father of our saint was potentate over a territory, known as Keretica or Ceretica,<sup>25</sup> when, during sleep, he heard the voice of an angel. It admonished him, that while hunting on the following day, he should kill a stag, and with its carcass he should find a fish and hive of bees, near a river; from these he was directed to take a honey-comb, with part of the fish and deer, for transmission to the monastery<sup>26</sup> of Manchan,<sup>27</sup> as an offering on behalf of his son, not yet born. This presentation would be emblematic of St. David's talents and perfection. For the honey-comb typified, that sweetness of heavenly wisdom, which would fill his mind; while the wax, containing its store of honey, represented a mystic sense, included in historic or literal meaning. The fish prefigured his living by the sea-shore,<sup>28</sup> and his selected aliment of bread and water solely; for, he avoided every draught that could inebriate. In fine, as the stag is supposed to renew its strength, so the holy David became transformed into a new man, having cast away the yoke of sin, by always desiring to slake his thirst, at fountains of supernal water.

The exact year, when St. David—or as he is called in the Welsh language, Dewid<sup>29</sup>—was born, cannot be ascertained with any great degree of certainty. The Bollandists set it down as happening, about the year 445.<sup>30</sup> But this date is founded on a rather arbitrary calculation, drawn from an incident, related in the Life of St. Patrick. It is supposed probable, that this latter saint had predicted St. David's birth, about the year 414 or 415. At this time, St. Patrick was not a bishop, but he is supposed to have been a priest, and without any definite idea of devoting himself to glean that harvest of souls, which awaited his labours in Ireland. He might have been dissuaded, they say, by some angelic monition, from spending a solitary life, amongst the Islands of Hetruria, in the Mediterranean Sea. Afterwards, returning to Gaul, he be-

<sup>23</sup> See "An Essay on the Welsh Saints, or the Primitive Christians usually considered to have been the Founders of Churches in Wales," sect. x., pp. 191 to 202.

<sup>24</sup> Ricemarchus, Giraldus Cambrensis, John of Teignmouth, and John Capgrave agree in relating this tradition.

<sup>25</sup> See Giraldus' Life, lect. i. Camden regards this district as contiguous with the present Cardiganshire, in Wales. It appears to have been included within the territory of Demetia. It is supposed, by some writers, to have derived its name from King Ceretus or Caraticus, the paternal grandfather of St. David. The sea lay westward of this territory; to the south, the Maridunenses or people of Caermarthen were separated by the Tivy River; to the north and east, extended the present Shires of Brecknock and Montgomery. The Britons called this district Sire Aber-tivi. See Gough's Camden's "Britannia," vol. ii., p. 524. See, also, Ussher's "De Primordiis Britannicarum Ecclesiarum," cap. xiv., p. 442.

<sup>26</sup> "Ad Nautanum Monasterium," according to the Bollandist Utercht MS. This monastery, we are told, was called "Vetus Rubus," in Latin; and, it has been regarded, as identical with "Vetus Menevia." On account of this incident, related in the text, it was anciently called the "Monastery of the Gift;" and, because St. David afterwards became an alumnus there, and while still later, as archbishop, he was guardian of those precious treasures deposited at Menevia.

<sup>27</sup> The Monastery of Manchan, who was the master of St. Audeus—venerated at the 21st of March—seems to have been identified with that of Rosnat in Britain. Yet, says the Bollandist editor, it may be doubtful if it were identical with the Rosnat here mentioned, and which, on account of many gifts bestowed on it, received for its appellation, "Depositi Monasterium."

<sup>28</sup> Wherefore, we are told, the Britons called St. David "Dewi Deverur," which signifies, David, the Waterman, lect. i.

<sup>29</sup> "Sanctus, quem tinctio baptismi David, vulgus antem 'Dewi clamat,'" says the Utercht MS., published by the Bollandists.

<sup>30</sup> They also state, that St. David flourished in the fifth and sixth centuries.

came a disciple of St. Amator and St. Germanus, until by advice of this latter holy master, he sought Pope Celestine, and received episcopal ordination. In passing through Wales, about the period intimated by the Bollandists, it is supposed, he predicted St. David's birth to take place thirty years subsequently; for, they do not think it probable, this prophetic incident can be assigned to A.D. 432, on his returning from Rome, or to about A.D. 459, when he made a third visit to this city, after having established his see of Armagh.<sup>31</sup> The name of David's father was Sanctus,<sup>32</sup>—sometimes called Sandde, or Xantus, one of the Kings of Wales—that of his mother has been variously rendered Non, Nonna, Nennita, Nonnita, Nemata,<sup>33</sup> Melaria<sup>34</sup> and Melari.<sup>35</sup> She is said to have been the daughter of Bracan or Brecan, an Irish prince, who died A.D. 450.<sup>36</sup> Our saint was a nephew to St. Canoc, of Gallen,<sup>37</sup> in the King's County,<sup>38</sup> according to this family connexion; and, this latter holy man flourished, it is thought, towards the close of the fifth century.<sup>39</sup> David was born in Brecknock, a part of Wales in which Nonna's father settled, and from him its present etymon has been derived. It would not, indeed, be an easy task, to determine in a satisfactory manner, the variety of appellations bestowed on the mother of St. David, or to trace their respective affinities, if any such may happen to exist. It would seem, the revelation made to Ireland's great Apostle occurred subsequent to that previously related. If we credit Roth's MS. Life of our Saint, when venerable Patrick,<sup>40</sup> having obtained his Pontifical dignity, passed through Ceretica<sup>41</sup> on returning from Rome, he cast his eyes over the beautiful vale, Rhos, or Rosina.<sup>42</sup> Then, he desired to rest in a spot, suitable for devout prayer and contemplation. Again, the Angel of God was heard to say: "The Lord has not destined this place for you,<sup>43</sup> as a still greater legation and charge await you. The whole land of Ireland, you are appointed to convert; but, this spot must become the inheritance of a boy, named David, who, thirty years hence, shall here be born. Let this prove a sign for you; the wide extent of Irish shore shall be visible from this locality." St. Patrick's eyes were raised from the ground, where he stood, when these

<sup>31</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii, num. 10, p. 39.

<sup>32</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis and John of Teignmouth have so called him. The former says of our saint, "Arthuri vero regis avunculus, fuisse perhibetur."

<sup>33</sup> Colgan remarks: "rectius forte Nem-nata, quod Hibernicis olim feminis fuit familiare, nisi et rectius Nonnita. Sic enim S. Davidis mater apud Capgravium in ejus vita et apud Vsserum, pag. 442 appellatur." See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 7, p. 431.

<sup>34</sup> Drayton's "Poly-Olbion." Illustrations to the Fourth Song. These illustrations were written by Selden.

<sup>35</sup> Capgrave, in Vita S. Keinæ, calls her Melari. See Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," No. v., S. David.

<sup>36</sup> According to a MS., quoted by Sir R. C. Holt, in his notes to the "Itinerarium Cambriæ," lib. i., cap. 2, and the Martyrology of Salisbury, at the 8th of October.

<sup>37</sup> See notices of him, at the 11th of February.

<sup>38</sup> Colgan has compiled the Acts of this saint from different sources, and he has appended learned explanatory notes, in the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," at the 11th day of February. See pp. 311 to 314. This Priory of Gallen, according to Harris' Ware, was founded by St. Canoc or Mochenoc, about A.D. 492. See vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 263.

<sup>39</sup> In the Illustrations to Drayton's "Poly-Olbion," the Fourth Song, reports are said to have prevailed in Wales, that he was "uncle to King Arthur," the most renowned of ancient British monarchs.

<sup>40</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>41</sup> Or "Demetica intrans rura," as read in the Utrecht MS.

<sup>42</sup> "Vallis Menevia aliis, prope urbem S. Davidis." (Bollandist editor.)

<sup>43</sup> Yet, John of Teignmouth says: "S. Davidem præ ceteris hanc Abbatiam dilexisse, quia B. Patricius, ipsam fundavit," (Lib. ii., cap. 3).

<sup>44</sup> Many other things are added in an account left us by Giraldus. We are told, that St. Patrick raised a dead man, named Dunaudus, to life, in this place. Ricemarc, in his Life of St. David, calls him Cruimther. It is added, that he remained twelve years buried, near that shore, and afterwards sail-heaven-sent sounds had ceased.<sup>44</sup> On his range of vision flashed the whole land of Erin, we are told.<sup>45</sup> There afterwards stood a chapel.<sup>46</sup> Even then, in the proud language of an Irish poet, as it “rose from the dark swelling flood,

God bless'd the green island, and saw it was good;
The em'rald of Europe, it sparkled and shone,
In the ring of the world, the most precious stone.
In her sun, in her soil, in her station thrice blest,<sup>47</sup>

Ireland was still more favoured, when her great Apostle St. Patrick took “heart of grace,” for his destined missionary enterprise. He soon sailed over the Irish Channel to conquer on her soil, and to gain over her sons those happy victories, that planted Christianity on the ruins of Paganism.<sup>48</sup>

Thirty years had elapsed, after these heavenly manifestations, when the King of Ceretica travelled through a large district of Wales, anciently known by the name, Demetrica, or as more generally and diversely written, Demetica, Demetia, Dimeta, or Demeta.<sup>49</sup> This region appears to have included a considerable angular portion of south-western Wales.<sup>50</sup> At its extreme western point lies Menevia, now better known and named, as St. David's episcopal city. Within this district of Demeta,<sup>51</sup> the mother of our saint ing with St. Patrick to Ireland, he became a bishop.

<sup>45</sup> The Bollandists observe, although Rice-marc and Giraldus assert this whole island was miraculously seen from that place, whence St. Patrick proposed embarking for Ireland; yet, Ussher says, such account is a fiction, not found in earlier Acts of St. David. There many other matters are seen, which Ussher quotes from Giraldus. Some of these are reproduced in the Bollandist notes. The words attributed to John of Teignmouth, by Ussher, are met with in “Vita S. Davidis,” by John Capgrave, in his work, “Nova Legenda Angliæ,” printed at London, A.D. MDXVI.

<sup>46</sup> Teignmouth describes the place, whence the whole of Ireland was seen by St. Patrick. See Ussher, p. 845. “Erat vallis satis magna, in qua est lapis, super quem stetit ante ostium cujusdam capellæ antiquæ, quam ego oculis vidi et manibus palpavi.” These very words occur in Capgrave's book. He had been an Augustinian hermit. See M. le Dr. Hoefer's “Nouvelle Biographie Générale depuis les Temps les plus Reculés jusqu'à nos Jours,” tome viii., p. 575. John of Teignmouth was at first a priest, attached to the Church of Durham. Afterwards, he became a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's, where he lived about the year 1360. He wrote or compiled a large volume on the Lives, Actions and Miracles of English, Welsh, Scotch, and Irish Saints. See Joannes Pitseus, “De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus.” Also, “Acta Sanctorum,” toms i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, Commentarius Prævius, sect. i., n. 5, pp. 38, 39.

<sup>47</sup> See that beautiful song of Dr. Drennan, and intitled, “Erin.”

<sup>48</sup> See Colgan's “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, cap. i., ii., p. 425.

<sup>49</sup> Camden has given us a description of this ancient territory, which is called West Wales. Pliny supposed it to have been occupied, by the Silures; but, Ptolemy, better acquainted with Britain, placed a people called Dimetæ or Demetæ here; whilst both Gildas and Ninnius use the name Demetia. The Cambro-British called it Difed, by a change of f into m, peculiar to their language. Camden maintains the name should be derived from Deheu Meath, which he renders the Plain to the South; for the Britons are said to have called all this South Wales, Deheubarth or the South Part. But, his editor says, it is more probable, the Romans formed this name, Dimetæ, out of Dyfed. See Gough's Camden's “Britannia,” p. 504, and n. (b). Ibid.

<sup>50</sup> As laid down in the Atlas Classica, Demeta seems to comprise the Shires of Pembroke, Cardigan, and Caermarthen. See the edition of this work, published by Robert Wilkinson, London, 1808. Royal 4to.

<sup>51</sup> The Demetian or Demetican territory—the site of which has been placed by Ptolemy in Britain—is said to have contained Pembroke, Caermarthen, and Ceretica districts. But this supposition appears contrary to what is related in St. David's Acts, viz.: that his father set out from Ceretica and went into Demetica. “Menevia, sita est in Penbrokiæ Commitatus promontorio spaciato, quod grandi fronte in Oceanum Virginium longe procedit: οκταντραπεζον ακρον appellat Ptolemeus, Britanni incolæ Pebidiaue and Cantred-Dewi, Angli S. David's-land, id est S. Davidis ditionem, et ipsam urbem Meneviam Britanni Tuy-Deui, id est domus Deui sive Davidis, et Angli S.

lived, and she is described as a lady, possessing rare beauty and gracefulness. These qualifications endeared her to the king.<sup>52</sup> From the time of St. David's conception,<sup>53</sup> we are told, that she lived solely on bread and water, afterwards leading a celibate's life. While yet in his mother's womb, the advent of our saint was signalized by miracles. Shortly before his birth, the mother entered a certain church,<sup>54</sup> where a very celebrated and holy man, named Gildas,<sup>55</sup> preached God's word to the people. As if struck suddenly dumb, on her entering, the preacher ceased his discourse; and, he declared, on being asked the reason for this silence, he felt unable to announce divine truths in the ordinary way. Gildas then requested his congregation to leave the church; and no other person remained within, but our saint's mother, who continued there unknown to the preacher. Yet, another attempt to speak, made by this holy teacher, was not attended with better success. Wherefore, raising his voice, he adjured any person yet remaining to reveal the fact. Our saint's mother then made known her presence. The preacher requested her to leave the church, so that his congregation might return. This order having been obeyed, the holy man found his tongue capable of giving expression to his ordinary religious and impressive sermons. Thus did the Almighty manifest his power, and indicate to all present the future greatness and eloquence of an unborn child.<sup>56</sup> Like the Blessed Virgin Mary, we can have little doubt, his mother treasured these remarkable incidents within her heart.<sup>57</sup> When the Saviour of this world deigned to enlighten it by his presence, the wicked tyrant Herod sought to learn the place of his birth, from those pilgrim Magi, that came from the East to adore him. This monster, however, designed the infant Saviour's death.<sup>58</sup> As happened in the case of our Divine Master, a tyrant of Demeta planned the infanticide of David, when his birth had occurred. This wicked and envious man had learned from British Magi, the whole country around must become subject to that child, after his being born. They had even pointed out the exact place, where his mother should be found living, when her term of child-bearing had elapsed. The Almighty, however, miraculously preserved the pious matron and her infant charge.<sup>59</sup> At the very moment of St. David's birth, a mighty tempest, mingled with lightning, hail, thunder and rain, swept the whole country around, so that no person dare venture out of doors. Yet, by a strange contrast, the air was perfectly serene, the skies were lightsome, nor did any storms prevail, near the house, where this religious woman experienced the pains and consolations of such heaven-protected maternity.<sup>60</sup> In Dauids appellant." See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, Commentarius Prævius, sect. i., num. 4, p. 38.

<sup>52</sup> We are told, he met Nonnita, when "ad partes de Pepidiaue declinaverat." Lect. i.

<sup>53</sup> Referring to this incident, the Utrecht MS. relates a legend, not found in Roth's MS.

<sup>54</sup> "Ad offerendas pro partu eleemosynas oblationem," says the Utrecht MS. Alluding to the site of this church, Giraldus Cambrensis writes, that it was situated in a place called Kanmorva or Cair Morua, which means a Maritime Fort or Town, in the English language. See Vita S. Davidis. John Capgrave has a similar account, in his Life of our Saint.

<sup>55</sup> Known as St. Gildas the Wise. His feast is kept on the 29th of January.

<sup>56</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, cap. iii., iv., pp. 425. 426.

<sup>57</sup> See Luke ii., 19.

<sup>58</sup> Matthew ii.

<sup>59</sup> The Utrecht MS. contains the following legend, not to be found in Roth's MS., and referring to the time of St. David's birth: "Urgente vero dolore in petra, quæ juxta erat, manibus innixa est: quæ vestigium veluti cera impressum, petram intuentibus ostendit: quæ et in medium divisa dolenti matri condoluit." And Capgrave tells us, that a church was afterwards built on this spot, while the stone itself rested as a foundation for its altar, which covered the stone. See "Legenda Sanctorum Angliæ."

<sup>60</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, cap. v., p. 426.

this physical world, storms and aerial disturbances are required to render our atmosphere clear and salubrious; the moral order of our lives is usually purified by chastening persecutions and afflictions. If he were a grandson to the Irish prince, Bracan, or Breacan, by his mother's side, and a nephew to St. Canoc of Gallen, David could hardly have been born in the year 462.<sup>61</sup> Some writers maintain, his birth occurred at this date, upon an unproved supposition, that he came into the world, thirty years after St. Patrick was about to arrive in Ireland, when engaging on his great mission.<sup>62</sup> Now, we are also informed, that soon after his birth, St. David was baptized by St. Helvacus, otherwise, Ailbe,<sup>63</sup> the Bishop of Munster. Hardly can we believe, that St. Ailbe was bishop so early as 462; yet, this is not very clear. We have a further probable indication, regarding David not having been born at this date, from what we find mentioned, concerning his birth and future greatness having been predicted by this Ailbe.<sup>64</sup> Another account, in the Welsh Annals, places St. David's nativity, under A.D. 458, the thirtieth year after the death of Patrick of Menevia.<sup>65</sup> Immediately at his birth, David was baptized, according to one account, by Bishop Elisus,<sup>66</sup> but, other writers call <sup>61</sup> In the Acts of St. David, it is said, when St. Patrick happened to be in the Vallis Rosina, in which Menevia was situated, an Angel foretold, that after thirty years a child would be born. He should bear the name of David, it was announced, and at a proper time, he would have care of that place. Soon afterwards, St. Patrick set out for Ireland, where he arrived in the year 432. Hence, Ussher has concluded, that St. David was born in 462. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 452; and "Index Chronologicus," A.D. CCCCLXII., p. 521.

<sup>62</sup> Ussher's calculation would answer very well, if it could be proved the Angel spoke in that manner. For, as to the opinion of writers of our saint's Acts, viz., that David was born in 462, if they thought so, their authority is still of little weight. We do not know, whether they were rightly informed, concerning the year of St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland. The notation of thirty intermediate years cannot then form a correct chronological date. "I do not know," writes Dr. Lanigan, "how it came to pass that the compilers of the Acts of our saints were so fond of the number thirty, as we have seen in the accounts of St. Patrick, St. Brigid, St. Finnian, &c. Jocelin gives a different turn to that prophecy, and attributing one somewhat like it to St. Patrick himself, who, he says (cap. 167), happening to be in Britain some years after the commencement of his mission, foretold the sanctity of St. David then in his mother's womb." See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. ix., n. 136, pp. 471, 472.

<sup>63</sup> See his Life, at the 12th of September.

<sup>64</sup> Ailbe's reputation, until about A.D. 490, had not been so generally established, as to have had predictions of this sort attributed to him. If, then, we may be allowed to build upon such traditions, David's birth must be brought down to the close of the fifth century, or perhaps to the beginning of the sixth. Meanwhile, those thirty years, already treated of, must be omitted from such calculations. See ibid., n. 138, p. 472.

<sup>65</sup> See "Annales Cambrie," edited by the Rev. John Williams ab Ithel, p. 3.

<sup>66</sup> This is stated, not only in St. David's Life, but also in the Acts of St. Ailbe, which Colgan promised to give at the 12th of September, his feast day. But we are admonished, that this baptism by Ailbeus did not take place before A.D. 432, when St. Patrick journeyed from Italy through Britain, on his way to Ireland. It took place on a subsequent occasion, A.D. 462, according to Colgan, when St. Ailbe is thought to have been in this part of Wales. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 8, p. 431.

<sup>67</sup> Giraldus writes, that St. David was born at a place, near the present St. David's, and that he was baptized at Porth Clais or Portcleis, by Ælueus, or Albeus, Bishop of Munster. Ussher says, that Portcleis was near Menevia, and that its name had not been changed, even in his time. Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Life of St. David, according to the old edition, instead of Ailbe, has Relveus, Bishop of Menevia, who, he says, had just arrived in Britain, from Ireland. But, as Ussher observes (p. 871), there was no Bishop of Menevia before St. David, and as Giraldus himself allows, he first built there a cathedral church. No necessity for this observation exists, if we follow Wharton's edition in Anglia Sacra, tom. ii. Giraldus' text here is Aelweo Mundeniensium episcopi, and it plainly refers to Ailbe, Bishop of Munster. In the Life of this latter holy man, David's father is said to have given his son to St. Albeus, "ut nutrit eum Deo." And, afterwards, it is stated: "Ipse est David sanctus Episcopus: cujus reliquiae requiescunt in civitate sua Ceallmuni, quæ est in Britannia." him Helveus or Ailbeus, Bishop of Munster.<sup>67</sup> St. David gave sight to a blind man, who held him, whilst the water was being poured upon him. We are again told, this blind man used as a lotion for his eyes, that very water, which had flowed on the head of David, during his baptism. This miraculous act the infant is supposed to have performed, through some holy inspiration. In the very same place, a beautiful and clear fountain of water sprung from earth. It served for the matter of baptism. As the rising sun dispels the shades of night, so this newly-born child gave sight to the blind, and he enlightened, likewise, in a miraculous manner, the pagan society of his age and country.

CHAPTER II.

THE MONASTERY OF ROSNAT OR KILMUNE—ST. DAVID NURTURED IN OLD MENEVIA—THE DOVE, AN EMBLEM OF HIS INNOCENCE AND HOLINESS—IT IS PROBABLE, ST. DAVID AND ST. FINNIAN OF CLONARD WERE EARLY COMPANIONS—ST. DAVID EDUCATED AT FIRST BY ILLTUTUS—AFTERWARDS INSTRUCTED BY PAULINUS—ORDAINED A PRIEST—HE RESTORES PAULINUS TO THE USE OF SIGHT—OBSERVATIONS CONCERNING ILLTUTUS AND PAULINUS.

FROM allusions already made to the celebrated Monastery of Manchen, it is somewhat incumbent on us to trace out—so far as can possibly be done—both its origin, and that of its founder. Yet, it will not be an easy matter to determine, who was this Manchan, or, as he is sometimes called, Nennius, under various forms of writing. There are divers reasons adduced, for supposing him to have been an Irishman, by race and birth. In any history or Martyrology known, we cannot find one bearing such a name, and belonging to the British nation.<sup>1</sup> Yet, we must endeavour to discover one having this cognomen, who had attained some degree of celebrity, even before St. David's birth, and who settled in the valley of Rosnat, where he lived in a monastery, known as Kill-mune. Such attempt would lead us to a conclusion, that Manchan probably lived before, or at least soon after, the commencement of the fifth century. In our Irish Calendars, as we are told, are found many different saints, bearing this name, and their Natales occur as follows,<sup>2</sup> viz. : At January 2nd,<sup>3</sup> 13th,<sup>4</sup> and 24th;<sup>5</sup> at February 14th;<sup>6</sup> at March 1st;<sup>7</sup> at May 21st;<sup>8</sup> at October 12th;<sup>9</sup> at November 2nd;<sup>10</sup> and at December 4th.<sup>11</sup>

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> There may have been an exception, in the particular case of Nennius of Bangor—if he were a Briton by birth—but he is said by Camerarius, to have first become a monk, about the year 600, and as other writers state, he flourished, circa, 620. See Bale, "Britannicarum Rerum Scriptores," n. 67.

<sup>2</sup> They are enumerated, as found in the text, by St. Ængus, by the Martyrology of Tallagh, by Marianus O'Gorman, by Maguire, and by the Martyrology of Donegal.

<sup>3</sup> At this day, Mainchin, the Sage of Disert-mic-Cuillin of Laeighis in Leinster, is venerated. See "The Martyrology of Donegal," edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 4, 5.

<sup>4</sup> At this day was venerated Mainchinn, son of Collan, in Corann. Ibid., pp. 14, 15.

<sup>5</sup> On this day, we find the feast of Manchan, of Liath, son of Indagh. Ibid., pp. 26, 27.

<sup>6</sup> Mainchein of Moethail is venerated on this day. Ibid., pp. 48, 49.

<sup>7</sup> At this day, I can only discover a Maoinneann, Bishop of Cluain-ferta-Brenainn, as nearly approaching the name Manchan. See ibid., pp. 60, 61. In the Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Martyrology of Tallagh," he is set down as "Moinend, Epis." at the same day. See p. xvii.

<sup>8</sup> At this day, I only find a "Moinne," in the "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 134, 135. In the "Martyrology of Tallagh," he is thus entered, "Moenind ocus Polan." See p. xxv.

<sup>9</sup> Neither in the "Martyrology of Tallagh," nor in the "Martyrology of Donegal," do I find a St. Manchan, so called. In the latter, however, we have recorded a Nannidh of Inis Cais. See pp. 274, 275.

<sup>10</sup> At this date, Dr. Kelly's "Martyrology of Tallagh" fails, but even in the "Martyrology of Donegal," I cannot find notice of a Manchan, at this day.

Again, if we regard the denomination, Nennius, Nennidius, or Nennionus, we find Irish saints, not fewer in number, set down in our Calendars. Among these, we need only mention, St. Nennius, Abbot of Inis-muighe-Samh, on Lough Erne, at the 16th and 18th of January;<sup>12</sup> St. Moinennus or Mon-Nennius at the 1st of March;<sup>13</sup> St. Nennionus or Nennius, denominated Sene of the Monastery, at the 18th of April;<sup>14</sup> St. Nennius, Abbot of Clonchaoin, at the 21st of April;<sup>15</sup> St. Nennius, Deacon of Cluain-airthir, at the 25th of April;<sup>16</sup> St. Nennius Sene, at the 25th of July;<sup>17</sup> St. Nennius, Bishop of Kiltoma, in Meath, at the 13th of November.<sup>18</sup> Colgan is of opinion, that the founder of Kill-mune—sometimes called Nennius—can be no other person, than the saint having this name, venerated on the 1st of March, and who had so many Irish saints enumerated among his disciples, viz. : Saints Brigid, Virgin,<sup>19</sup> Endeus,<sup>20</sup> Finnian of Maghbile,<sup>21</sup> Tigernach,<sup>22</sup> Eugene, Bishop of Ardstra,<sup>23</sup> and Carpre, Bishop of Colerain.<sup>24</sup> Whoever had been master of these great saints must necessarily have flourished, before the end of the fifth century.

From what we have already said, there seems to be little difficulty, in reconciling the chronological period of the exiled Irish Manchan, living in Wales, with that of a holy man, known as Manchen, the Master.<sup>25</sup> He is classed among the disciples of St. Patrick, our great Irish Apostle. It is said, this latter had set him to rule over the church of Coille Fochluc, in Connaught.<sup>26</sup> All upon record might agree with the holy character, wisdom, <sup>11</sup> The previous remarks apply to this particular date.

<sup>12</sup> Colgan gives us his Acts, at the latter of these days. It is said, he flourished, in the time of Saints Patrick and Brigid; that he left Ireland; and, that he lived many years afterwards, in Britain.

<sup>13</sup> Colgan published his Acts, at this day. He is there called Bishop of Clonfert. He flourished about the middle of the sixth century. See "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," i. Martii. Vita S. Moinenni, sive, Mon-Nennii, pp. 437 to 439.

<sup>14</sup> In the "Martyrology of Donegal," already quoted, I find nothing regarding him. But, in the "Martyrology of Tallagh," I meet with a "Moninnsen o Mainister," at this date, p. xxi.

<sup>15</sup> There is a Ninnidh of Cluain-Caoi, at this day, in the "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 106, 107. Dr. Kelly's "Martyrology of Tallagh" does not mention him at this date, in such a manner; but we find there a "Ninidh Bugno i Tir Bret." See p. xxii.

<sup>16</sup> In the "Martyrology of Donegal," there is a notice concerning Deacon Menn of Cluain Arathair, at this date. In a note, he seems to be identical with Nennius, as the commentator remarks. See pp. 110, 111. In the "Martyrology of Tallagh," we read, "Dechonen Cluana Arathair." See p. xxii.

<sup>17</sup> In the "Martyrology of Donegal," at this date, he is called, Ninnio, the Old. In the "Martyrology of Tallagh," he is denominated, "Ninnio senior." See p. xxx.

<sup>18</sup> In the "Martyrology of Donegal," at this date, such an entry may be seen, pp. 308, 309. Dr. Kelly's "Martyrology of Tallagh" fails at this month.

<sup>19</sup> So Colgan states. But, I fear he must have hastily identified this saint, with Ninnidh of the White Hand, whose Acts he gives at the 18th of January.

<sup>20</sup> In the Life of this saint, published by Colgan, at the 21st of March, his sister, St. Fanchea, is represented as saying to him: "Vade ad Britanniam ad Rosnacum monasterium, et esto humilis discipulus Manseni, Magistri illius Monasterii." See cap. v., p. 705.

<sup>21</sup> "Ut habetur in ejus vita, cap. iii.," says Colgan.

<sup>22</sup> This saint, who is venerated on the 4th of April, was diligently instructed, "Monennii disciplinis et monitis in Rosnacensi Monasterio, quod alio nomine Alba vocatur."—"Vita S. Tigernaci," cap. iii.

<sup>23</sup> As in the former instance, we find Rosnacensis, or Rosnatensis, confounded with Alba, and Nennius or Monennius with Manchanus, so in "Vita S. Eugenii," cap. iii., as Colgan promised to show at the 23rd of August, these words are quoted, "Vir sanctus ac sapiens, Nennio qui Mancenus dicitur de Rosnacensi Monasterio quod alio nomine Alba vocatur."

<sup>24</sup> Also, "Vita S. Eugenii," cap. iii., quoted by Colgan.

<sup>25</sup> See, Vita Tripartita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. 62. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>26</sup> So says Joceline. "Sanctis etiam Patricius hoic populo converso noviter ad Christum, Magistrum, Manchenum virum religiosum, et in scripturis sanctis exercitatum." Vita S. Patricii, cap. 59. Ibid.

<sup>27</sup> See Giraldus Cambrensis, "Itinerarium

and learning of the saintly Abbot Manchan, who presided over Rosnat or Kill-mune Monastery, in Britain, and perhaps, at some subsequent period of his life to that already indicated.

When Manchan and probably some Irish disciples alone were inhabitants of this place, they may have given it the well-remembered name Kill-mune. By this denomination, it seems to have been solely designated, in all our Irish Histories and Calendars. Possibly, it obtained the title, Monasterium Rosnatense, or Rosnacense, in other writings, from the circumstance of Manchan's religious house having been built, in the valley, Rosina, or Rosnat. We know, that Menevia, or St. David's, afterwards lay in this valley.<sup>27</sup> It does not seem so clearly explained, why this place had the etymon, Alba, applied to it.<sup>28</sup> Yet, Colgan was doubtful, if this monastery, called indiscriminately, in the Lives of our early saints, Rosnatense, Albium, or Magnum Monasterium, could have been different from that of Benchor or Bangor.<sup>29</sup> Such a supposition, however, would even appear irreconcilable with various authorities, produced by this learned author.

St. David was brought up at a place, variously called, Vetus-Rubus, or Vetus-Menevia,<sup>30</sup> in Latin, and Henmenen, or Henmenew, in the Welsh language. He was there instructed in letters and in ecclesiastical discipline. He was often discovered by his companions, in the state of being taught by a dove, which warbled hymns with him. Hence, and for a reason to which allusion will be made hereafter, the pictures and statues of St. David usually represent him preaching on a hill, with a dove perched on his shoulder.<sup>31</sup> This bird, also, serves to typify the Holy Ghost, shedding the sweet influence of holy innocence and Divine Grace into his soul. Thus, our saint grew in amiability and virtue, beloved by the children of men, and favoured specially by the Lord of Heaven.

Some persons supposed St. Patrick to have been the first founder of a monastery at Menevia, and that it had been afterwards restored or enlarged by St. David, about the year 490.<sup>32</sup> About this time, also, St. Finian of Clonard<sup>33</sup> is said to have left Ireland for Britain, where he formed an acquaintanceship and a friendship, with St. David.<sup>34</sup> At such date, as St.

Cambrizæ," lib. ii., cap. i., and Camden in his description of Pembrokeshire.

<sup>28</sup> The valley in which Kilmune monastery lay abounded in marble, and possibly the church or house had been built of this material; so that it might be called marmorea, rather than Rosea or Rosina, says Giraldus; for roses do flourish there, while marble is found in great abundance.

<sup>29</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, n. 4, p. 430. This opinion he endeavours further to sustain, in his Acts of Nennius or Monennius, at the same day; but, I think, with no very successful result. See ibid., p. 439.

<sup>30</sup> This monastery seems to have borne no less than five distinct names, besides having various other forms of spelling. "Sortitus est autem locus hoc nomen ab Hibernico Muni," says Giraldus Cambrensis, "quod et Rubus sonat, unde et Kilmune Hibernice adhuc hodie Ecclesia Menevensis appellatur." See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, cap. i., and n. (n), p. 42. Giraldus was well acquainted with its local characteristics. This Vetus Rubus appears to have differed from the new Menevia, to which St. David transferred his episcopal see, although it was identical with old Menevia. This latter, however, must have been situated, not very far from the present city, St. David's; and, it was the site of an older religious house, in which our saint received his early rudiments of instruction.

<sup>31</sup> See Very Rev. F. C. Husenbeth's "Emblems of Saints," p. 45. As authority for this representation, he quotes Jacques Callot's "Les Images de tous les Saints et Saintes de l'année." This latter work has been published in Paris, A.D. 1636. It contains engravings by Isr. Henriet.

<sup>32</sup> See Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, p. 40. And Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xii., p. 253. Also, "Index Chronologicus," A.D. cccxc., p. 524.

<sup>33</sup> See Colgan's Acts of this saint, at the 23rd day of February. But, the Bollandist editor says, this Life had been edited from a Codex MS. of theirs, which wanted some correction.

Benedict<sup>35</sup> had been only a boy ten years old, it is not true, that his rule had been then followed in Menevia.<sup>36</sup>

What has been evolved from contemporaneous incidents, when St. David flourished, shows St. Finnian of Clonard,<sup>37</sup> although he might have been a companion in Britain, could hardly have been St. David's disciple. The holy bishop of Menevia was then too young to have been master over a man, who returned to Ireland, before the year 520. In all probability, St. Finnian<sup>38</sup> was older than St. David. Still a learned Irish historian is inclined to think, that both studied together, at least during part of their scholarship, in some eminent British school. Such conclusion appears uncontravened, by any existing record.

Our saint received his education, it has been asserted, at the school of Illtutus,<sup>39</sup> which he is said to have founded, near the sea-coast, and not far from Llan-carvan. Afterwards, he studied with Paul Hên, or Paulinus,<sup>40</sup> it is thought, at Ty-gwyn-ar Dâf,<sup>41</sup> where he spent ten years reading the Holy Scriptures. St. Ailbe, who baptized him, is also said to have superintended his education, for some time.<sup>42</sup> Hence, we are supposed to obtain an additional proof, that David must have been very young, about the commencement of the sixth century. He afterwards withdrew, from all worldly allurements, and he was ordained a priest. David then began his missionary labours, and grounded well in exercises of piety, he preserved a chastened spirit, in the pursuit of greater learning and perfection. He set out for the Isle of Whiteland, Withland, or Witland,<sup>43</sup> where Paulinus,<sup>44</sup> a disciple to St. Germanus,

<sup>34</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 473, and "Index Chronologicus" ad A.D. ccccxc.

<sup>35</sup> His feast occurs, on the 21st of March.

<sup>36</sup> Edward Maihew, Bucelin, and other writers, incorrectly say, that St. David followed the rule of St. Benedict.

<sup>37</sup> Finnian is not mentioned, in any of St. David's Lives. In his own Acts, when spoken of, as connected with David, he does not appear represented as a disciple. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Februarii. Vita S. Finniani, cap. iv., v., vi., vii., viii., ix., x., xi., pp. 393, 394.

<sup>38</sup> His Life will be found, at the 12th of December.

<sup>39</sup> This school of Illtutus, at Laniltult, or Lantwitt, in Glamorganshire, is said to have been very celebrated, about the beginning of the sixth century. See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus" at A.D. 508, and Stillingfleet's "Antiquities of the British Churches," chap. v. A Life of Illtutus mentions David, by mistake, as his scholar. The Bollandists and Stillingfleet observe, however, instead of David, we must read Daniel. This latter studied under Illtutus. Afterwards, he became first Bishop of Bangor.

<sup>40</sup> According to Ussher's "Primordia," p. 472, and Stillingfleet's "History of the British Churches," there had been a school of Paulinus at Withland or Whiteland, in Caermarthen, and not the Isle of Wight, as some have made it, in which St. David spent some of his early years. See his Acts, at the 1st of March, cap. 8. Paulinus is said to have been a disciple of Illtutus. Considering the period, at which Illtutus' school was in vogue, Paulinus could scarcely have opened his before A.D. 512. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. ix., and note 151, pp. 471, 475, 476.

<sup>41</sup> In Caermarthenshire. "Below Talcharn the river Taf runs into the sea; on whose banks stood formerly the famous Twy Gwyn ar Taf or the White House on the Taf, built of white hazel rods for a summer residence, where A.D. 914 Hoel, surnamed the Good, Prince of Wales, held an assembly, whereat assisted 140 ecclesiastics, besides others, and abrogating the ancient laws he enacted new ones for his people as the preamble to these laws sets forth. On this spot was afterwards built a monastery called White Land."—Gough's Camden's "Britannia," p. 505.

<sup>42</sup> Ussher makes such a statement from St. Ailbe's Life. See "Primordia," p. 871.

<sup>43</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis says, he set out, "in Vectam insulam." Camden tells us, the Anglo-Saxons called it Wuidland, or Withland, whilst the Britons called it Guith. In Caermarthen, ascribed to old Demetia, Whiteland was known by the Latin designation Albalandia, where a magnificent Cistercian monastery was built, regarding which a charter of King John exists. See "Monasticon Anglicanum," p. 884 et seq. This lay near Glamorgan, where Illtutus opened his school. Whiteland is mistaken for the Isle of Wight, by the learned Alban Butler, in his Life of St. David, at the 1st of March. See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii, lived, and in a very holy manner. This distinguished teacher had been deprived of sight. Calling his disciples together, Paulinus ordered each in turn to offer a prayer, and then to make a sign of the cross over his eyes. All obeyed these injunctions, but without any healing result, until David was called. This truly modest and humble young priest, by a religious habit acquired, constantly kept his eyes fixed on the ground. "Hitherto," said he, "I have not seen the face of my master." "Then," replied Paulinus, "touch my eyes, that I may behold thee!" David obeyed the order, and sight was immediately restored to his beloved master. However, such was the extraordinary abnegation and modesty of our saint, that for ten years sojourn with Paulinus, he never allowed his eyes to gaze upon the features of his holy director.<sup>45</sup>

In assuming Paulinus to have been the master of David, it is thought by Colgan, the former must have acted in his capacity, as teacher to our saint, before the end of the fifth century. Ussher's opinion would seem to be,<sup>46</sup> that David—having been already promoted to the priesthood—studied under Paulinus, at the very commencement of the sixth century, and that he was a fellow-disciple, about this time, with Thelias.<sup>47</sup> However, vainly endeavouring to identify this Paulinus,<sup>48</sup> master of St. David, with others bearing a similar name, Colgan is forced to a conclusion, that he may have been Hildutus or Iltutus,<sup>49</sup> and especially led to this inference, from one or two circumstances related, regarding this latter saint. The first of these is, that in David's Life, published by himself, there is mention made concerning St. Paulinus, and yet no word about St. Iltutus,<sup>50</sup> as our saint's teacher; likewise, in a Life of this latter, which he cites, David, with others, is said to have been taught by Iltutus.<sup>51</sup> In the second place, as by the Rothe MS., by Capgrave,<sup>52</sup> and by Giraldus,<sup>53</sup> Paulinus is called a disciple of St. Germanus,<sup>54</sup>

<sup>44</sup> By Capgrave, he is called, Paulentus, or Poulentus.

<sup>45</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, cap. vi., vii., viii., p. 426.

<sup>46</sup> See, at the year 500, Ussher's "Index Chronologicus." It is strange, Colgan should cite Ussher, as naming A.D. 484, for this course of instruction, more than once. He then infers from it, that a certain St. Paulus, who died, A.D. 600 or 620, could not have been the Paulinus, who was David's teacher, A.D. 484. Ussher has no such account. St. Paulus, called Leonensis Episcopus, is said to have been a disciple of Iltutus, and to have died at Bath, more than one hundred years old, A.D. 600, according to Claudius Robert, in "Catalogus Episcoporum Leonensium," at this year. Ussher also places his death, about the same time, in his "Index Chronologicus;" but, in the body of his work, adds, "vel etiam DCXX. pervenisse traditur," and for this latter date, he cites John Capgrave, after Vita S. Ithamari. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xiv., p. 290.

<sup>47</sup> His feast occurs, at the 9th of February.

<sup>48</sup> Giraldus says: "tandem Paulinus episcopus, cum quo David olim liberalibus disciplinis in pueritia studuerat." From this, it is not easy to determine, whether Paulinus was the master or fellow-disciple of St. David.

<sup>49</sup> Capgrave gives his Acts, and tells us, he was venerated, on the viii. of the Ides of November.

<sup>50</sup> His feast occurs, at the 6th of November. He died, at Dol, in the sixth century.

<sup>51</sup> Speaking about this saint, his Life has it, that many scholars flocked to him, "quorum de numero quatuor isti, Samson, Paulinus, Gildas, et Dewi, id est, David, studentes sapienter." Here, Paulinus or Paulus is represented as a fellow-disciple of St. David. Colgan tells us, he who in the Life of Iltutus is titled Paulinus, should rather be regarded as "Paulus episcopus Oxismorum sive Leonensis." This would appear, from a Life of St. Gildas, in Bibliotheca Floriacensi, where Gildas, Paulus Leonensis and Samson are enumerated, among the disciples of Hildutus. How is it likely, we may ask, that the master and disciple, bearing different names, could have been mistaken for one and the same person? There was another St. Paulinus, Bishop of Capua, who lived about A.D. 570, according to Ferrarius, "De Sanctis Italiæ," and to Baronius, in his notes to the Martyrology, at the 10th of October. Colgan, however, adds regarding him: "Sed an in Britanniam venerit, vel institutor S. Davidis usque ad annum 570 pervenerit, nullo mihi argumento constat."

<sup>52</sup> Capgrave calls him Paulentus.

<sup>53</sup> Giraldus names him Paulinus. It is the Bishop; so, according to another authority, St. Iltutus is said to have been a disciple of the same Germanus.<sup>55</sup> And lastly, St. Paulinus, together with David, Dubricius,<sup>56</sup> Daniel,<sup>57</sup> and others, is reported to have assisted at the Synod of Brevi,<sup>58</sup> held in the country of Ceretica. Now, St. Iltutus is supposed to have flourished, about the same time, and in this same region. It is not likely, he was absent from such an important Synod, writes Colgan; or, if present, that he had been omitted from that account, contained in the Rothe MS.<sup>59</sup> The author, who wrote this Life of St. David, seems to have supposed, that the person, called by him Paulinus, had been named Iltutus, by other writers.<sup>60</sup> Indeed, it becomes no easy matter to determine this question, with any perfect degree of accuracy.

CHAPTER III.

ST. DAVID ADMONISHED BY AN ANGEL TO COMMENCE HIS MISSION—RESTORES GLASTONBURY—BUILDS A CHAPEL IN HONOUR OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY—KING INA'S FOUNDATIONS FOR IRISH STUDENTS—DEATH AND BURIAL OF KING ARTHUR—RELIGIOUS ERECTION AT BATH BY ST. DAVID—HE BLESSES THE SPRINGS AT THIS PLACE—MISSIONARY WORKS UNDERTAKEN BY ST. DAVID, DURING THE SAXON INCURSIONS—CONDITION OF WALES ABOUT THIS PERIOD—KING ERTIG'S SIGHT RESTORED—AN ANGELIC MONITION—MANY DISCIPLES FLOCK TO ST. DAVID—OPPOSITION EXPERIENCED, AND THE DESIGNS OF PAGAN ENEMIES FRUSTRATED.

WHEN David had spent a sufficient length of time with Paulinus, the Angel of the Lord said to this latter holy man: "It is time that God's beloved—a talent entrusted to thy care—should be presented for the salvation of souls." And the works of our saint soon became manifested to men. He founded or re-edified no less than twelve monasteries. Among these, one of the most celebrated was known as Glastonbury, on the confines of Somersetshire. However, we are not to regard St. David, as the original founder, but rather as the rebuildier or restorer of this ancient religious establishment.<sup>1</sup> For we even learn, from an ancient local chronicle, that when Archbishop of Caerleon on Usk, St. David,<sup>2</sup> with seven bishops, over whom he presided, not reasonable to suppose, he could be identical with St. Paulinus, Apostle of Northumbria, and Archbishop of York, who died A.D. 640. See his Life, at the 10th of October, the day of his feast, in Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints," vol. x.

<sup>54</sup> His feast is held, on the 26th of July.

<sup>55</sup> Vincentius, "In Speculo Hystoricali," lib. xx. cap. 105, and Vita S. Samsonis, preserved in a Landaff Registry.

<sup>56</sup> His festival is usually observed, on the 14th of November.

<sup>57</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 23rd of November.

<sup>58</sup> A.D. 519, according to Ussher. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xiii., pp. 253, 254, and "Index Chronologicus" ad ann. DXIX., p. 526.

<sup>59</sup> The only inference to be drawn from such a statement is, that under the title Paulinus must also be understood a personal identity with St. Iltutus.

<sup>60</sup> Our Irish hagiologist adds: "Alias

cur sileret discipulatum apud Iltutum, virum origine Britannum et inter Britannos notissimum, memorato ejus discipulatu apud Paulinum Britannicis scriptoribus ignotum, si a Paulino sit diversus." See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 10, p. 431.

CHAPTER III.—<sup>1</sup> St. Joseph of Arimathea, with his disciples, is said to have settled in this place, and to have consecrated it. Afterwards, St. Fagan, St. David, St. Patrick, with innumerable other holy and learned men, are found connected, by writers, with this celebrated monastery. Ussher cites the following Latin verses, taken from an old chronicle:—

"Intrat Avallonium duodena caterva virorum;

Flos Arimatheæ Joseph est primus eorum.
Josephes ex Joseph genitus patrem comitatur;

His alisque decem jus Glastoniæ propriatur."

visited Glastonbury about A.D. 565.<sup>3</sup> There he made arrangements, for dedicating its old church, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Another record, in nearly similar terms, assigns this dedication to the year preceding.<sup>4</sup> Yet, in a more modern work, it is stated, that at a still earlier period, about A.D. 530,<sup>5</sup> St. David and his suffragan bishops laid out vast sums in adding to and adorning buildings, belonging to this monastery. From a certain old record,<sup>6</sup> we learn, that when St. David came to Glastonbury, he intended to dedicate the church, already restored to nearly its former appearance. Yet, the Lord miraculously appeared to him in sleep, and dissuaded him from this purpose.<sup>7</sup> Being warned by a Divine revelation, St. David added another minor chapel, in form of a chancel, to the eastern side of this church. This he consecrated, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary; and, to commemorate still more such an event, he brought a precious altar of his own to the place. That posterity might know at what point the chapel had been united to the church, a pyramid was exteriorly erected, towards the north; and, an inner grade or line, facing the south, showed the place where St. Joseph, with a great number of saints, had been buried, according to the opinion of some antiquarians. This place became a sepulchre in after time, for kings, queens, bishops, and nobles. The chapel was consequently held in great veneration, and it was munificently endowed.<sup>8</sup>

In a charter of Ina, king over the East Saxons, several hides of land, with other privileges and possessions, are enumerated, as having been bestowed on this old chapel<sup>9</sup> of the Blessed Virgin. These were intended for the use of Glastonbury monks, who had practised there a life of regular observance. The date of this charter has been assigned to A.D. 725.<sup>10</sup>

It was traditionally held, that when the little ancient church, said to have been here built by Joseph of Arimathea, fell into decay, David, Bishop of St. David's, erected a new one, on the same spot. This structure appears to have been evanescent, as the former;<sup>11</sup> for, it became ruinous, in a short time. It was next rebuilt, by twelve persons, from the northern parts of Britain. Even this latter church did not last; for King Ina had it pulled down, towards the close of the seventh or commencement of the eighth

See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. ii., p. 8. Also, cap. vi., pp. 55, 56.

<sup>2</sup> Our saint is there called "Legionum Archiepiscopus." Under the year of grace 516, we read, "Dubritius urbis Legionum Archiepiscopus," in Matthew of Westminster. See "Flores Historiarum," p. 185.

<sup>3</sup> This visit has been assigned to A.D. 566. A tablet at Glastonbury placed it at 565. But these dates are subsequent to the year generally assigned for our saint's death.

<sup>4</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. v., p. 47. This learned writer places the work of restoration under the year 529. See "Index Chronologicus," p. 528.

<sup>5</sup> See "Britannia ; or, a Chronographical Description of the Flourishing Kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Islands adjacent, from the earliest Antiquity." By William Camden. Translated from the edition published by the Author in MDCVII. Enlarged by the latest discoveries, by Richard Gough, F.A. & R.L.S., vol. i., p. 58, note (u.)

<sup>6</sup> Such account is contained in a MS.

History of Glastonbury church, preserved in the Cotton Library. See "Monasticon Anglicanum," vol. i., p. 1.

<sup>7</sup> The account adds: "Necnon in signum quod Dominus ipse Ecclesiam ipsam prius cum ejus Cimiterio dedicaverat, manum Episcopi digito perforavit; et sic perforata multis videntibus in crastino apparuit." See also Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," S. David.

<sup>8</sup> Views of Glastonbury town and its ancient ruins are to be seen appended to the foregoing account, in "Monasticon Anglicanum," vol. i., p. 3.

<sup>9</sup> Before particularizing the several donations to this establishment, it is parenthetically remarked: "Quam magnus Sacerdos a Pontifex summus Anglorum Christus obsequio, sibi ac perpetuæ Virgini Mariæ, et beato David, multis et inauditis miraculis olim se sanctificasse innotuit." See Spelman's "Concilia," pp. 227, 228.

<sup>10</sup> See ibid., p. 227.

<sup>11</sup> It was probably built of wood or planks, and consequently no trace of it can be found at present.

century. He then built a magnificent one, which was dedicated in honour of Christ, under the invocation of his two glorious Apostles, SS. Peter and Paul, as an inscription in elegiac Latin verse on its upper cornice testified.<sup>12</sup> In those early times, men of most exemplary lives, "especially the Irish," as we are informed, devoted themselves to a religious life. They were maintained at the king's expense, while engaged instructing youth in the principles of religion, in practices of piety, and in an acquisition of the liberal sciences.<sup>13</sup> Even many of these students led solitary lives, that they might have greater leisure for learned pursuits, and greater opportunities for the practice of asceticism and mortification.<sup>14</sup> Owing to such circumstances, this place received the title, Glas-nan Geadhel, or Glassia Hibernorum, in Latin; for, it became a favourite place of resort for our countrymen, many of whom rendered it still more celebrated, by their piety, learning and residence. Amongst them, various saints are enumerated.<sup>15</sup>

During the lifetime of David, lived his renowned kinsman King Arthur,<sup>16</sup>

<sup>12</sup> This inscription, with a versified English translation, is to be found in Gough's Camden's "Britannia," vol. i., pp. 58, 59.

<sup>13</sup> One of the St. Patricks from Ireland—known as St. Patrick Senior—A.D. 435, here gathered, it is said, the first regular congregation of monks. Here, likewise, he lived thirty years as a monk, and he was buried on the north side of the altar. See ibid., and William of Malmsbury's "History and Antiquities of Glastonbury," printed in folio, by Gale, at Oxford, A.D. 1691. Here, also, died and was interred the renowned King Arthur—said to have been St. David's nephew—on the 21st of May, A.D. 542. According to a bardic tradition, Speed relates, that his body was deposited between two Pyramids, standing in the churchyard of Glastonbury. King Henry II. of England "caused the ground to be digged, and at seven foot depth was found a huge broad stone, wherein a Leaden Crosse was fastened, and in that side that lay downward, in rude and barbarous letters (as rudely set and contrived) this inscription written vpon that side of the lead that was towards the stone." There is an engraving of this lead cross, with an inscription, in very ancient lettering, given: HIC JACET SEPULTUS INCLITUS REX ARTURIUS IN INSULA AVALONIA. The cross of lead and its inscription had been long preserved in the Treasury or Register of Glastonbury church, until the time of Henry VIII., according to Stowe. The body of Queen Gueneuer, Arthur's wife, was found beside his own. Both were enclosed in the trunk of a tree, nine feet below the "huge broad stone." Ten wounds were traceable on the skull of King Arthur. Finely platted tresses, in colour like gold, remained on the queen's skull. On being touched, these latter turned into dust. Of this exhumation, Giraldus Cambrensis was an eye-witness. "The bones of King Arthur and of Queen Guineuer, his wife, by the direction of Henry de Bloys, Nephew to King Henry the Second, and Abbot of Glastenbury, at that present, were translated into the great new church, and there in a faire Tombe of Marble, his body was laid, and his Queenes at his feete; which noble Monument, among the fatall overthrowes of infinite more, was altogether raced at the dispose of some then in commission; whose too forward zeale, and ouer-hasty actions in these behalves, hath left vnto vs a want of many truths, and cause to wish that some of their employments had bene better spent." —See Speed's "Historie of Great Britaine." Booke vii., chap. xii., pp. 272, 273.

<sup>14</sup> See Gough's Camden's "Britannia."

<sup>15</sup> The principal one of these was St. Patrick Senior, to whom Marianus O'Gorman alludes in his Martyrology, at the 24th of August, in these words: "S. Patricius Senex in Ros-dela in regione de Magh-lacha," et in Glais na ngaehkel, id est, Glassie Hibernorum, qua est urbs in Aquilonari regione Saxonum: in qua olim suscepta peregrinatione solebant Hiberni habitare: ejus autem reliquie jacent in reliquiario Senioris Patricii Ardmachie." And the Calendar of Cashel, at the same day, has the following account: "Patricius Senior quiescit in Ros dela in regione Maclacha quiescit. Sed secundum aliquos, et verius, Glastonie Hibernorum quiescit senior Patricius. Hæc enim est civitas in Aquilonari regione Saxonum, et Scoti habitant eam. Ejus autem reliquie jacent in reliquiario S. Patricii Ardmachie." The Martyrologies of St. Ængus, Maguire and Donegal, as we are told, have similar accounts, regarding this St. Patrick Senior, at the 24th of August. However, in "The Martyrology of Donegal," published by Drs. Todd and Reeves, I find no mention regarding him, at the date in question.

<sup>16</sup> He is said to have been the son of Nazaleod or Uther, and to have succeeded him, A.D. 514. The war of Badon and King Arthur's great victory are commemorated at A.D. 516. See "Annales Cambrie," edited by Rev. John Williams, ab the heroic leader of the Britons, and the terror of their foes. We read, that having been mortally wounded by Modred,<sup>17</sup> in Cornubia, near the river Kemelen, in the year of our Lord 542, Arthur had been brought to the Island of Avallon, so that his wound might be healed. Here he died, and was buried in the cemetery of the monks, during summer, and about the feast of Pentecost. His queen Guenevera was interred beside him. We are told, they rested in their grave for 648 years, when their remains were afterwards removed to the larger church.<sup>18</sup> Immediately before the death of Arthur, in 542, he is said to have bequeathed his British crown to a kinsman, named Constantine, son to Cador, Chief of Cornubia. Then, we are informed, the most holy Archbishop of Caerleon, David, died in his city of Menevia, and within the Abbey, which he loved more than all the other religious houses in his diocese. This was because, it had been founded by St. Patrick, who predicted his own nativity.<sup>19</sup> Whilst sojourning in this monastery with his confères, a sudden weakness, betokening the approach of death, came over him. By order of Malgon, King of the Venedoti, he was buried in the Church of Menevia. Then, after giving an account of Constantine's wars, it is said, he was killed by Conan, in the third year of his reign,<sup>20</sup> which must have been, A.D. 545.<sup>21</sup>

Another recorded religious foundation, effected by St. David, was at Bath,<sup>22</sup> in Somersetshire. Here, we are told, that owing to his blessing, Ithel, p. 3. Many fabulous and romantic things have been related, concerning this renowned champion of the British nation. He powerfully resisted the Pagan Saxons; but, whether he was king of the Britons in general, or only a Prince over Cornwall, is uncertain. See Echard's "History of England," vol. i., book i., chap. ii., cent. vi., p. 41. In another account, I find Uter "called Pendragon, of his Royal Banner born ever before him; wherein was portrayed a Dragon with a Golden Head, as in our English camps it is at this day born for the Imperial Standard."—Sir Richard Baker's "Chronicle of the Kings of England," p. 4. By the same author, we are told, that Arthur was son "of the fair Lady Igren;" but, we may well doubt the veracity of this account, as it has been connected with a fabulous and an absurd tradition.

<sup>17</sup> In Polydori Vergilii Urbinatis "Anglicæ Historiæ" Libri Vigintiseptem, lib. iii., p. 60, this enemy of King Arthur is called "Mordredum nepotem." He is said to have excited insurrection, during the king's absence on a warlike expedition, having the city of Rome for its object. Mordred is also said to have been killed in this battle. Polydore Virgil was born about A.D. 1470, and he died in 1555. See notices regarding him and his writings, in the "Biographie Universelle, Ancienne et Moderne, cr. Redigé par une Société de Gens de Lettres et de Savants." Tome xxxv., pp. 260, 261, 262.

<sup>18</sup> The foregoing account is set down in some ancient records of Glastonbury church. See "Monasticon Anglicanum," vol. i., p. 7. The writers of British history, who confirm this statement, are Thomas Rudburn, Walter of Oxford, Geoffrey of Monmouth, Matthew of Westminster, Alan Insulensis, and the Annals of Winton monastery. Amongst Scottish writers, are John Fordun, John Major, and Hector Boetius, who accord in their several works. These are cited and followed by Ussher.

<sup>19</sup> Here, evidently, the popular tradition has confounded the great Apostle of Ireland, with a St. Patrick, designated Senior.

<sup>20</sup> Godfrey, or Geoffirey, of Monmouth, gives the foregoing account in his Chronicle, lib. ii., cap. 2, 3, 4.

<sup>21</sup> Such, at least, is the inference of the Bollandist editor, who says: "recte erui infra ex Vita, num. 17. mortuum esse anno intermedio DXLIV., quo cyclo solis XXI., litteris Dominicalibus CB, Kalendæ Martiæ in feriam tertiam convenire: qui obitus ejus characteres ibidem observantur." See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., n. 14, pp. 40, 41.

<sup>22</sup> The name, in the original account, is Badum. Camden has a description concerning it, in his account of Somersetshire. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sect. ix., p. 426, and n. 13, p. 431, ibid. Also, Gough's Camden's "Britannia," where it is described, as lying on the noble river Avon. It is an ancient city, "called by Ptolemy from its baths, Τόρα Ὀπερα, or the Warm Waters"; by Antoninus AQUÆ SOLIS, by the Britons Yr ennaint twymin and Caer Badon, by the Saxons Bathancester, Hat Bathan, and from the resort of the sick Akenancester, q.d. the city of the sick; by Stephanus Badisa, by us at present Bathe, and in modern Latin Bathonia. It stands water, which heretofore had proved most deleterious to health, became afterwards most salubrious to persons washed by it.<sup>23</sup> Whether, this account has any reference to the famous Thermal and warm water fountains, so well known and so long resorted to by invalids, we have no means left for ascertaining. But, there is every reason for supposing such identification.<sup>24</sup> These appear to have been known, from the most remote antiquity. Yet, we can find no very satisfactory account, regarding the religious foundation of St. David, at this place. Probably, the materials used in its construction were not destined for a durability, greater than had been effected in the case of Glastonbury. In all likelihood, it perished, during the destructive wars waged, at this period of British history.

Many other monasteries were erected by our saint.<sup>25</sup> Yet, these religious works seem to have been undertaken and executed, at a time, when social disturbances prevailed over a great portion of Britain.<sup>26</sup> The Picts, Scots and Saxons had already made inroads on the disunited aboriginal inhabitants. In 449, the Saxons first landed, as pretended auxiliaries of the Britons, on the Isle of Thanet. But, they soon found or sought a pretext for quarrelling with their allies. The Saxon invasion of England levelled churches and monasteries of the conquered Britons; whilst Paganism and barbarism triumphed over the early victories of Christianity, in Southern England. The two last bishops of these vanquished Britons abandoned their churches and pastoral charges of London and York, in 586. Carrying with them relics of saints and consecrated vessels, they followed tribes of their people and race, seeking refuge westwards amongst the inaccessible mountains of Wales.<sup>27</sup> The Saxons now dreamed only of conquest, and an unrelenting struggle continued, almost without intermission, for a period of one hundred and fifty years. Indeed, it never entirely ceased, until the warlike Saxon finally yielded to the hardy and enterprising Danes and Normans, in the eleventh century. Wales had its part, in these internecine contests;<sup>28</sup> but, the early history of in a small plain, fenced as it were on every side by hills of equal height, from whence perpetual springs descend into the city to the great convenience of the inhabitants." See vol. i., p. 61.

<sup>23</sup> See Tanner's "Notitia Monastica; or, an Account of All the Abbies, Priors and Houses of Friars, formerly in England and Wales," edited by James Nasmith, M.A., Somersetshire. V. Bath, n. (k). This erudite and valuable edition is without any paging.

<sup>24</sup> We are informed by a modern Protestant historian, that "giving to the Bath waters the virtues they still retain" is one of those miracles attributed to St. David. See Mon. De Thyoras Rapin's "History of England," vol. i., book ii., p. 43. Translated by N. Tindal, M.A.

<sup>25</sup> In addition to those already named, the Utrecht MS. says: "Postea Caulam et Reptum, Coluam et Glastum, deinde Seumnistre, postea Raclam: hinc Langhemalach, in quo postea altare missum accepit." We are told, by the Bollandist editor, that these seven monasteries have been omitted, by other writers; probably, because they had ceased to exist, at the period of their writing. Two additional monasteries are named by Capgrave: "Lemustir et aliud in Govvir in Wallia." But, perhaps, the first may be regarded as identical with "Secumnistre." In the text of Giraldus Cambrensis, we read: "Postea Croulam et Reptum, Colvan et Glascom. Ex hinc Leonis monasterium, Ragalan quoque in Wintae, et Langevelach apud Goer, ubi et altare missum a Domino postea suscepit."—Lect. iii. Ricemarc has Reptum, for Reptum; Colguan, for Colvan; Leuministre, for Leonis; Raglam in regione Guent, for Ragalan; and Guhir, for Goer.

<sup>26</sup> I know of no other work more elegantly and learnedly written, on the history of this early period, or ages subsequent thereto, and which will give the reader more accurate accounts, than Sharon Turner's "History of the Anglo-Saxons," in four volumes, 8vo. This work was first published in London, at the close of the last, and beginning of the present century.

<sup>27</sup> See Le Comte de Montalembert's work, "Les Moines d'Occident, depuis Saint Benoit jusqu'à Saint Bernard," Tome iii., livre x., xii. For an interesting account of the Saxon conquests, over the Britons, may be consulted that interesting work: Percie Enderbie's "Cambria Triumphans, or Britain in its perfect lustre, shewing the Origin and Antiquity of that illustrious Nation. Second Tome, First Book.

<sup>28</sup> See that valuable and compendious

this province requires further elucidation, from its numerous records yet existing.<sup>29</sup>

This remarkable division of Britain, now for many ages past united to England, had been called "Britannia Secunda," under Roman rule. Formerly, it had been governed by its own rulers. When the Anglo-Saxons occupied most other parts of Britain, and had given different names to kingdoms founded by them, many people, retaining the name of Britons, fled into Wales, so that they might not dwell with the idolatrous Anglo-Saxons. In Wales, they lived under the rule of petty kings. Afterwards, it is said, to have been named Cambria, or even, as many think, this had been its original denomination. It is still poetically known by this latter name. Among the people of Armoric Gaul and those Britons very friendly relations existed. The Armoric district was even called Britain, by the Gauls; whilst the other Britain or Cambria had been designated Gualla and then Wallia. This was supposed to have been derived from the name of Gaul.<sup>30</sup> Such derivation appears more probable, than one offered by an old English chronicler, that Wales took its appellation from a Princess, named Walia.<sup>31</sup>

After giving an account of St. David's various religious foundations, the Utrecht MS. relates, that he restored sight to a King Ertig,<sup>32</sup> who was a relation of his own.<sup>33</sup> Having established the cenobitical rule, in houses of his appointment, he prepared for a return to the place, whence he had set out, namely, Menevia, and there Bishop Duisdianus<sup>34</sup> lived. He is also called Gweslan, and he was nearly related to St. David.<sup>35</sup> Here, while conversing together on pious topics and in a friendly manner, they proposed remaining. But an Angel said in their hearing: "Scarcely one in a hundred shall enjoy Heavenly rewards, in the place where you purpose serving God. But near this, there is another spot," showing Rossina valley,<sup>36</sup> "and of those work, the Rev. Thomas Flanagan's "Manual of British and Irish History," illustrated with Maps, Engravings, and Statistical, Chronological and Genealogical Tables, chap. i., p. 18, chap. ii., p. 21. There we read: "Some maintain that the inhabitants of Wales are not ancient Britons but Picts. Their principal reasons are, that the Welsh have not retained the old name Silures and Ordovices; that the genealogies of their principal families almost invariably lead back to the Pictish kingdom of Strathclyde, or the Valley of the Clyde; and that the language of the Picts, if we may judge from one or two words that remain, was decidedly Welsh. These reasons, however, are not in themselves conclusive, and they take it for granted that the Picts were a different race from the ancient Britons, a position by no means substantiated, and generally denied." See ibid., p. 24, note.

<sup>29</sup> The Welsh language affords upwards of a thousand, we will venture to say two thousand manuscripts of very considerable antiquity. See "The Mgyvrian Archæology of Wales," vol. i. Preface.

<sup>30</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis. Commentarius Prævius, sect. i., num. i., p. 38.

<sup>31</sup> Du Chesne, in his "Histoire Generale d'Angleterre, D'Ecosse, et D'Irlande," Livre v., p. 263, after giving an account of the dispersion into Armorica, adds: "Les autres qui chercherent une patrie dedans leur propre patrie, se refugierent es pays appelez depuis et maintenant encor par les Anglois Waller, ou Galles, & Cornwal. Appellations derivees du mot Welsh, ou Walsh, c'est à dire estranger & d'autre nation, entre les Germaines. Car quant a ceux qui les ont voulu tirer des Gaulois, comme Bucanan, ou d'une Princesse appelee Walia, comme Geofroy de Monmoulth, il semble que leurs conjectures sont foibles, & sans aucun fondement."

<sup>32</sup> He is called, "Ergin cui nomen Proprius," by Giraldus. Lect. iii. Ricemarc has it, "Pepiau regem Erging."

<sup>33</sup> Here Ricemarc interposes: "Duo quoque sancti Boducat et Maitrun in provincia Celgueli dederunt sibi manus."

<sup>34</sup> Giraldus writes: "Erat autem codem tempore ibidem episcopus avunculus ejus, vir venerabilis, cui nomen Glastianus." In another account, we have, "Giustilianus fratruelis ejus."

<sup>35</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 21.

<sup>36</sup> Ricemarc adds: "Quem vulgari nomine Hoduant Britones vocitant." Giraldus adds: "ubi sacrum hodie cimiterium extat, longe religioni et sanctæ congregationi competentior. Ex hoc nempe maximos sibi divina providentia fidelium animarum thesauros elegit." Lect. iii.

<sup>37</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i.,

who shall be buried in its cemetery, scarcely one shall suffer the pains of hell, provided they fall not from the faith."<sup>37</sup>

In a short time, the celebrity of St. David, as a master of the spiritual life, spread abroad, throughout his own country, and in more distant lands. Soon, many disciples began to collect around him. Among these, we find the Irish Saint Moedoc or Aidan, afterwards bishop of Ferns,<sup>38</sup> St. Eliud,<sup>39</sup> who is called, also, Teilo,<sup>40</sup> Thelias, Teilaus, Teilanus or Teleanus, together with Ismael. Regarding this latter, little appears to be known; but, according to some accounts, Ismael is represented as the immediate successor of St. David. Ismael is also said to have been a disciple of Dubricius, and to have been consecrated by Teilo. While these three saints, with other fellow-disciples, were one day in company, an Angel directed their course towards a place, where a fire was kindled. From this spot a column of smoke ascended. It seemed, not only to cover all the land of Britain, but it even enveloped the whole Island of Hibernia. We are told, that a certain inhabitant, named Boia,<sup>41</sup> living in that part of Wales, trembled when he witnessed this sign. He felt so very much depressed in mind, that he spent the whole day in grief and fasting. When his wife asked the cause for his extraordinary depression of countenance and spirits, Boia replied to her: "I have seen a smoke arising from Rossina valley, covering, as it were, the whole land, and I fear the mystery it conceals. From this omen, I undoubtedly anticipate, that he, who hath lighted such a fire, must excel all other

Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, cap. ii., sect. 5, p. 42.

<sup>38</sup> His Life will be found, at the 31st of January.

<sup>39</sup> According to some writers, this saint immediately succeeded St. David, as bishop of Menevia. But, Giraldus Cambrensis tells us, that a Cenaus or Kinocus was the immediate successor of our saint, and that after him came Eliud Teliau or Teilanus. See "Itinerarium Cambriae," lib. ii., cap. i., and Vita S. Davidis. Amongst the Charters of Donations granted by King Ido, son to Ynir Guent, as found in the Registry of Landaff, we find foremost the signatures of clergy, Telias Archiepiscopus; "ille nimirum," adds Ussher, "quem Dividi suo Menevenses, in sede vero Ladavensi Dubricio successisse alii tradiderunt."—"Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. v., p. 52. As Teilo succeeded Dubricius, in the see of Landaff, it has been conjectured, that some error must have occurred in placing his name amongst the Archbishops of St. David's See.—Examine "The Beauties of England and Wales," &c. South Wales. By Thomas Rees, F.S.A. Vol. xviii., p. 847. Yet, his name, Eliud or Teilaus, is given as third in succession from St. David, in a list of Menevian bishops, drawn up by Giraldus; while, in another list, prepared by Godwin, on the authority of an ancient document, belonging to St. David's church, Eliud is represented as the second and Thelias as the third bishop, succeeding our saint. See ibid., pp. 845, 846. Hence, to me, it does not seem clear, that Eliud was identical with Teilo. This latter, also known as Teilaus or Teleanus, was venerated, we are told, at Landaff, in Glamorganshire, on the 25th of November. Here, it is said, he had been educated under St. Dubritius and St. David. As another saint, bearing this name, has not been discovered, Herman Greuen or the Carthusian Martyrology records his festival probably at the 9th of February, "In Britannia S. Teillani Confessoris." The English Martyrology does not make him a confessor, but a martyr. It says, that he fell by the hand of a noble, called Gueddan, A.D. 626. Colgan remarks, that in the beginning of the seventh century a Saint Telleus or Teleanus, an Irishman, lived. He was descended from the family of Colla Dacrioch, as appears in the Martyrologium Genealogicum, cap. 12, and Vita S. Munnæ, cap. 10. He had been venerated at the church of Tegh-telle, in Westmeath, on the 25th of June, as would appear from the Martyrologies of Tallagh, Marianus O'Gorman, Maguire and Donegal. But, until the Acts of this Telleus or Teilo, mentioned in the text, came into Colgan's hands, or some valid source of evidence became available, our Irish hagiologist would not pronounce for their identity or distinction. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 16, pp. 431, 432.

<sup>40</sup> Teilo is said to have been, not a disciple, but a fellow-disciple, with St. David. In the Utrecht MS., the names of saints, mentioned in the text, are not given.

<sup>41</sup> "Baia vocatus Scottus," says Rice-marc. He was probably a Druidical chief, and he had a strong fortress in the neighbourhood. See Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," V. S. David.

<sup>42</sup> The place where St. David and his monks then lived is designated, "Collegii inhabitants of this land in power and glory." His wife, who participated in these prejudices of her husband, advised the latter to gather a number of his followers and massacre those, who had lighted the fire. Having prepared to obey these her instructions, six of his followers were seized with fever on the way. The rest of these retainers, finding their object could not be accomplished, returned, only to hear from Boia's wife, that their cattle had perished during their absence. On learning this news, they said one to another, "Let us go back, and on bended knees entreat God's servants to remove their ban from ourselves and from our cattle." This they did in all humility, confessing their fault and shedding an abundance of tears, whilst they said: "May the land in which you live belong to you for ever." St. David had compassion on them, and he affectionately told them, their animals should again come to life; and, as he had promised, so it happened.

By other improper means, we are informed, Boia's wife contrived to render this place of habitation<sup>42</sup> distasteful to the monks, and they proposed that St. David should abandon it. But their holy superior said: "As, through many tribulations, persecutions and continuous wars against seven nations, whose destruction God had ordered, his Israelites came to the Land of Promise; so, at the present time, those, who desire rest in a heavenly country, must be exposed to many adversities, and yet not fail, but valiantly resist every effort of the enemy, through God's assistance. Be you, therefore, faithful, nor let the enemy rejoice at your flight. For we must remain, and Boia, with his wife, shall yield to us." With such words, he fortified the minds of his disciples, and rendered them inflexible in their purpose. The very next day, Boia's wife lapsed into insanity, nor did she ever recover from it.<sup>43</sup> Boia himself soon perished, receiving an unexpected stroke from the hands of an enemy; a fire or lightning sent from heaven burned his dwelling; and, in these visible judgments, the power of God was terribly manifested.<sup>44</sup>

CHAPTER IV.

ST. DAVID FOUNDS HIS MONASTERY—RULES THERE ESTABLISHED FOR HIS MONKS—THEIR OBSERVANCES AND AUSTERE PRACTICES—PERSONAL EXAMPLE OF OUR SAINT—HIS PREACHING AND PERFECT PIETY—MANY ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONS ARE ATTACHED TO ST. DAVID'S RULE OF OBSERVANCE—HIS MIRACLES—VARIOUS HOLY IRISHMEN BECOME HIS DISCIPLES—IRELAND HAS ALWAYS REGARDED ST. DAVID WITH A SPECIAL VENERATION.

THROUGH Divine agency, his adversaries having been removed, St. David founded a very celebrated monastery, on that identical spot, pointed out by the Angel. He then commenced, by setting his house in order. He decreed, whatever his brethren might there acquire, by daily labour, should be appropriated for their common support. This holy man recognised the fact, proved by experience, that idleness is the source and origin of most Pœnitentia," in the Utrecht MS. And to this, the editor has appended the following note: "Albertus le Grand in Vita S. Sezni cremetorium hujus Sancti Britannis ait vocari Peneti Sant Sezni: et alibi insinuat pro pœnitentia hanc vocem accepi, id est, loco pœnitentia exercenda destinato; fortassis hic quoque rectius Penetia, seu Pœnitentia legatur."—Vita S. Davidis, cap. ii., n. (e),

p. 43.

<sup>43</sup> The Utrecht MS. adds, to this account of Boia's wife: "occisa prius innocenti privigna (in cujus martyrii sede fons sanitatum redditor emanavit)."

<sup>44</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sects. x., xi., p. 426.

vices. Therefore, did he require the monks to labour hard, each day ; for, he knew, that were they to rest entirely, a spirit of sloth or luxury must pervert their minds. He constantly set before them a necessity for labouring in earnest, so that the devil might never find them idle. They must reject all presents and despise riches. Nor would he allow a yoke of oxen to plough their land ; this work of tillage should be performed alone by manual labour. During their hours for toil, or when leaving off work for the day, he would not have a single unnecessary word or idle conversation amongst his disciples, who were then required to engage in prayer or holy meditation. When their hours for agricultural work had elapsed, these monks were enjoined to return to their monastery, where their remaining time until evening came was devoted to reading, writing and prayer. When evening came the sound of a bell was heard. Then each monk left his studies, and went in silence to the common place for assembling. At the very first stroke of this bell, when heard, each monk was obliged to rise instantly, nor dare he finish a single letter he had been writing : he must even leave it partially formed. When they had chaunted the Divine Office and hymns, with great reverence, in the church, his monks, afterwards, on bended knees, made an examination of conscience, with much interior devotion, and often accompanied with penitential tears.

When these holy religious took food in a common refectory, it was through matter of necessity, and not to please the palate. Their rule required great abstemiousness. They were obliged to live on bread, vegetables and salt. They regarded any more generous food with aversion. But, in the case of infirm, aged, or over-fatigued monks, better fare was sometimes very wisely allowed.

Having given thanks to God after meals, the monks entered church in their usual manner. There, during three hours, they were accustomed to kneel, to pray, and to meditate. Whilst praying in church, they were forbidden to yawn, to cough, or to spit ; these being regarded as improprieties, quite unbecoming the sacred place, and occasion, for which they had assembled.

When all their daily exercises had ended, they prepared for nightly repose. That this was of brief duration would appear, from an account, how they arose at cock-crow, again to engage in prayer and genuflexion. They were obliged to keep vigil, until the dawn of morning. They were clad, likewise, in very coarse habits, chiefly formed from the skins of beasts.

His monks were accustomed to reveal their secret thoughts to their holy superior, and in the performance of most trivial things, they wished to secure his permission. Their monastic property was common to all, so that none of the brethren could say, "this is mine," or, "that is yours." Whoever infringed on the letter or spirit of this rule was subjected to a severe penance. They never failed in obedience to their superior's orders. Their single-mindedness was admirable, and their perseverance in action was a mark of their religious vocation. Whatever candidate for admission to this community presented himself, withdrawing from worldly engagements, was first required to remain ten days before the door of the monastery. There he only heard reproachful and discouraging words addressed to him. If he had patience to bear such an ordeal for ten days, the postulant was received. Then he first served under a senior, appointed to this office for a time. The candidate was trained to many naturally distasteful practices, until humility made him fitted for full companionship with his brethren. Nothing superfluous could belong to any one of those monks, who thus voluntarily accepted a life of true poverty. Any person, who really desired to follow this community's rule, was received, divested of all worldly goods, as if rescued from a shipwreck, with the loss of every article of his property. Nor would the holy superior, St. David, receive the smallest donation from a postulant, as a contribution for the common support of their monastery. Such was the perfect spirit of abnegation, required by this most rigorous and ascetic rule.

Among all his spiritual children, St. David was most distinguished for his daily labours. He spent each day, in teaching, in reading, in prayer, and in the government of his religious family. He also took care to provide for and feed orphans, widows, with other indigent persons. His heart glowed like a furnace of Divine love, especially when he offered the Holy Sacrifice of the Lord's body and blood. He often poured forth floods of penitential tears. Engaged in meditation, he seemed to be holding conversation alone with the Angels of God. One of his penitential exercises consisted in the nightly and lengthened immersion of his body in cold water, so that he might perfectly subdue every rebellious movement of the flesh. When the rest of his monks sought a much-needed repose in their beds, the holy David alone frequently kept vigil, and offered his prayers to Almighty God, on behalf of that flock entrusted to his charge.<sup>1</sup>

St. David is said<sup>2</sup> to have been set up as a most eminent mirror and exemplar for all. His subjects were instructed by example, not less than by word. Although a great preacher, he was still greater in practical work. He conveyed instruction to his hearers, order to his religious, life to the destitute, support to the orphan, comfort to widows; he became the father of his scholars, a rule for his monks, and a guide for secular persons. Thus, he became all things to all men, that he might gain all to Christ.

His fame then became so great, that by his means, many kings and princes left the world and sought cloistral shelter. His monastery seemed the great centre of religious attraction. Among others, Constantine, King of Cornubia,<sup>3</sup> now Cornwall, abandoning the early vices of his youth and all worldly pleasures, took the habit of a monk in St. David's monastery. That he might become still more devoted to the Almighty's service, he afterwards went over to Ireland,<sup>4</sup> where he is said to have passed some time, under the direction of St. Carthage,<sup>5</sup> at Rathen, near Tullamore.<sup>6</sup>

Among many miracles recorded of our saint, it is said, that one day, whilst his brethren were assembled together, they complained that water was wanting to them. Their compassionate father went to a spot adjoining, where he held converse with an angel. Here he prayed very feverently, asking the Almighty to supply what was necessary. Immediately a fountain of water issued from the earth. What seemed still more remarkable was a change of this water into wine, for the refreshment of St. David's monks.<sup>7</sup>

This is related, by Giraldus, in a more diffuse and somewhat different manner. He tells us, the monks had desired, that a sufficient supply of clear running water should flow near the monastery, for sacramental celebration of the holy mysteries of our Lord's Body, offered at Mass. For a stream called Aluni, which ran through the valley, had often become turbid and discoloured, when it had not dried up in the summer season. Then their venerable

CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sects. xii., xiii., pp. 426, 427. John Capgrave has nearly the same account, regarding our saint's mode of living. See "Legenda Angliæ."

<sup>2</sup> By Giraldus Cambrensis.

<sup>3</sup> Ricemarc calls him "rex," and Giraldus, "dux Cornubiæ."

<sup>4</sup> See Hector Boetius, "Historia Scoto-

rum," lib. ix.

<sup>5</sup> His Life is given, at the 14th of May.

<sup>6</sup> The Acts of St. Constantine, King, Monk and Martyr, are given by Colgan, at the 11th of March, the date for his festival. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," pp. 577 to 579. See also our account of him, at that date.

<sup>7</sup> See ibid., i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sect. xv., p. 427.

superior went immediately to the cemetery, where he had angelic conferences frequently ; and, for some time he prayed devoutly to our Lord. The clear fountain, which immediately issued from that spot, served for sacramental and general purposes, even to the time of Giraldus. Before his age, popular tradition had held, that this fountain sometimes flowed with wine ; and, it was a certain truth, says this writer, that milk issued from it, occasionally, so late as the twelfth century. Moreover, owing to the great merits of St. David and his monks, many other fountains of water sprung up near the same place.<sup>8</sup> In the Utrecht Manuscript, it is related, that a rustic, called Tardus, said to St. David : " Our life is one of excessive toil, because our land lies far from the river, and we find the watering of it very laborious."<sup>9</sup> Wherefore, the holy David, having compassion on this peasant, drove the point of his staff into the earth. Suddenly, a clear fountain of cold water sprung up, and served to refresh the soil, during the heats of summer.<sup>10</sup>

Whatever spiritual graces pious disciples receive, also reflect glory and honour on their holy masters. Many such worthy scholars flocked to the school of St. David ; and, our island furnished its fair contingent, as we read in the Acts of our national saints. Aidan is repeatedly spoken of as St. David's disciple, not only in his own Life, at the 31st of January,<sup>11</sup> but likewise in David's Acts. From the former it would appear, that Aidan was already grown, when he went to study under the Bishop of Menevia.<sup>12</sup> Ussher was greatly puzzled by these authorities, some of which are quoted by him.<sup>13</sup> He endeavours to invalidate them ; first, by suggesting that King Ainmire, with whom Aidan was left as a hostage, perhaps had been an older one bearing that name ; and, secondly, by observing, that what is said regarding Aidan having been with St. David, may be understood of that holy Irishman, having studied in David's monastery after the Bishop of Menevia's death.<sup>14</sup> Ussher knew very well, that Aidan flourished in the latter end of the sixth century, and during no small part of the seventh. This explanation, in Dr. Lanigan's opinion, cannot be reconciled with passages found in the Lives of our saints. We find St. David introduced several times as speaking to or concerning Aidan, when in his monastery. In the Life of St. David,<sup>15</sup> we read that Aidan, after returning to Ireland, had sent a person to David, for the special purpose of guarding him from an attempt to take away his life, by poisoning some bread, which had been offered to him. This he blessed, when it divided into three portions, and without any hesitation, he eat one of these fragments, that contained no poison.

We are told, that a portion of Scripture had been transcribed by Maidoc. This was the Gospel of St. John, and he found an unfinished column, on his return, completed by an angel, in letters of gold. Through reverence for this Codex, it was long kept as a sealed book. Having been enclosed in a cover, ornamented with gold and silver, no human eye had been permitted to inspect it, or to open the clasp. In the time of Giraldus, when the love and

<sup>8</sup> Vita S. Davidis, lect. v.

<sup>9</sup> " Ubi Breudi quoque, ubi ecclesia in honore Sancti David, quasi per milliaria quatuor a Menevia distans, fundata dinoscitur, ad instantiam viri cujusdam, cui nomen Terdi, pulcherrimum dulcis aquæ fontem piis similiter supplicationibus pater emisit." Lect. v. For " cui nomen Terdi," the Bollandists have " Quidam rusticus, nomine Tardi." Vita S. Davidis, cap. iii.

<sup>10</sup> See " Acta Sanctorum," i. Martii.

Vita S. Davidis, cap. iii., sect. 9, p. 43.

<sup>11</sup> See Colgan's " Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," at this day.

<sup>12</sup> In the Life of St. David by Giraldus, St. Aidan is said to have been " divinis eruditus disciplinis," when under the tuition of the saintly bishop of Menevia. " Quodam igitur die tres fidelissimi discipuli David ad ipsum veniunt ; Aidanus scilicet, qui et Hybernice Maidaucus ; Eliud, qui et hodie Teliau dicitur ; et Ysmael."—Lect. iv.

<sup>13</sup> See " Primordia," p. 965.

<sup>14</sup> See " Index Chronologicus," A.D.

DLXVI.

<sup>15</sup> See Vita S. Davidis, cap. xvii.

fear of God grew weak, and when the fervour of faith declined, some persons felt curious enough to examine this remarkable work. But, having had some internal monition, which taught them to dread a perilous result, they desisted from such rash experiment.<sup>16</sup>

The Bollandists say, however, that in any Acts of St. David, which they had seen, no mention had been made regarding this work, written in golden characters, and completed by angels. Such a remark has been incidentally made, when citing the testimony of Herman Greuen's additions to Usuard's Martyrology, where the foregoing account had been given. A wood in which St. Maidoc wrought, was situated in a valley, known as Saleunach, about two miles distant from St. David's monastery.<sup>17</sup> His course of instruction caused the disciple to emulate his master's noble example. It is said, by Giraldus, that when Maidoc built a magnificent monastery at Ferns,<sup>18</sup> he called his own disciples together, and proposed to them the adoption of St. David's religious rule, which he studied at Menevia. This recommendation was adopted.

Another Irish disciple of St. David, called Scuthinus by Colgan and the Bollandists, is designated by Giraldus, Swithinus, or Scolanus, who was said to have been appointed Bishop of Winton. Ricemarc calls him Scutinus; but, he is silent regarding the episcopacy of Winton having been conferred upon him. This report, which Giraldus gives as such, cannot have been well founded; for, it appears referable to St. Swithun, who became bishop, and who is venerated on a different day. Speaking of that Scuthinus, who is venerated at the 2nd of January, in our Irish Calendars, Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Life of St. David, has observed, that he was otherwise called Scolanus, after his promotion to the see of Winton. But, says the Bollandist editor, this seems to be St. Swithun, venerated on the 2nd of July, and who was successor of Helmstan, A.D. 936.<sup>19</sup>

Besides the foregoing holy Irishmen, we read of St. Barr or Barrocos having visited St. David, on returning from Rome. In giving us an account, of St. Barrock<sup>20</sup> meeting St. Brendan on the sea, Giraldus prefaces his observations with a remark, that in those times, it was a usual custom of the Irish, to make pious and laborious pilgrimages towards that holy city, in preference to any other place.<sup>21</sup> A strange legend is introduced, in connexion with this narrative.<sup>22</sup> We must remark, however, this account about St. Barr is altogether omitted from the Utrecht MS. The Bollandist editor attaches little importance to it; for, he regards the story about St. Barr of Cork visit-

<sup>16</sup> Giraldus adds, respecting this book: "Vocatur autem a comprovincialibus textus iste Evangelium Imperfectum; qui usque in hodiernum signis clarus et virtutibus, in maxima non immerito reverentia a cunctis habetur." Lect. vi. Ricemarc does not mention anything regarding this Codex.

<sup>17</sup> See Giraldus Cambrensis' account.

<sup>18</sup> Giraldus calls his place "Fernas," and Ricemarc "Guerwin."

<sup>19</sup> So Wigorn relates, in his Chronicle.

<sup>20</sup> St. Barrocos is called Barre, by Ricemarc. See his Life, at the 25th of September.

<sup>21</sup> See Lect. vi.

<sup>22</sup> Giraldus concludes his account about Barr's return to Cork, by saying, that this saint related to the brethren what had occurred, and that these monks kept the horse on which he had been borne for their monastic purposes, to the day of his death. He adds: "Post obitum vero ad tanti [et] tam inauditi miraculi perpetuam memoriam, equum fusilem modicum et portabilem, virumque insidentem, auro et argento egregie distinctum fecerunt. Qui usque in hodiernum Corcagiæ in ecclesia Barroci, signis clarus et virtutibus, in maxima nimirum reverentia a comprovincialibus haberi solet. His autem vehiculorum miraculis illud in Psalmo consonare potest. 'In mari via tua, et semita tua in aquis multis; et vestigia tua non cognoscentur.' Item et illud in cantico Abba-cuk: 'Viam fecisti in mari equis tuis, in luto aquarum multarum.' Mirabilis itaque Deus in sanctis suis et magnus in omnibus operibus suis. Nec detestari debet, sed admirari, sed venerari, Creatoris opera, quævis creatura. 'Multa nimirum' ut ait Jeronimus 'incredibilia reperies nec verisimilia, quæ nihilominus tamen vera sunt.' Nihil enim contra naturæ Dominum prævalet natura." Lect. vi.

<sup>23</sup> The modern editor of Giraldus Cam-

ing St. David, to be irreconcilable with correct chronology. Being represented, as a disciple of St. Gregory, and returning from Rome ; it is thought, St. Barr could not have found St. David then living. This account and that referring to St. Swithin are supposed to have been merely poetic figments.<sup>23</sup> Modomnoc or Dominic,<sup>24</sup> the bee-keeper of St. David, was an Irishman, who, after remaining some time with his devout director, returned to his own country. This monk is said to have been the first person, who introduced bees into Ireland.<sup>25</sup>

Various reasons have been assigned by our national hagiologist, Colgan, for placing St. David of Wales, among the saints of Ireland. In the first place, this patriarch's mother, by race, and family, perhaps even by birth, had been Irish.<sup>26</sup> Secondly, an affectionate and unalterable intimacy existed between St. David, and some of the most eminent of our Irish saints, who either lived with him for a time, as disciples and scholars, or who claimed his friendship and religious services. Thirdly, by our national hagiologists and martyrologists, we find his name and festival set down in native Calendars and Martyrologies, with the saints of our own country. This is quite an unusual distinction, when a saint had not been known, as connected with Ireland, by birth, residence, or death.<sup>27</sup> Fourthly, among the Acts of Irish saints, found in the Codex Kilkeniensis and Book of the Island, those of St. David, Bishop of Menevia, are included. To the foregoing, we may be permitted to append an observation, that the name, festival, patronage and memory of St. David, for a long period, have been held in veneration, by the inhabitants of our own Green Island ; and, in various localities there, churches and religious houses have cherished his patronage and protection.

CHAPTER V.

ST. DAVID, WITH ST. ELIUD AND ST. PATERONE, VISITS JERUSALEM—THE GIFT OF TONGUES—HOSPITABLY RECEIVED BY THE PATRIARCH—ST. DAVID'S CONSECRATION—PREACHING OF THOSE HOLY MISSIONARIES, AND NUMBERS OF PEOPLE CONVERTED—PRESENTS RECEIVED ON THEIR RETURN TO BRITAIN—THE PELAGIAN HERESY—SYNOD CONVOKED AT BREVI—A GREAT MULTITUDE ASSEMBLED THERE, TO WHOM ST. DAVID PREACHES—MIRACULOUS MANIFESTATIONS—HE IS CREATED ARCHBISHOP OVER THE BRITONS—THE PROBABLE SUCCESSION OF BISHOPS IN THE SEE OF CARLEON—THE "SYNOD OF VICTORY" THERE ASSEMBLED—ITS DECREES AND HAPPY RESULTS—REMOVAL OF THE SEE FROM CARLEON TO MENEVIA—ST. KENTIGERN'S VISIT TO THE HOLY ARCHBISHOP.

ST. DAVID was commanded by an angel to repair to Jerusalem with two of his companions, named Eliud or Teilo, and Padarn or Peterone.<sup>1</sup> He asked brensis' works says : "This legend is also found in the older Life, published by the Bollandists, but is rejected by them as a later insertion. It is found in all the early hagiologies, and is so completely Irish in its character, that its genuineness can hardly be disputed. No one would now think of paring down these accounts to the dead level of historic prose."

<sup>24</sup> Giraldus calls Modomnoc, "Mandab-naucus." In the Utrecht MS. we read Modnuciant, for Colgan's Modomnoc. See his Life, at the 13th of February.

<sup>25</sup> Ricemarc says : "In Hibernia nunquam ad illud tempus apes vivere poterant. Nam si Hiberniensem humum aut lapidem mediis apibus immitteres ; dispersæ atque

fugaces nimium devitarent." Giraldus attributes this importation of most useful insects, to St. Dominick of Ossory, on the assertion of some writers. See "Topographia Hibernica." Distinctio I, cap. vi., "Opera," vol. v.

<sup>26</sup> Her father, Bracan, was son to Hauluph, an Irish king or prince. See Albertus le Grande, "De Sanctis Armorica." Vita S. Cadoci, 1 Novembris. And William Camden, in his account of Great Britain, notes to "Itinerarium Cambriae," lib. i., cap. ii. In the Acts, and notes thereto, of St. Canoc, at the 11th of February, Colgan likewise treats on this subject.

<sup>27</sup> St. Ængus and the Martyrology of Tallagh, Marianus O'Gorman, Maguire and the angel, how this matter could be accomplished, as both of these holy men were then living far apart from him, and from each other. The angel then said, he would bring all three together, and that they should meet at an appointed place. All matters being thus arranged, St. David repaired towards the sea-shore. As the angel had promised, both of his designated companions joined him. They formed one band, and all were regarded as on an equal footing. Accordingly, he and his two companions set out, with one heart and will. But, on reaching France, and hearing its people speak in a different language from that of their own native land, God bestowed on David and his friends the gift of tongues, so that, during the whole of their journey, they did not need an interpreter.<sup>2</sup> They were even found capable of speaking strange dialects. Furthermore, the Almighty was pleased to direct their course towards Jerusalem. But, before they had entered this renowned and hallowed city, the Angel of God visited its patriarch<sup>3</sup> in a dream. This angel said to him: "Three Catholics from the bounds of the West are coming to thee. Receive them with honour. One of these, named David, you shall consecrate Archbishop." The patriarch greatly rejoiced, on hearing these words, and afterwards he received the holy strangers with marked distinction.

On reaching Jerusalem, they were graciously and hospitably entertained by the patriarch.<sup>4</sup> David himself, as we are told, was consecrated Archbishop. All three were commanded by this patriarch to preach to the Jews, and to other heretical opponents of the Catholic Church. They were exhorted, to regard this office as their special duty, being true soldiers of Christ, wielding the buckler of Faith and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. They were required to preach the Scriptures daily, that so they the Martyrology of Donegal, have notices of St. David, at the date assigned for his festival.

CHAPTER V.—<sup>1</sup> "Patern, of a noble family in Armorica, having studied 20 years in Ireland, came and settled in Cambria, where he usefully employed his time in promoting peace among the several princes. He generally resided at Cardigan, where is still to be seen Llan-Badarn-vawr, that is, The Church of great St. Patern, which for some time was a bishop's seat. Patern died in his native country, where he was so distinguished for holiness of life, that no less than three festival-days were dedicated to his memory."—Rapin's "History of England," vol. i., book ii., p. 43.

<sup>2</sup> We are informed, there was a great similarity in the lives and actions of Dewi, Padarn and Teilo, and that, on such account, they are frequently joined together in the Welsh Triads. They are called the three Blessed Visitors and the three Blessed Bards of the Isle of Britain. David is said to have performed Divine Service, in a more pleasing manner, than either of his companions; Padarn sang in a superior style; and Teilo surpassed either of the former, as an excellent preacher. See Rev. John Williams' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of the Cymry," chap. v., p. 133.

<sup>3</sup> The Patriarch of Jerusalem, at this time, was John III., as the Bollandists prove, in the Life of S. Theodosius the Cœnobiarch, published at the 11th of January. See these notices of Theodosius, in "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., xi. Januarii. Vita S. Theodosii, pp. 680 to 701. The Bollandists assign this visit of St. David, and his consecration at Jerusalem, to about A.D. 516, or almost immediately after this year.

<sup>4</sup> The Irish custom of making pilgrimages to Rome, at this period and subsequently, is mentioned by Ricemarc, in his Life of St. David, "cum inextinguibile Hibernensium desiderium ad sanctorum Petri et Pauli apostolorum reliquias visitandas arderet." See Rt. Rev. Dr. Moran's valuable and learned "Essays on the Origin, Doctrines, and Discipline of the Early Irish Church," part iii., chap. iii., p. 150. On this particular subject, there are multiplied instances and proofs, afforded by the author, regarding Irish pilgrimages made to Rome, from the days of St. Patrick to periods long subsequent. We have no mention about St. David having visited Rome; yet, it is possible, he may have journeyed thither, on his going to or returning from Jerusalem. However, as he does not then appear to have been consecrated bishop, or as Rome might have taken him too far away from a direct course, or as want of time, opportunity, means, &c., might not have permitted, St. David may have been obliged to forego his wishes, on this matter of accomplishing a Roman pilgrimage.

<sup>5</sup> Giraldus says, that at this time the fury might frustrate and overcome their spiritual adversaries.<sup>5</sup> These commands were duly obeyed, and the Gospel was announced every day. Their labours were crowned with a fruitful harvest of souls. Many were brought into the fold of Christ's Church. Many believers, also, were still more confirmed in the faith.

This happy and fruitful pilgrimage had brought with it a term, when the Almighty wished his faithful servants' return towards their own country. As parting gifts, the patriarch bestowed on Blessed David four different objects. These were intended to serve for religious souvenirs of the time spent by him in a land so celebrated, and which had been the immediate scene of so many great mysteries and miracles effected, when our Lord Jesus appeared to men upon earth. They were a consecrated portable altar<sup>6</sup>—used no doubt for missionary purposes while travelling—a staff, a bell,<sup>7</sup> and a tunic.<sup>8</sup> These presents were held in the greatest veneration, as relics, and were long afterwards preserved. Through them, many miracles are said to have been wrought, in various places.<sup>9</sup>

Either before or after his consecration, David founded a monastery in the Valley of Rosina,<sup>10</sup> which was afterwards called Menevia. Here he lived in seclusion, for some time, till he was called to the Synod of Brehn.<sup>11</sup> Amidst of the Gentiles—Ricemarc says of the Jews—greatly prevailed against the Christians. The Patriarch obtained the consent of our saints, to spread the Gospel “in Orientis aliquamdiu partibus,” &c.—Lect. vii.

<sup>6</sup> “In quo Dominicum sacrat corpus,” adds the Utrecht MS., “quod innumeris virtutibus pollens, nunquam ab hominibus ab ejus Pontificis obitu visum est : sed pelleis velaminibus tectum absconditum latet insigni etiam nola : sed et ipsa virtutibus claret : baculo et tunica ex auro texta.”

<sup>7</sup> We learn from Ranulph Higden's “Polychronicon,” that in Wales, as in Ireland and Scotland, bells and crooked staves, (croziers) were held in great veneration, and people feared to commit perjury, when swearing on them.

“In hac quoque provincia,
Hibernia, et Scotia
Campanæ sunt et baculi
Ornati sub multiplici,
Tam digni procul dubio
In clero et in populo,
Quod vereantur hodie
Perjurium committere
Tam super horum alterum,
Quam super evangelium.”
(Vol. i., lib. i., pp. 426, 428.)

See the edition, edited by Churchill Babington, B.D., and published under direction of the Master of the Rolls.

<sup>8</sup> In the Life of St. Telius, says the Bollandist editor, it is related, the bell was his peculiar gift, and that St. Padarn received a “baculus” and “cappa choralis.” In Capgrave's Vita S. Patricii we read, “S. David lapidem, quem a Patriarcha Hierosolymitano in sua consecratione acceperat, adhuc vivens Ecclesie Glostoniensi delegavit.” The patriarch, in the Utrecht MS., is said to have told these saints, to return in peace towards their own country, and that those gifts should afterwards reach them. The guardian angel of each is said to have brought his own gift to every one of those saints, when he had arrived at his own religious house. David was then found at his monastery, named Langemelech—by Giraldus it is called Langevelach. “Inde ea vocat vulgus celo venientia,” adds the Utrecht MS. Giraldus says, the bell and altar were regarded as instrumental in working miracles, at his day ; and, that the gifts of Paternus and Eliud, preserved in their monasteries, were similarly signalized.

<sup>9</sup> See Colgan's “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sects. xx., xxi., xxii., p. 428.

<sup>10</sup> Sometimes called Ross, Rosnaut or Rosnat. It was situated in Pembrokeshire. Frequent mention is made regarding this monastery, in the Acts of various Irish saints. It was reputed as one of their foreign colleges.

<sup>11</sup> This Synod of Brevy—confounded by Colgan (note 27) with the “Synod of Victory”—is said to have assembled, A.D. 519. See Bale, Century i., cap. 55, and Ussher's “Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates,” Index Chronologicus, A.D. DXIX., p. 526. Endeavouring to account for the large number of bishops here assembled, Colgan observes, formerly in the British and Irish Church, bishops were much more numerous, than at a later period. He says, there were many titular bishops, who had no determinate dioceses or subjects. St. Patrick is said to have consecrated 350 bishops, under his own hand ; but, it does not follow, that all these held different sees, “nisi nomine sedium intelligamus ipsa Monasteria, quorum prelati passim creabantur Episcopi.”—“Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 27, p. 432.

many calamities that befell their country, the Britons found themselves involved in theological disputes. About the commencement of the fifth century, these controversies led to what has been since called the Pelagian heresy. This appellation it derived from Pelagius, a Briton, who broached heterodox and dangerous errors, regarding the nature of Divine Grace and Original Sin. In advancing such opinions, he was sustained by Celestius, a Scot, and a disciple, named Agricola. The British bishops sought the assistance of their Gallic brethren, to refute the subtleties of these heresiarchs. Having obtained permission from Pope Celestine I., St. Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, visited Britain, on two different occasions. In 429 he came, accompanied by St. Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, and again in 446, with Severus of Treves.<sup>12</sup> The opinions of Pelagius were finally condemned and suppressed, whilst judicious efforts were made to counteract them. Schools and seminaries for clerical education supplied at length a much needed requirement, in various dioceses.<sup>13</sup>

At that time, when the Pelagian heresy was again growing rife in Britain, a numerous Synod of bishops was summoned. - So great was the throng of people, that they crowded all the surrounding neighbourhood, when this convocation took place. They assembled at a place called Brevi, and hence it is known as the Synod of Brevy.<sup>14</sup> One account has it, that no less than one hundred and eighteen bishops<sup>15</sup> were present, together with an almost limitless gathering of abbots, religious, clerics, kings, princes and nobles.<sup>16</sup> This multitudinous gathering resembled in some measure one of those great "monster meetings," with which the passing generation of our own countrymen must be tolerably familiar; for, we are told, that a trumpet, much less a human voice, could hardly be expected to sound in the ears of all present. It was feared, that if this great multitude could not hear a preacher, the leaven of heresy must remain amongst them.<sup>17</sup>

This great Synod had assembled within Cardiganshire. A discussion then arose among the bishops, as to who should preach to so great a multitude.<sup>18</sup> It was determined, at last, that he who could preach, so as to be heard by all, should be named Metropolitan. A heap of garments was piled together, and this served as an open-air tribunal. Bishop after bishop arose. But <sup>12</sup> Both St. Germanus and St. Lupus, in a conference with the Pelagians at Verulam, defended the truth with such constancy and evidence, that many turned from former errors. "But after their departure, the Hereticks gaining ground again, Germanus was desired once more to come over. Though he was now very old, he undertook a second voyage into Britain, in company with Severus, Bishop of Troyes." See, Rapin de Thoyras' "History of England," translated by N. Tindal, M.A. Vol. i., book i., p. 29. London: 1743, folio. Third Edition.

<sup>13</sup> See Dr. Lingard's "History of England," vol. i., chap. i., A.D. 449, p. 58.

<sup>14</sup> In "Ceretica regione"—now Cardiganshire—according to Giraldus Cambrensis. See Vita S. Davidis. This place is also called Lhan-Deuy Breuy, which is Latinized, "templum S. Davidis Breuiense." It may be Anglicized as the church of St. David near the River Brevi. See, also, "Itinerarium Cambriae," lib. ii., cap. 4.

<sup>15</sup> Capgrave and Giraldus Cambrensis do not mention the number of bishops present.

The latter, however, calls this "universali totius Kambriae Synodo."

<sup>16</sup> In Wilkins' "Concilia Magnae Britanniae et Hiberniae," vol. i., p. 8, there is a brief account of what is called Synodus Menevensis, which is identified with the Synod of Brevi. Its chronology has been thus determined: "Papae Rom. HORMISD. 6. Anno Christi 519. Imperat. JUSTIN. sen. 2." It is said to have been convened under St. David, "contra fecem Palagianae haereseis adhuc redolentem." The account, given by Wilkins, is chiefly extracted from Balaeus, Centur. i., cap. 55, and from the Eighth Lesson of St. David's Life, by Cambrensis.

<sup>17</sup> Of the people, Giraldus says, "haeretica privitate pene irrevocabiliter infectum, ad fidei reducere tramitem non prevaluisse."—Vita S. Davidis.

<sup>18</sup> According to an account of this Synod, we are said to possess only the names of "Dyfrig, Pawl Hen, Deiniol, Dewi, Catwg and Cybi."—Rev. John Williams' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of the Cymry," chap.

their voices could scarcely be heard by their next neighbours, for a great tumult arose among the people. The ecclesiastics especially felt some degree of trepidation, lest the crowd might continue irresolute or unconvinced regarding the true nature of those subtle controversies discussed or treated on, in this large assembly. The clerics regarded their labour as already lost, until one of the bishops, named Paulinus, with whom David formerly studied, rising in their midst, said before all: "There is indeed a bishop here, who has been consecrated by the patriarch of Jerusalem; he is eloquent, has a beautiful countenance, is filled with the grace of God, and of approved height<sup>19</sup> and figure, for the Angel of the Lord is his companion. Therefore, call him to your council." Having heard these words, messengers were sent to invite St. David's attendance. Such, however, had been his humble and retiring nature,<sup>20</sup> that three different times he wished to decline their invitation. At last, two venerable men, St. Daniel and St. Dubritius,<sup>21</sup> were sent to him. Owing to their persuasions, he consented to come.

On his way to the Synod, it is related, that a woman placed the dead body of her son<sup>22</sup> before St. David. She besought him in tears, to bring her offspring once again to life. The compassionate bishop, touched by her misfortune, offered his prayers to God, when the boy was soon restored to life and health. Transported with joy, his mother cried out: "My son that had died, through God's favour and yours, now lives!" The holy bishop, David, then lifting this boy in his arms, placed him on his own shoulders, and thus conveyed him towards the Synod. This child afterwards ended his days, by a holy death.

When St. David arrived, all those constituting the Synod, especially the secular and regular clergy, greatly rejoiced. Being asked to preach, he humbly consented. On rising for this purpose, in presence of a vast multitude, a snow-white dove seemed coming down from heaven, and, at length, it alighted on the shoulders of St. David.<sup>23</sup> With clear intonation, and as if with trumpet notes, he began to announce the Word of God.<sup>24</sup> He met all xiv., p. 237, note. This writer assigns the usual date, A.D. 519, for the Synod of Brevi.

<sup>19</sup> "Quatuor cubitorum statura erectus," adds the Utrecht MS.

<sup>20</sup> "Erat enim vir sanctus, contemplationi deditus: de temporalibus rebus et secularibus, nisi necessitate urgentiore compulsus, aut nihil aut parum curans."—Giraldus Cambrensis, "Vita S. Davidis."

<sup>21</sup> "Dubricius died in the Isle of Bardsey in 522," according to Rapin. See "History of England," vol. i., book ii., note (1), p. 43. Translation by N. Tindal, M.A. His demise took place on the 14th of November. St. Daniel was the first bishop of Bangor, near Anglesea, about A.D. 516, or perhaps later. He was consecrated by his master, St. Dubritius, Bishop, or as sometimes called Archbishop of Landaff, or Legionensis, as we are told, by the Bollandist editor. St. Daniel's feast occurs on the 1st of December, according to the English Martyrology, and that of St. Dubritius on the 14th of November, with his translation at the 8th of May. The Martyrology of Tal-laght, Marianus and Maguire, place St. Daniel's festival at the 11th of September. See Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Martyrology of Tal-lagh," p. xxxiv. It is supposed, he was thus ranked with the Irish Saints, because he lived an eremitical life, for some years, at Inis-angin, in Lough Ree, as would appear from a Life of St. Kieran of Clonmacnois (Chap. 25). He is supposed to have died, between the years 542 and 545.

<sup>22</sup> "Cui barbara imperitia Magnum nomen dederat," adds the Utrecht MS.

<sup>23</sup> Colgan remarks, that the descent of a snow-white dove is a circumstance often noted in the Acts of various saints. Thus, at the ordination of St. Sampson, as Capgrave relates in his Life of St. Dubricius; likewise, at the ordination of St. Fabian, Pope, as stated by Eusebius, lib. 6, cap. 22, and by Baronius, at A.D. 238. Again, in the case of St. Papeus, as related in the Acts of St. Endeus of Arran, at the 21st of March. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 29, p. 432. Also, ibid., xxi. Martii. Vita S. Endei, cap. xix., p. 708.

<sup>24</sup> "Juxta illud: 'Aperi os tuum, et ego adimplebo illud.' Et alibi: 'Cum steteritis ante reges et præsides, nolite cogitare, quomodo aut quid loquamini. Dabitur enim vobis illa hora quid loquamini.' Et subsequenter: 'Non enim vos estis, qui loqua-

objections advanced for the prevailing heresy, and admirably refuted them, whilst he proved most convincingly the tenets of Holy Church. He gained all hearts, by his eloquent and persuasive words, so that the entire multitude gave thanks to the Almighty and to our saint. Meantime, the earth appeared to swell beneath his feet, until the preacher, ascending above the crowd, was distinctly seen by all present, as if standing upon a high hill.<sup>25</sup>

He preached in so loud, and in so full a voice, that he was heard by all present; by those who were near, as well as by those, who were obliged to remain afar. With consent of all prelates, kings and chieftains there, he was named Archbishop of Britain.<sup>26</sup> To this arrangement he reluctantly assented. The city, in which he was destined to reside, had been raised to the dignity of a Metropolitan see.<sup>27</sup> The date of St. David's elevation to the episcopal dignity has been left very much an open question, for chronographers to determine.<sup>28</sup> That St. David belonged wholly to the sixth century, is Dr. Lanigan's opinion, he being contemporary with Irish saints of the second order. As for certain biographical writers, who made him a bishop in the fifth century, they are not worth attending to, in the estimation of this learned Doctor.

It hardly falls within our province, to treat on the origin of Menevia; or rather a removal thither of old Cear-leon see, in the time of David's incumbency, as ratified by the celebrated Synod of Brevy. These events have been illustrated with much accuracy, both by Ussher<sup>29</sup> and by Stillingfleet.<sup>30</sup> At the Church of Llan Devi Brevi, a curious inscription was found by Mr. Lluyd, on a stone set over the chancel door. The inhabitants said this commemorated a person struck dead by St. David, for letting loose a mischievous beaver, after it had been ensnared with difficulty. This inscription was long preserved. The sexton of the church showed him a rarity called, Matkorn yr ych bannog or Matkorn ych Dewi, which was said to have been there preserved from the time of St. David. He added the fable of the oxen called Ychen bannog, which drew away a monstrous beaver dead.<sup>31</sup> Caerleon was then a populous city, whilst Menevia, remotely situated, seemed destined only for solitude, being almost separated from other parts of Britain.<sup>32</sup>

Certain rather modern writers would make St. David a bishop before A.D. 519, remarks Dr. Lanigan, as this year is assigned for holding the Synod of Brevy,<sup>33</sup> in which our saint acted so conspicuous a part, and when the see of Menevia is said to have been declared Metropolitan. This Synod was mini, sed Spiritus Patris vestri, qui loquitur in vobis."—Giraldus Cambrensis' "Vita S. Davidis," Lect. viii.

<sup>25</sup> On the top of this hill a church stood, at the time the author of the Utrecht MS. wrote.

<sup>26</sup> Giraldus says: "Pater autem David communi omnium tam cleri scilicet quam populi, electione pariter et acclamatione, cui et honorem antea destinatione Dubricius cesserat, in Kambriæ totius archiepiscopum est sublimatus." Lect. viii.

<sup>27</sup> The account adds: "Ita ut quicumque in ea præsideret in posterum Archipræsul haberetur." See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sect. xxiii., pp. 428, 429.

<sup>28</sup> Colgan tells us, that Radulphus de Baldock, Bishop of London, in his Chronicle, and a certain anonymous chronicler, belonging to the Church of Menevia, have assigned his accession to A.D. 561. See ibid., i.

Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 31, p. 432. Yet, the Bollandists think, St. David immediately succeeded as Archbishop, after the death of Dubritius, A.D. 522.

<sup>29</sup> In his "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates."

<sup>30</sup> In his "Antiquities of the British Churches."

<sup>31</sup> "If this Matkorn is not the interior part of an ox's horn, as its name imports, it very much resembles it, and is so heavy that it seems absolutely petrified." Gough's Camden's "Britannia," vol. ii., p. 527.

<sup>32</sup> Ralph of Chester, in his "Chronicle," lib. i., cap. 52, states, that by favour of King Arthur, St. David had been allowed to transfer the seat of episcopacy from Caerleon to Menevia.

<sup>33</sup> Bale has this statement. Ussher also coincides, in his "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. DIX. See, also, Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," V. S. David.

held, about the year 522, according to Gibson.<sup>34</sup> Whilst treating of it, Wilkins does not venture to decide on the time, when this Synod was held.<sup>35</sup> The place is of insignificant size, at present.<sup>36</sup> But, there is still better authority for supposing, in Dr. Lanigan's opinion, that St. David did not become bishop, until about 540, a date, which it is thought agrees with accounts appearing most worthy of credit. Ussher, who quotes Ranulph of Chester, says, that David was made Bishop of Menevia, the very year when Pope Silverius died, i.e., A.D. 540.<sup>37</sup> Even if proceeding from an interpolator, this note is of old standing. The interpolator of Marianus Scotus has the year 543 marked for David's promotion. Others have 565, owing to a mistake in not understanding certain chronological terms.<sup>38</sup> This date is considered quite too late, nor can it be reconciled with any very credible authority, which records the Acts of St. David. However, such era cannot be made to harmonize with Ussher's hypothesis, which many other writers have followed, of St. David having died in or about A.D. 544. Believing David died about that period, Ussher preferred the date 544 to A.D. 546 given by William of Malmesbury, or A.D. 547, preferred by others, because Giraldus Cambrensis intimates, that David's death happened on a Tuesday.<sup>39</sup> It seems pretty certain, that David governed the Menevian see for several years, although their precise number cannot be ascertained, with any great degree of exactness.<sup>40</sup> According to Ussher, calculating from A.D. 462 to A.D. 544, St. David must have died at the age of eighty-two. Now, if he were a bishop for sixty-five years, he should have been consecrated, according to Dr. Lanigan's opinion, when only seventeen years old. No one will admit this early age, as a time suitable for assuming the responsibilities of such an office.<sup>41</sup>

When the Synod of Brevy had been held, say the Bollandists, the Archbishopal see of Wales was established in the City of Carleon, on the Usk, Osk or Isk river. This city also obtained the name Legio. We are told, that Gistilianus, an uncle of St. David, had been a bishop of Carleon.<sup>42</sup> St. Dubricius then presided over Carleon see, and that of Landaff, having succeeded St. Teliaus, second bishop over this latter diocese.<sup>43</sup> Some writers have supposed, that St. Dubricius, leaving Llandaff and Caerleon to St. Teliaus, had been transferred as Archbishop to Menevia, which he again resigned to St. David. The Bollandists consider it more probable, that having died A.D. 522, or having been rendered through old age unable to dis-

<sup>34</sup> See his additions to Camden, col. 768.

<sup>35</sup> See "Concilia Magnæ Britanniae," Tom. i., p. 7.

<sup>36</sup> "Llandewi brewi," says Leland, "is but a simple or poor village set among mountains every way but the west, where is the Vale of Tyve. I passed over a little brook to enter into it. The collegiate church of prebendaries standeth somewhat upon a high ground, but it is rude." Vol. v., p. 75. This was founded in honour of St. David, for a precentor and twelve prebends by Thomas Bek, Bishop of St. David's, A.D. 1187. See, Tanner's "Notitia Monastica," p. 77.

<sup>37</sup> In Gale's edition of Ranulph, we do not find mention made of St. David. See "Scriptores xv."

<sup>38</sup> See, Le Neve's "Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae," p. 510.

<sup>39</sup> "Now, in the year 544, the first of March fell on Tuesday. This is a good argument against any other year about that time, but not against our being allowed to suppose that David died several years later than 544; whereas the first of March fell also on Tuesday in the years, 550, 561, 567, 578, 589, 595, 600, &c. Passing by Cressy and other copyists of Ussher, the Bollandists, and the minor writers of Lives of Saints, and even the author of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates (at Chronologie des Saints), have adopted his computation, as if the question had been decided."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. ix., n. 142, p. 473.

<sup>40</sup> Godwin, "De præsulibus Angliæ," ad Episcopos Menevenses, maintains that his episcopacy continued for sixty-five years. If any foundation for this statement existed, it would overturn Ussher's hypothesis.

<sup>41</sup> See, "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. ix., and n. 143, pp. 470, 472, 473.

<sup>42</sup> See, Winkles's "Cathedral Churches of England and Wales," vol. iii., p. 129.

charge his episcopal duties, Dubricius had left the Church of Llandaff to be ruled over by Teilaus, and that of Carleon by David. It is supposed, our saint may have thence removed to Menevia, still retaining his archiepiscopal rank and office. Or he may have become Bishop of Menevia, while Dubricius yet lived. The latter having died, St. David possibly became Archbishop over Cambria, with the approval of his reputed uncle, King Arthur.<sup>44</sup>

Having thus successfully defended the cause of Catholic Truth, the dogmas of Faith were announced, authentic seals were attached to those decrees, and St. David was then and there named to the Archbishopric. As the Pelagian heresy was not entirely suppressed, St. David convened another Synod of all the Cambrian clergy at Caerleon,<sup>45</sup> which proved so successful, that Pelagianism was exterminated. This Synod was termed the "Synod of Victory."<sup>46</sup> Many necessary and useful decrees were passed and afterwards signed by the illustrious Pontiff. He even prescribed the observance of statutes, framed at both of those Synods, in the churches and monasteries of Britain. Here, they served to form a rule and code of Christian life, and they were written by the hand of our holy prelate. It is greatly to be regretted, that these decrees have not survived the wreck of many other ancient records.<sup>47</sup>

The good fruits resulting from both these Synods soon became apparent. Churches and Monasteries increased in number and good government. Works of charity and religion extended among the faithful. The holy-David seemed like a ruler set by our Lord over the house of Israel. In his learning, discipline and life, he was a perfect example for his flock to follow. With judgment and care, he provided for all necessities of his people. Like a pious father and revered shepherd, he assisted those subject to him. It would be impossible to enumerate the many virtues, which exalted his character, or those various advantages, procured for his ecclesiastical charge. And in the discharge of those religious duties, his life is said to have reached an extraordinary term of duration.<sup>48</sup>

As Archbishop, he first resided at Caerleon, upon Usk;<sup>49</sup> but, he soon obtained permission from King Arthur<sup>50</sup> to remove his see to Menevia, now

<sup>43</sup> At the 9th of February, John Bollandus has learnedly examined intricacies regarding this period of early British history.

<sup>44</sup> "Hæc nos ibi conjectavimus," say the Bollandists, "non ausi fidere Actis S. Davidis, secundum quæ in Synodo Brevisi est Archiepiscopus constitutus, cui eum honorem antea destinatione Dubricium cesserat."

<sup>45</sup> This Synod is thought to have been held A.D. 529. Its canons are said to have been "lost by means of the frequent incursions of pirates on the coasts of Wales." See, Rev. John Williams' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of the Cymry," chap. xv., p. 237, and note 16. Also, Ussher's Chronological Index, at A.D. DXXIX., under which year it is placed. See, "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 528.

<sup>46</sup> In Wilkins' "Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ et Hiberniæ," vol. i., pp. 8, 9, we have only a very short account, regarding "Synodus Victoriz in Wallia." This is taken from the Ninth Lesson of St. David's Life, by Cambrensis. The editor prefixes "anno incerto," to this notice.

<sup>47</sup> Giraldus says of them: "Quæ quidem, sicut et alii quamplurimi nobilis bibliothecæ

thesauri egregii, tam vetustate quam incuria, piratarum quoque crebris insultibus, qui de Orcadam insulis æstivo tempore longis navibus advecti maritimis Kambriæ provincias vastare consueverant, evanuerunt." Lect. ix.

<sup>48</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, sect. xxiv., xxv., p. 429.

<sup>49</sup> To this place, we are told, as a metropolitanical see, the British bishoprics were subject, for a long time. See, "Polychronicon," lib. i., cap. 52.

<sup>50</sup> "His nephew," according to Selden's illustrations to Drayton's "Poly-Olbion." The Fourth Song. From a translation of the seventh Historical Triad, we learn, that the following three were enthroned persons in the Isle of Britain: "Arthur as sovereign prince (yn benteyrned) in Caerleon upon Usk, and Dewi (David) the head bishop, and Maelgon of Gwynne the chief elder (ben hynain); Arthur as sovereign prince at Celliwig in Cornwall, and Bedwini the head bishop, and Caradoc with the brawny arm (vreizcras) the chief elder; Arthur as sovereign prince at the promontory of Rlonyz in the north, and Cyndeyrn Garthwys (Kentigern) the head bishop, and Gwrthmwl

St. David's, in Pembrokeshire.<sup>51</sup> Such permission having been obtained, the change of see was effected.<sup>52</sup> This translation of the Archbishopric is said to have been foretold by Merlin :<sup>53</sup> "Menevia shall put on the Pall of Caerleon ; and the preacher of Ireland shall wax dumb by an infant growing in the womb."<sup>54</sup>

In the Life of St. Kentigern,<sup>55</sup> Bishop of Glasgow, it is said, that certain children of Belial, belonging to King Morken's kindred, had conspired to effect the death of this holy man. Whereupon, having had a Divine admonition, he directed his course towards Menevia, where St. David had already acquired a great reputation, owing to his distinguished virtues. Near Carleum<sup>56</sup> St. Kentigern converted many to the faith and built a church. He remained some short time with our saint. This journey is assigned to A.D. 543,<sup>57</sup> by Ussher. It is said, he obtained a place for building a monastery from Cathwal, a king in this part of the country. Again, we find it related, that he composed a very elegant and erudite discourse, on the death of St. David, besides leaving other learned works behind him.<sup>58</sup> These, however, the Bollandists considered to have been lost.<sup>59</sup>

CHAPTER VI.

OUR SAINT RECEIVES A HEAVENLY ADMONITION REGARDING HIS DEATH—HIS PIOUS RESIGNATION TO THE DIVINE WILL—A FOREKNOWLEDGE OF HIS DECEASE CONVEYED TO THE PEOPLE OF BRITAIN AND IRELAND—THE LAST HOURS OF ST. DAVID—DISCORDANT DATES REGARDING THE YEAR WHEN HE DIED—HIS EXTRAORDINARY LONGEVITY—OPINIONS OF VARIOUS WRITERS—ST. DAVID DIED AT MENEVIA ON THE FIRST OF MARCH—HIS INTERMENT—LOCAL TRADITIONS—TRANSLATION OF ST. DAVID'S RELICS, IN THE TENTH CENTURY—CANONIZATION BY POPE CALIXTUS II., IN 1120—WELSH CUSTOM OF WEARING THE LEEK ON ST. DAVID'S DAY—FESTIVALS IN HONOUR OF THIS HOLY ARCHBISHOP—OFFICES AND RELIGIOUS SERVICES APPOINTED.

At last, having attained the extraordinary age of 147 years; the Almighty deemed his days and virtuous acts sufficiently ripe for heavenly rest and re-

Wledig the chief elder." See, Sharon Turner's "History of the Anglo-Saxons," vol. i., book ii., chap. v., pp. 250, 251. In this same chapter, the reader will find an interesting account, about the renowned King Arthur and his achievements. His history will serve to recall these noble lines of our Irish poet, Davis :—

"Then send out a thunder shout, and every true man summon,
Till the ground shall echo round from Severn to Plinlimmon,

Saxon foes, and Cymric brothers,
Arthur's come again !"

"Poems," Cymric Rule and Cymric Rulers, p. 43.

<sup>51</sup> "Cambriæ Metropolitæ et Primas propterea factus, tantum cum Rege Arthuro gratiam iniit, ut ab urbe Legionum ad suam Meneviam Archiepiscopalem transferret sedem, ut lib. i., cap. 52 fusius tradit Rannulfus Cestriensis."—Spelman's "Concilia Decreta Leges Constitutiones in Re Ecclesiarum Orbis Britannici," p. 62.

<sup>52</sup> This is certified, by Giraldus Cambren-

sis, in "Itinerarium Cambriæ," lib. ii., cap. 4, and by Ralph of Chester in "Polychronicon," lib. i., cap. 52.

<sup>53</sup> For authority, Alan de Insul. I., ad Prophet. Merlini, is quoted.

<sup>54</sup> "This was performed," we are told, "when St. Patrick, at presence of Melaria, then with child, suddenly lost use of his speech ; but recovering it after some time, made prediction of Dewy's holiness, joined with greatness, which is so celebrated. Upon my author's credit only believe me." See, Selden's illustrations to Dryden's "Poly-Olbion." The Fifth Song.

<sup>55</sup> See notices of him, at the 13th of January, and at the 13th of November.

<sup>56</sup> Carleon (?)

<sup>57</sup> The Bollandists, regarding this as the last year before David's death, think St. Kentigern might have procured many accounts through our saint's own narrative. From such materials, perhaps, he might have written that obituary discourse, attributed to him, after the death of the holy Menevian bishop.

<sup>58</sup> Pitseus, Bale, and Leland are cited, as authorities for statements in the text.

ward. He was admonished by an angel about his approaching death, on the viii, of the March Kalends, corresponding with the 22nd of February. His religious brethren had been engaged, reciting the Lauds of their Holy Office, at an early morning hour, when this angelic voice was heard: "Behold, David, the day thou hast desired approaches!" The venerable bishop heard this summons with delight. In a transport of joy, he cried out: "Now, O Lord, dismiss thy servant in peace!"<sup>1</sup> The monks, who were present, heard this miraculous colloquy; but, not fully understanding its import, they fell prostrate on earth. The venerable bishop standing, with his countenance and thoughts alike raised towards heaven, exclaimed: "O Lord, receive my spirit!" In the hearing of his monks, the angel again replied: "Prepare thyself for the Kalends of March, for then Jesus Christ, the King of this world, shall meet thee, and with him will be many thousands of angels." Sadness filled the hearts of his spiritual children, when they heard this announcement. But, the Blessed David consoled them, saying: "My brethren persevere, and bear to the end, that yoke you have received." Soon were sorrow and lamentations diffused throughout his favoured city. Tears and pious impetrations were poured out by all its inhabitants. And as the angelic words sounded in his ears, a most enchanting concert of angelic choirs was heard, while a fragrance, surpassing earth's most odoriferous perfumes, was wafted throughout the city of Menevia.

How delightfully instructive are the examples left to Christians by God's saints, especially during those days, when life fast draws towards its closing scenes. Some angelic monition regarding such events appears to have spread a rumour, not alone through all Britain, but even throughout the whole of Hibernia. The holy men of both islands assembled together, like flocks of birds flying through air, towards some place of trysting. But, from the moment St. David had heard the angelic warning, to that of his decease, he continued in the church, preaching God's holy word to all the people.<sup>2</sup> On that Sunday intervening,<sup>3</sup> after an eloquent and impressive sermon, which encouraged and exhorted his audience to persevere in the practice of good works, he consecrated the body of our Lord in the Holy Eucharist. Having now experienced the last pangs of bodily suffering, and partaken of Holy Viaticum, at the close of a devout office, he calmly said to his brethren: "On Tuesday, the Kalends of March, I will tread the way of my fathers, but you I commend to the guardianship of the Father Almighty, who will strengthen you to persevere in those things learned from me." The third day of the week had dawned, and the crowing of chanticleer aroused the citizens of Menevia from midnight slumber. Delicious odours impregnated the surrounding atmosphere, and angelic choirs filled the air with ravishing harmonies. With such foretaste of heavenly joys, clerics and monks assembled to chaunt the early Lauds. To the enraptured gaze of St. David,

<sup>1</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis. Commentarius Prævius, sect. i., n. 6, p. 39. They have published St. Kentigern's Acts, at the 13th of January. See, Ibid., tomus i., Januarii xiii., pp. 815 to 821.

CHAPTER VI.—<sup>2</sup> See, Luke ii., 29.

<sup>3</sup> An old Welsh bard, Rhys ab Rhiccart, in his description of pleasure, introduces these following comparisons:—

Or the Round Table feasts at Caerlleon,
Or Angel joys in paradise."

See, Thomas Stephens' "Literature of the Kymry," chap. iv., sect. ii., p. 481.

<sup>3</sup> Giraldus, in his "Life of St. David," Lect. 10, relates, that the saint foretold on a Sunday, that he would die on the third feria, i.e., the Tuesday following; and that so it came to pass.

<sup>4</sup> See the foregoing account, taken from that vellum MS. Life of our saint, belonging formerly to the Most Rev. David Routh, and published by Colgan, in his "Acta Sancto-

"Like that of saintly David in the choir of Hodnant,
Or Taliesin at the court of Elphin, our Lord Jesus appeared, and transported with the ineffable beauty of his presence, our holy bishop poured forth his soul in the exclamation: "Draw me, O Lord, after thee." Thus passed away from life, into the loving embrace of Jesus, this ennobled servant; and multitudes of heavenly denizens led his way to their happy mansions, where not the least illustrious amongst God's elect was crowned with a brilliant diadem of glory.<sup>4</sup>

He died<sup>5</sup> accordingly, amid the joyous song of angels, and in the presence of Jesus, who had himself deigned to visit him on Monday, 1st of March. The Bollandists consider his age to have been 97 years, but, they also give it, as an opinion of many, that he died at the age of 147 years. This last opinion they regard as erroneous, and set down his death as occurring in the year 544. Such mortuary chronology has been followed by many modern writers; but, by others, it has been asserted, that St. David lived to a much later period.<sup>6</sup> On the death of David, the disciple of Dubricius, Ismael, is said to have been consecrated in his stead as Bishop of Menevia, by St. Teliaus. Ismael is also declared to have presided over all churches on the right side of Britain.<sup>7</sup> Now, it is stated, in an old MS., belonging to the Church of Llandaff,<sup>8</sup> that when a Synod had been held there in 560, the bishop, Oerdoceus, excommunicated King Mouricus. This sentence was pronounced, for a homicide perpetrated, and for a contract, violated by him, even after an oath had been taken in the bishop's presence, at the altar of St. Peter the Apostle, and of SS. Dubricius and Teliaus. Such a date would seem to prove, that Teliaus had died some time before 560, when the honour of beatification had been conferred upon him. Now, reason the Bollandists, if St. David did not die, during the reign of King Constantine, A.D. 544, when the 1st of March fell on a Tuesday, he must necessarily have departed A.D. 550, when a similar coincidence took place.<sup>9</sup>

The Bollandists enter upon the following speculative dates, to determine the epoch of St. David's birth, age and death. Supposing him to have been born towards the close of A.D. 446, thirty years or more having elapsed since St. Patrick had transacted business at Rome, and on his return had spent some time in Britain,<sup>10</sup> and that David had died in the beginning of A.D. 544; our saint would have completed his ninety-sixth, or died in the ninety-seventh year of his age. They do not think it at all credible, that he lived to the extreme age of 147 years. They suppose it possible, that some transcriber of St. David's Acts, may have fallen into the error of inserting a rum Hiberniæ," sect. xxvi., xxvii., p. 429. Giraldus is not so minute in his description, relating to the last days of St. David. He passes over many of the foregoing particulars, as related in the text.

<sup>5</sup> "Talari indutus tunica," adds Giraldus.

<sup>6</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks it doubtful, if he were even a bishop, in 544. See, "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xii., n. 106, p. 28.

<sup>7</sup> See the Acts of St. Teliaus or Eliud, Bishop of Landaff, in Wales, compiled by Father John Bollandus, at the ninth of February, in the "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Februarii ix. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., n. 13, p. 305.

<sup>8</sup> Published by Henry Spelman.

<sup>9</sup> Yet, opposed to this inference, may be objected the testimony of Geoffrey of Monmouth. He says, that on the death of St. David, Kincus, otherwise called Kinocus or Cenaus—who was bishop over "Lampa- ternensis Ecclesia," in the province of Cere-tica—obtained the higher dignity of promotion to the Metropolitan See. "Verum is in Legionensi sede successisse dicendus est, quod etiam innuit Usserius, pag. 528. Kinoco dien mortuo S. Teliaum in Legionensi sede subrogatum, Menevensi Antistitem ordinasse Ismaëlem, ab aliis dici indicavimus ad S. Teliai Vitam, sect. i., num. 9, quæ annum mortis S. Davidis a nobis assignatum magis confirmant." See, "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., n. 15, p. 41.

<sup>10</sup> In the Acts of our saint, he is said to have been born, "post annos xxx.," according to the prophecy. This indefinite way of writing, the Bollandists think, would not necessarily lead us to a conclusion, that St. David had been conceived or born immediately on completion of such a term. Some months, or even a year, nearly expired, might be allowed.

wrong numeral, in recording those years attained at his death. Thus, such a mistake may have occurred. They take Colgan to task for assigning the long term of 147 years for our saint's life, and for instances alleged by him, to prove parallel cases.<sup>11</sup> Bucelinus places the death of St. David at A.D. 650,<sup>12</sup> which is thought to have been merely a typographical error; the printer of his work having transposed one cypher for another, so that this learned writer must have intended to write A.D. 560. Edward Maihew maintains, that St. David flourished about the year of our Lord 490.<sup>13</sup>

The calculation of Ussher, that St. David had died, A.D. 544, seems to have been founded on false data, for it is altogether too early placed.<sup>14</sup> He depended on a statement made by Geoffrey of Monmouth, who says, that St. David departed in the time of King Constantine, son of Cador, who reigned only three years, from A.D. 542, when King Arthur fell, to A.D. 545. Into this opinion, he was further led, from the agreement of Giraldus Cambrensis and other writers in saying, that St. David died on a Tuesday,<sup>15</sup> the 1st day of March. It so happened these coincident days came together, in the year 544. William of Malmesbury places his death at A.D. 546,<sup>16</sup> and also John of Teignmouth.<sup>17</sup> That he died A.D. 547, has been asserted in the Annals of Waverly Monastery, and in the Annals of Winton. But, that St. David lived much longer appears, not only from his own Acts, but from many other old and trustworthy records. In the "Chronicum Scotorum," David of Cill-Muine's death is set down at A.D. 588.<sup>18</sup> It appears from our Irish Annals, that St. Aidan, Bishop of Ferns, died in the year 624.<sup>19</sup> Now, in the Acts of David, Aidan is said to have been residing in a monastery at Ferns, when he sent a message to our saint. Colgan thinks, that he who had been only a boy, when Ainmire reigned in Ireland,<sup>20</sup> and afterwards many years a disciple, could not have been abbot, until after A.D. 580. He supposes, St. David must have lived subsequently to A.D. 590, and he does not hesitate to allow this bishop may have survived until A.D. 607 or 608. The extreme age, which our saint is said to have attained, is not without parallel in written Acts of other holy British and Irish ecclesiastics and recluses.<sup>21</sup> Extraordinary and well-authenticated cases of longevity are known, even in days long subsequent to the time, when St. David flourished.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>11</sup> In the Bollandists' opinion, what furnished occasion for such an error arose from the false statement, that St. Barr or Fynbarr, had visited St. David, and the monastic habit having been assumed by Constantine, King of Cornwall. Thesetimes or events, however, are supposed to have happened after the death of St. David. The evidence produced by Colgan regarding our saint's length of years are nearly altogether taken from Irish sources, and are considered to be very obscure. To refute such testimonies would involve great labour, and it might otherwise be productive of weariness to the reader. See, "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., n. 16, p. 41.

<sup>12</sup> See the Benedictine Menology.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid.

<sup>14</sup> See, Sir R. C. Hoare's Annotations to the "Itinerary of Wales," by Giraldus Cambrensis, vol. ii., p. 13.

<sup>15</sup> Not "feria quarta" as Colgan has it, but "feria tertia."

<sup>16</sup> For this statement, he quotes the Chronicles of Glastonbury Church.

<sup>17</sup> In "Vita S. Patricii."

<sup>18</sup> It is also under the head, "Kal. iv.," according to an arrangement explained by the learned editor, William M. Hennessy, M.R.I.A., in his preface. See, pp. xlii. et seq., and pp. 62, 63.

<sup>19</sup> See, Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 246 to 249, and n. (p.) Ibid.

<sup>20</sup> A.D. 564, 565 or 566. See ibid., pp. 204, 205.

<sup>21</sup> Colgan cites various particular instances. See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Davidis, n. 31, p. 432.

<sup>22</sup> In an article, headed, "Longevity and Centenarianism," published in the "Quarterly Review," for January, 1868. No. 247, vol. cxxiv., several extraordinary instances of extreme age are cited, and reference is made to various works treating on this subject. See, pp. 179 to 198. It is there stated, that Iceland, Greenland and Norway have always boasted a large average of very old people, and that the Highlands of Scotland, with "the colder parts of Wales and England, show the same phenomenon in the

If we are to credit the account of St. David, as contained in Roth's MS., his days were prolonged to a period, far exceeding the ordinary span of life. One hundred and forty-seven years are set down as the term for his existence.<sup>23</sup> The truth of this account has been denied by some of our most learned and competent critics and historians.<sup>24</sup> Yet, many ancient writers<sup>25</sup> agree in this statement, probably founded on still older accounts, or resting on a universally prevailing tradition.<sup>26</sup> And, indeed, if we are to form an estimate of calculation from incidents recorded, it would seem a matter of easy accomplishment, to spread the Acts of St. David over such a lengthened period. When St. Patrick, on his way to Ireland in 432,<sup>27</sup> foretold St. David's birth would happen thirty years later, and when this event as predicted had occurred, a supposition must be entertained, that the future bishop of Menevia first saw the light in A.D. 462. We are told, that St. David was alive, after the year 560. This is concluded by Dr. Lanigan, from the circumstance of his having died, during the reign of Maelgwn, Maglocun, Malgon or Magoclun, by whose order he is said to have been buried, in his own church at Menevia. From having been prince of North Wales—and he is said to have lived in the Isle of Anglesey—Maelgwn was raised to the rank of king over all the Britons,<sup>28</sup> about this year 560.<sup>29</sup> It must have records of parishes," p. 194. Ibid. Amongst these instances, allusion is made to the old Countess of Desmond, in Ireland, who lived to be 140 years, and according to some accounts to be 150, or even 163 years. See, p. 183, ibid., and the "Quarterly Review" for March, 1853, No. 184, vol. xcii., pp. 329 to 354. See, also, "Notes and Queries," 2nd Series, vol. vii., pp. 313, 365, 431, 432. Old Parr is said to have been born at Alberbury, Salop, in 1483, and to have died in 1635, having thus lived 152 years. Taylor, the Water Poet, gives the following description of Parr's dietary and mode of living:—

"His physick was good butter, which the soil
Of Salop yields, more sweet than candy oil,
And garlic he esteemed beyond the rate
Of Venice treacle or best mithridate.
He entertained no gout, no ache he felt,
The air was good and temperate where he dwelt,
While mavis and sweet-tongued nightingales
Did chaunt him roundelays and madrigals.
Thus living within bounds of nature's laws,
Of his long lasting life may be some cause."

It may fairly be conjectured, that a nearly similar plain regimen and strict temperate habits, had a healthy influence on the presumed longevity of St. David. Henry Jenkins, of Ellerton, is said to have followed the occupation of fisherman to the end of a long life, lasting 169 years. Of this, however, grave doubt is entertained. Peter Garden of Auchterless, Aberdeenshire, is said to have died on the 12th of January, 1775, aged 131 years. See, "Notes and Queries," 2nd series, vol. x., p. 156.

<sup>23</sup> The Bollandist editor only allows him to have attained 82 years.

<sup>24</sup> Ussher says, he could not be persuaded, that St. David lived to the extraordinary age of 147 years, or until the year 604. "As to the 147 years he was right," observes Dr. Lanigan, "but had he rejected the hypothesis of David having been born in the year 462, he would have found matters easy enough. In fact that story of so great an age was patched up to reconcile the supposition of David's birth at that early period with the real circumstance of his having lived until towards the latter end of the sixth century." See, "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. ix., n. 147, pp. 474, 475.

<sup>25</sup> Amongst these may be mentioned, Ricemarc, Giraldus Cambrensis, John of Teignmouth, John Capgrave, Harpsfeld, with others.

<sup>26</sup> It is said, St. David died, in the one hundred and forty-sixth year of his age, according to Herman Greuen's additions to the Martyrology of Usuard.

<sup>27</sup> The Bollandist editor has it many years earlier, or about the year 414.

<sup>28</sup> Humphry Lhuyd, as cited by Ussher and Rowland, in his "Mona Antiqua," has this event placed at A.D. 560. Also, in Lewis' "History of Britaine," p. 204, the year of Maclawn's ascension to the throne is mentioned as the year 552—Vitus being cited as authority—and, according to Powel, it was A.D. 580. Ussher himself takes date for his elevation, from Matthew Florilegus, at A.D. 581. See, "Index Chronologicus." "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 533.

<sup>29</sup> As to 552, the date is thought to be much too early. Lhuyd's computation is been after advancing to this dignity, that he interfered with regard to St. David's interment. So long as he remained a chieftain or king over North Wales only, at Menevia he had no jurisdiction or power.<sup>30</sup> It cannot be conjectured, at what period of Maelgwn's reign, which lasted, it is supposed, until A.D. 593,<sup>31</sup> St. David died; but, that his decease took place towards the latter end of it would seem probable, from having had for some years under his tuition St. Aidan or Maidoc, afterwards Bishop of Ferns. This latter saint was only a boy, during the reign of Ainmire, King of Ireland, which began at the earliest, in A.D. 564.<sup>32</sup> Maidoc afterwards became distinguished before St. David's death. On the other hand, St. David's death cannot well be placed after Maelgwn's reign, lasting until A.D. 593. Ralph of Chester, who is quoted by Ussher, says, that David died in the same year with Pope Gregory the Great. If such were the case, his departure should be assigned to the year 604.<sup>33</sup> An extravagant calculation of St. David having lived until A.D. 642, founded upon a supposition that he did not take possession of the Menevian See, until 577, and that he held it for sixty-five years, has been adopted by some writers. According to this very strange hypothesis, he should have survived, not alone Maelgwn, but likewise his disciple, Aidan. It is well known, this latter bishop lived for several years, after St. David's death.

It is generally allowed, that St. David died in the monastery he had founded at Menevia.<sup>34</sup> According to Archbishop Ussher, as we have said, his death occurred in 544; but, there is reason to believe he survived this period, for some years.<sup>35</sup> He died on the Kalends of March, corresponding with the 1st day one usually followed, and it seems tolerably well established. According to an old book, which treats on the laws of the Ancient Britons, it is said, Malgon ruled not only over all Britain, but even over six adjoining islands or countries lying on the ocean, viz.: Ireland, Iceland, Gothland, the Orcades, Norway and Dacia. He is erroneously said by Gildas to have subjected these nations to his sway, after fighting fierce battles. Over these he is related to have ruled like Draco. See, ibid.

<sup>30</sup> Maglocun is represented by Ussher as prince of North Wales, at the time of David's death. "His hypothesis required this caution. And, lest it might be objected that Maglocun was not sovereign even of North Wales as early as A.D. 544, he has affixed his accession to that year. (Ind. Chron.) He must also have supposed that Maglocun obtained that sovereignty very early in said year, whereas St. David died on the first of March. But how could he explain that prince's issuing orders as to the burial of a person, who lived and died in South Wales? If it be said that he issued them during a certain predatory incursion (see Ussher, p. 528), surely we are not to suppose that incursion took place in the first year of his sovereignty, nor much less prior to the first of March in said year. On the whole, Ussher's calculations on these dates are too much forced; and the simplest method of reconciling all the circumstances is to admit that Maglocun was king not only of North but likewise of South Wales, &c., at the time of David's death."—Dr. Lani-gan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. ix., n. 145, pp. 473, 474.

<sup>31</sup> Several writers place the death of Maelgwn at a somewhat earlier period. Gibson, in his notes on Camden, col. 825, has stated, that he died about 586. This is asserted from a MS. note by Vaughan on Powel. But Ussher, in his Chronological Index at DXCIII., tells us that Cereticus succeeded Malgon or Maglocun in Britain. This latter was known as Maelgun Gwinedh or Malgonus Venedotus, whilst the Cambro-Britons call the former Karedic. See, "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 534.

<sup>32</sup> See, O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 204, 205. However, O'Flaherty places the commencement of his reign at A.D. 568. See, "Ogygia: seu Rerum Hibernicarum Chronologia," pars. iii., p. 431.

<sup>33</sup> Yet, such a date cannot agree with his having died during Maelgwn's reign, nor with a notation of Tuesday being the day of his death. Still it indicates a belief, that he did not die until towards the time of Pope Gregory, and very many years after A.D. 544. Other writers have said, that his death happened in the same year, with that of St. Senan. Meanwhile, it may be observed, that St. Senan lived to a later period than A.D. 544.

<sup>34</sup> Geoffrey of Monmouth has such a statement.

<sup>35</sup> If Tuesday were the day of his death, Dr. Lanigan thinks, that with a great degree of that month,<sup>36</sup> and on a Tuesday.<sup>37</sup> The holy disciples of our saint took care to have his remains deposited in the Church of St. Andrew, within that city, with which his name and celebrity have since been so much identified.<sup>38</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis testifies, that his body had been interred with great solemnity by his religious brethren, and that it was preserved with that veneration, becoming so great a treasure. Down to the twelfth century, the Lord was pleased to manifest our saint's glory, by signs and prodigies. Even in later ages, Giraldus considered it possible, that accounts of these miracles would be extended, and added to his own record of our saint's Acts.<sup>39</sup> St. Kentigern is said to have seen his soul ascending to heaven, and borne by holy angels. Near the Church of St. Andrew stood several chapels, which were formerly resorted to with great devotion. One of these has been dedicated to St. Nun, who presided over many religious women, and who was considered the mother of St. David. She is honoured on the 2nd of March. Near this chapel was a beautiful well, often a place of resort for pilgrims. Another chapel was sacred to St. Lily, surnamed Gwas-Dewy, that is, St. David's man; because, he was a beloved disciple and companion, during our bishop's retirement. St. Lily was venerated on the 3rd of March. In honour of these several saints, the three first days of March were formerly kept as holy days in South Wales. At present, only St. David's day is observed as a festival, throughout all Wales.<sup>40</sup>

A certain matron, named Elswida, in the time of King Edgar, A.D. 962,<sup>41</sup> translated the relics of St. David from the Vale of Ross to Glastonbury, when all Wales had been so laid waste, that scarcely anyone was found therein dwelling. These she procured, through the influence of her kinsman, who was Bishop of Meñevia. A portion of the relics of St. Stephen, Protomartyr, had also been removed, at the same time. This religious rite was accompanied with great solemnity, on the part of those assisting.<sup>42</sup> It would seem, that the relics of St. David had been deposited on the right side of the altar, within Glastonbury old Church.<sup>43</sup> He is said to have been canonized of probability, we may suppose the year was 589.

<sup>36</sup> Our native Martyrologists, St. Ængus, Marianus Scotus, Maguire, and the Tallagh Martyrology, mention his festival, as occurring on this day. So, also, accord, Giraldus Cambrensis, John of Teignmouth and Capgrave, with the English and Salisbury Martyrologies. The Rev. W. J. Rees, in his "Lives of the Cambro-British Saints," has a Life of Buchedd Dewi Sant, in Welch, pp. 102 to 116, with an English translation, pp. 402 to 417. Selden in his illustrations to Drayton's "Poly-Olbion," says of St. David: "To him our country Calendars give the first of March, but in the old Martyrologies, I find him not remembered. See, 'Fourth Song.'"

<sup>37</sup> See, Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates." Index Chronologicus, A.D. DXLIV., p. 530.

<sup>38</sup> This account is found in Rev. Alban Butler's Life of this saint, and in the copy of St. David's Life, furnished to Colgan, by the Most Rev. David Routh, Bishop of Ossory.

<sup>39</sup> Giraldus concludes his account of St. David with the following, Responsio:

"Gloriose præsul Christi David, suscipe vota servorum tuorum, et pro nobis intercede ad Dominum Magnum.

"Deus, qui ecclesiæ tuæ beatum David pontificem tuum mirabilem tribuisti doctorem, concede propitius, ut hunc apud te semper pium habere mereamur intercessorem, per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum. Amen." See, "Vita S. Davidis," lect. x. "Opera," vol. iii., p. 404.

<sup>40</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii. March 1st.

<sup>41</sup> According to the Bollandist computation, this translation took place A.D. 964, and in the sixth year of King Edgar's reign. Capgrave removes it to a different period. "Hæc autem Translatio Corporis S. David per matronam præfatam facta est usque ad Glastoniam anno post mortem ejus quadringentesimo vicesimo primo."—"Vita S. Patricii."

<sup>42</sup> We have an account concerning this translation at p. 130, in the "History of Glastonbury," written by John of Glastonbury, and published by Mr. Thomas Hearne, in 1726.

<sup>43</sup> See, Dodsworth's and Dugdale's "Monasticon Anglicanum," vol. i., p. 4. For an interesting account of Glastonbury and its antiquities, the reader is referred to this same work. Ibid., pp. 1 to 18.

by Pope Calistus II.,<sup>44</sup> in 1120. The Bollandists tell us, that either such was the case, or that this Pontiff must have issued new privileges to sanction still more an old veneration of the faithful, towards St. David. Soon after this time, his religious celebrity extended beyond the limits of these islands, and, it was propagated throughout the whole Christian world.<sup>45</sup> The name of St. David is found recorded in nearly all our Calendars and Martyrologies, as, also, in almost every work that treats on the early ecclesiastical history of England, Ireland, Wales or Scotland.<sup>46</sup>

A singular Welsh custom of wearing the leek has prevailed throughout the principality from a very remote time. Most probably, the leek had been the favourite article of food, used by this holy vegetarian, whose austerity of living had been so remarkable.<sup>47</sup> By another account, such a custom is said to have derived its origin, from that neighbourly aid, practised amongst farmers in South Wales, and locally known as Cymhorthu. When a small farmer had slender means, his neighbours, more favoured with the gifts of fortune, appointed a day for all to meet and plough his land, or to render him some other agricultural service. On such occasions, each individual of the company carried with him that portion of leeks necessary to make his pottage.<sup>48</sup> Others again, have asserted, that the practice took its rise from a victory obtained by Cadwallo over the Saxons, on the 1st of March, 640, when, to distinguish themselves, the Welsh wore leeks in their bonnets.<sup>49</sup>

<sup>44</sup> See, Bale, Cent. I., the English Martyrology, and Godwin's work on the Bishops of England, p. 601. This Pope sat from A.D. 1119 to 1124.

<sup>45</sup> Nicholas Harpsfeld writes, in his "Historia Ecclesiastica Anglicana, in sex primis seculis," cap. 26, regarding this saint: "Deum hujus viri sanctitatem orbi commendasse stupendis et admirandis quibusdam eventibus, quos alii persequuntur." Then are noted some miraculous occurrences, which are elsewhere related. These were attributed to the merits of St. David of Wales.

<sup>46</sup> Besides, various works, already cited in the progress of this Memoir, the reader is referred to the General Catalogue of Saints, compiled by Ferrarius, Molanus, Canisius, the MS. "Florarium Sanctorum," and to many other tracts and writers, treating about the saints of our Church.

<sup>47</sup> So, at least, the old poet Drayton has it, with some other interesting metrical allusions to St. David:—

"The Britons, like devout, their messengers direct To David, that he would their ancient right protect.
'Mongst Hatterill's lofty hills, that with the clouds are crown'd,
The valley Ewias lies immur'd so deep and round,
As they below that see the mountains rise so high,
Might think the straggl'ing herds were grazing in the sky:
Which in it such a shape of solitude doth bear,

As nature at the first appointed it for pray'r:

Wherein an aged cell, with moss and ivy grown,
In which not to this day the sun hath ever shone,

That reverend British Saint in zealous ages past,

To contemplation liv'd; and did so truly fast,

As he did only drink what crystal Hodney yields,

And fed upon the leeks he gathered in the fields.

In memory of whom, in the revolving year

The Welchman on his day that sacred herb do wear:

Where, of that holy man as humbly they do crave,

That in their just defence they might his furth'rance have." — "Poly-Olbion."

The Fourth Song.

The "valley Ewias," alluded to in the foregoing lines, is situated in Monmouthshire, and on the borders of Brecknockshire.

<sup>48</sup> Mr. Owen is accredited with the foregoing explanation; although, Mr. Rees says, he never heard of such a custom prevailing in South Wales.

<sup>49</sup> To such event, the great English dramatist is supposed to allude, when he makes the stout-hearted Welsh Captain, Fluellen, remark to King Henry V.: "the Welshmen did good service in a garden where leeks did grow, wearing leeks in their Monmouth caps; which your majesty knows, to this hour, is an honourable page of the service;

Even less rational conjectures have been offered,<sup>50</sup> to account for the early use of this national Cymbric practice.<sup>51</sup> Of this custom the Cambrians were proud, from Shakespeare's time, when the brave Fluellen had cause and occasion for wearing his leek, although St. Davy's day had passed, to a much more recent period, when a modern writer presents us with the picture of a tall, meagre old Welsh baronet, stalking down the streets of London, "with a leek stuck defiantly in his hat, because it is St. David's day."<sup>52</sup>

It would seem, that the 16th of August had been observed as a feast to commemorate the translation of St. David's relics.<sup>53</sup> Again, the 26th of September is mentioned, as having been a similar festival.<sup>54</sup> For these statements, we have the authority of Greuen.<sup>55</sup> The special veneration paid to St. David, in Wales, is evidenced from his day, the 1st of March, having been long kept as a national festival, and owing to the circumstance of that church at Menevia—formerly dedicated to St. Andrew—having been subsequently named after St. David. This church and city were likewise placed under his patronage, with metropolitical privileges. Again, the Church of Brevy, in the Ceretica district, was especially consecrated to him. Various offices were prescribed to be celebrated in his honour, not alone in Wales, but even throughout England proper, Ireland and Scotland. Amongst the Provincial Constitutions of England, one is to be found, regulating the celebration of St. David's day (March 1st), with a choral service and nine lessons, in the Province of Canterbury.<sup>56</sup> These lessons are also to be found in an ancient Breviary of Salisbury Church.<sup>57</sup> In the English Martyrology, an eulogy of our saint has been inserted. In the Scottish fasti, St. David's name is found included. The lessons of his office, prescribed to be recited during Matins, are contained in an old Aberdeen Breviary; while Dempster and Camerarius record his name, in their country's Calendars, at the 1st day of March.

CHAPTER VII.

MIRACLES ATTRIBUTED TO ST. DAVID'S MERITS AND ADVOCACY AFTER HIS DEATH—
TRADITIONAL AND RECORDED INCIDENTS—A PLAGUE DISAPPEARS, AFTER ST.
DAVID'S RELICS HAD BEEN EXPOSED—DESCRIPTION OF ST. DAVID'S TOWN AND CATHEDRAL—PILGRIMAGES MADE TO OUR SAINT'S SHRINE—A LIST OF RECTORIES, VICARAGES, PREBENDS, CURACIES, CHURCHES AND CHAPELS DEDICATED TO HIM IN WALES AND ENGLAND—NAAS TOWN AND CHURCH, IN IRELAND, HAVE ST. DAVID AS SPECIAL PATRON—OTHER PLACES IN OUR ISLAND COMMEMORATIVE OF HIS NAME—CONCLUSION.

THE place where he dwelt, in course of time, was called the fane of St. David.<sup>1</sup> We are told, that about A.D. 470, the Church of Menevia was at and I do believe your majesty takes no scorn to wear the leek upon St. Tavy's day."

"K. Henry. I wear it for a memorable honour;

For I am Welsh, you know, good country-man."

Shakespeare's "Works." King Henry V., Act iv., Scene vii.

<sup>50</sup> As, in the instance of a writer, who says: "Scholars know that the leek πρασον of the Greeks by a corrupt transposition of Pates-on, and Porrum of the Latins, corrupted from Pur-orus, was an Egyptian deity, and consequently the Britons, a colony of Egyptians, were worshippers of Leeks." See, "Gentleman's Magazine," vol. lvii., p. 131.

<sup>51</sup> See, "The Beauties of England and Wales," South Wales. By Thomas Rees, F.S.A., vol. xviii., p. 845.

<sup>52</sup> See, "London Palaces," by Walter Thornbury, in "Belgravia," vol. iv., p. 464, No. 16. February, 1868.

<sup>53</sup> At this date, we find the following entry: "Translatio Divi Davidis Archiepiscopi in Wallia," in some Calendars.

<sup>54</sup> At this particular day, the following account is given: "Translatio sanctissimi Davidis Archiepiscopi in Menevia."

<sup>55</sup> In MSS. Notationibus Carthusiæ Bruxellensis.

<sup>56</sup> See, Edward Maihew, "In Trophæis

first dedicated by St. Patrick to the Almighty, and under the invocation of St. Andrew.<sup>2</sup> During lapse of time, however, the fame of St. David spread so much, through this part of the country, and so many miracles were attributed to his merits, that the cathedral bore his name. An old chronicler, with much judgment, declares, that many of those miracles attributed to him when living deserved to be omitted, lest they might excite doubt in the minds of his readers. But, many undoubtedly took place after St. David's death, which his intercession procured, and of these four or five deserved to be mentioned, especially as they partly rested on the testimony of credible and worthy eye-witnesses.<sup>3</sup> In his description of Cambria—an ancient name for the Welsh Principality—Giraldus Cambrensis records many miracles, attributed to the intercession and merits of this holy Archbishop of Menevia.<sup>4</sup> He is not the only writer, however, who has written, regarding St. David's supernatural works.<sup>5</sup>

We are told, that a river, which ran by the cemetery of St. David's church, flowed with wine in King Stephen's reign. About the same time, a fountain, known as Pistel-Dewy, or, as Latinized, Fistula-David, according to Harpsfeld,<sup>6</sup> flowed with milk.<sup>7</sup> There was a certain portable bell, in Cambria, said to have been St. David's. This bell had been kept by soldiers, at Raidgnok Castle. During night, a fire suddenly broke out, which consumed the whole town, except a single wall, where this bell hung. In a church of St. David,<sup>8</sup> some pigeons had built their nests. A certain boy sought to take away their young, but his hands got fastened in some crevice, and they could not be removed. This was regarded as a punishment for his attempted sacrilege. This boy's parents and friends spent three whole days and nights, watching, fasting and praying, for his release, before the altar of this same church. The culprit himself joined in their holy exercises. At length, as if by a miracle, his hands were removed from the wall. He lived to relate this event, to one who had been instrumental in having it recorded. And the stone was long afterwards shown as a memorial in this church, with the traces of the boy's fingers formed and graved, as if in wax. There was a church of St. David at Lanthoheni,<sup>9</sup> near the river Hodhen. By others it was called Benedictinis Congregationis Anglicanæ," at the 1st of March.

<sup>57</sup> Printed in the year 1499. The Bollandists state, "et fere ex Capite i. Vitæ desumptæ, quibus in fine Clausula de ejus obitu additur." Hence, it seems just to infer, that the remaining portion of St. David's Life had been distributed in Lessons, which were recited during the octave.

CHAPTER VII.—<sup>3</sup> See Centuriators of Magdeburg's "Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ," tomus iii., cent. vi., cap. x., col. 753.

<sup>2</sup> It would appear from Leland, there was a book extant in his time, "De Dotatione Ecclesiæ S. Davidis," which he cites. See, also, Cressy's "Church History of Brittain." Book xi., chap. xx., p. 245. The studious reader is likewise referred to that learned work, Tanner's "Notitia Monastica." Pembrokehire, ii., St. David's or Menevia, for interesting historic memoranda, illustrating the past annals of its religious establishments.

<sup>3</sup> See, Nicholas Harpsfeld's "Historia Anglicana Ecclesiastica a primis Gentis susceptæ fidei incunabulis ad nostra fere tempora deducta, et in quindecim centurias

distributa." Sex drima Sæculæ. Cap. xxvi., pp. 40, 41. This edition has been edited by Father Richard Gibbon, an English Jesuit.

<sup>4</sup> See, "Itinerarium Cambriæ," cap. i.

<sup>5</sup> See, Harpsfeld. Lib. i., cap. 26.

<sup>6</sup> He was an ecclesiastic, who died in 1583. He was Dean of Canterbury during the reign of Queen Mary, but under her successor, Queen Elizabeth, he was deprived of this benefice and cast into prison, where he remained until the time of his death. See, an abstract of his life and writings in M. Le Dr. Hoefer's "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," &c., tome xxiii., pp. 442, 443.

<sup>7</sup> Harpsfeld says, the fountain was so called, "quia per fistulam quamdam et calalem fons in cœmeterium delabitur." Regarding this miracle, related in the text, he remarks: "Quod ab eo proditum est, quid tum vitæ resque illius patriæ exploratissimæ habuit."

<sup>8</sup> Called "Ecclesiæ Davidis de Lhanuaes."

<sup>9</sup> St. David is said to have formed a hermitage and chapel in the Vale of Llanthony, near the Black Mountains. It is thus poetically described:—

Nanthodheni.<sup>10</sup> Here there was a chapel sacred to St. David, and some holy men passed a life of strict observance in the wild country near it. Those, who committed any depredation on this church, were sure to be visited with marked misfortunes. Mahel, son to Milo, Earl of Brethenauc, tyrannically and unscrupulously oppressed a bishop of Menevia, and destroyed his church property, in the reign of King Stephen. A little while after, a stone fell down from the top of a turret, and inflicted on him a death-wound. Regarding this as a just visitation of Providence for his rapine, he ordered the church property taken to be restored again to the bishop. In presence of the latter, he deplored his misfortune, saying that St. David had inflicted a just punishment on him. And with these complaints he expired.<sup>11</sup>

A certain Welshman, who belonged to the Diocese of Menevia, together with a German, had been captured by the Saracens and bound with an iron chain. Day or night, the Welshman did not cease crying out in his native dialect, "Dewi wareth," which means, "David, help me!" In a short time, this Welshman obtained his liberty, and returned to his own country, where, in recognition of his miraculous release, Gervasius,<sup>12</sup> Bishop of Menevia, received him into his house. As the German was suspected to have connived at this escape, he was exposed to stripes, and kept in stricter confinement. Meantime, he recollected, that the Welshman had often used the words "Dewi wareth." The German often repeated these words, likewise, although he did not know their meaning. Suddenly, he seemed to have been brought to his own home, and in a way he could not understand. He vainly sought, for some time, to learn the meaning of those words. At last he went to Paris, where he met a Welshman, who explained them. The German gave God thanks, and resolved to set out on a pilgrimage to St. David's shrine, in Menevia. Here, he met his former companion, who kissed him with much affection. They mutually related those adventures, which might well be regarded as miraculous. A great plague having prevailed throughout Anglia, and many persons having fallen victims to it, in various places, it was generally resolved, that every bishop should immerse the relics of his church in holy water. It was hoped, that the use of this water, by aspersion or drinking, would have procured its cessation; but, the mortality still continued to be very great. Last of all came the Bishop of Menevia, bearing the arm of St. David. When it had been immersed in the water, this liquid appeared as if covered with some rich unctuous substance, and over it gleamed a golden cross. The people flocked in crowds to taste this water, when the mortality soon disappeared. Joy and health were immediately diffused throughout the whole country.<sup>13</sup>

The situation of modern St. David's or old Menevia is so depressed by surrounding hills, that a traveller approaching from the eastward cannot see any of its buildings, until he actually finds himself entering its principal street.<sup>14</sup> Notwithstanding the present very wretched appearance of this city,

"A little lowly hermitage it was,
Down in a dale, hard by a forest's side,
Far from resort of people that did pass
In travell to and fro: a little wyde
There was an holy chapelle edifyde,
Wherein the Hermit dewly wont to say
His holy things each morn and eventyde;
Therebye a christall streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountaine welled forth alway."

—See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 61.

<sup>10</sup> "Id est vallem Hodheni," says Harpsfeld.

<sup>11</sup> See, Harpsfeld's "Historia Anglicana," &c., p. 41.

<sup>12</sup> This bishop is thought, however, by the Bollandists, to have been Gervasius de Castro, Bishop of Bangor, who is said to have enjoyed such dignity, from A.D. 1366 to 1370.

<sup>13</sup> See, Capgrave's "Nova Legenda Anglie." Kalendas Martii, fol. lxxxiii., lxxxiii., lxxxv., lxxxvi.

there are evidences of its former consequence remaining. Traces of old streets may be found, and the foundations of walls, with many other objects of antiquity. St. David's is now only an insignificant village, situated on a small eminence, near a projecting headland, terminating in a pile of rocks. These obtain the denomination of St. David's Head. The whole country around is wild, picturesque, unwooded, and rather thinly inhabited. In a deep hollow, beneath the town, and greatly sheltered from the winds, which occasionally sweep around these rugged shores, the cathedral and its surrounding ecclesiastical buildings are to be seen. The cathedral tower is finely carved in fretwork, and a Gothic ornamental choir contrasts with Saxon pillars and arches in the great aisle. There is a ceiling of Irish oak, which is greatly admired, together with a fine Mosaic pavement.<sup>14</sup>

The Episcopal See of St. David's is situated at the western extremity of Pembrokeshire, sixteen miles distant from the market and county town of Haverfordwest. Consequently, it is placed at the extreme point of South Wales, and even on the most extreme promontory of England, with the exception of the Land's End, which projects more westwardly, about one-third of a degree. The peculiar position of the cathedral hinders it from being at all a prominent object, at any distant point of view. It lies in a deep hollow, immediately below the town of St. David's; and, consequently, from most directions, the body of the church is hardly visible. The great tower alone indicates its existence. Nothing can be more striking than a

<sup>14</sup> The old poet Drayton, in his pleasing lines, supplies us with a correct local description, as the city stood in his time :—

“ As crescent-like the land her breadth here inward bends,
From Milford, which she forth to old Menevia sends ;
Since holy David's seat ; which of especial grace
Doth lend that nobler name, to this unnobler place.
Of all the holy men whose fame so fresh remains,
To whom the Britons built so many sumptuous fanes,
This saint before the rest their patron still they hold,
Whose birth their ancient bards to Cambria long foretold,
And seated here a see, his bishopric of yore,
Upon the farthest point of this unfruitful shore ;
Selected by himself that far from all resort
With contemplation seem'd most fitly to comport ;
That, void of all delight, cold, barren,
bleak and dry,
No pleasure might allure, nor steal the wand'ring eye :
Where Ramsey with those rocks, in rank that order'd stand
Upon the farthest point of David's ancient land,
Do raise their rugged heads (the seaman's noted marks)
Call'd of their mitred tops the bishop and his clerks ;

Into that channel cast, whose raging current wars

Betwixt the British sands and the Hiber-nian shores :

Whose grim and horrid face doth pleased heaven neglect,

And bears bleak winter still in his more sad aspect :

Yet, Gwyn and Nevern near, two fine and fishful brooks,

Do never stay their course, how stern so e'er he looks ;

Which with his shipping once should seem to have commerst,

When Fiscard as her floods doth only grace the first.

To Newport falls the next : then we awhile will rest ;

Our next ensuing song to wond'rous things address.”

“ Poly-Olbion.” The Fifth Song.

<sup>15</sup> A writer of the last century, treating on St. David's Cathedral, says : “ This church is far superior to that of Llandaffe in its preservation, and has received ample justice from the attention and expense bestowed on it by its modern proprietors, the whole being in good repair, and the west front having lately been rebuilt in a taste perfectly corresponding with the rest of the structure.”—Skrine's “ Two Successive Tours through-out the whole of Wales, with several of the adjacent English Counties, so as to form a comprehensive view of the picturesque beauty, the peculiar manners, and the fine remains of antiquity, in that interesting part of the British Island.” Tour in South Wales, chap. iv.

descent, from the main streets of this decayed village, upon its magnificent remains of ecclesiastical splendour. Viewed from without, the cathedral displays no great architectural magnificence. Exposed as it is to the blasts of ocean, external ornament would have been worse than useless. Its decoration, therefore, is wisely confined to the interior. In point of size, this minster is one of the second order, as compared with other great English cathedrals, although far surpassing anything of its kind in Wales. The ground plan, in complication, perhaps even surpasses Winchester or St. Alban's. The profusion of the chapels and surrounding buildings, including a college dedicated to St. Mary, the bishop's palace—of which it is not too much to say, that it is unsurpassed by any similar residence in Britain—has the advantage of restoring the picturesque effect, which might otherwise have been lost, by the absence of any high-pitched roof. The whole edifice, however, is very low. From the days of Godwin downwards, antiquaries attribute the earliest portions of the existing fabric, to the time of Bishop Peter de Leiâ, consecrated in 1176. This prelate is recorded to have rebuilt his cathedral, after it had been many times destroyed by Danes and by other pirates. The principal dimensions of St. David's cathedral church are as follows: Length of nave, 127 feet 4 inches; whole breadth of nave and aisles, 69 feet 6 inches; length of transepts (each), 44 feet 6 inches; breadth of transepts (each), 27 feet 3 inches; length of choir, 53 feet 6 inches; breadth, 30 feet 3 inches; total external length, 306 feet; height of nave, 45 feet 8 inches; total height of tower, 116 feet.

To conduct the description of the cathedral on one uniform plan is very difficult; but, we shall suppose the visitor to have entered the church on the west. Then we may follow out in detail each subordinate part. The west front is modern, and it is almost the worst form of modern-antique. Here we may remark, that the whole structure combines Romanesque, Decorated, and Perpendicular architecture. The external view of nave and aisles calls not for much remark. These portions of the building form a long, low, regular structure. The internal features of the nave are Romanesque, or perhaps more accurately speaking, Transitional. The general effect is very striking, from the remarkable gorgeousness of architecture; in fact, few structures of the same size equal this cathedral, in the richness and elaborateness of execution, upon this portion of the interior. The flooring of the nave rises from east to west, at a most perceptible slope. This peculiarity is probably due to the builders having followed a natural slope in the ground, but the practical result is to give the building an effect of greater apparent length. The central tower is naturally one of the most striking features of this cathedral, in an external view. Within, the four grand arches which support the tower are of very noble proportions, and they are richer than usually found in large churches. The transepts without present a tolerably uniform design. Within they are Transitional Romanesque. The choir is now the only portion of this building, east of the tower, and retained as part of the church. With a small exception, it is the only part which retains its roof. The aisles of the choir, like the chapels beyond, are nearly ruinous. They are blocked off from the choir and roofless. The internal view of the choir is regarded as one of the most attractive features belonging to the church. There is no lack of ornament; but, the simplicity of composition forms a decided contrast to the over-complicated design of the nave. The Lady Chapel, like that of Hereford Cathedral, stands behind the high altar. Beside are the remains of the ancient palace of the former bishops of St. David.<sup>16</sup>

The body of St. David was interred in this church, and it seems to have been enclosed within a portable shrine. It was even the object of royal pilgrimage. We read, that William the Conqueror, Henry II., Edward I.

and Queen Eleanor made pilgrimages thereto. The extent of the bishop's lands, as shown in 1326, informs us, that the burgesses of St. David's were bound to follow the bishop in time of war, one day's journey in either direction, with the shrine of St. David. In the same church, there was also a shrine, devoted to the remains of St. Caradoc, whose body is supposed to have been there interred.<sup>17</sup>

Ancient Porch of Bishop's Palace, St. David's, Wales.

In the six counties of North Wales there is not one church that bears St. David's name—as we are told by Rev. Rice Rees.<sup>18</sup> This very learned provincial antiquary, after very minute investigation, asserts, that the following churches were dedicated—as had been generally assumed—to St. David, in the southern shires. Yet, he does not positively affirm such a statement. On the contrary, he proposes an emendation of the list.<sup>19</sup> These letters R. V. P. C. affixed to benefices, denote Rectory, Vicarage, Prebend, Curacy. In the Diocese of St. David's, Pembrokeshire, we find the Cathedral (dedicated to SS. David and Andrew) has 5 dependent chapels.<sup>20</sup> Brawdy, V. Whitchurch, V. Prendergast, R. Hubberston, R. Bridell, R. Llanuch-llwydog, R., has 1 dependent chapel.<sup>21</sup> Llanychaer, R. Llanddewi Felffre, R. and V. Maenor Deifi, R. In Cardiganshire, Llanddewi Brefi, C., has 4 dependent chapels.<sup>22</sup> Blaenporth, P. Bangor, R., has 1 dependent

<sup>16</sup> The accompanying illustration of its porch is drawn by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>17</sup> See, "The History and Antiquities of St. David's," by William Basil Jones, M.A. In this work, continual reference is made to Giraldus Cambrensis, to "Anglia Sacra," Browne Willis, and Men. Sac., &c., &c.

<sup>18</sup> In an "Essay on the Welsh Saints, or the Primitive Christians usually considered to have been the founders of Churches in Wales," sect. ii., p. 45.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., pp. 52, 53, 54.

<sup>20</sup> These are Gurhyd; Non (St. Non); Padrig (St. Patrick); Pistyll; and Stinan (St. Justinian).

<sup>21</sup> This is called Llanllawen.

<sup>22</sup> These are called Bettws Lleicu; Blaenpennal (St. David); Gartheli; Gwenfyl (St. Gwenfyl).

chapel.<sup>23</sup> Henfynyw, C. Llanddewi Aberarth, P. Henllan, chapel to Bangor (St. David). Blaenpennal, chapel to Llanddewi Brefi (St. David). In Carmarthenshire, Henllan Amgoed, R., has 1 chapel.<sup>24</sup> Meidrym, V., has 1 chapel.<sup>25</sup> Capel Dewi is a chapel to Llanelly (St. Ellyw). Llanarthneu, P. and V., 1 chapel.<sup>26</sup> Abergwilly, or Abergwyli, V., 3 chapels.<sup>27</sup> Bettws, C. Llanycrwys, C. Llanydyfeisant, C. In Brecknockshire, Garthbrengei, P. Trallwng, P. Llywel, V., has 1 chapel.<sup>28</sup> Llanfaes, V. Maesmynys, R. Llanddewi Abergwesin, is a chapel to Llangammarch (St. Cammarch). Llanwrtyd is also a chapel to Llangammarch (St. Cammarch). Llanddewi'r Cwm, C. In Radnorshire, Heyop, R. Whitton, R. Llanddewi Ystrad Enni is a chapel to Llanbister (St. Cynllo). Cregruna, R., has 1 chapel.<sup>29</sup> Glascwm, V., has 2 chapels.<sup>30</sup> Colfa is a chapel to Glascwm (St. David). Llanddewi Fach is a chapel to Llywes (St. Meilig). Rhiwlen is a chapel to Glascwm (St. David). In Glamorganshire, Llanddewi in Gower.

In the Diocese of Llandaff, Glamorganshire, Bettws and Laleston are both chapels to Newcastle (St. Illtyd). In Monmouthshire, Llanddewi Sgyryd, R. Llanddewi Rhydderch, V. Llanddewi Fach, C. Bettws, a chapel to Newport (St. Gwynllgw). Trostre, alias Trawsdre, C. Llangyniow, C. Qu. Llangyfyw?

In the Diocese of Hereford, Herefordshire, Kilpeck, C. (dedicated to St. Mary and St. David). Dewchurch Magna, V. Little Dewchurch chapel to Lugwardine (St. Peter).

Thus do we find, no less than 40 churches and 13 chapels enumerated in the dioceses already mentioned—in all 53.<sup>31</sup> Their foundation is popularly ascribed to St. David himself; but, probably many, if not nearly all, belong to a much later period, and were only subsequent dedications to the great Welsh patron saint. Four endowments, in the foregoing list, are of the first class, having a plurality of chapels dependent on them; seven more have one chapel each; and most of these subordinate chapels are dedicated to St. David himself, or to Welsh saints, his contemporaries. The chapels dedicated to St. David are subject to churches, attributed to the same person, or to other Welsh saints of an older or of a contemporary date. Out of the 13 chapelries, assigned to St. David, 11 are parochial.<sup>32</sup> But, it may be urged against the antiquity of the beneficed churches, that only 4 out of 40 have endowments of the first foundation. A review of the list, however, compared with a map of the country, and some knowledge of its localities, will show that the majority of these benefices do not stand singly, in their situations. They are joined by two, and sometimes by three, together;—Thus Whitchurch is contiguous to St. David's, Llanuchllwydog and Llanychaer are adjoining parishes. The same may be said of Maenor Deifi and Bridell. Henfynyw and Llanddewi Arberarth are contiguous; so are Trallwng and Llywel; Maesmynys and Llanddewi'r Cwm; as well as Glascwm and Cregruna. Brawdy and Whitchurch, though not contiguous, are nearer to each other, than many detached chapelries. The same may be said of Henllan Amgoed and Llanddewi Felffre, and also of Llanddewi Brefi and Llanycrwys. Garthbrengei and Llanfaes are so situated with respect to each other,

<sup>23</sup> Henllan (St. David).

<sup>24</sup> Eglwys Fair a Churig.

<sup>25</sup> Llanhangel Abercywyn (St. Michael).

<sup>26</sup> Llanlleian.

<sup>27</sup> Llanfihangel Uwch Gwyli (St. Michael); Llanpumsant; and Llanllawddog (St. Llawddog).

<sup>28</sup> Rhydybriew.

<sup>29</sup> Llanbadarn y Garreg (St. Padarn).

<sup>30</sup> Colfa (St. David); and Rhiwlen (St. David.)

<sup>31</sup> See, ibid., pp. 43, 44, 45. The foregoing list is taken from Ecton's Thesaurus, edited by Browne.

<sup>32</sup> Ascertained from the population returns for 1831, printed by order of the House of Commons.

<sup>33</sup> See, a poem, which he wrote in honour

that it is probable they were first separated in arrangements, made by the followers of Bernard Newmarch, a Norman adventurer, who took forcible possession of the county of Brecknock, about A.D. 1090. Similar remarks apply to others in Monmouthshire, and to the three churches in Herefordshire. Heyop and Whitton belong to a district, which was one of the first subjected to the Lords Marchers. From the disposition of these churches in clusters, it may be supposed, that the parishes of each cluster formed originally a single endowment, in support of one church, or perhaps of two churches, to which the rest served as so many chapels. Light may be borrowed, on such a subject, from the testimony of Gwynfardd Brycheinwg, a bard who lived between 1160 and 1230.<sup>33</sup>

All but 5 chapels are in that district, over which St. David was Archbishop of Caerleon or Menevia. The Cathedral of St. David is in the former territory of his maternal grandfather. The neighbourhood of Henfynyw appears to have been the property of St. David's father; while, Llanddewi Brefi is situated on that spot, where St. David refuted the Pelagian heresy.<sup>34</sup>

These churches, however, are not the only ones dedicated to St. David, Patron of Wales, within the British Islands. It may not be possible to present a complete list. A church has lately been erected, in his honour, at Neath. This is built in a style of Gothic, characteristic of the thirteenth century. It is regarded, as being excellently and tastefully designed, with a French treatment of detail and ornament.<sup>35</sup> For an account of certain other churches, dedicated or specially relating to St. David, the writer feels indebted for the following enumeration, furnished by the Very Rev. Bede Vaughan, formerly Prior at Hereford, and at present Archbishop of Sydney, Australia.

Thus, in Cornwall, do we find memorials of this holy prelate. Although St. David is justly regarded, as the glory of the Welsh nation and their own patron saint, their Celtic brethren on the opposite shores of the Severn sea may venture to claim a share in his renown; for, we are told, by William of Worcester,<sup>36</sup> that he was a native of Cornwall, and that Albernun, or Alternun, was the place of his birth. There is a church, dedicated to his mother Nonna, or Nonnita.<sup>37</sup> Leland asserts, that his mother was the daughter of a Cornish chief. If those statements are reliable, we may almost use the words, which the men of Israel addressed to the men of Judah, concerning his Hebrew namesake: "David belongeth more to me than to thee."<sup>38</sup> But, apart from those statements by William of Worcester<sup>39</sup> and Leland,<sup>40</sup> which, it must be admitted, are somewhat incompatible with the general tradition of the saint's nativity, there is abundant evidence, that he was intimately connected with Cornwall, and that we may fairly reckon him amongst the foremost apostles of the ancient Cornish Church. There is, in the Deanery of Trigg Major, a parish, which from time immemorial has claimed St. David as its founder. Adjoining it is Alternun, and at Davidstow, there is a church dedicated to St. David.<sup>41</sup> Again, in Devonshire, we find at Little Ashpring-of St. David, and which has been published in "Welsh Archaeology," vol. i., p. 270.

<sup>34</sup> See, Rev. Rice Rees' "Essay on the Welsh Saints," sect. ii., pp. 45 to 56.

<sup>35</sup> For a more complete architectural description and a woodcut engraving, the reader may consult the "London Illustrated News" of October 3rd, 1868, vol. lii., No. 1504.

<sup>36</sup> "In Kalendario ecclesiæ Mont Myghell."

<sup>37</sup> Sancta Nonnita mater Sancti David jacet apud ecclesiam villæ Alternonitæ per 6 miliaria de Launceston, ubi natus fuit Sanctus David."

<sup>38</sup> II. Kings, xix., 43.

<sup>39</sup> William of Worcester went into Cornwall A.D. 1478, and travelled as far west as St. Michael's Mount. The above note is one of the memoranda, which he copied from the register of the Mount.

<sup>40</sup> "Nonita, mater Davidis, fuit ut aliqui adfirmant, filia Comitiss Coriniæ." See "Collectanea," vol. ii., 107.

<sup>41</sup> See the interesting "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," No. v. St. David. By Rev. John Adams, M.A., Vicar of Stockcross, Berks. "Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall," No. xi. 1870.

ton, there stood a chapel, formerly dedicated to St. David, now to St. Mary. At Bradstone, there is a church, dedicated to St. Nonna, mother of St. David. At Exeter, there is a new church, dedicated to St. David, and consecrated September, 1817. At Thelbridge, there is a church, also dedicated to St. David.<sup>42</sup> The Catholic churches and chapels, at present dedicated to our saint, as given in the English "Catholic Directory," are as follows:—In Wales, Glamorganshire—At Cardiff, there is a church, dedicated to St. David. At Swansea, there is a church, dedicated, in like manner, to this great saint. Flintshire—At Mold, there is a church, dedicated to St. David. The foregoing, we have reason to believe, nearly exhausts the number of churches and chapels, which claim David of Wales as their titular saint, in the Welsh Principality. In England, so far as we can ascertain, there are no Catholic Churches or Chapels, dedicated to St. David. Those bearing the title of David, in Scotland, appear to have been erected in honour of the holy king, who ruled over that country, in the twelfth century.

It was only natural, the ancient Welsh colonists should desire their chief patron, St. David, to be regarded as titular of Naas, in Ireland. Accordingly, at an early period, no doubt, such an honour awaited the church first raised there, to the invocation of this beloved and venerated patron.

The site of the old church of St. David, at Naas, is in the centre, and on the east side of the town. It is popularly agreed, that the present walls of this church, with an ancient tower on the south-west end, are repaired portions of the old parochial church of St. David.<sup>43</sup> There were three chantries formerly within it, viz. : that of the Holy Trinity, of St. Mary, and of St. Catherine. The Church of St. David is surrounded by a cemetery, where Catholic families still continue to bury their dead. Some remains of old tombs and armorial bearings, carved in stone, are found within this graveyard enclosure. The soil seems to have accumulated to a considerable height over the foundations, owing chiefly to interments continued for centuries past. No very ancient monuments, however, can be found there at present.

The old parish church, now appropriated and re-modelled for the purposes of Protestant worship, appears to rest on a part only of its original foundations. Near the side walls, traces of extension may be discovered, so as to indicate, that it had probably been cruciform in design. The foundations of one lateral transept are visible. It was known as the Lady Chapel. Another transept probably corresponded with it, on the opposite side, where a poorly-designed porch now extends.<sup>44</sup> Internally, as well as externally, it is an easy matter for the antiquarian and architect to discover alterations, from a much purer type of building. Hardly in any one instance can the more recent modifications be regarded as improvements. The walls are of extreme thickness. The interior contains some tablet memorials, a rich stained glass window, an organ, &c. ; but, it is deformed with a cumbersome gallery, high pews, and other unsightly obstructions and designs.

The present building has evidently undergone many alterations. It is near the site of an old castle, which, in a great measure, has been modernized, and at present serves to form a rectorial residence. It is still known as St.

<sup>42</sup> My respected informant adds, that the above list has been taken from the "Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis," by George Oliver, D.D. The work bears the imprint : Exeter and London, A.D. 1846.

<sup>43</sup> See, "Ordnance Survey MS. Letters, relating to the County of Kildare Antiquities," vol. i. Letter of T. O'Connor, and dated Naas, November 9th, 1837, p. 148.

<sup>44</sup> On occasion of a former visit, in company with the late Rev. James Hughes, Pastor of Naas, the Rev. Mr. De Burgh, Protestant Rector of this parish, very courteously and intelligently directed attention to many of these peculiarities in construction.

David's castle. The adjoining grounds and accessories are ornamental. Not far removed, an endowed grammar school is entered, through the cemetery gate. Where the steeple once stood, a huge unfinished tower was erected, nearly one hundred years since, by an Earl of Mayo.<sup>45</sup> It has within it, on a slab, the following inscription :—" Ruinam inveni, pyramidem reliqui, Mayo."<sup>46</sup> Some time after the Catholics were deprived of this church, they built another, where the Moat School now is, and which served until the present building was erected.

The first stone of this commodious edifice was laid, August 15th, 1827. This church is dedicated, under the joint patronage of our Lady and of St. David. The church itself is divided into nave and aisles, by two rows of columns, the nave being 30 feet wide, and the aisles 15 feet, each. The total length, from the eastern wall, behind the high altar, to the western wall of the tower, is 138 feet; and, the height of the nave to the ridge plate 52 feet, a good and beautiful proportion. Forty years after the opening, the interior began to be finished. About twenty years after the opening, a steeple, modelled after that of Ewerby, in Lincolnshire, set up in the 14th century, was commenced, and was finished on the last day of the year 1858. It is 200 feet high. The style is what is called the transitional; that is, what prevailed between "the early English" and "the decorated" periods. The tower consists of three stages.<sup>47</sup> The Priory of Great Connell, within a few miles of Naas, was dedicated to our Lady and to St. David. Canons Regular of St. Augustine occupied this religious establishment, and the Prior had a

St. David's Catholic Church, Naas, County Kildare.

<sup>45</sup> His successor holds property in and near the town of Naas.

<sup>46</sup> "I found a ruin,"—the old Catholic erection then in ruins.—"I left this steeple in its place, Mayo." In the tower, is a bell, bearing the following inscription: "Os meum laudabit Dominum in Ecclesia S. Davidis de Naas." ("My mouth shall praise the Lord in the Church of St. David of Naas.") R. P. W. C., 1674.

<sup>47</sup> This and many another local improvement in Naas have been effected by Rev. James Hughes, at whose request the author compiled a "Life of St. David," embracing fuller particulars regarding this town than the present. Since his death, many useful works have been effected by the present respected and zealous Rev. Thomas Morrin, P.P. The accompany-seat in the Upper House. Great Conall was founded by Meyler Fitz-Henry, Lord Justice of Ireland, in the beginning of the thirteenth century.<sup>48</sup> Although St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise seems to have been the first patron saint of Ard-nurcher, a parish located partly in the barony of Kilcoursey, but chiefly in that of Moycashel, county of Westmeath; yet, St. David—most likely the present one—has been patron saint for many centuries back, and there is a holy well dedicated to him, at Ballinlaban. It is still much frequented.<sup>49</sup> In Mulrankin parish, county of Wexford, a patron was formerly held, on the 1st of March. Probably this was in honour of St. David.<sup>50</sup> A Ballydavid Townland and Head are to be found, on an extremely remote shore of western Kerry, in the barony of Corkaguiny, not far from the old ruined church, in Kilquane parish.

It must always constitute a pleasing and truly Christian state of society, to find international kindness and courtesies, with charitable and religious offices, exchanged between the people of different countries. Such kindly relationship appears to have prevailed, on the part of our Irish ancestors and the Cambro-Britons, except on rare occasions, when ambitious, adventurous, and unprincipled leaders conducted marauding expeditions, against those exposed to their predatory incursions. The bad passions of men, thus mutually excited, led oftentimes to bloody reprisals. Nor can we doubt, but the period and contemporaries of St. David witnessed many of those devastating raids. Yet, it is consoling to find, that the holy men of Hibernia and Cambria maintained an intimacy, strengthened by bonds of mutual friendship and religious associations, even from opposite shores.<sup>51</sup> Intercommunication by sea voyages brought Menevia within easy reach of Irish students, many of whom were proud to acknowledge St. David as their master in sacred and secular learning.<sup>52</sup> Again, the schools of Ireland were not less celebrated, about the same time, and had been resorted to by numbers of Cambro-Britons, who spent precious years in the acquisition of similar knowledge. We have already seen, that several renowned Irish ecclesiastics are specially named, as having sought the companionship and guidance of holy David. Some of their Acts are recorded, in connexion with him, and these even serve to illustrate his biography. Encouraged by his example and emulating his piety, while cultivating their natural mental faculties, Almighty God was pleased to reserve them for a career of further usefulness, when returning once more to their native Isle beyond the waves. Hence, in life, St. David ing illustration was drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>48</sup> See, Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 262. For a fuller account, the reader is referred to Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 317 to 321.

<sup>49</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xix., p. 497.

<sup>50</sup> See "Letters containing Information, relating to the Antiquities of the County of Wexford," vol. i. I.O.S.

<sup>51</sup> So early as the eighth century the veneration for St. David was well established in Ireland. The following Irish stanza, and its English translation, have been obligingly furnished by Professor O'Looney, from the copy of the "Feilire" of St. Ængus the Culdee, contained in the "Leabhar Breac:"—

D. k. l.    πορ καλαιο μην μαρτα, ηις μορσα ρηια ηγουρε,
 Senan, Moineno, Myre, Oabro Chille mune.

On the Kalends of the month of March,
 Not proud to be invoked;
 Senan, Moinend, Myse (Moyes),
 David of Kilmunney.

The Moyes here noticed seems to have been the great Legislator and Leader of the Jews, and whose festival "Moyses hominis Dei depositio" is marked, at this date, in a Lætiensian MS. His chief feast is held on the 4th of September. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 4.

<sup>52</sup> In the Trinity College, Dublin, MS., Classed E. 3. 8., we find a notice, De Vita David Menevensis.

was honoured and venerated by some of our most distinguished saints, and it is only just, therefore, when he has passed from life to the happiness of immortality, that in our Island, as within his specially privileged principality, the name of this great and good bishop should be well remembered and invoked. Through his ministry, blessings descended on our forefathers, and so may his protection secure other spiritual favours for those people, who have adopted him as their special patron.

ARTICLE II.—ST. SWIBERT OR SUITBERT, BISHOP, AND APOSTLE OF THE FRISONS AND OF THE BORUCTUARIANS. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] Our illustrious national hagiologist, Father John Colgan, in presenting the Acts of this saint,<sup>1</sup> has remarked, how in accordance with the Apostolic number, several holy missionaries went from Ireland to evangelize distant nations, in bands of twelve. This peculiarity of blessed adventure, he illustrates by many examples and incidents, recorded in our ecclesiastical Annals.<sup>2</sup> It was the glorious fortune of St. Swibert, Suitbert, or Suidbert to travel abroad in such holy companionship, and to unite his labours with truly great men. This celebrated missionary was born, sometime in the seventh century. The most authentic particulars, regarding him, are to be found written, by the Venerable Bede.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists have published Acts of St. Suibert, at the 1st of March, and these are very complete, so far as the obscurities of early history permit their elucidation.<sup>4</sup> It is said, the actions of this holy missionary had been early recorded by the companion of his labours, the priest St. Marcellinus, and by St. Lutger, the first bishop of Munster. Miræus thought some modern additions had been unauthorizedly made to the narrative of St. Marcellinus, and he expresses a hope that more genuine Acts should be found in old codices and published. Much more might be added to the present narrative, if we could rely upon the account of this saint's life, published under the name of Marcellinus, who, it is pretended, was Marchelm, a disciple or colleague of our saint. Modern critics are of opinion, however, that a pretended biography of Marcellinus was compiled by an impostor, and that it was a forgery of the fifteenth century.<sup>5</sup> Not suspecting its authenticity, Surius has included it, in his Acts of the Saints.<sup>6</sup> Other modern writers, likewise, have too readily adopted the said statements of Marcellinus, as being genuinely contemporaneous records regarding St. Suitbert. Among those may be noticed Dean Cressy.<sup>7</sup> Nor are the Acts,<sup>8</sup>

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. De S. Suitberto Episcopo Tiesterbandiæ Apostolo, pp. 433 to 437.

<sup>2</sup> See ibid., n. 2, p. 436.

<sup>3</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. v., cap. x., xi., pp. 257 to 260. See that edition, published with notes and various readings, in the "Monumenta Historica Britannica," or Materials for the History of Britain, from the earliest period to the end of the Reign of King Henry VII., vol. i. Extending to the Norman Conquest. This work, so very valuable for purposes of historic enquiry, was at first prepared and illustrated, with notes, by Henry Petrie, Esq., F.S.A., assisted by the Rev. John Sharpe, B.A. It is ably edited by Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, and it was published by command of her Majesty, in fine large folio, A.D. MDCCCLXVIII.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Suiberto Episcopo Frisonum et Boructuariorum Apostolo Cæsaris-Werdæ ad Rhenum. Commentarius historicus, viii. sections and 65 paragraphs, with St. Radbod's Sermon and Allegoric "Carmen," relating to St. Suibertus. See pp. 67 to 86.

<sup>5</sup> Colgan and the Bollandists take care to point out the self-contradictions and anachronisms in this Life. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. De S. Suitberto Episcopo, &c., n. 3, p. 436. Also, "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Suiberto Episcopo, sect. ii., iii., iv., pp. 70 to 75.

<sup>6</sup> See "De Probatis Sanctorum Historiis," tomus ii., Martius i. Vita S. Suiberti, Werdensis Ecclesiæ primi Episcopi et Confessoris Saxonum Frisiorumque Apostoli: Scripta a B. Marcellino presbytero. This Life is

ascribed to St. Lutger,<sup>9</sup> more authentic. By several authors and in their works, St. Suitbert is to be found commemorated. Thus, in the old "Hystorie plurimorum Sanctorum,"<sup>10</sup> as also in the works of John Molanus,<sup>11</sup> and of Albertus Miraëus,<sup>12</sup> as also in the "Acta Sanctorum Belgii," appear the Acts of St. Suidbert, Bishop and Apostle of the Frisons, and of the Boructuarii, at the 1st of March.<sup>13</sup> At this same date, we find mentioned, by Adrien Baillet, St. Swibert or Swibert, a regionary Bishop and the Apostle of Frise.<sup>14</sup> The Rt. Rev. Bishop Challenor,<sup>15</sup> Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>16</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould<sup>17</sup> have notices of his life and labours. The Irish Cistercian Monk ranks him among the Irish Saints, as a Bishop and a Confessor.<sup>18</sup> He is also designated the Ancient,<sup>19</sup> to distinguish him from another, called Swibert, the younger.<sup>20</sup> A sermon on St. Suitbert, by the Blessed Radbod,<sup>21</sup> and also a Latin poem, in his praise, are to be found in the great Bollandist collection. It is stated, that there were two saints, respectively named Swibert, and that both were Englishmen. One was the Apostle of the Frisons<sup>22</sup> and of the Boructuarians.<sup>23</sup> The other is reputed to have been the first bishop of Werden.<sup>24</sup> The present holy man is considered to have been a native or an inhabitant of Northumbria, in his earlier years; and, from the name, we may infer, that he was probably of Anglo-Saxon origin.<sup>25</sup> He is said to have been educated near the borders of Scotland, and to have lived for some time, under the direction of that holy and learned priest and monk, St. Egbert,<sup>26</sup> whom he accompanied into Ireland.<sup>27</sup> We find it stated, likewise, that this saint received his education at Armagh.<sup>28</sup> It is not so well known, if such be the case; but, in Ireland, he probably conceived the wish, with other distin-preceded by a Prologue of the writer, addressed to Gregory, Bishop of Utrecht; and, it contains 32 chapters. See, pp. 5 to 28.

<sup>7</sup> See his "Church History of Brittany," book xxii., chap. ii., pp. 556, 557.

<sup>8</sup> These, too, will be found in Surius, "De Probatis Sanctorum Historiis," tomus ii., Martius i. They appear, in the shape of an Epistle to Rixfrid, the seventh Bishop of Utrecht, and in response to his request. They are given, with a Preface, in 12 chapters. See pp. 28 to 40.

<sup>9</sup> His festival has been assigned to the 26th of March; and there, too, Surius has published his Life, which professes to have been written by monks of the Monastery at Verden, who were almost his contemporaries. Besides two respective Prologues, the First Book contains 35 chapters, and the Second Book has 9 chapters. See ibid., pp. 412 to 436. Lutger lived contemporaneously with the Emperor Charlemagne.

<sup>10</sup> There he is called St. Suebertus, Confessor. See fol. xxxiii., xxxv.

<sup>11</sup> See "In Natalibus Sanctorum Belgii."

<sup>12</sup> See "In Fastis Belgicis."

<sup>13</sup> See vol. vi., pp. 152 to 196. The matter is all to be found in the Bollandist collection.

<sup>14</sup> See Baillet's "Les Vies des Saints," Tome i., pp. 8 to 11.

<sup>15</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 145, 146.

<sup>16</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii. March i.

<sup>17</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., pp.

16 to 18.

<sup>18</sup> See "Lives of the Irish Saints," pp. 286, 287.

<sup>19</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 61.

<sup>20</sup> His feast occurs, at the 30th of April.

<sup>21</sup> He was Bishop of Utrecht, and he died A.D. 917 or 918. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March i., and vol. xi., November xxix. At the last date, he is commemorated in the Calendars.

<sup>22</sup> Tacitus, Pliny and Ptolemy have respectively accounts of this ancient people.

<sup>23</sup> The Boructuarii are said frequently to have changed their settlements. At one time, they dwelt between the Rivers Rhine and Weser; again, they lived between the Lyppe and Ems Rivers, and afterwards between Cologne and Hesse. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Suitberto Episcopo, sect. i., num. 1, 9, pp. 67, 70.

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i.

<sup>25</sup> According to Marcellinus, our saint was of noble birth, his father being Sigebert, Count of Nortingham, and his mother Berta was also of a distinguished race. See Surius' "De Probatis Sanctorum Historiis," tomus ii., Martius i. Vita, cap. i., p. 7.

<sup>26</sup> See his Life, at the 24th of April.

<sup>27</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March i.

<sup>28</sup> See J. B. Doyle's "Tours in Ulster," p. 140.

<sup>29</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Eccle-

guished men, to spread the faith among the old Saxons.<sup>29</sup> Towards the close of the seventh century, the apostolic labours of St. Suitbert and his fellow-missionaries commenced among the Frisons.<sup>30</sup> Following the directions of St. Egbert, St. Willibrord<sup>31</sup> and twelve missionaries, among whom was our saint, sailed for Frisia or Friesland, about the year 690, according to the very general opinion of historians. These apostolic men departed immediately from Ireland, and landed at Katwyck, at the mouth of the Rhine.<sup>32</sup> Pepin d'Heristal, at this time, was a celebrated character in French History.<sup>33</sup> His power and influence even extended into the Netherlands. He was at first married to Plectrude,<sup>34</sup> whom he divorced, and then he married Alpaide;<sup>35</sup> but, the former was restored to his favour, and she assumed the direction of affairs after the death of Pepin, who was Maire in the Royal Palace of the French Kings for twenty-eight years. Pepin had compelled Radbod, about eighteen months before their arrival, to pay an annual tribute.<sup>36</sup> He had lately subdued some of the Netherland provinces, and he desired, moreover, to have the inhabitants won over to Christ. Radbod, sovereign in the northern provinces, dared not oppose the preaching of those missionaries, who found so powerful a protector and so zealous a benefactor in his celebrated rival. The former had sued for a peace, which he obtained, by ceding his most important possessions, to the Mayor of the Palace. Among these was that whole basin, between the Meuse and the Rhine, where now stand the towns of Leyden, Delft, Gouda, Brill, and Dordrecht, as also the city of Utrecht.<sup>37</sup> Here was found an admirable field for their labours, and soon the missionaries' success answered Pepin's desires. In a short time, those apostolic men made great progress in the conversion of idolaters. To proceed more regularly and with higher authority, in so great a work, St. Willebrord went to Rome, where he visited Pope Sergius I.,<sup>38</sup> to obtain his licence and blessing, for preaching the Gospel among the Gentiles.<sup>39</sup> Willebrord was ordained Archbishop of Utrecht, about A.D. 696, and he then returned to prosecute his labours. The ministry of St. Suitbert was exercised, chiefly in the southern parts of the present kingdom of Holland, in the northern parts of Brabant, in the countries of Cleves and Gueldres. The territory of the Frisians was formerly of great extent, reaching from the mouths of the Rhine and the Meuse, so far as Denmark and ancient Saxony. The zeal of St. Suitbert was most untiring. He drew an incredible number of idolaters away from their pagan superstitions, and he reclaimed them from indulgence, in the most shameful vices and disorders.<sup>40</sup> For his modesty of behaviour and meekness of heart, Suitbert was distinguished among the Frisian preachers of the Word. He was therefore selected to become their bishop, and he was siastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. v., cap. x.—

"Monumenta Historica Britannica," vol.
i., pp. 257, 258.

<sup>30</sup> See ibid., cap. xi., pp. 258, 259.

<sup>31</sup> See his Life, at the 7th of November.

<sup>32</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March i.

<sup>33</sup> See an interesting account of this monarch and his achievements, by the writers of "The Modern Part of an Universal History, from the earliest Accounts to the present Time," vol. xix. The History of France, chap. lxxviii., sect. i., pp. 257 to 260.

<sup>34</sup> By her, he had two sons, Drogon, whom he made Duke of Burgundy, and Grimoalde, who was Mayor of the Palace to Childebert. See Fredegarii Scholastici, "Epitome et Chronicon," cap. 101.

<sup>35</sup> By her, Pepin had two sons, also, while one of these was named Charles Martel, and the other Childebrande.

<sup>36</sup> The death of this Frisian king has been variously placed at A.D. 717, 718, or 719. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Suitberto Episcopo, sect. v., num. 37, p. 76.

<sup>37</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March i., p. 17.

<sup>38</sup> He sat from A.D. 687 to 701. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 211.

<sup>39</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 146.

<sup>40</sup> These are accounts contained, more in detail in the Life, attributed to Marcellinus; yet, how far they are genuine has been questioned.

sent over to be consecrated in Britain. At this time, St. Theodore,<sup>41</sup> Archbishop of Canterbury, had died.<sup>42</sup> His successor, Berthwald, or Brihtwold, had gone beyond the sea, for the purpose of being consecrated.<sup>43</sup> He had not returned, when Suitbert reached the shores of Britain. Bishop Wilfrid<sup>44</sup> then lived in exile among the Mercians, having been banished from his own see.<sup>45</sup> By him, Suitbert was elevated to the dignity of bishop, before August 31st, 693.<sup>46</sup> As the fields were now white for the harvest, it seems probable, he sought fellow-helpers, during the time he was in England.<sup>47</sup> Having obtained the Pontiff's permission, he returned to the work of his ministry, furnished with holy relics. These he desired to make use of, when dedicating such churches as he should erect for the use of his new converts.<sup>48</sup> The zealous Swibert, having been consecrated bishop, returned from Britain, and went over again to the Continent. Again he visited that flock, committed to his care, but, desiring a wider field for missionary enterprise, he asked St. Willibrord to take charge of his people, while he went in search of new conquests farther up the River Rhine. Not long afterwards, he went to the Boructuarians,<sup>49</sup> or Boructarians, inhabiting that country, afterwards called the Duchy of Berg and the country of La Marck.<sup>50</sup> These people lived below Cologne, and near the Lower Rhine. Owing to his preaching, Suibert brought many among them to the way of truth. The Boructuarians, however, having been attacked and subdued by the ancient Saxons, those who had received the Word of God from Swibert were dispersed, after their territory had been subjected to horrible devastations. In Plectrude, Suibert found a zealous patroness, and her influence was specially directed, to second his efforts, with her powerful consort.<sup>51</sup> The bishop repaired to Pepin, who gave him a place of residence in a certain Island, formed by different channels of the Rhine. It was called Keiserswerdt, or "The Emperor's Island."<sup>52</sup> It is situated six miles below Dusseldorp, but the Rhine channel having changed its course, the place is no longer an island. There he built a monastery, and the place was for a long time called St. Swibert's Isle. This religious site his successors afterwards possessed. The monastery flourished for many ages, but it was subsequently converted into a collegiate church of secular canons.<sup>53</sup> Although called, by many writers, the first bishop of Werda or Werden; yet, it only appears, that he was consecrated as a regionary bishop, without having been attached to any fixed see. He was accustomed,

<sup>41</sup> His festival occurs on the 19th of September.

<sup>42</sup> After a rule as bishop of twenty-two years, he died A.D. 690, according to the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle." See "Monumenta Historica Britannica," or Materials for the History of Britain, from the earliest Period to the end of the Reign of King Henry VII. Edited by Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, vol. i., p. 323.

<sup>43</sup> He was chosen Archbishop on the 1st of July, A.D. 692, and he was consecrated Archbishop, by Guodun, or Godwin, Bishop of the Gauls, on the 29th of June, A.D. 693. See ibid.

<sup>44</sup> His festival is held on the 12th of October. The greatest part of his remains were translated from Ripon to Cahterbury in 959 by St. Odo; these were enshrined by Lanfranc, and deposited on the north side of the altar by St. Anselm. St. Wilfrid died on the 24th of April, A.D. 709.

<sup>45</sup> See an account of these transactions in

Rev. Dr. Lingard's "Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," chap. v., pp. 109 to 116.

<sup>46</sup> Marcellinus states, A.D. 695, but the Bollandists seem to give better reasons for the account, 'contained in the text. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Suiberto Episcopo, sect. v., num. 35, p. 76.

<sup>47</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March i., p. 17.

<sup>48</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 146.

<sup>49</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. v., cap. xi., p. 259.

<sup>50</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March i.

<sup>51</sup> By Venerable Bede, she is called Blithryda or Bliththrude. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. v., cap. xi., p. 259.

as we are told by Radbod, to caution those monks, who were subject to him, against deceitful persuasions and public contentions ; while, like a valiant leader, his followers were taught by him to contend against tyrants and persecutors. He stood as David against Goliath, but armed alone with Faith, Hope and Charity. Humble and meek, he was modest in prosperity, and patient in adversity. His abstinence, his vigils, and his prayers, were incessant : he led a most continent—i.e., a most holy and mortified—life, according to Venerable Bede.<sup>54</sup> He wrought many miracles, as stated in the various offices, composed in his honour, as also following the bent of popular tradition. Especially was he believed, to have given relief to those affected with quinsy, or inflammation of the jaws ; and several attributed their cures from this painful disease, to a devout intercession of St. Suitbert. It is probable, his reputation for effecting such cures commenced during his lifetime. His judgment, his compassion for sinners, his disinterestedness, and his liberality, are alike praised by Radbod. While he steadfastly reprov'd vice, yet was he indulgent to the sinner. His words were as honey, his preaching was most eloquent, his spiritual conferences were edifying. In his monastery reigned an angelic society. There ended his days, on the 1st of March, and in the year 713, according to the accounts of most historians.<sup>55</sup> The Calendarists are unanimous, in assigning his festival to this day. In the archiepiscopal province of Utrecht, and in all its suffragan sees, his feast was honoured as a double rite, and it was celebrated with a special office. The best and most ancient copies of Venerable Bede's and Usuard's Martyrologies have no mention of this saint's festival, for this day ; although, it is inserted, in some printed editions. Ado, the Cologne Martyrology, Molanus, Miræus, Menard, James Mosander, Baronius, Franciscus Maurolycus, Constantinus Felicius, Galesinus, the Gallic Martyrology of Saussay and the Roman Martyrology have all their respective commemorations of this holy missionary among the Frisians.<sup>56</sup> At the 1st of March, the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints enters Suitbertus.<sup>57</sup> According to the Epistle of Lutger, Pope Leo III., when he visited Gaul and Germany, A.D. 803, came to Verden ; where, it is said, that having satisfied himself regarding the labours and miracles of St. Suitbert, the latter was solemnly enrolled by the Sovereign Pontiff in the list of holy Confessors.<sup>58</sup> In the year 1626, the relics of St. Swidbert, together with those of St. Willeic,<sup>59</sup> his successor, were found in a silver shrine, at Keiserswerdt. Yet, some smaller portions have been given to other churches, by an Archbishop of Cologne. These have been held in very great veneration, by the faithful, especially by those living on the borders of the Lower Rhine.

---

ARTICLE III.—ST. BAITAN, ABBOT OF CLONMACNOIS, KING'S COUNTY. [Seventh Century.] While several heroes, poets, and philosophers, are not remembered after centuries pass away, the Saints of the Church are seldom forgot-

---

<sup>52</sup> In the language of that country, Keiser means "Emperor," and Werdt, "an Island."

<sup>53</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., page 18.

<sup>54</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. v., cap. xi., p. 259.

<sup>55</sup> See Andreas de Chesne's "Historiæ Francorum Scriptores Coætanei," tomos ii. Breves Francorum Annales ab anno DCCVIII. usque ad annum DCCC. At A.D. DCCXIII., we read "Depositio Suitberti Episcopi."

<sup>56</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii i. De S. Suiberto Episcopo, sect. viii., num. 59, p. 83.

<sup>57</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomos i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

<sup>58</sup> See Surius, "De Probatis Sanctorum Historiis," tomos ii., Martius i. Epistola S. Ludgeri de S. Swiberto, cap. 9, pp. 36, 37.

<sup>59</sup> See notices of him, at the 2nd of March. ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum

ten, especially in the celebrated places associated with their commemoration. A few short notices, regarding this holy Abbot, are to be found in Father Colgan's work ;<sup>1</sup> while the Bollandists are still more brief, in their allusions to him.<sup>2</sup> Besides the name of this saint, as already given, he is variously named Boetan, Baotan, Buadan, Boedan, Baithan, Da-Buadoc, &c.<sup>3</sup> He is also called Boyhan, in the "Annals of Clonmacnoise." He is said to have belonged to the race of Hua-Cormaic ; and, he seems different<sup>4</sup> from Boedan, son of Sinell, who has the further designation of Cluain-Andobhuir.<sup>5</sup> This latter, too, was a member of the Conmaicnian family.<sup>6</sup> The present holy man appears to have been born, in some part of maritime Connemara,<sup>7</sup> in the province of Connaught. This was formerly known as Conmaicne-mhara, and subsequently it was called Irros or Erris. There was a Conmaicne or Conmacia, also, near Tuam, as likewise a Conmaicne Rein, afterwards called Muintir Eoluis. This holy man was born, probably towards the close of the sixth, or beginning of the seventh, century. He became a monk, at the celebrated monastery of Clonmacnoise. Afterwards, he governed this same house in quality of abbot,<sup>8</sup> having succeeded Ædlug, who died on the 26th of February, 651.<sup>9</sup> Our saint is also said to have discharged episcopal functions, in the Church of Clonmacnois.<sup>10</sup> He ruled over the church and monastery, at this place. Baitan, Bishop of Cluan, is mentioned in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>11</sup> as having a festival on the 1st of March, which it appears was the date for his death. Marianus O'Gorman, and his Scholiast, as also Maguire, concur in their statements. We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>12</sup> that Baotan, Mac Ua Corbmaic, Abbot of Cluain-mic-Nois, was venerated on this day. The year 660 is assigned for the death of this holy abbot, by the "Chronicon Scotorum,"<sup>13</sup> and by the "Annals of Clonmacnoise,"<sup>14</sup> but, A.D. 663, according to the Annals of Ulster,<sup>15</sup> and of the Four Masters.<sup>16</sup> Thus, he was translated to the eternal felicity of faithful souls departed, about the time indicated.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MARNAN, OR MARNOCK, BISHOP AND CONFESSOR, ABERKERDOR, SCOTLAND. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] In various Scotch Kalendars and Martyrologies, we find notices of St. Marnan, or Mernanus, a Bishop and a Confessor, whose festival has been assigned to the Kalends, or Hiberniæ," i. Martii. De S. Baitano sive Boetano, p. 437.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Baitani, n. i., p. 437.

<sup>4</sup> This is indicated by the name applied to his father, "filius Hua Cormaic ;" as, also, because the place and day, where venerated, have a corresponding diversity.

<sup>5</sup> We are told, by Colgan, that he was venerated, at the 13th of December, and for this statement, he cites St. Ængus, Marianus, and the Calendar of Cashel. However, this seems to be an incorrect quotation.

<sup>6</sup> The "Sanctilogium Genealogicum" thus weaves his pedigree: Beodan, of Cluain-andobhuir, was son to Senell, son of Natfraich, son to Fiachius, son of Alta, son to Ogaman, son of Fitchar, &c.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Marcii i. De S. Baitano sive Boetano, nn. 2, 3, p. 437.

<sup>8</sup> In filling this capacity, most of our Kalendars and Annals mention him.

<sup>9</sup> See his Acts, at the 26th of February.

<sup>10</sup> According to the Martyrology of Tallagh.

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>13</sup> At A.D. 660, we read, "Baedan Mac Ui Cormaic (whose tribe was of the Conmaicne Mara), Abbot of Cluain-muc-Nois, quievit."—W. M. Hennessy's Edition, pp. 98, 99.

<sup>14</sup> These state: "A.D. 660. Boyhan Mac Cowcormick died."

<sup>15</sup> At A.D. 663, "Baeta mc Cucormaic abbas Cluano," is mentioned. See Dr. O'Conor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv. Annales Ultonienses, p. 56.

<sup>16</sup> "The Age of Christ, 663. The seventh

1st day of March. His name has also the diminutive termination Marnoch or Marnock.<sup>1</sup> The old Breviary and Martyrology, for the use of Aberdeen Church, seem to be the chief sources for illustrating his biography. But, nowhere do we clearly find the place or date for his nativity. The Bollandists have endeavoured to throw some light on his history, and yet only with an indifferent amount of success.<sup>2</sup> That St. Marnan or Marnock was born in Ireland is sufficiently probable, although yet doubtful. According to Bishop Forbes,<sup>3</sup> he seems to be identical with St. Erneneus, the son of Crasenus, the naughty and despised child, who sought to touch the hem of St. Columba's garment at Clonmacnoise.<sup>5</sup> If so, he is thought to be the Ernin, i.e., Mernog of Rath-noi, in Ui Garchon, i.e., in Fotharta of Leinster, and of Cill-Draighnech, in Ui Drona.<sup>6</sup> The Scottish writers, Dempster and Camerarius, appear particularly to have placed the genuineness of his Acts in question, owing to their unaccountable statements, in reference to him. The latter tells us, that Marnan executed various labours in the Scottish Church.<sup>7</sup> Aidan,<sup>8</sup> King of the Scots, is said to have ruled during his period. In 593, Æthelfrith, or Ethelfrid, became King of the Northumbrians, and in 560 Ceawlin had began to reign over the West Saxons.<sup>9</sup> The latter, especially, was a renowned warrior, and he fought against the Britons, or the Picts, or the Scots. His devastations were a source of constant alarm, and soon King Aidan was obliged to appear in arms, against the Saxon united forces.<sup>10</sup> Owing to their inferior numbers, his Scots were fearful, regarding the issue of a campaign then planned; however, their courage was greatly animated, when St. Marnan, through whose advice King Aidan assumed the defensive, began to exhort the soldiers to place all their trust in the Lord of Hosts. Marnan then ordered them to make the sign of the cross on their foreheads; and when the signal for battle was given, all rushed forward to the shock of arms, loudly invoking the name and aid of our Lord Jesus Christ.<sup>11</sup> Of this great engagement, it is said, that St. Columba, then living in the Island of Hy, had a Divine intuition, and to his prayers, and to those of St. Marnan, was the result piously attributed.<sup>12</sup> The Saxons were utterly routed, and an immense slaughter of them followed. Their chiefs and men turned in flight, while Ceaulin, Cuichelm and Crida perished.<sup>13</sup> This great battle was contested, A.D. 593.<sup>14</sup> King Aidan fought, also, with Æthelfrith, who was not present in the foregoing engagement.<sup>15</sup> In 603, a terrible battle took place, year of Diarmaid and Blathmac. Baetan Mac-Ua-Cormaic, Abbot of Cluain-mic-Nois died. He was of the sept of Conmaicne-mara.—See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 274, 275.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 392.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Marnano Episcopo in Scotia, pp. 63 to 65.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 392.

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. i., cap. 3, and n. (i), pp. 25, 26.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 18th of August.

<sup>7</sup> See Camerarius, "De Scotorum Pietate," lib. iii.

<sup>8</sup> George Buchanan, who makes him the forty-ninth king of the Scots, has an account of his reign in "Rerum Scotticarum Historia," lib. v., pp. 142 to 144.

<sup>9</sup> See "The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," in "Monumenta Historica Britannica," vol. i., pp. 302, 305.

<sup>10</sup> See the account of his wars, in the Scottish Histories of Hector Boece and John Lesley. An account of Ceawlin or Ceaulin and his warlike enterprises will be found in Henry of Huntingdon's "Historiæ Anglorum," lib. ii., from A.D. 556 to 590.

<sup>11</sup> Such is the account given in Camerarius, "De Scotorum Pietate," lib. iii.

<sup>12</sup> Such is the statement, made without sufficient authority, apparently, by some Scottish writers.

<sup>13</sup> See "Chronicon ex Chronicis, ab initio Mundi usque ad annum Domini M. C. XVIII. deductum," auctore Florentio Wigornensi Monacho, A.D. D.XCIII., p. 526. "Monumenta Historica Britannica," vol. i.

<sup>14</sup> See Fabii Ethelewerdi "Chronicorum, ab Urbe Condito, scilicet, adusque A.D. DCCCC.LXXV." Libri Quatuor, lib. i. Ibid., p. 504.

at Degsastan, or Degsa Lapis,<sup>16</sup> which ended in the utter overthrow of Aidan, with a great loss to his army.<sup>17</sup> The death of this celebrated Scottish King soon afterwards followed. St. Marnan is said to have survived him for many years, and when his son, Eugenius IV., succeeded to the throne,<sup>18</sup> he was advised by that Christian prelate to treat even the Pagan Angles coming into Scotland, with consideration and favour. So were their minds gradually prepared, for a future reception of the Divine truths of religion.<sup>19</sup> There is a tradition, that St. Marnock retired to do penance, where, in a small field, called Ard Marnock, near the sea, and about three miles south from Kilfinan Church, the foundation and part of a chapel wall, surrounded by a churchyard, may be seen.<sup>20</sup> The holy Marnan was an assiduous preacher of the Gospel.<sup>21</sup> With continuous care and solicitude for the poor, this holy bishop spent his life in the subjugation of his body to the yoke of severe discipline, avoiding honours, and worldly ambition or comforts.<sup>22</sup> At length, borne down by age and infirmity, Marnan resigned his spirit to the Lord, and in that place, which had been chiefly blessed through his zeal and charity. We are informed, that he died in the province of Annandia, and in a place called Abirkerdoure, Aberkerdor,<sup>23</sup> or Aberkerdour, on the beautiful River Duverne, not far from Anglia. There, too, his remains were entombed. It is stated, that pilgrimages were frequently made to his shrine. It is generally thought, that St. Marnan lived to A.D. 625,<sup>24</sup> or thereabouts; while other writers prolong his period to the reign of King Indulph, who flourished in the tenth century.<sup>25</sup> This latter statement is on the authority of Adam King's Kalendar. Dempster tells us,<sup>26</sup> that Marnan flourished A.D. 962, and that he wrote many tracts,<sup>27</sup> which we may well doubt. The head of St. Marnan<sup>28</sup> is said to have been preserved in Murray, where the Innes family and tribe had an especial veneration for the holy relic, which was frequently borne in solemn procession, to procure from God the favour of good weather. The coffin and head of St. Marnan were used on certain occasions, for persons to make solemn asseverations before;<sup>29</sup> and a special Mass of St. Marnock

<sup>15</sup> Yet, such a statement has been made by Camerarius.

<sup>16</sup> This place, formerly so noted, is not now known. It is thought, however, to be Dalston, near Carlisle, or Dawston, near Jedborough.

<sup>17</sup> Thenceforward to the time of Venerable Bede, no king over the Scots in Britain durst invade the Anglo-Saxons. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. xxxiv.

<sup>18</sup> This happened A.D. 605, according to George Buchanan, "Rerum Scoticarum Historia," lib. v., p. 144.

<sup>19</sup> See Camerarius, "De Scotorum Pietate," lib. iii. This author professes to draw his account of St. Marnan, from the Chronicles of Scone, from the Aberdeen Breviary, and from Adam King's Kalendar.

<sup>20</sup> "About 300 yards above this chapel, on an eminence, a cell and part of another appears in the end of a pile of stones or borradh."—"Old Statistical Survey of Scotland," vol. xiv., p. 258.

<sup>21</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," p. 392. We are told, also, that men honoured him "tanquam Deum in terris."

<sup>22</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Sessions MDCCCLIV—V.—MDCCCLVI—VII., p. 261.

<sup>23</sup> The Martyrology of Aberdeen states "diem ibidem clausit extremum."

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," p. 392.

<sup>25</sup> See George Buchanan's "Rerum Scoticarum Historia," lib. vi., pp. 165, 166.

<sup>26</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 852, p. 454.

<sup>27</sup> Among the titles of these, he tells us, are "Pro Fædere servando," lib. i., and, "Monitorium ad Ecclesias patrias," lib. i. He also incorrectly places the festival of this saint, at the 2nd of March.

<sup>28</sup> In reference to it and to his remains, the Aberdeen Martyrology states, that as a sweet-smelling balsam, these brought each day joy and health to all the people of the province, where they had been kept. See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Sessions MDCCCLIV—V.—MDCCCLVI—VII., p. 261.

<sup>29</sup> This appears from a Perambulation of the lands of the Church of Aber-Keyrdor, called Yochry and Achbrady. See "Registrum Nigrum de Aberbrothock," p. 277.

was celebrated on the day of his feast.<sup>30</sup> The clergy and people were accustomed each Sunday, to have lights placed around the head, which was washed with water. This again was used by the infirm and sick, who deemed it an effective restorative. Some remarkable instances are adduced, in the Breviary of Aberdeen, of miracles wrought, through the intervention of St. Marnan. Certain persons, who had plundered the lands of Abirkerdoure Church, were unable to light the tapers, held in their hands. A chief, who wished to carry off a tree from Lochellis Church lands, in the diocese of Aberdeen, could not remove it beyond the bounds, but the clergy very readily carried it back.<sup>31</sup> The Kalendar of Arbuthnott notes St. Marnoc, Bishop, with an office of nine Lessons, at the 1st of March.<sup>32</sup> The Martyrology, compiled for the use of the church at Aberdeen,<sup>33</sup> has the festival of St. Marnan, Bishop and Confessor, at Aberkerdor, of Moray, in Scotia, on the Kalends of March.<sup>34</sup> In Adam King's Kalendar, "St. Marnane, bisch. and confess. in Scotland vnder King indulphe," is noticed, at the 1st of March.<sup>35</sup> The Breviary of Aberdeen has an Office and Lessons for St. Marnan's festival, at this date. In it, he is regarded as a Bishop and Confessor.<sup>36</sup> The Kalendar of David Camerarius enters the feast of St. Marnanus, Bishop and Confessor, at the 1st of March.<sup>37</sup> The parish of Aberchirder, in the presbytery of Strathbogie, is called St. Marnoch. Near the manse is a well, called after him. Here, too, on the 2nd Tuesday of March, is held Marnoch fair.<sup>38</sup> The parish of Kilmarnock, Ayrshire; <sup>39</sup> Leochel; <sup>40</sup> Foulis-Easter; <sup>41</sup> Dalmarnock, at Little Dunkeld; <sup>42</sup> Inchmarnock, a suppressed parish, now united to Glentaner and Aboyne; <sup>43</sup> Both Chapelary; <sup>44</sup> Inchmarnock, on the Isle of Bute; <sup>45</sup> all were places where his memory had been formerly celebrated. Among the Scone Charters, there is mention of a gift to the convent, attached to St. Mernoc's Chapel, "infra Fossata," as also allusion to St. Mernock's croft, with the chapel-yard and chapel of St. Mernock.<sup>46</sup> At Benholm, there is a St. Marny's Well.<sup>47</sup> There is a Portmarnock <sup>48</sup> townland and parish, in the barony of Coolock, county of Dublin; <sup>49</sup> but, whether its name has been derived from the present saint, or from another bearing a similar name, may be questioned.

---

ARTICLE V.—ST. MOINEND OR MAOINEANN, BISHOP OF CLONFERT, COUNTY OF GALWAY. [Sixth Century.] Doubts have been entertained,<sup>1</sup> that the present holy man, called Moen, Moena, Maoinneann, Mainneann, <sup>30</sup> See "Registrum Episcopatus Brechinensis," p. 12.

<sup>31</sup> "Breviarium Aberdonense," Pars Hymnalis, fol. lx., b. lxi.

<sup>32</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 97.

<sup>33</sup> Communicated by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A., Scot.

<sup>34</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Sessions MDCCCLIV—V.—MDCCCLVI—VII., p. 261.

<sup>35</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 146.

<sup>36</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. De S. Marnano Episcopo in Scotia, num. i., p. 63.

<sup>37</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 235.

<sup>38</sup> See "New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Banff, pp. 382, 386.

<sup>39</sup> See ibid., Ayr, p. 535.

<sup>40</sup> As related in the legend.

<sup>41</sup> See "Registrum Prioratus S. Andree," p. 348.

<sup>42</sup> See "Old Statistical Survey of Scotland," vol. vi., p. 381.

<sup>43</sup> See ibid., vol. xix., p. 296.

<sup>44</sup> See "Registrum Episcopatus Brechinensis," pp. 12, 14.

<sup>45</sup> See "New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Bute, pp. 96, 104.

<sup>46</sup> See "Liber Ecclesie de Scon," pp. 186, 231.

<sup>47</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 392, 393.

<sup>48</sup> Rendered St. Mernoc's Port or landing-place.

<sup>49</sup> The townland is shown on Sheet 15, and the parish on Sheets 12, 14, 15, "Ordinance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin."

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ec-

Moeneann, Moennenn, Moenu, Moenen, Moinend, and as in Scotland Minnan, Monan or Monanus,<sup>2</sup> may not be different from the saint, whom we have already noticed, at the 26th of February. So far as he had been able to build upon conjecture and inference, the Life of this bishop is published by Colgan, at the 1st of March,<sup>3</sup> and it is drawn from many sources. The Bollandists merely notice him,<sup>4</sup> and cautiously avoid entering upon particulars already given; nor, is it known, that any special Acts are available, to throw light on his history. Mo, which signifies "my," is prefixed very frequently to the proper names of Irish Saints, out of respect and tenderness. Removing this prefix, the original and true name probably was Nennius or Nennio. But, it being common with the Irish to add the monosyllable, the name in spelling has been considerably metamorphosed. Mo-Nennius and Mon-Nennio, too, are held to have been other forms.<sup>5</sup> In the opinion of Dr. Lanigan,<sup>6</sup> this Monennus, venerated at the 1st of March, was undoubtedly the same person as Nennio, who had been abbot and bishop over what was called the great monastery in Britain. This, which was known as Rosnat, is thought to be a sufficiently probable conjecture, by Colgan; and, therefore, our saint might be regarded as teacher of the most celebrated among our Irish Saints. Again, he is thought to have been a companion of St. Brendan,<sup>7</sup> the Navigator, by whom he was installed as Bishop of Clonfert.<sup>8</sup> Following Dr. Lanigan's hypothesis, the present holy man should have been the teacher of St. Tighearnach,<sup>9</sup> Bishop of Clones, of St. Eugene,<sup>10</sup> Bishop of Ardstraw, of St. Carpreus or Carbrei,<sup>11</sup> and of St. Ændæus of Aran.<sup>12</sup> Likewise, Cailan or Mochai,<sup>13</sup> of Nendrum, is said to have sent Finnian of Maghbile,<sup>14</sup> to Nennius or Monenius.<sup>15</sup> But, even the foregoing should not close the list of his celebrated disciples. Another supposition has confounded the present St. Moinend, with the St. Mannan, to whom allusion has been already made, at the 23rd of February, and who has been thought identical with a St. Monan, called Archdeacon of St. Andrew's Church, in Scotland. He is said to have preached the Word of God, in the country about Fife. By some of the Scottish writers, he is also called Mynnanus. The Bollandists have the Acts of this St. Monon, Archdeacon, taken from the Aberdeen Breviary,<sup>16</sup> at the 1st of March.<sup>17</sup> The legend relates, that he and several companions came from Hungary<sup>18</sup>—certain Scottish writers think them rather to have been clesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. vii., n. 116, p. 36.

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 412, 413.

<sup>3</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Martii. Vita S. Moinenni, sive Mon-Nennii, pp. 437 to 439.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 3.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. De S. Moinenno sive Mon-Nennio, Episcopo Cluanfertensi, p. 437, and n. 1, 439.

<sup>6</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. ii., n. 17, p. 437.

<sup>7</sup> His feast occurs, at the 16th of May.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. De S. Moinenno sive Mon-Nennio, Episcopo Cluanfertensi, pp. 436, 437.

<sup>9</sup> His feast is held, on the 4th of April.

<sup>10</sup> His festival occurs, at the 23rd of August.

<sup>11</sup> Probably Bishop of Culrain, whose feast takes place on the 11th of November; or perhaps St. Cairbre, Bishop of Magh Bile, venerated on the 3rd; or St. Coirpre, Abbot of Magh Bile, venerated on the 31st of May.

<sup>12</sup> His feast is celebrated, on the 21st of March.

<sup>13</sup> His feast occurs, at the 23rd of June.

<sup>14</sup> His festival is referred to the 10th of September.

<sup>15</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia Ecclesiarum Britannicarum," p. 954.

<sup>16</sup> First printed, A.D. MDIX., at the expense of Walter Chepman, a citizen of Edinburgh.

<sup>17</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," Martii i. De S. Monano Archidiacono Andreopoleos in Scotia, tomus i., pp. 86 to 88.

<sup>18</sup> The Bollandists discredit this statement, however, by showing, that in the ninth century, the period assumed for their arrival, the Hungarians were not Christians. The Chuni or Avars were then in possession of Hungary, and Pagans. See ibid. Commentarius prævius, num. 1, p. 86.

Scots or Angles<sup>19</sup>—and suffered martyrdom, in the ninth century, at the hands of the Danes.<sup>20</sup> St. Monon is said to have flourished during the reign of Kenneth, King of Scotland. This holy man's tomb was at Inverny in Fife,<sup>21</sup> where many miracles were wrought, in favour of sick and afflicted persons. Pilgrimages to his shrine were also very frequently made, during the middle ages, as we learn from the five Lessons of St. Monon's Office, contained in the old Breviary of Aberdeen, at this day. The mother of a family, furious and possessed by devils, had these cast out through the prayer of St. Monan, and though left half dead, yet was she immediately restored to health. For many years after his translation to heaven, a little chapel contained his relics. Being struck by an iron-barbed arrow from a catapult, King David II.<sup>22</sup> of Scotland failed to get relief from surgeons; but, by commending himself to the protection of St. Monan, the barbed arrow came out of its own accord, not even leaving a scar. This incident and other miracles caused the king to restore and found the Chapel of St. Monon, on the 3rd of April, and in the fortieth year of his reign. A hermit was attached to its service, and lands were granted for its support.<sup>23</sup> St. Monan's was the chief seat for the cultus of this holy man, and it is now joined to the parish of Abercromby in Fife,<sup>24</sup> where there is a fine church, standing picturesquely on the shore.<sup>25</sup> His chapel in the Aberdeen Martyrology is called Invere. There is a burn anciently called Inweary, on the west of the parish. There is a chapel of St. Monanis, in the parish of Kilteam, in Ross.<sup>26</sup> Minnan's fair is held at the old chapel, at Freswick, in Caithness, on the 2nd of May (? March), a day later than the feast.<sup>27</sup> There is also a Kilminning farm and rock in the parish of Crail.<sup>28</sup> The Kalendar of Drummond, at the Kalends, or 1st of March, commemorates St. David, Archbishop of Britain, and amongst the Irish, it states, that the holy Bishops and Confessors, Senan and Moynenn, went to heaven.<sup>29</sup> In the Martyrology, printed at Cologne, A.D. 1490, St. Monan, Confessor, is entered, at this date; likewise, in Hermann Greuen's additions to Usuard,<sup>30</sup> we read, in Scotland, Monan, Levite and Confessor, for this day; a manuscript copy of Florarius, however, places him in Anglia, as a Bishop and Confessor, at this date.<sup>31</sup> In the Kalendar of Hyrdmanistoun, there is an entry of St. Monan's feast, at the 1st of March. He is

<sup>19</sup> See Hector Boece, "Scotorum Hystoriae," lib. x., p. ccvi.

<sup>20</sup> The Bollandists suggest, that as the northern pirates at this time carried on wars with the Gauls and Belgians, who were Christians, these martyrs might be considered, as coming from Belgium or Gaul, to take refuge in Scotland; or, rather, they think it more probable, that they may have been missionaries, newly arrived from Hibernia, to spread the Gospel among the Picts. See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii i. De S. Monano Archidiacono Andreopoleos in Scotia. Commentarius prævius, num. 2, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>21</sup> According to the old Breviary of Aberdeen; yet, in the Martyrology of Aberdeen, the place is called "Inuere in Fyfe." Thither, "fama sanctitas Monam tam de vrbibus quam de agris vulgus innumerabile tam validorum quam languidorum ad benefica Monani consequenda continue confluit." — "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Sessions MDCCCLIV—V.—MDCCCLVI—VII. Communicated by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A.,

Scot., p. 261.

<sup>22</sup> He reigned from A.D. 1329 to 1370. See George Buchanan's account of the stirring events during his time in "Rerum Scoticarum Historia," lib. ix., pp. 262 to 285.

<sup>23</sup> See Spottiswoode's Religious Houses, in Keith's "Scottish Bishops," p. 445. Russel edition.

<sup>24</sup> See "New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Fife, pp. 337, 350.

<sup>25</sup> See "Old Statistical Survey of Scotland," vol. ix., p. 334.

<sup>26</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," vol. ii., part ii., p. 478.

<sup>27</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 413.

<sup>28</sup> See "New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Fife, p. 944.

<sup>29</sup> See "Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 6.

<sup>30</sup> Edited A.D. 1515 and 1521.

<sup>31</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii i. De S. Monano Archidiacono Andreopoleos in Scotia, num. 4, p. 87.

noted as a Confessor, who had an Office, comprising nine Lessons.<sup>32</sup> The Kalendar De Nova Farina, has Monan, Abbot, at the same date.<sup>33</sup> The Kalendar of Arbuthnott notes St. Monan, a Confessor, with an Office of nine Lessons.<sup>34</sup> The Kalendar of the Aberdeen Breviary, at the 1st of March, has the festival of St. Monan, of St. Marnan, Bishop, and of St. David, Bishop, with offices respectively of nine Lessons.<sup>35</sup> In the Martyrology<sup>36</sup> for the use of the Church of Aberdeen,<sup>37</sup> St. Monan is noticed as a Confessor, in Scotia, at this date.<sup>38</sup> But, from what has been already stated, as also in that which follows, it must be extremely difficult to reconcile conflicting accounts respecting him. In Adam King's Kalendar, "St. Mynnane, archdeacon and confess. in Scotland vnder king constantine ye 2,"<sup>39</sup> is entered, at the 1st of March.<sup>40</sup> Dempster has Minnan, Archdeacon, in his "Menologium Scoticum," at the same date.<sup>41</sup> Most unaccountably, this writer elsewhere distinguishes between a St. Monan and a St. Minnan, making both archdeacons, however, and the authors of books. Thus, he states, St. Monan composed "Epistolæ ad Diversos," lib. i., and "Carmina Sacra," lib. i., and that he suffered martyrdom,<sup>42</sup> with St. Adrian, and his companions.<sup>43</sup> The reader is referred to another volume of this work, for further details of their passion.<sup>44</sup> At the 1st of March, Camerarius has the feast of St. Monan, Martyr. He officiated in the province of Fife, and in the country adjoining the Island, Maia. He was celebrated for his miracles.<sup>45</sup> At the 1st of March, Dempster has an account of a St. Minnanus, who is called an archdeacon, and who had a great reputation for piety and learning. He is said, to have been a great favourite of King Kenneth, and after his death, Minnan retired from the Court of Donald V., being disgusted with his luxurious habits of living. He is stated, to have written, "De Legitima Pictici Regni cum Scotico Unione," lib. i., "Apologiam pro Rege," lib. i. The Church of Kilminnan in Gallovidua was dedicated to him. According to the Scottish Breviary, he was venerated on this day, and he lived, A.D. 878.<sup>46</sup> Now, it seems difficult beyond measure, to identify the foregoing Minnan or Monon, with Moinend or Maoineann, said to have been a bishop over the see of Clonfert. St. Ængus, the Culdee, has a notice of this latter saint.<sup>47</sup> On the 1st of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>48</sup> also mentions Moinend, Bishop, but without indicating his see. Alluding to the holy man recorded at this date, Marianus O'Gorman calls him "the fair, tall, smooth Moenend."<sup>49</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>50</sup> on this day, records Maoineann, Bishop of Cluain-ferta Brenainn. This place is now known as Clonfert, near the River Shannon, in the barony of Longford, and county of Galway. St. Brendan

<sup>32</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 37.

<sup>33</sup> See ibid., p. 69.

<sup>34</sup> See ibid., p. 97.

<sup>35</sup> See ibid., p. 113.

<sup>36</sup> From a Manuscript of the sixteenth century.

<sup>37</sup> Communicated by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A., Scot.

<sup>38</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Sessions MDCCLIV—V. —MDCCLVI—VII., p. 261.

<sup>39</sup> According to George Buchanan, King Constantine II. reigned from A.D. 858 to 874. See "Rerum Scotticarum Historia," lib. v., pp. 158, 159.

<sup>40</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 146.

<sup>41</sup> See ibid., p. 193.

<sup>42</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 834, p. 451.

<sup>43</sup> Their festival is usually assigned to the 4th of March.

<sup>44</sup> See vol. ii., Twenty-Third day of February, Article iv., Saints Mannan and Tiaan, of Aredh-Suird, or Airiudh h-Uird.

<sup>45</sup> See Scottish Entries in the Kalendar of David Camerarius. Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 235.

<sup>46</sup> See Dempster's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 851, p. 453.

<sup>47</sup> A note on Moinend, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus thus runs: εππος οαυρ κομωβα κλυανα φερτα βρεναινο, i.e., "Bishop and Coarb of Cluain-Ferta of Brenaind."

founded a great monastery here, in the middle of the sixth century.<sup>51</sup> The present saint is thought to have been a companion of St. Brendan, during the seven years of his trans-Atlantic voyage ; and to have afterwards lived under this holy abbot's rule, at Clonfert. But, indeed, historic notices have been so obscure regarding him, that little of a definite character can be gleaned for his Acts. The ancient building at Clonfert had been remodelled, at various periods, and it is now used for the Protestant episcopal parish church. It consisted of nave, chancel and transepts. The chancel, supposed to be the oldest part of the building, is 27½ feet long, by 22 feet in breadth ; while the nave measures 54 feet in length, and 27 feet 6 inches in breadth, clear of the walls. The south wall of the nave is about 14 or 15 feet high, and 2 feet 6 inches in thickness, while the chancel wall only measures 2 feet in depth.

The gables are highly pitched, yet so covered with thick ivy, that there is no way of seeing what was the nature of the roof. The masonry of this building is in irregular courses of rough sandstone, laid in rough mortar, without ashlar work.<sup>52</sup> The doorway of sandstone deserves a particular study.<sup>53</sup> Two outer pilasters support a high pitched pediment : the doorway proper is deeply recessed, in six jamb-shafts and piers, on either side, surrounded by capitals. From these springs a beautiful columnar rounded arch, with a row of bosses, all varied in pattern.

Doorway of Clonfert Church, County Galway.

The most quaint and elaborate carving appears on all the stones of which it is composed ; and, an amazing variety of ornament, showing a marvellous fertility of invention,<sup>54</sup> is manifested in a work, which has hitherto so well

<sup>46</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>49</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 412.

<sup>50</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>51</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 278.

<sup>52</sup> See "Notes on Irish Architecture."

By Edwin, third Earl of Dunraven, edited by Margaret Stokes, vol. ii., p. 106.

<sup>53</sup> Two fine autotypes accompany the letter-press of the noble work, to which allusion has been made in the previous note. The accompanying illustration of the doorway has been copied therefrom by the writer, with kind permission of Miss Stokes. It has stood the ravages of time. Colgan would fain make St. Moinend or Monennus the same as Moena, who died Bishop of Clonfert, in the year 570, or 571. But, Dr. Lanigan asks, how could a man, who had been a bishop in Britain, before Tigernach became one in 506, be supposed to have lived to so late a period? Besides, as he remarks, the names are plainly different.<sup>55</sup> To wind up the uncertain accounts regarding him, we have only to state, the Annals of the Four Masters, at A.D. 570, mention, that St. Maeineann, Bishop of Cluain-fearta-Breanainn, died on the 1st of March.<sup>56</sup> Tigernach,<sup>57</sup> and the Annalists of Ulster, assign his death to A.D. 571.<sup>58</sup> The foregoing account must mean, our saint was either a bishop assistant, or a bishop designate, of St. Brendan's foundation, as the death of the founder is, by the Annals of Ulster,<sup>59</sup> and of the Four Masters, assigned to A.D. 576.<sup>60</sup> Yet, we heartily wish, the foregoing notices should be more critically examined, by future writers.

ARTICLE VI.—OBITUARY FESTIVAL OF ST. SENAN, ABBOT OF SCATTERY ISLAND, COUNTY OF CLARE. [Sixth Century.] One of the most renowned among our old saints was St. Senan, Abbot of Iniscathaigh. At this date, as noticed by Colgan<sup>1</sup> and by the Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> his death occurred; although, his chief festival is set down, at the 8th of March, where his Life will be found written more at length. The old metrical Acts, published by Colgan, allude to the coincidence of his departure on St. David's day; and, with the illustrious prelate of Menevia, he was bound in a special spiritual friendship. Senan, Bishop, is the only mention made of him, in the Martyrology of Tal-lagh,<sup>3</sup> at this date. At the Kalends of March, the Calendar of Cashel places the death of St. Senan. Marianus O'Gorman, and Maguire have his festival, also, at the present date. It is stated to be that day, when his departure from life first took place; but, that, through a singular dispensation of Divine Providence, he was again revived, and that on the eighth day subsequent, Senan was finally summoned away to heaven. The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>4</sup> mentions on this day Senan, of Inis Cathaigh.<sup>5</sup> In the table affixed, this saint's name has been Latinized, Priscianus.<sup>6</sup> Under the head of Inis Cathaigh, Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Senan, Bishop, from Inis-Cathaigh, at March 1st.<sup>7</sup> There is another feast to Senán, on the 8th of March; but, this present been drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>54</sup> In Richard Rolt Brash's "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," there is a minute and critical detailed description of the workmanship, at p. 42.

<sup>55</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap ix., sect. ii., n. 17, p. 437.

<sup>56</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 206, 207.

<sup>57</sup> According to the MS. copy, in Irish and English, which is to be found in the handwriting of Brannan, the Irish Scribe of Charles O'Connor, of Belanagare, fol. 22, 23. R.I.A.

<sup>58</sup> See Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus ii. Tigernaci Annales, p. 151. The Annales Ultonienses state "Moena Eps Cluana ferta Brenain [Moena Episcopus Cluana ferta Brendani, i.e., Episcopus civitatis Cluanfert] quievit." —Ibid., tomus iv., p. 26.

<sup>59</sup> See ibid., p. 28.

<sup>60</sup> See ibid., pp. 208, 209.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii i. De S. Senano Episcopo, p. 440.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 4.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>5</sup> "Aut de Insula Gatag," state the Bollandists, at this date.

<sup>6</sup> See, "The Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 464, 465. Dr. Todd here remarks: "The Irish word Sean signifies antiquus, priscus."

<sup>7</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 114, 115.

<sup>8</sup> Dr. Todd in a note adds, at the word Aenghus: "Or rather, according to the one is the commemoration of his death, as the O'Clerys inexactly state, according to Aenghus.<sup>8</sup> The same thing is understood, from the Life of Senán, where it treats about his death.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. CASSAN, CASYN, OR CASSAIN, SON OF NEMAN. [Sixth Century.] A brief notice of this holy man is given, by the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> who remark on Colgan having omitted all mention of him, at this day, although assigning his festival to it. This supposes him to be identical with a holy man, who must have flourished, so early as the sixth century. He is alluded to as Casyn, in the Acts<sup>2</sup> of St. Brigid,<sup>3</sup> Abbess of Kildare. To illustrate his pedigree, Colgan cites the twenty-second chapter of the "Sanctilogic Genealogy."<sup>4</sup> St. Finian of Clonard<sup>5</sup> met St. Cassan, the son of Neman, in the country of Fortcherten. The latter greatly rejoiced at his approach; while he subjected himself and his church to Finian. The name Cassan mac Neman, without any further designation, occurs in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>6</sup> at the 1st of March. At this date, also, Marianus O'Gorman commemorates him. Again, on this day was venerated, according to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> Caissin, son of Nemán. There was a Caisin of the Dal Buain, adds the compiler, who belonged to the race of Eochaidh, son to Muiredh, and who sprung from the posterity of Heremon.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. ENAN MAC NISSI, BISHOP. The Bollandists record a St. Macnissius or Maonissius, at this date, relying on the Irish Martyrologists, although acknowledging, that otherwise he was unknown.<sup>1</sup> The name Enan, without any other title, is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> at the 1st of March; but, it would seem Macnisi, with its adjunct, bishop, ought to be placed in conjunction with the first name. Marianus O'Gorman, likewise, notices him. According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day was venerated Enán, Mac Nissi.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. NON, NONNA, NONNITA OR MELARI, MOTHER OF ST. DAVID, ARCHBISHOP OF MENEVIA, WALES. [Fifth Century.] In a manuscript copy of Florarius, the pious mother of St. David,<sup>1</sup> Archbishop of Menevia, in Wales, is entered as St. Nonnita, Martyr, at this date. But, the Bollandists assert, that elsewhere, she is not found among the lists of saints, neither does it appear, that her life was crowned by martyrdom.<sup>2</sup> The illustrious David's mother, Non, or Nonnita, by name, is usually designated a nun. But, in the oldest and most consistent Life of St. David, and also in the Life given by Colgan, she is spoken of as a beautiful girl, whom the chieftain of Ceretica, Xantus, met as he journeyed into Demetia, Scholiast on Aengus, whose words are, "obitus est in hoc die."

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints," p. 3.

<sup>2</sup> See the Bollandist Collection, at the 1st of February, sect. xiii., num. 105, p. 116.

<sup>3</sup> See her Life, at the 1st of February.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Februarii. Vita S. Finniani seu Finneni Abbatis de Cluain-Eraird, n. 20, p. 398.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 12th of December.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints," p. 3.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>4</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd here says: "The Mart. Taml. distinguishes Enán and Mac Nissi, but M. O'Gorman, as explained by the gloss, makes them one and the same."

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, already given, at this date.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 3.

and of whom he became passionately enamoured.<sup>3</sup> She is said to have been daughter to Bracan or Breccan, an Irish prince, who settled in Wales, and who died A.D. 450. Whether she was born there or in Ireland seems a matter open to question. In the Shire of Cornwall, and in the union of Camelford, and hundred of Lesnewth, lies the parish of Tintagel.<sup>4</sup> This is said to have been the stronghold and birthplace of the famous King Arthur, to whom St. David was so closely related. Adjoining it, on the east side, is the wide parish of Alternun, where, tradition tells us, his mother abode, and where her well remains to this day.<sup>5</sup> The particulars of her life, so far as known to us, have been already embodied in the Acts of St. David, which precede. She lived a most holy and austere life, as the Acts of her celebrated son indicate.<sup>6</sup> Non seems to have been a woman of great Christian zeal. There are four religious edifices in Wales dedicated to her memory, all of which, like her church in Cornwall, are situated in the immediate neighbourhood of churches ascribed to her renowned son.<sup>7</sup>

ARTICLE X.—BANFOTA. According to the published Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> veneration was given, at the 1st of March, to Banfota. To us, this entry is simply unintelligible.

ARTICLE XI.—ST. COLUMBA OR COLUM, OF CEANN GARADH, NOW KIN-GARTH, IN BUTE, SCOTLAND. We find the name of this saint entered, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 1st of March. Marianus O'Gorman has a notice of him, likewise, as the Bollandists observe,<sup>2</sup> placing him among the pretermitted Saints. Colum, of Ceann Garadh, is mentioned in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having a festival at this date. When he flourished does not appear, from the Annals of the Four Masters.

ARTICLE XII.—ST. SARAN, BISHOP. At the 17th of February, when treating about the saints, buried at Trim, Colgan alluded to a St. Saran, venerated at the 1st and 10th of March;<sup>1</sup> but, at either day, he has taken no further notice of them. The Bollandists merely notice St. Saran, a bishop, at the 1st of March, and point out such omission.<sup>2</sup> We find an entry, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> at the 1st of March, relating to St. Saran, a bishop. The festival of Sarán, Bishop, is registered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> on this day. More we cannot state, in reference to him.

ARTICLE XIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. FERGAN, ABBOT. The MS. in T.C.D., classed B. 1. 1., contains in its Calendar list, at March 1st, Sancti Fergana Abbatis, ix., Lect. This was formerly the Antiphonarium of

<sup>3</sup> See Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," No. v., S. David.

<sup>4</sup> See an account of it, in Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. iv., pp. 362, 363.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," No. v., S. David.

<sup>6</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Vita S. Davidis, ex MS. Ultrajectino, cap. i., num. 2, 3, pp. 41, 42.

<sup>7</sup> See Rev. John Adams' "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," No. v., S. David.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly,

p. xvii.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i., p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Februarii, p. 367.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii i. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

the Culdees, at the Metropolitan Church of Armagh. As will be seen, at the ensuing day, St. Fergna, Britt, Bishop and Abbot of Iona, is then venerated, and perhaps the present notice may, likewise, have reference to him.

ARTICLE XIV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. CEDDE. In the “Scottish Kalendar,” is entered Cedde, at the 1st of March.<sup>1</sup> We think, however, this must be a mistake for the 2nd of this month.

Second Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. CEDDA OR CHAD, BISHOP OF LICHFIELD, AND APOSTLE OF THE MERCIANS.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

CHAPTER I.

ST. CEADDA'S OR CHAD'S ACTS—HIS FAMILY AND BIRTH—HIS EARLY EDUCATION IN LINDISFARNE AND IN IRELAND—HE IS PLACED OVER LESTINGAN MONASTERY—OWEN OR OWINI BECOMES HIS DISCIPLE—THE LEGEND OF ST. CHAD, KING WULFERE AND HIS FAMILY.

THE chiefest and most reliable accounts, we find, regarding this holy bishop, are taken from Venerable Bede.<sup>1</sup> Since his time, others have treated concerning him; as, for example, John Capgrave,<sup>2</sup> Dempster,<sup>3</sup> Dean Cressy.<sup>4</sup> At the 2nd day of March, Colgan introduces Acts of this saint. These are chiefly taken from Venerable Bede, and Colgan has added notes of his own to illustrate the memoir.<sup>5</sup> The Bollandists also have inserted his Acts.<sup>6</sup> Adrien Baillet,<sup>7</sup> Bishop Challenor,<sup>8</sup> Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>9</sup> Rohrbacher,<sup>10</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould<sup>11</sup> have their respective notices of this renowned saint. A metrical Life of St. Chad, attributed to Robert of Gloucester, is likewise extant; and, among the Bodleian MSS., there is an Anglo-Saxon homily for St. Chad's day, written in the Middle-Englian dialect, which stretched from Lichfield to Peterborough.

Ceaddanus, who is also called St. Chad, Cedd, or Cedda—and by the

<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 249.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> See “Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum,” lib. iii., cap. xxiii., xxviii., lib. iv., cap. iii., pp. 197, 206, 211 to 214. Edition in “Monumenta Historica Britannica.”

<sup>2</sup> See “Nova Legenda Angliæ.”

<sup>3</sup> This writer classes him among the Scottish Saints.

<sup>4</sup> See “Church-History of Brittany,” book xvi., chap. xii., p. 393, and book xvii., chap. ii., viii., ix., pp. 410, 416 to 418.

<sup>5</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” ii. Martii. Vita S. Cedde, Episcopo Lickfeldiensi, pp. 444 to 447.

<sup>6</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ceadda Episcopo Merciorum et Lindisfarorum, Lichfeldiæ in Anglia, pp. 143 to 148. The Acts of St. Chad are preceded by a historic commentary of two sections and twelve paragraphs.

<sup>7</sup> See Baillet's “Vies des Saints,” tome i., at the Second of March, the Life of St. Ceaddé, pronounced Cedde, Bishop of Lichfield, pp. 20 to 23.

<sup>8</sup> See “Britannia Sancta,” part i., pp. 147 to 151.

<sup>9</sup> See “Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints,” vol. iii., March ii.

<sup>10</sup> See “Vies des Saints pour tous les jours de l'année,” tome ii., p. 11.

<sup>11</sup> See “Lives of the Saints,” vol. iii., March ii., pp. 23 to 37.

Irish, Ceaddan, or Ceaddain<sup>12</sup>—was brother to that Apostolic Prelate, St. Cedd,<sup>13</sup> or Chad, who was Apostle and Bishop of the East Saxons, and also, it has been stated, Bishop of London. The two holy priests, St. Ceulin and St. Cymbill, were his brothers.<sup>14</sup> They were natives of Northumbria, as has been generally supposed. It is remarkable, that often in Saxon, as in the Celtic, families, we find two brothers or two sisters, bearing the same name.<sup>15</sup> Probably, from the order in which they are mentioned, by Venerable Bede, we should consider the present holy man, as junior among the four brothers. The date A.D. 620 has been suggested, as the probable time of this St. Chad's birth.<sup>16</sup> His early ecclesiastical education<sup>17</sup> was received from the great St. Aidan,<sup>18</sup> in his monastery of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island. Here he probably enjoyed the companionship of his brother Cedd or Chad. Thence, for his greater improvement in sacred letters and Divine contemplation, St. Chad, it is said, passed into Ireland. This adventure is thought to have taken place, after the death of St. Aidan;<sup>19</sup> but, we have no sufficient warrant for such assumption, as the narrative, in Venerable Bede, and on which nearly all subsequent writers rest their statements, is obscure and equivocal, in reference to his having lived in our island, for any length of time.<sup>20</sup> This resort to Ireland for a studious purpose, however, according to the practice prevailing among a great many distinguished English-Saxons, was common enough in those days. He contracted a close friendship and companionship with St. Egbert.<sup>21</sup> Whether Chad became a priest in Ireland or in England, we have no means left for knowing. However, we may infer, from Venerable Bede's narrative, that a mutual friendship prevailed in their youth, between Egbert and himself, while both were engaged in the monastic profession.

The elder St. Chad, as we have already seen, had founded a monastery at Lestingan, Lestinga or Laestingaeu, which he left occasionally, to prosecute his missionary work among the East Saxons. It was situated near Streanaeshalch, but much doubt seems to exist, regarding its actual position.<sup>22</sup> We are told, however, that it stood, just on the edge of that wide expanse of moorland, which extends thirty miles inland from the coast of Yorkshire.<sup>23</sup> The younger Chad was desired to take care of this new establishment,<sup>24</sup> when his brother was obliged to minister among the East Saxons. We are told, that St. Chad was then living in Ireland; and, if we credit some accounts, he returned from that country, only when the death of the elder St. Chad took place, in the year 664.<sup>25</sup> His office, for about six years, was

<sup>12</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii., n. 1, p. 446.

<sup>13</sup> See his Life, already written, at the 7th of January.

<sup>14</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iii., cap. xxiii.

<sup>15</sup> In such cases, they were possibly distinguished as the Elder or the Younger, or probably the use of some soubriquet supplied the distinction.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 23.

<sup>17</sup> See Ven. Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iii., cap. xxviii., p. 206.

<sup>18</sup> See his Life, at the 31st of August.

<sup>19</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 24.

<sup>20</sup> The passage runs as follows: "Convenit autem revelationi et relationi præfati

Fratris de obitu hujus Antistitis, etiam sermo reverendissimi Patris Egberti, de quo supra diximus, qui dudum cum eodem Ceadda adolescens, et ipse adolescens in Hibernia monachicam in orationibus et continentia ac meditatione divinarum Scripturarum vitam sedulus agebat."—Ven. Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii. This seems only to mean, that Egbert alone passed his monastic life in Ireland, although, in earlier days, he had the happiness of living with Blessed Chad.

<sup>21</sup> See his Life, at the 24th of April.

<sup>22</sup> See "Monumenta Historica Britannica," vol. i., n. (a), p. 197.

<sup>23</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 24.

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 147.

<sup>25</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 24.

managed with great perfection and prudence, while he was much recommended by his virtuous eminence. While here, Owen,<sup>26</sup> or Owini, a monk of great merit, left the world, through a pure intention of obtaining the heavenly reward. In all respects, he was deemed worthy to have the secrets of our Lord revealed to him, and deserving to have credit given by his hearers, to what he related. He came with Queen Etheldryde or St. Audry<sup>27</sup> from the province of the East Angles. He was her prime officer and major-domo. As the fervour of his faith increased, however, he resolved wholly to renounce the world. Nor did he set about this work slothfully; but, quitting at once all earthly things, and being clad in a mean garment, while carrying only an axe and a hatchet in his hand, he went to the monastery of the holy prelate at Lestingay. Then signifying, that he came there to work, and not to be idle, his intentions were made good in his practice.<sup>28</sup>

The following beautiful legend is related in the Life of St. Chad.<sup>29</sup> King Wulfere,<sup>30</sup> the youngest son of King Penda, the Strenuous, had been baptized by Blessed Finan,<sup>31</sup> many years before our saint's time. At the font, and afterwards when wedded to Ermenilda,<sup>32</sup> of the royal house of Kent, Wulfere had promised to destroy all the idols in his realm. But, he neglected to do so, and he even allowed his three sons, Wulfade, Rufine and Kenred to remain unbaptized. The queen had dedicated her beauteous daughter Werburga<sup>33</sup> to Christ, as a virgin; yet, Werbode, the king's chief councillor and a Pagan, sought her hand in marriage, and obtained her father's consent. This purpose, however, was opposed by the queen and by her sons. One day, the young Prince Wulfade pursued a hart in the forest, and while praying by a fountain, near his cell, St. Chad perceived the animal plunge into the cooling stream, with quivering limbs and panting breath. Pitying its distress, the saint covered the animal with boughs, and, placing a rope about its neck, he let it graze in the forest. Soon Wulfade came up, and, heated with the chase, he asked where the hart had gone. Then Chad replied, "Am I keeper of the hart? Yet, through the instrumentality of the hart, I have become the guide of thy salvation. The hart, bathing in the fountain, foreshoweth to thee the laver of baptism, as the text says: 'As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.'" The young prince then said: "The things you tell me would be more likely to work faith in me, if the hart you have taught to wander in the forest, with the rope round its neck, were to appear in answer to your prayers." Holy Chad then prostrated himself in prayer, and lo! the hart burst from the thicket. The saint exclaimed: "All things are possible to him who believeth. Hear then, and receive the faith of Christ." The young prince consented to receive instruction, and Chad baptized him. The next day he received the Eucharist, went home, and told his brother Rufine, that he had become a Christian. Rufine declared, that he had long wished for baptism, and expressed his in-

<sup>26</sup> His feast was celebrated, on the 3rd of March, according to Menard's "Martyrologium Benedictinum," or on the 29th of July, according to the "English Martyrology." The name was always a common one in Ireland.

<sup>27</sup> Her feast occurs June 23rd. She died A.D. 679.

<sup>28</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 212.

<sup>29</sup> By Mr. Warner, and Rev. S. Baring-Gould.

<sup>30</sup> About the year 657, he succeeded his brother Peada in Mercia. He revolted from under the jurisdiction of Oswey, King of Northumbria, afterwards, and united under his government the Mercians, the Middle Angles and the Lindiswaras or natives of the county of Lincoln. See Rev. Dr. Lingard's "History of England," vol. i., chap. ii., p. 98.

<sup>31</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of January.

<sup>32</sup> She is also venerated as a saint, at the 13th of February.

<sup>33</sup> Her feast occurs, on the 3rd of February.

<sup>34</sup> The festival of Wulfade and Rufine is

tention to seek holy Chad. The brothers set out with such an intent; and, on the way, Rufine espied the hart, with the rope around its neck. He gave hot chase, and the animal, making for Chad's cell, jumped into the fountain as before. Rufine saw a venerable man praying near the water, and he accosted him: "Art thou, my lord, Father Chad, the guide of my brother Wulfade to salvation?" Chad answered, "I am." Rufine earnestly desired baptism, and the saint performed the office, Wulfade holding him at the font, after the manner prescribed by holy Church. Afterwards, the princes took their leave, but they returned daily to seek the company and conversation of the exemplary hermit. However, Werbode stealthily observed their proceedings, and having told their father that they had become Christians, he added, that their conversion must alienate his subjects. He reported, that they were worshipping in St. Chad's oratory; and, the king, in an angry mood, set out for the cell, yet he sent Werbode before, to tell the princes of his approach, so that they might escape from his presence. But, Werbode only looked in through the oratory window, and saw them earnestly praying. He then returned to the king, stating that his sons were obstinate in their purpose of worshipping Christ. Pale with anger, Wulfere rushed towards the oratory, and upbraided his sons for breaking his laws, by becoming Christians. He threatened them with his vengeance, and bade them renounce Christ. Wulfade replied, that they did not want to break the laws, and that the king himself had once embraced the faith, which he now renounced; but, while wishing to retain his fatherly affection, he declared, that no tortures could turn them from Christianity. The king rushed furiously on him, and cut off his head. His brother, Rufine, fled, but he was pursued by Wulfere, who gave him a death-wound.<sup>34</sup> Then returning to the castle, Werbode announced this murder, but he was immediately smitten with madness. In great sorrow, the queen buried her sons, whose souls had departed to celestial glory, in one stone tomb.<sup>35</sup> With her daughter, Werburga, she soon withdrew to the monastery at Sheppey, and then to that of Ely.<sup>36</sup> Subsequently, the king was filled with remorse, and he became dangerously ill. The queen counselled him to seek out Chad, and confess to him. Wulfere took her advice, and called his thanes together, as if for a chase. But, his attendants got scattered from him, and being left alone, he espied the hart, with the rope around its neck. Following on its track, he was led to Chad's oratory, where the saint was then engaged celebrating Mass. When the canon began, so great a light shone through the apertures in the wall, while priest and sacrifice were covered with such splendour, that the king was nearly blinded by it, for it was brighter than that of the natural sun. He durst not enter the oratory, until he had been shriven, and he lay prostrate before the door. Knowing what the king desired, at the conclusion of the office, Chad hastily put off his vestments, and thinking to leave them upon the natural place, he unwittingly hung them upon a sun-beam, for the natural sunlight was now streaming in through the window. Then he went out, and raising the king from his prostrate position, Chad heard his confession, and enjoined it as a penance, on him, to root out idolatry, and to build several abbeys.<sup>37</sup> The holy man next motioned to the king, that he should enter the oratory and pray. Lift-kept on the 24th of July. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 176.

<sup>35</sup> The substance of this legend was formerly inscribed, beneath the cloister windows of Peterborough: it runs in quaint old verse, beginning:—

"By Queen Ermenild had King Wulfere

These twey sons thot ye see here," &c.

<sup>36</sup> Ethelreda, daughter of Anna, King of the East Angles, founded a monastery here in 673. It is the seat of a bishop, and it possesses a fine Cathedral, begun in 1081. See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. ii., pp. 171 to 173.

ing up his eyes, by chance, Wulfere saw with astonishment the vestments hanging on the sun-beam. Rising from his knees, he drew near, trying to place his own gloves and baldric upon the beam, but these immediately fell on the ground. Wherefore the king understood, as the natural sun paid him so much homage, that Chad was beloved by the Sun of Righteousness.<sup>38</sup> Wulfere died in the year 675,<sup>39</sup> and he was buried in Lichfield.<sup>40</sup>

CHAPTER II.

ST. CHAD CONSECRATED BISHOP—ST. THEODORE—ST. CHAD'S MISSIONARY CAREER—HIS PIOUS PRACTICES WHILE AT LAESTINGAEU—HE BECOMES A BISHOP OVER MERCIA AND LINDSAY—HIS LOVE FOR PRAYER AND RETIREMENT.

OSWIU<sup>1</sup> was a potent and a contemporary king in Northumbria: he had already conceived a high idea of holy Chad's worth and sanctity. A vacancy occurred in the see of York, or Northumbria, through the death of Tuda,<sup>2</sup> who was carried off by the pestilence, A.D. 664.<sup>3</sup> At the nomination of King Alchfrid,<sup>4</sup> son of Oswy, St. Wilfrid<sup>5</sup> was consecrated for the same see, by Agilbert, Bishop of Paris, at Compeigne. However, the newly-consecrated prelate delayed too long his return to Northumbria, while the king and people of that province were impatient to have its see filled. Chad was obliged by King Oswy, to accept episcopal consecration.<sup>6</sup> Accordingly, he was consecrated Bishop of York, by Wini, or Wina, Bishop of Winchester,<sup>7</sup> assisted by two British prelates.<sup>8</sup> Other accounts place this event in the year 664.<sup>9</sup> The king sent his own priest, Eadhaed,<sup>10</sup> with him, as a companion to Kent; but, before arriving there, Densdedit,<sup>11</sup> the Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and no other prelate was available for the ceremony but Wini, the bishop. This proceeding created some confusion, for a time; but, it was soon remedied, owing to St. Chad's great humility. In the year 668, St. Theodore<sup>12</sup> was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, and Wilfrid also returned to England, with a great desire to introduce the Roman customs, <sup>37</sup> Among the number, he completed Peterborough Minster, which his father had begun. The reader will here recall, the account of Lancelot, and the Sacring in the Tower by Joseph of Arimathæa, in the Morte d'Arthur.

<sup>38</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., pp. 33 to 37.

<sup>39</sup> See Florentii Wigorniensis' "Chronicon," A.D. DC.LXXV.

<sup>40</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. ii., February iii. Life of St. Wereburge, v.

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> He was brother to St. Oswald, King of Northumbria, who was slain by Penda, A.D. 642. Oswiu immediately succeeded, and died, February 15th, A.D. 670. See the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," pp. 311 to 318. "Monumenta Historica Britannica."

<sup>2</sup> He was buried, according to Ven. Bede, in his monastery of Paegnalaech: by some, it is called Waghele, and again Wemalet.

The situation is not well known.

<sup>3</sup> This was a very fatal scourge, as we learn from the Irish and English Annals.

<sup>4</sup> His father bestowed on him the province of the Derori, which he governed.

<sup>5</sup> His chief feast occurs on the 12th of October. He died A.D. 709, on the 24th of April.

<sup>6</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 147.

<sup>7</sup> So states Bishop Challenor. Colgan calls him, however, Bishop of Lincoln.

<sup>8</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March ii.

<sup>9</sup> According to the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle."

<sup>10</sup> He afterwards became Bishop of Ripon, during the reign of Egfrid.

<sup>11</sup> The English Martyrology has his feast at the 30th of June, and the Benedictine Martyrology, at the 15th of July.

<sup>12</sup> His feast occurs, on the 19th of September.

<sup>13</sup> He ruled over the English Church, from instead of those prevailing among the Scots. St. Theodore had been sent over into England, by Pope Vitalian,<sup>13</sup> in 669.<sup>14</sup> When he came to visit the northern provinces, he found fault with St. Chad's ordination,<sup>15</sup> giving the preference to St. Wilfrid, and adjudging to him the see of York. St. Chad humbly replied: "If you judge, I have not lawfully received episcopal consecration, I willingly resign the function. I never thought myself worthy of it; yet, although unworthy, in obedience, I submitted to take it." St. Theodore would not permit St. Chad's resignation, however, but he supplied what was thought to have been defective in his ordination.<sup>16</sup>

No sooner was he consecrated bishop, than he devoted himself, with untiring zeal, to the observance of ecclesiastical truth and purity. He constantly practised humility and mortification; he was addicted to spiritual reading. After the apostolic manner, he visited the diocese, on foot, and not on horseback.<sup>17</sup> He assiduously preached the Gospel, and sought the salvation of souls, not alone in towns, castles, and villages, but even in the meanest cottages, and even in the very fields. Thus he was a true disciple and follower of St. Aidan, and he endeavoured to instruct the people with a like zeal. He adopted the same method and behaviour, he had learned from Aidan's and from his brother Cedda's example.<sup>18</sup>

St. Chad retired to his monastery at Lestingay, so that there might not be two bishops for the same see, and at the same time. This place was situated in the province of the Deiri.<sup>19</sup> At Laestingaeu, St. Chad remained until called upon to undertake the charge of another church.<sup>20</sup> While here, or elsewhere, he had a disciple, named Trumhere,<sup>21</sup> sometimes called Trumberct, Trumbrect, Trumberht, or Trumberthus,<sup>22</sup> who told Venerable Bede, the saint was so filled with the fear of God and of his last end, that when a strong gale of wind blew, while Chad was reading or engaged at any other business, he at once called for mercy from the Almighty, for himself and for all mankind. If it blew stronger, prostrating himself, he prayed more earnestly. But, if a violent storm of wind or rain, or of thunder and lightning, came, he prayed and recited psalms in the church, until the weather became calm. Being asked by his disciples why he did so, Chad replied: "Have you not heard it said, 'The Lord thundered from heaven, and the highest

A.D. 658 to 672. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Outlines of History," p. 211.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 27.

<sup>15</sup> The validity of his consecration does not appear to have been questioned; but, it is probable, there was something informal in his nomination, or in the mode of performance. Yet, Wini, as we are told, was the only bishop then in Britain, who had been consecrated after the Roman usage; all the other bishops were ordained, after the British or Scottish manner. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii., n. 22, p. 477.

<sup>16</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 148.

<sup>17</sup> Robert of Gloucester thus celebrates his labours, in the Metrical Life, of which he is the supposed author:—

"He endeavoured earnestly, night and day, when he had hither come,
To guard well holy Church, and to uphold Christendom.

He went into all his bishopric, and preacht full fast,
Much of that folk, through his word, to God their hearts cast,
All afoot he travelled about, nor kept he any state,
Rich man though he was made he reckoned there of little great.
The Archbishop of York had not him used to go
To preach about on his feet, nor another none the mo,
They ride upon their palfreys, lest they should spurn their toe,
But riches and worldly state doth to holy Church woe."

<sup>18</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iii., cap. xxviii., p. 206.

<sup>19</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii., n. 18, p. 447.

<sup>20</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 148.

<sup>21</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of gave his voice. He sent forth his arrows, and he scattered them: he multiplied lightnings, and troubled them.' <sup>23</sup> For, the Lord moves the air, raises the winds, darts the lightning, and thunders from heaven, to excite the inhabitants of the earth to fear him, that he may bring to their thoughts the memory of a future judgment, to dispel their pride and to vanquish their boldness, by bringing to their minds that dreadful time, when, the heavens and the earth being in a flame, he will come in the clouds, with great power and majesty to judge the living and the dead. Wherefore, it behoves us to answer his heavenly admonitions, with fear and love; so, that often as the air is disturbed, we should regard his hand, as if raised to strike us, and yet to be restrained. Then should we implore his mercy, and take care to examine the very secrets of our hearts, so that we may be anxious to purge away all stains of sin, and never deserve to be condemned." <sup>24</sup>

Jaruman, <sup>25</sup> a holy man and bishop over the Mercians, being dead, King Wulfhere, who governed that province, desired Archbishop Theodore <sup>26</sup> to furnish him and his people with a worthy pastor. The Archbishop would not ordain a new one for them, but he appointed St. Chad for their see. He also preferred this request to King Oswiu, who acceded to it. This Diocese of Lichfield was of vast extent. The holy prelate was accustomed to visit all places, where he went to preach the Word of God, on foot. But the Archbishop, who had a great esteem for his sanctity, obliged him to ride on horseback, whenever he travelled on a long journey. Theodore even helped him on horseback, with his own hands. <sup>27</sup>

Having been appointed bishop for all the Kingdom of Mercia, and Lindsay, he chose to live at Lichfield. <sup>28</sup> Four bishops of the Middle-Angles had preceded him, but they do not appear to have been attached to any permanent see. These were all holy men, and worthy to be ranked amongst the saints. St. Diuma, a Scot or an Irishman, was the Apostle of that province. Keollach belonged to the same nation; Trumhere, had been at first Abbot of Gethling, in the province of the Northumbrians. The fourth and immediate successor was Jaruman. But, St. Chad is regarded as the first bishop, and chief patron of Lichfield, although the fifth prelate, in order of succession, who ruled over the Mercians. St. Chad extended his pastoral care and vigilance from Lichfield to all parts of Mercia and Lindsay. By his heavenly doctrine, and saintly life, he shone as one of the brightest stars, in the firmament of God's Church. <sup>29</sup> He had governed this diocese with great sanctity, having also erected a small domicile at some distance from the church, where, with seven or eight of the brothers, he could retire occasionally for prayer and study, when he had a little time left him, after the labours of his ministry. Thus was his episcopacy spent, in great perfection, for two years and a half, <sup>30</sup> when a great mortality was sent by Divine Providence. This the Saints," vol. iii., March ii. He afterwards taught divinity to Venerable Bede.

<sup>22</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Vita S. Ceddæ, cap. iii., num. 10, and n. (a), pp. 147, 148.

<sup>23</sup> See Psalms xvii., 14, 15.

<sup>24</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 213. "Monumenta Historica Britannica."

<sup>25</sup> He died A.D. 669.

<sup>26</sup> In the year 668, he was consecrated, and sent to Britain, according to the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," p. 318. See "Monumenta Historica Britannica."

<sup>27</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 211.

<sup>28</sup> It is said to have been so called, on account of a great number of martyrs slain and buried there, under Maximianus Hercules. The name signifies, it is thought, "the field of carcasses." Hence, this city bears for its arms, a landscape, covered with the bodies of martyrs. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March ii.

<sup>29</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 149.

pestilence translated a great many precious stones of God's sanctuary from an earthly to a heavenly temple, according to what is said in the Sacred Scriptures: "A time to scatter stones, and a time to gather."<sup>31</sup>

CHAPTER III.

MIRACULOUS PREMONITION OF HIS DECEASE—THE DAY AND YEAR OF HIS DEATH—NOTICES IN THE CALENDARS—TRANSLATIONS OF HIS RELICS—MEMORIALS—PRESERVATION OF HIS RELICS—ST. CHAD'S CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL, BIRMINGHAM—CONCLUSION.

WHEN many had been taken away from life, who were members of his church, and when his own hour drew near for a summons to the Lord's presence, it happened one day, that he was in the aforesaid dwelling with only one brother—that Owen, already mentioned—his other companions being in the church. While employed about the business of the house, when his companions were gone to the church, and the bishop being all alone, attending to reading or prayer in the oratory of the house, on a sudden, as he afterwards related, that monk heard most melodious and jubilant voices. These seemed descending from heaven, towards the oratory, where the bishop was meditating.<sup>1</sup> Entering near this place, Owen listened attentively to what he heard. About half an hour elapsed, when the joyous harmony seemed departing from the roof of the oratory and returning again towards heaven, until it died away with inexpressible sweetness. The monk stood for about one hour astonished, and he seriously revolved in mind, what such a portent could signify. The bishop at length opened the oratory window, and he made a sound with his hands—a well-known signal for those without—that the monk should come towards him. Then desiring him to hasten, and to bring seven brothers to attend at the church, the prelate desired them to preserve the virtue of peace among themselves, and with all others. He requested them, likewise, to observe those regular rules of discipline, which had been taught or observed by him, or which they found in the words and actions of their forefathers. Then he added, that the day of his death was at hand.<sup>2</sup> "For," said he, "that amiable guest, who was wont to visit our brethren, has vouchsafed also to come to me this day, and to call me out of this world. Therefore, returning to the church, speak to the brethren, that they in their prayers recommend my passage to our Lord; and, that they be careful to provide for their own—the hour of which is uncertain—by watching, prayer, and good works." Having spoken thus, and after receiving his blessing, they being gone away very sorrowful, Owini returned alone. Prostrating himself on the ground, he said, "I beseech you, father, may I be permitted to ask one question?" "Ask what you will," answered the bishop. "Then," said he, "I entreat you to tell me, what joyful melody was that, which I heard coming upon this oratory, and after some time returning to heaven?" The bishop answered, "If you heard the singing, and know

<sup>30</sup> The Bollandists estimate this term of rule, from about the month of September, A.D. 669 to the 2nd of March, A.D. 672. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ceadda Episcopo, Vita, &c., cap. ii. n. (g), p. 147.

<sup>31</sup> See Ecclesiastes iii., 5.

CHAPTER III.—<sup>1</sup> The account adds:

"quam videlicet vocem ab Euro austro, id est, ab alto Brumalis exortam, primo se auduisse dicebat."

<sup>2</sup> We find it stated, that he died of a pestilence in the year 673. See A Key to the Calendar, p. 57, in Whitaker's "Almanack for the year of our Lord 1873."

<sup>3</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Eccle-

the coming of the heavenly company, I command you, in the name of our Lord, that you do not tell the same to any before my death; but, they were really angelic spirits, who came to call me to those heavenly rewards I always so much loved and desired. They promised, likewise, to return seven days hence, and to take me away with them." As had been intimated to him, this promise was fulfilled. A languishing illness seized him, and it increased daily in intensity, until the seventh day. Then he had prepared for death, by receiving the Body of our Lord. Released from the prison of the body—the angels, as may justly be believed, attending him—his spirit went to take possession of heavenly joys.<sup>3</sup>

The year generally assigned for his death is 672.<sup>4</sup> Others again place it at 673.<sup>5</sup> This saint was very celebrated in his day, and after his time, several writers have recorded him.<sup>6</sup> The holy prelate passed out of this life, on the 2nd of March, or on the 6th day of the Nones, according to Venerable Bede.<sup>7</sup> The Martyrology of Salisbury, the English Martyrology, Hugh Menard,<sup>8</sup> the Martyrology of Cologne, Molanus on Usuard, Canisius, Felicius, Galesinius, the Roman Martyrology, and several other ancient and modern Calendars, have his commemoration assigned to this date.<sup>9</sup> The Kalendar of Arbuthnott notices the feast of St. Ceadde, Bishop and Confessor, with an Office of nine Lessons, at the 2nd of March. The Kalendarium Breviarii Aberdonensis has a notice of St. Cedde's festival, at the 2nd of March. This holy bishop had an Office of nine Lessons. At the 2nd of March, Dempster says,<sup>10</sup> that at York, in England, the first Apostle of the East Angles, Archbishop Cedda, and Bishop of Leichfeld, was commemorated. In Adam King's Kalendar, at the 2nd of March, is found "S. Cedde bisch. of ye mers in scot. vnder Constantine ye 5."<sup>11</sup>

At first his remains were buried near the Church of St. Mary, but afterwards the Church of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, was built there, and thither his remains were translated. In testimony of his sanctity, frequent miraculous cures were performed. "Among the rest of late," says Bede, "a certain distracted person, wandering about, arrived there in the evening unknown to or unregarded by keepers of the place. Having rested there all night, he came out the next morning in his perfect senses, to the great admiration and joy of all. The place of his sepulchre," continues the historian, "is a wooden monument, made like a little house covered; <sup>12</sup> having a hole in the wall, through which those that go thither for devotion usually put in their hand, and take away some of the dust. This, being put into water, and given to sick persons or cattle to drink, gives immediate ease to their infirmity, and restores them to health."<sup>13</sup> The relics of St. Chad were subsequently translated to that church, built by Roger de Clinton, in the year 1148. This was dedicated to God, in honour of the Blessed Virgin and of St. Chad. It siastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii., pp. 212, 213.

<sup>4</sup> See "Monumenta Historica Britannica," vol. i., p. 214.

<sup>5</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 62.

<sup>6</sup> Thus the reader may find the references of Arnold Wion in his "Lignum Vitæ;" Harpsfeld's Chronicle, Seculum vii.; Florence of Worcester ad A.D. 653, 664; Ranulphus Cestrensis, lib. v., cap. 15, 16; William of Malmesbury, "De Regibus Anglorum," lib. i., cap. 6. "De Pontificibus," lib. ii., &c.

<sup>7</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 214.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii., n. 31, p. 447.

<sup>9</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ceadda, Episcopo, &c. Commentarius historicus, sect. i., num. 5, 6, p. 144.

<sup>10</sup> In "Menologium Scoticum."

<sup>11</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 97, 113, 146, 193.

<sup>12</sup> This form of shrine was very common in Ireland, in the instances of saints' preserved relics.

<sup>13</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 214.

is at present known as the fine Cathedral Church of Lichfield. In 1296, Walter Langton was raised to this see, and he built the Lady Chapel. He there erected a beautiful shrine, at the enormous cost of £2,000, to receive the holy bishop's relics.<sup>14</sup> Although St. Chad's episcopate was a short one, yet, the warm-hearted Mercians abundantly esteemed it, for no less than thirty-one churches are dedicated to his honour, and all in the midland counties, either in or near the ancient diocese of Lichfield. The first church ever built in Shrewsbury was named after him, and when the old building fell in 1788, an ancient wooden figure of the patron escaped destruction. The carver had represented St. Chad, in his pontifical robes, with a mitre: a book being held in his right hand, and a pastoral staff in his left. This image is still preserved in the new Protestant Church.<sup>15</sup>

Until the change of religion in England, St. Chad's remains were preserved in the Cathedral of Lichfield.<sup>16</sup> Some of these relics are now lost, but some of them have been preserved in a very providential manner. The head of the Lichfield St. Chad had been long kept, on a special altar of the cathedral, called the Altar of St. Chad;<sup>17</sup> but, what became of this relic, at the time of the Reformation, has not been ascertained. A prebendary of Lichfield Cathedral, named Arthur Dudley,<sup>18</sup> a relation to the noble family of Dudley, preserved St. Chad's relics from desecration, by giving them for safe keeping to two ladies of that family, from whom they passed dividedly into the hands of two neighbours, Henry and William Hoodsheeds. When about to die,<sup>19</sup> Henry Hoodsheeds, of Woodcitton, near Sedgley, in Staffordshire, was attended by his priest, Father Peter Turner, and then the dying man gave him that portion he possessed of St. Chad's relics, they being concealed at that time, on the top of his bed.<sup>20</sup> Father Turner, dying in 1655, this treasure passed to the keeping of "Dominus Leveson." We next hear of them, about 1667, as being at Boscobel, a house of the Fitzherberts; and, later still, they were kept at Swinnerton,<sup>21</sup> in the county of Stafford. These relics had been inspected, at various times, by venerable ecclesiastics.<sup>22</sup> About A.D. 1790, they followed the Fitzherberts to a new residence, at Aston Hall, near Stone. The Rev. Father Maher, their Jesuit chaplain, had charge of those relics; but, in consequence of his sudden death, the place where they had been concealed was for a time unknown. In 1837, Father Benjamin Hulme, a secular priest, while thoroughly renovating the chapel, discovered the box containing St. Chad's and other relics, fastened up under the altar.<sup>23</sup> The bishop of the district, Rt. Rev. Dr. Walsh, and Bishop Wiseman, went to Aston Hall, and there having carefully enquired into the whole matter, they presented a manifesto to Pope Gregory XVI. On weighing their evidence, he granted permission for the relics to be publicly venerated.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 33.

<sup>15</sup> See ibid., p. 32.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March ii.

<sup>17</sup> See a very interesting article, relating to these relics, the "Keeper of St. Chad's Head," in Lichfield Cathedral, and other matters concerning that minster in the fifteenth century, by John Hewitt. "The Archaeological Journal," vol. xxxiii., No. 129, pp. 72 to 82.

<sup>18</sup> He appears in the list of Prebendaries, A.D. 1531. See Harwood's "History of Lichfield."

<sup>19</sup> On the 8th of September, A.D. 1615.

<sup>20</sup> That portion of St. Chad's relics, which fell to the lot of William Hoodsheeds, is now traceable.

<sup>21</sup> A seat of the same family.

<sup>22</sup> The foregoing account is substantiated by documents and contained in a MS. in the handwriting of the Rev. Alban Butler, now kept among the archives of Oscott College, near Birmingham.

<sup>23</sup> The Rev. Dr. Kirk of Lichfield, who died there aged 92, in A.D. 1852, at once identified them as St. Chad's relics. He might well have seen them, when they were at Aston Hall, at the close of the eighteenth, or the beginning of the present century.

They were lodged for a time at Oscott College; but, on the opening of the new Cathedral of St. Chad, at Birmingham, in June, 1841, they were transferred to their present position.<sup>24</sup> They are still exposed for veneration, on the 2nd of March each year, as also on the anniversary of the Dedication of the Church, which is kept on the third Sunday of June, and which is looked upon as the feast of the Finding of those Relics. St. Chad's Catholic Church,<sup>25</sup> in Birmingham, serves as the Cathedral of this flourishing diocese. It is situated in Bath Street, and it has been erected after a design, furnished by the celebrated architect, Welby Pugin. In style it is Gothic, but mainly built of brick materials. Exteriorly and interiorly, however, the effects are very striking. It has a nave, side aisles and short transepts, with a choir. An elegantly-designed rood-screen separates nave and choir. Over the high altar and within a canopied niche, there is a capsula, or shrine, containing the relics of St. Chad, Bishop of Lichfield. Side altars are placed within chapels, on either side of the high altar and choir stalls. No writings of this saint have survived, yet in Lichfield Cathedral Library, there is a MS. of the seventh century, in the Anglo-Saxon character. It contains the Gospels of St. Matthew, of St. Mark, and a part of St. Luke; it being known by the title of St. Chad's Gospel. His well, too, is shown at Lichfield. There was one in London, called St. Chad's well, the water of which was sold to valetudinarians, at sixpence a glass. He got the character of being patron saint of medicinal springs. At Chadshunt, there was an oratory, and a well, bearing his name. Chadwell—one source of the New River—is, perhaps, a corruption of St. Chad's well.<sup>26</sup> In the Clog Almanacks, St. Chad's emblem is a branch. Perhaps, this had been suggested by the Gospel,<sup>27</sup> read in the Mass, and on the feast of his Translation—formerly celebrated on the 2nd of August, with great pomp, at Lichfield. So long as the virtues of chastity, humility and a forsaking of all for Christ's sake, are esteemed among men, the name of this great Mercian Apostle ought not to be forgotten.<sup>28</sup>

ARTICLE II.—ST. MONTAN, OR MANTAN, DEACON, OF BLARIS, COUNTY OF DOWN, AND OF KILL MANTAN, COUNTY OF WICKLOW. [Fifth Century.] It is the property of true wit or humour, to bear no malice; it has no bitterness at heart; it carries no venom beneath its tongue; it aims no shafts at goodness or worth. It is not self-seeking or envious of another's reputation; its laughter is harmless, its sparkling beam is sunny, its aim is generous. It is a child of light and of warm-heartedness. Impurity, indecency, indelicacy, it holds in aversion. Even the forfeiture of self-respect is an outrage on refinement and social propriety. In such an aspect, St. Montan or Mantan appears to have regarded the silly or sinful drolleries of strolling outcasts, at an early period, of Bishop Wiseman. It is signed by Bishop Walsh, Bishop Wiseman, and Bishop Kyle (of Scotland).

<sup>24</sup> At the examination of Oscott College, St. Chad's relics are thus described: No. 1. A femur of the left side, nearly entire; Nos. 2 and 3. The two tibiae, both broken at the lower ends, one having the head of the fibula adhering; No. 4. Portion of a humerus. The relics were wrapped up in the slate-coloured silk, which originally enclosed them. The box containing them, and covered with velvet and lace, was reclosed. It was bound with a white silk riband, and sealed by Bishop Walsh and by Bishop Wiseman. An attestation of the above examination and a description of the relics, dated 20th June, 1841, is in the handwriting

<sup>25</sup> It is situated on Snow Hill, between Nos. 62 and 69 Bath Street, Birmingham. A convent dedicated to St. Chad, and also a Grammar school, under ecclesiastical direction, are among the religious institutes of the diocese.

<sup>26</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., pp. 32, 33.

<sup>27</sup> See St. John xv., where allusion is made to the fruitful vine branches.

<sup>28</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 33.

and who were regarded with aversion, by men of sense, of judgment, and of moral courage. His Acts, by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> at the 2nd of March, refer to this single attributed incident of his life, and it is indicated or foreshadowed, by our previous remarks. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have only a passing allusion to this saint, and some doubts respecting his identity have been thrown out. The Irish Martyrologist, Cathal Maguire, states, that Montan was venerated in a place, called Blarus. We can only find one locality, in Ireland, bearing a denomination, at all corresponding. Within the county of Down lies the townland of Blaris,<sup>3</sup> and there may be seen an old graveyard, with very little of the ancient church remaining. Blaris or Lisburn parish being intersected by the River Lagan, belongs to both the counties of Down and of Antrim.<sup>4</sup> In some old Inquisitions, it is called Bally-templeblarisse.<sup>5</sup> It is denominated, on an old map, "Blare." The church and graveyard give name to this parish. Its etymological meaning may have been derived, from Blar, "a plain," or field, and Rus "a wood;" or perhaps, more probably, from Rus "red," for the soil everywhere around is of a red, sandy kind.<sup>6</sup> Save a

Blaris Graveyard, County of Down.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," ii. Martii. De S. Montano, Diacono, pp. 450, 451.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 125.

<sup>3</sup> It is situated in the parish as Blaris, and barony of Upper Castlereagh. It is marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 14.

<sup>4</sup> The portion of it in Down is described on Sheets 8, 14, 15, ibid. That within the barony of Upper Massariene is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 64, 67, 68.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (h), p. 47.

<sup>6</sup> The writer is indebted to Rev. David B. Mulcahy, C.C., Lisburn—an excellent Irish scholar, well versed in local and general Irish history—for much of the information contained in the text and illustrative notes, in a letter, dated, Lisburn, 8th of August, 1877.

<sup>7</sup> Two of the holy water fonts are now in the possession of Mr. P. Connery, Bridge-street, Lisburn. These were got in the old church of Blaris. The accompanying view of Blaris graveyard was sketched on the small portion of the north side-wall—now called the old wall—the former church has disappeared.<sup>7</sup> The ornamental stone work of the eastern window was removed to Mr. Carlton's place, he being the former proprietor.<sup>8</sup> It may be questioned, whether or not, the present holy man could have been born here; but, now, there is not any account whatsoever of St. Mantan, in the place. It is also problematical, if he can be considered as identical with a certain St. Mantan, or Montan, Deacon, who flourished, at an early period of our history. We know little regarding him, except what can be gleaned from St. Patrick's Tripartite Life; and from this, Jocelyn seems to have related the matter, yet in a form, somewhat dissimilar.<sup>9</sup> Montanus is classed as a disciple to the great St. Patrick.<sup>10</sup> He is said to have assisted the Irish Apostle, in various ministerial labours. From his designation of Deacon,<sup>11</sup> we may fairly infer, that he was never elevated, beyond such an ecclesiastical rank, although Maguire, or his Scholiast, calls him a Presbyter. In the Tripartite Life,<sup>12</sup> we are told, that having arranged the religious affairs of Ara Church,<sup>13</sup> St. Patrick betook himself to the Hi-Fidhgente<sup>14</sup> region, where he was hospitably received by Lonan,<sup>15</sup> son of Eric. This chieftain prepared a banquet for him, in a castle, situated on Mount Kea,<sup>16</sup> and near Carn-Feradhui<sup>17</sup> mountain, in the southern part of Munster. Montan assisted in preparing this banquet. While thus engaged, a certain band of Druids and buffoons arrived at the place.<sup>18</sup> These persons demanded food from St. Patrick, in an importunate, and even in an insulting manner.<sup>19</sup> Fearing they would spread scandalous reports among his new converts, unless they should receive refreshments, since the saint and his companions might be said to enjoy themselves at table, whilst others were hungry; St. Patrick requested Lonan and Montan to send them something, to satisfy their importunities. But, disregarding the efforts of such worthless characters, to spread disparaging reports against the great Irish Apostle, Lonan and Montan delayed complying with this request, until the meat should be thoroughly cooked, and afterwards blessed by Patrick. Meantime a youth, named Nesson,<sup>20</sup> who, together with his mother, was bearing a basket filled with viands to Lonan's spot, by Mr. Goodman, of Belfast. It has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it has been engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>8</sup> When the graveyard was enlarged, more than fifty years ago, a chalice is said to have been found in the digging, by his workmen. Of this sacred object there is no trace, at present.

<sup>9</sup> Jocelyn conceals all mention of Montan's name.

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 267.

<sup>11</sup> We are told, by Colgan, that in Book i. of St. Ængus' "Opuscula," cap. iii., he is styled "Diaconus." See ibid., n. 74, p. 186.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid. Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xlii., pp. 157, 158.

<sup>13</sup> Ara Cliach was situated in the county of Limerick, and it lies round Knockany. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (b), p. 47.

<sup>14</sup> At the reign of Diarmaid Mac Ceirbheoil and Conall Caol, Keating states, that this was the plain of the county of Limerick. Uí Feroigeinte re parórtor clár contae

luimnig anu,—"History of Ireland," book ii.

<sup>15</sup> Jocelyn calls him "de Comdothan."

<sup>16</sup> It rises just on the borders of the counties of Cork and of Limerick.

<sup>17</sup> Fearadhach's Carn or Heap. In the "Book of Lecan," fol. 204, it is referred to as being on the southern boundary of Clu-Mail territory. It was probably the ancient name of Seefin, in the barony of Coshlea, in the south of Limerick county. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (g), p. 41.

<sup>18</sup> It seems probable, that these buffoons had certain characteristics with the histriones, introduced from Etruria, by the ancient Romans, B.C., 364. Such dancers or tumblers are found represented on old Etruscan monuments. Illustrations of comic and tragic acting, with theatrical arrangements at Pompeii are numerous enough, in Thomas H. Dyer's "Pompeii: Its History, Buildings and Antiquities," part i., chap. vii., pp. 188 to 214.

<sup>19</sup> Jocelyn only mentions one, whom he designates, "quidam improbus, nomine Dercardius," yet seeming to indicate, that he was leader of a band.

table, had been asked by St. Patrick to divide its contents among the buffoons.<sup>21</sup> No sooner had they tasted this food, however, than God's vengeance fell upon them, for injuries offered to his great saint.<sup>22</sup> All of these men dropped dead.<sup>23</sup> But, St. Patrick was likewise offended, at the disobedience of Lonan and Montan to his orders. As a punishment for their fault, he predicted, that none of Lonan's seed should enjoy the regal or pontifical dignity; while, the Church of Montan, he declared, should be humble and of moderate dimensions; moreover, it should become a place of resort for the vulgar, and even over Montan's tomb and body, sheep and swine should afterwards range uncontrolled, according to the Apostle's prediction.<sup>24</sup> We cannot account, for the change of scene, to a place far more distant; but, this church is said to have been situated, on the sea shore, in the eastern part of Leinster. The site is still remembered, and called after the name of the present saint. Killmantan Hill<sup>25</sup> is known, in the county town of Wicklow.<sup>26</sup>

Kilmantan Hill, South of Wicklow Town.

<sup>20</sup> Colgan tells us, this St. Nessian, called the Deacon, had been venerated, on the 25th of July, in the Monastery of Mungarret, and that he was synchronos and a disciple of St. Patrick. Or he says, there was another St. Nessian of Cork, venerated on the 17th of March. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 75, p. 186. Also, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. De S. Montano Diacono, n. 1, p. 451. Also at xvii. Martii. De S. Nessano Presbytero, Corcagiensi Patrono, p. 629. For proof of this statement, he cites St. Ængus, Marianus O'Gorman, Maguire, the Calendar of Cashel, and other authorities. Ibid., n. 2, p. 630. However, this latter conjecture appears to have been a mistake, according to Dr. Lanigan; for, he, whose feast occurs at that day, is St. Nessian, Abbot of Mungret, who lived at a later period. See, the Acts of this latter, at the 25th of July.

<sup>21</sup> The food is called "vervecem coctum,"—which means cooked mutton—in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick.

<sup>22</sup> Jocelyn mentions this entertainment, also, and about Saint Patrick having taken a share of it. Instead of a roasted sheep, however, he makes the saint give those fellows a live animal. See "Trias Thaumaturga." Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxv., p. 82. "He thus gave a twist to the anecdote," adds Dr. Lanigan, "lest he should appear to acknowledge that there was flesh-meat on Lonan's table."—See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. viii., n. 53, p. 154.

<sup>23</sup> The Tripartite Life has it, "vix vervecinæ carnes erant in ore eorum, cum ecce ira Dei ascendit super eos, carniūque esus velut toxicum, iusta Domini ira, injuriam servi sui vindicante, Sathanæ satellites illico extinxit cum suo Duce et Antesignano Dergio

Buidhe-cloch, or "the yellow stone," is said to have been an ancient name for Wicklow.<sup>27</sup> In this town<sup>28</sup> may be seen some interesting remains of the former Franciscan Abbey,<sup>29</sup> which Father John Colgan must have lived in, at one time. The eminence of Killmantan is on that rock, south of the River Leitrim, but no trace of the old church can be seen there any longer.<sup>30</sup> Even the burial-ground, which was attached to it, has undergone various processes of desecration. Although the former Kill-Mantain Church<sup>31</sup> was situated, in the midst of a flourishing and growing town,<sup>32</sup> not only had its roof gone to decay, but its walls were crumbled and ruined to such a degree, that sheep, swine, with other beasts, found easy access to its interior, and frequently made it their place of refuge and rest.<sup>33</sup> The remains of the dead were for a long time subjected to neglect or disrespect.<sup>34</sup> Irishtown lies between this closed graveyard, and the Black Castle, which is situated on a steep rock overhanging the sea. That reverence,<sup>35</sup> formerly entertained towards this church, had been transferred to another, built within the same town, and which was dedicated to St. Patrick.<sup>36</sup> Notwithstanding, the memory of St. Montan had not been forgotten; for, his name was communicated, not alone to his church, but even to the district, in which it was situated.<sup>37</sup> We have only to add, that the festival of St. Mantan is recorded in our Martyrologies, at the 2nd of March.<sup>38</sup> His name appears, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>39</sup> at the 2nd of March. Marianus O'Gorman, likewise, records his festival.

Schirri filio, de septentrionalibus Desiis originem trahente."

<sup>24</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xlii., pp. 157, 158.

<sup>25</sup> This historic place has no separated distinction of name on the Ordnance Survey Maps.

<sup>26</sup> The site is shown, however, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheet 25. The town itself is in the baronies of Arklow and Newcastle, and its houses lie in the parishes of Drunkay, Kilpoole and Rathnew.

<sup>27</sup> See John T. O'Flaherty's "Sketch of the History and Antiquities of the Southern Islands of Aran, lying off the West Coast of Ireland," &c.—"Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xiv., p. 125.

<sup>28</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis, speaking of this "portus apud Wikingelo," has some curious remarks in reference to the tides, along the east coast of Ireland. See "Opera," vol. v. "Topographia Hibernica," Dist. ii., cap. ii., p. 77. Edited by James F. Dimock, M.A.

<sup>29</sup> A view of it, drawn by T. G. Brien, is found engraved, in Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 44.

<sup>30</sup> The exact site is now occupied by a garden and orchard walled round, and belonging to a Mr. Gregory, on the side of a lane, branching from the main street of Wicklow, and right over the harbour. The jail and court house of this town are not far removed.

<sup>31</sup> Cill-Mantain, i.e., the cell or church of St. Mantan. This is the ancient and present Irish name for the town of Wicklow.

<sup>32</sup> "It should also be remarked, that contae Chille mantain is still the Irish name, for the county of Wicklow."—Dr.

O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iv., n. (y), pp. 991, 992.

<sup>33</sup> Alluding to this town, Ussher says, "Giraldus Cambrensis Wykingelo, Angli Wicklo, Hiberni Kilmantan vocant."—"De Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Primordiis," cap. xvii., p. 846.

<sup>34</sup> Several human bones have been turned up, in this place; and, it is a tradition in Wicklow, that in the year 1798, the soldiery and yeomen used to take human skulls from it, in which they placed lighted candles, in order to terrify passengers at night. The accompanying engraving of Kilmantan Hill was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon, from a photograph, kindly procured for the author, by Mrs. Ryan, 89 South Great George's-street, Dublin. The foreground represents the hill itself, immediately over Wicklow town, and the Murrough, in the mid-distance. The Wicklow mountains, to the Sugar-Loaf, are represented in the background.

<sup>35</sup> Colgan tells us, that he afterwards witnessed, with his own eyes, a literal fulfilment of St. Patrick's prophecy, with regard to the desecration, which Kilmantan burial-ground underwent.

<sup>36</sup> Whether Colgan alludes to the parish church, or to the Franciscan church, cannot easily be determined; but, it seems most probable, to the former. Some ruins of the latter are yet standing, within beautiful grounds, which are occupied by the parish priest.

<sup>37</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," ii. Martii. Vita S. Montani, cap. iii., p. 451.

<sup>38</sup> See ibid., nn. 2, 3, p. 451.

<sup>39</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>40</sup> that Montan, Priest, was venerated, on this day. In his Martyrology, Maguire states, that our saint was venerated, at a place called Blarus.<sup>41</sup> He is called St. Mantan of Blarus, in a Calendar, compiled by Dr. Reeves.<sup>42</sup> Colgan confesses himself unable to say, whether or not Blarus should be confounded with Kill-Mantain. In our opinion, it seems more probably referable to a distant place, in the north of Ireland. About one mile and a half from Blaris graveyard<sup>43</sup> rises the flourishing town of Lisburn,<sup>44</sup> surrounded by extensive bleach-greens, flax and spinning mills ; it being a chief seat of the Ulster linen manufactures.<sup>45</sup> The town, although of comparatively modern growth, yet has a history of very considerable interest.<sup>46</sup> An old burial-ground, called Kilrush,<sup>47</sup> lies near the town of Lisburn, and beside the Lagan River.<sup>48</sup> The year of St. Montan's death is not known, although it appears pretty certain, that he flourished, a

Lisburn, County of Antrim.

<sup>40</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>41</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," ii. Martii, nn. 2, 3, p. 451.

<sup>42</sup> See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix LL., p. 377.

<sup>43</sup> The gravedigger affirms, he found ashes, straw and scollops, here, in the digging of graves ; also, stones, with sculptured faces on them. He adds, a gentleman not long since told him, he had read in a book, that a monastery was founded there, in the year 1421, by a chieftain of the neighbourhood, named Magennis.

<sup>44</sup> That portion, situated in the barony of Upper Massareene, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 68 ; while that situated in the barony of Upper Castlereagh is marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 14.

<sup>45</sup> The accompanying view of the town is from a photograph, kindly procured for the writer, by Rev. David B. Mulcahy, C.C., Lisburn. It has been transferred to the wood by William F. Wakeman, and it has been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>46</sup> See an account of it, in Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. ii., pp. 278 to 280.

<sup>47</sup> This, however, has no designation on the Ordnance Survey Maps.

<sup>48</sup> In 1849, appeared a volume of Poems, called "Lispings of the Lagan," by Francis Davis, "the Belfastman." It contains some interesting local allusions.

little after the middle of the fifth century. Another festival, in honour of the present, or of a different, St. Montan, is kept, on the 26th of this month,<sup>49</sup> according to Colgan; and, yet, at such date, we find him omitted, by our national hagiologist, as indeed he is likewise omitted, from most of our Calendars, at the last-named day.

ARTICLE III.—ST. IOAVA OR JOAVA, BISHOP OF LEON, IN LESSER BRITANY, FRANCE. [Sixth Century.] From much earlier records, it would seem, that Albert Le Grande<sup>1</sup> produced the Acts of St. Ioava or Joava; and, from such account, in French, we have the life of this holy man, rendered into Latin, by Father John Colgan,<sup>2</sup> by the Bollandists,<sup>3</sup> and by other writers. Lobineau has also some particulars, recording his achievements and virtues;<sup>4</sup> while, the Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>5</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould, have brief notices of his life, in English.<sup>6</sup> The originals, from which his biography has been compiled, were old manuscript histories and legends, preserved at Leon, when Albert Le Grand first edited his Life,<sup>7</sup> in the year 1623.<sup>8</sup> The chief of these was an old record, containing Acts of the bishops over Leon Diocese.<sup>9</sup> We are assured, however, by Dom. Gui Alexis Lobineau, that some of St. Johava's written life appears to be false and unsustainable.<sup>10</sup> From our sources, we learn, that St. Iovava, Ioava, Iaöva, Iovinus, Iohævius,<sup>11</sup> or Joëvinus<sup>12</sup>—as he is differently called—had been an Irishman, by birth, and he was uncle, on the mother's side, to a prince, named Tinidorus,<sup>13</sup> the father of St. Tenenan.<sup>14</sup> The mother of our saint was own sister to St. Paul Aurelian.<sup>15</sup> However this may be, St. Joava spent some time in Wales.<sup>16</sup> He is said to have studied there, under his maternal uncle, St. Paul.<sup>17</sup> In the course of a short time, Joava became a great proficient in Philosophy and Theology.<sup>18</sup> Then, having obtained his uncle's permission, our saint returned to his father, and to his native country, where he was greatly respected for <sup>49</sup> See some notices of him, at the 26th of March.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Les Vies des Saints de la Bretagne Armorique," &c.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. Vita S. Ioavæ, Episcopi Leonensis, pp. 441 to 444.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ioava seu Jovino Leonii in Britannia Armorica. Besides the Life translated into Latin, by Colgan, the Bollandists give one, from Lessons in the Brevari of Leon, as also a previous commentary, in three paragraphs, pp. 138 to 141.

<sup>4</sup> See "Les Vies des Saints de la Bretagne," p. 71.

<sup>5</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March ii.

<sup>6</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 22.

<sup>7</sup> Vincent Le Grand, of Kersca Kerigounalen, gave an old MS. Life to him, in the month of May, A.D. 1623.

<sup>8</sup> See "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. ii., num. ccix., p. 76.

<sup>9</sup> This was edited in 1472, by Ivon, Grand Canon of St. Paul, Leon, and Rector of Plouneverten, Almoner and Chancellor to Francis II., last Duke of Brittany, who died A.D. 1488. By the marriage of his eldest daughter, Anna, to King Charles

VIII., the dukedom was annexed to the crown of France, A.D. 1491. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ioava seu Jovino, &c. Albert Le Grand's Life, num. 15, and n. (n), p. 141.

<sup>10</sup> See "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. ii., num. ccix., p. 76.

<sup>11</sup> Such is his appellation, in the Acts of St. Paul.

<sup>12</sup> See the old Office and Albertus Le Grand, as also the Bollandists and Colgan.

<sup>13</sup> It does not seem possible to identify him, among the entries in our Irish Annals.

<sup>14</sup> He was venerated, on the 16th of July, in Brittany, and as Albert Le Grande states, he was bishop of Leon, after St. Goluenus.

<sup>15</sup> His feast occurs, on the 12th of March. He is said to have become bishop, over St. Pol de Leon, A.D. 529. See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates." Index Chronologicus, A.D. DXXIX.

<sup>16</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 32.

<sup>17</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. xii., p. 492.

<sup>18</sup> Those readers, who might desire a further acquaintance with the Divinity and Secular science, taught in the early Welsh schools, will find some specimens of elegant his learning and polite accomplishments. Treated with all the distinction that became his rank, and introduced to the best society, it was hoped, by his parents, that Ioava should be married to some honourable and exemplary lady; but, his own inclinations led him to decline such an alliance, since he had already in secret cherished a desire, to devote himself wholly to a religious life.<sup>19</sup> His uncle, Paul Aurelian, born of an illustrious Welsh family, was a fellow-student with St. Gildas,<sup>20</sup> at the Monastery of St. Iltut.<sup>21</sup> He passed over the sea, with twelve priests; and, at first, he rested in the Isle of Ushant.<sup>22</sup> Thence he proceeded to the country about Leon,<sup>23</sup> where he acquired the high esteem of the religious King Victor. The latter sent him to Childebert, and soon afterwards he was consecrated, as the first Bishop of Leon.<sup>24</sup> Ioava had notice of this change, by letters received from the Greater Britain; and, he took occasion to leave Ireland, with as much secrecy as possible, by taking only two servants, who embarked on a vessel with him.<sup>25</sup> It was steered towards Ushant, and even it reached within sight of this island. A tempest arose, however, and it drove our saint far from the shore, and near to Llandeuenec,<sup>26</sup> where St. Winwaloe<sup>27</sup> had founded a monastery, over which he presided as abbot.<sup>28</sup> Ioava landed, at the mouth of the Faovian River, and then announcing his name, country and purpose, when he met the holy Abbot Judulus, Ioava was cordially received. Having re-embarked, he and his servants were conducted to the monastery of the former. Soon the young exile dismissed his Irish dependants. St. Ioava passed his novitiate under St. Judulus, in the monastery of Llanaterenecan,<sup>29</sup> or as it is Latinized, Landtuenecanum.<sup>30</sup> There, too, he assumed the religious habit, and, in due course, he aspired to a higher office in the Church. St. Ioava led an anchoretical life, in the country of Ack,<sup>31</sup> before he lived in the Island of Baaz. At Leon, he received priest's orders, from his uncle, St. Paul.<sup>32</sup> Ioava was then sent to resume his religious ministrations, in the monastery at Landtuenecanum. Soon the Abbot Judulus appointed him to govern the parish of Barspars,<sup>33</sup> then wanting a pastor. At first, great difficulties beset his administration, for the whole country about Cornuaille, in which it was situated, had been a prey to Pagan superstitions,<sup>34</sup> and the and instructive learning, conveyed in the "Barddas," edited by Rev. J. Williams, Ap. Ithel, M.A., vols. i., ii.

<sup>19</sup> The Bollandists notice some biographical inconsistencies—chiefly of a chronological order—in that Prologue, which they prefix to St. Ioava's Acts.

<sup>20</sup> See his Life, at the 29th of January.

<sup>21</sup> His feast is held, on the 6th of November.

<sup>22</sup> North-westwards, off the coast, in the present department of Finistère, France. S. Michel is noted on it, as marked on Alexander Keith Johnston's "Royal Atlas of Modern Geography." France, No. 10.

<sup>23</sup> It is situated in Lower Bretagne, near the sea.

<sup>24</sup> See Dom. Gui Alexis Lobineau's "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. ii., num. ccxi., p. 74.

<sup>25</sup> One account has it, that he travelled with Paulinien, who is apparently no other than the foregoing Paul, when he sailed to Lesser Britain. See ibid., num. ccix., p. 76.

<sup>26</sup> This was near the harbour of Brest, in Brittany, and it was called the Glastonbury of that province, "the final resting-place of the monastic exiles, who grew old, but could not die in the wild paradise of their first settlement, and which held fast its Scotch-British customs until the ninth century."—Haddan, "Remains," p. 264.

<sup>27</sup> He died on the 3rd of March, A.D. 529.

<sup>28</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 32.

<sup>29</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 22.

<sup>30</sup> This was an ancient Abbey of the Diocese of Corisopitan. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ioava sive Jovino, &c., n. (c), p. 141.

<sup>31</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March ii.

<sup>32</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 22.

<sup>33</sup> This lies about eleven leagues, towards the south, from St. Paul's City of Leon.

<sup>34</sup> Cicero, who flourished B.C. 43, speaks of the Gaulish Druids, with one of whom,

people were very ignorant regarding the Christian doctrine. However, owing to the eloquence, example, reproaches and prayers of their new pastor, the inhabitants were converted from their former errors and evil ways. Here lived, at the time, in a castle, called Kerar-Roue, or Ker-ar,<sup>35</sup> a nobleman and a Christian, named Aristagnus.<sup>36</sup> A nephew of this chieftain, and son of his sister, was the Toparch of Le Fou. He was very hostile to our saint, because he had brought over so many to the true Faith. Dissembling his vindictive purpose, he resolved on finding an opportunity to effect his revenge; and, hearing that a meeting of holy abbots, belonging to Cornuaille, should soon be held, near his own territories, with a pretended zeal for the interests of religion, the false Toparch led an armed band to that place, appointed for this conference. A holy Irish priest, named Taidoc,<sup>37</sup> had already destroyed some pagan temples in the neighbourhood, and he was then engaged offering the Christians' sacrifice. Joava and Judulus<sup>38</sup> happened to be present. All were attacked by an armed party, under the leadership of their local tyrant. Taidoc had just pronounced the words "Nobis quoque peccatoribus," when the myrmidons rushed in, and murdered him at the altar. Judulus and others perished by the sword. The surviving religious present sought safety in flight. Divine punishment fell immediately on the wicked chief,<sup>39</sup> who is said to have been seized with a sudden madness, while other marks of Divine displeasure followed his impious and murderous intent. St. Ioava escaped the slaughter, however, and reached in safety his parish of Barsparz, but he experienced a deep sorrow for the death of St. Judulus and his holy religious.<sup>40</sup> Before this time, St. Paul governed an island monastery in the Morbihan,<sup>41</sup> and the people now sent an embassy to Ker-paol, where he then dwelt, to ask his interposition. He exhorted them, to do penance, and he promised to visit their country. When they had departed, with such a message, St. Paul and certain companions set out on a journey, towards the parish of Plougaran,<sup>42</sup> and at a spot, afterwards known as Mouster-Paul,<sup>43</sup> he turned aside to pray. There he had a vision, and a beautiful young man seemed to admonish him, that the journey should be prosecuted, and that it must have a successful issue. Then, too, Iaova, having had a premonition, that his uncle was on the way to Le Fou, set out and met him, at a place, called Coatgarz, where after the usual salutes were exchanged, they embraced each other. St. Paul then felt a thirst, and he ordered St. Iaova to strike an adjoining rock with his staff, when a clear and most refreshing fountain issued. Both drank from it, and they sung our Lord's praises, at that place. When they approached Le Fou, a great crowd of people came forth to meet them. To these, St. Paul preached the Christian Faith, the necessity for Divitiacus Æduus, he was acquainted. This man not only professed an intimate knowledge of the system of nature, which the Greeks called physiology, but also he foretold future events, partly by augury, and partly by conjecture. See "De Divinatione," lib. i.

<sup>35</sup> It is scarcely two leagues from the parish of Leon. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Ioava seu Jovino, &c., n. (d), p. 141.

<sup>36</sup> This name seems derivable from the Greek, signifying "good" or "chaste." See ibid., n. (f).

<sup>37</sup> Colgan thinks he was the same as St. Tada MacColgan, whose name is found in the "Tallagh Martyrology," edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly (See p. xiv.); because, no place is assigned for him, and possibly as he died away from his own country. There is another Taodhog, of Tech-Taodhog, venerated on the 13th of July. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. Vita S. Jaova, Episcopi Leonensis, n. 5, p. 443.

<sup>38</sup> Colgan remarks, that he found nothing more regarding him, than what is here related. See ibid., n. 6.

<sup>39</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 32.

<sup>40</sup> The account of this massacre is to be found in the Lessons of the Leon Breviary.

<sup>41</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 32.

<sup>42</sup> It is four leagues distant from the city of Leon, and in the direction of Brest.

<sup>43</sup> Or the Monastery of Paul.

doing penance, and for renouncing pagan practices, in the name of Jesus Christ. All were moved, through the force of his exhortations, and cried out with one voice, that they should become thoroughly repentant. Then ordering an altar to be prepared, and St. Ioava having finished the Holy Sacrifice, St. Paul wrought a wonderful miracle, in relieving the district, from the presence of a dragon, which had there caused great terror and loss of life. Afterwards, he visited the Toparch, from whom he expelled a demon, and marking him with a sign of the cross, that Dynast was instructed in the Christian doctrine. Then he was baptized by St. Ioava, while St. Paul, who assisted, gave him that same name, which he bore himself. The Toparch's whole family followed this example. His mother ran in great joy to acquaint her brother, Aristagnus, with the news of her son's restoration and of his baptism. Aristagnus requested St. Paul and St. Ioava to visit him, and they consented; when, on their arrival, the chieftain, with a large train, came out to meet them. He not only received them most courteously, but he even promised, in his nephew's name, that he should expiate a former offence. Nor did the Toparch refuse to execute this promise, made by his uncle. A fine monastery was then erected, to perpetuate their memory, on that very spot, where St. Taidoc and St. Judulus had been martyred.<sup>43</sup> Joava was chosen as its first abbot,<sup>44</sup> at the request of the Toparch of Le Fou. After a few years, the building was completed, and liberally endowed. It was consecrated by the Bishop of Cornouaille. Joava was directed, by his uncle, St. Paul, to reside in the Isle of Baz,<sup>45</sup> as we are told; but, for this statement, we find no corresponding warranty, derivable from the old Acts.<sup>46</sup> It was known in after times as St. Mary's Monastery of Doulas,<sup>47</sup> Daoulane or Daouz-Glas,<sup>48</sup> which is interpreted as "the monastery of the two wounds."<sup>49</sup> We may well pass over some fabulous accounts, referring to St. Paul's return; but, it must suffice to state, that St. Ioava collected a numerous company of monks at Daoulane, and his life was there a cause for great edification. The evil one, however, envying his success, in freeing the province from heathenish thralldom, forced him at length to resign the rectorship of Barsparz to Tuseran, or Tusuran,<sup>50</sup> the son of Aristagnus. Having instructed the latter, in the right manner of ruling his parish and monastery, Joava asked leave from his religious, to seek his uncle Paul, at Leon. He was joyfully received there. He is stated, to have been created a Canon of the Cathedral Church.<sup>51</sup> Soon he was destined for a higher dignity. Being chosen as Bishop of Leon, St. Paul invited Joava to aid him, in sanctifying his people.<sup>52</sup> The senior now desired to spend his life in retirement, and his canons advised, that the assistant bishop should assume the responsibility of government. Then, St. Sampson<sup>53</sup> ruled over the see of Dol, and he was regarded as the Metropolitan of Britany. By him, it is stated, Joava was consecrated bishop. St.

<sup>44</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., pp. 32, 33.

<sup>45</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ii., p. 22.

<sup>46</sup> However, this appears to be founded on the Lessons of the old Breviary of Leon.

<sup>47</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 33.

<sup>48</sup> The Bollandists suppose, in referring to this passage, that as Albert Le Grande wrote his account from certain knowledge, it may be inferred, that the compilers of the Catalogue of all the Gaulish Churches, denominated Poullie, have omitted the names of many monasteries and churches.

<sup>49</sup> It became a house for Canons Regular

of St. Augustine. It belonged to the Diocese of Corisopotensis, in Armoric Cornouaille, as Claudius Robert shows in his list of the bishops there, as also in a Catalogue of the Gaulish Monasteries.

<sup>50</sup> If this person belong to the list of saints, it does not seem possible to identify him, from the Calendars. Hugh Menard, in his Benedictine Martyrology, at the 25th of November, has a Blessed Toussan, Monk of Cluny, but seemingly different from the present Tuseran.

<sup>51</sup> See the Lessons in the Breviary of Leon.

<sup>52</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 33.

Paul soon retired from his see, to the monastery of Baaz, being weighed down with old age and infirmities.<sup>54</sup> While Joava diligently exercised his episcopal duties at Leon,<sup>55</sup> the people he had left experienced the horrors of a famine, for three successive years, and were obliged to bring breadstuffs, from the most remote parts of Britany. Recognising this scarcity, as a punishment for their ingratitude towards our saint, they sent some of the Ocismii<sup>56</sup> to Leon, who requested his forgiveness, and return to their place, so that they might receive his benediction. Forgetful of injuries, the holy man was only too anxious to repay good for evil. He returned to their country, and no sooner had he prayed for increased prosperity there, than the earth and its fruits seemed to revive, and abundance followed. While here, in the presbytery of Barzparz, Ioava was stricken with a fever, which, after a few days access, deprived him of all strength. The third day before his death, a Divine intuition conveyed this intelligence to St. Kenan<sup>57</sup> of Plou-kernaw, and to St. Paul, then residing in the Island Monastery of Baaz. The former instantly set out for Barzparz, to administer every spiritual succour to Ioava, and to arrange for his honourable interment. Our saint was greatly consoled, on his arrival, and piously received the Church Sacraments, through Kenan's ministry. Then blessing those around him, the holy bishop gave directions about his interment. Afterwards, extending his hands towards heaven, he rendered his soul to his Creator, on the 2nd day of March. St. Joava only ruled over the ancient see of Leon, for one year and seventy days,<sup>58</sup> while he died, A.D. 554,<sup>59</sup> or 555.<sup>60</sup> The body was washed after his death, and clothed in pontifical garments. Then, it was laid on a new couch, or litter, according to his previous directions, and borne by animals, along the great road, leading from Barzparz, until these arrived at a place, called Porz-arr charz, where they stopped of their own accord. There, the bier seemed violently agitated, and a loud sound was heard; yet, the animals advanced about five hundred paces onwards, to where a grave had been prepared miraculously for the remains. Here, they were buried, and a splendid temple, called after St. Ioava, was subsequently erected. In course of time, his relics were transferred to the Cathedral Church of Leon, where they were religiously preserved. As nothing occurs, in our Irish Calendars, at this date, in reference to St. Iaova or Jovinus, Colgan thinks his name may have undergone some change among the Gauls, where he lived and died, away from his own country.<sup>61</sup> He is the special patron of two parishes,<sup>62</sup> one called Ker-iouen,<sup>63</sup> and the other St. Iouan,<sup>64</sup> in Leon diocese.<sup>65</sup> There, his

<sup>53</sup> See his Life, at the 28th of July.

<sup>54</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 33.

<sup>55</sup> In his Catalogue of the Bishops of Leon, Joava is omitted from it, by Claudius Robert, most probably, as Colgan states, because he administered that see, while St. Paul was living. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. Vita S. Iaovæ, Episcopi Leonensis, n. 9, p. 443.

<sup>56</sup> These were an ancient people of Bretagne, who lived near Leon and Treguier. See Cæsar "Commentariorum de Bello Gallico," lib. iii., cap. ix.

<sup>57</sup> There is some question about this saint's identity. The reader is referred to what has been already written about St. Cienan or Kenan, Abbot, in the second vol. of this Work, Art. i., at the 25th of February. See, also, the notices of St. Cienan or Kenan, at the 5th, and of St. Cienan or Kenan, Bishop of Duleek, at the 24th, of November.

<sup>58</sup> Yet, nothing regarding these seventy days, as the Bollandists remark, can be found in the Acts of St. Paul. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Iaova sive Jovino, &c., n. (m), p. 141.

<sup>59</sup> Such is the date found in the Breviary of Leon.

<sup>60</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 33.

<sup>61</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. Vita S. Iaovæ Episcopi Leonensis, n. 1, p. 443.

<sup>62</sup> See Lobineau's "Les Vies des Saints de la Bretagne," p. 71.

<sup>63</sup> This lay on the shore of the British Sea, and about seven French leagues from the city of Leon.

<sup>64</sup> This is called St. Iahona, in the des-feast has been celebrated on the 2nd of March, the anniversary of his death, and with an office of nine Lessons, as contained in the Legendary of the Cathedral. It might be desired, that his Acts<sup>66</sup> were better expurgated, as they contain legends, which, instead of heightening the interest for judicious readers, tend rather to depreciate their authenticity and value, when subjected to the process of just criticism.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. FERGNA BRITT, ABBOT OF IONA. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] The Acts of St. Fergna, or Fergnaus, drawn from various writers, have been published by Colgan, at the 2nd of March.<sup>1</sup> In like manner, the Bollandists follow his authority, taking exceptions to some of those attributed Acts.<sup>2</sup> Bishop Forbes has certain notices regarding him.<sup>3</sup> The surname Brit, which signifies a “Briton,” was derived, in Colgan’s opinion, from his having lived in Britain; but, the Rev. Dr. Reeves thinks, that probably more is implied in such an epithet, than is found recorded.<sup>4</sup> He belonged to the race of Conall Gulban, son to Niall,<sup>5</sup> and he was son to Failbe, belonging to the family of Enna Boghaine. Fergna was born, probably after or about the middle of the sixth century, having been a member of the community in St. Columba’s time.<sup>6</sup> He is called Virgnous, by Adamnan, who describes him as being a youth of ardent piety.<sup>7</sup> St. Ængus the Culdee and the Calendar of Cashel designate him, by an epithet<sup>8</sup> meaning “white” or “fair.” He appears to have presided over the religious community, at Iona, from A.D. 605, to 623, having immediately succeeded St. Laisren, or Laisrien,<sup>9</sup> who died on the 16th of September, in the former year. It is said, that St. Fergna had lived for some time with St. Lugudius,<sup>10</sup> Abbot of Cluain-Finchuil, or Cluain-Fiacul,<sup>11</sup> in Ireland;<sup>12</sup> but, this Fergnous or Vergnous is clearly a different person. Both are confounded, however, by Colgan, who represents St. Fergna, as the disciple of St. Columkille.<sup>13</sup> He was the fourth abbot, in succession; but, not so nearly related, to St. Columba,<sup>14</sup> as his predecessors. The contemporaneous incidents of his rule have been noted, by the Rev. Dr. Reeves.<sup>15</sup> For additional particulars cription of the Benefices of France. The Bollandists think, it was the place of our saint’s first burial.

<sup>65</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran’s “Early Irish Missions,” No. i., p. 33.

<sup>66</sup> The Rev. Alban Butler observes, that his Life, copied by Albert the Great, from older Acts, “deserves no regard.”

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii ii. De S. Fergna sive Fergnao, Abbate Hiensi et Episcopo, ex variis, pp. 448 to 450.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i., Martii ii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 125.

<sup>3</sup> See “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 336.

<sup>4</sup> See Adamnan’s “Life of St. Columba,” Additional Notes, O, p. 372.

<sup>5</sup> His pedigree is given from the “Sanctilogic Genealogy,” chap. i., in Colgan’s “Trias Thaumaturga.” Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 481, cap. x., p. 492.

<sup>6</sup> This identity is called in question, by Dr. Lanigan. See “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. ii., chap. xiv., sect. xii., n. 167, p. 348.

<sup>7</sup> See Rev. William Reeves’ Adamnan’s “Life of St. Columba,” lib. iii., cap. 19, pp. 223 to 225.

<sup>8</sup> Fionn.

<sup>9</sup> See notices of him, at the 16th of September.

<sup>10</sup> See notices of him, at this date.

<sup>11</sup> Now Clonfeakle, a parish situated, partly in the baronies of Armagh and Oneilland West, county of Armagh, which part is shown on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh,” Sheets 4, 8; and, partly in the barony of Middle Dunganon, which is found on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone,” Sheets 54, 55, 61, 62, 67. Clonfeacle town is on Sheet 61, ibid.

<sup>12</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii ii. De S. Fergna sive Fergnao, Abbate Hiensi et Episcopo, p. 449.

<sup>13</sup> See “Trias Thaumaturga.” Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 58, 112, pp. 490, 492.

<sup>14</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>15</sup> See his Adamnan’s “Life of St. Columba,” lib. iii., cap. 23, n. (d), pp. 236, 237, and Additional Notes, (O), pp. 372, 373.

regarding him, the reader is referred to the Life of St. Columba. Fergna's death is noted, at A.D. 616, in the Annals of Inisfallen; at A.D. 622, by the Annals of the Four Masters;<sup>16</sup> and, at A.D. 623, by the Annals of Tighernach, and by the Rev. William Reeves.<sup>17</sup> The 2nd of March is supposed to have been the day of his death. Simply the name Fergna, Abbot of Ia, is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>18</sup> at the same date. St. Ængus the Culdee notices him,<sup>19</sup> at the 2nd of March, as likewise Marianus O'Gorman; but, in the gloss to his Calendar, Fergna is styled bishop. Yet, this is thought to have been an incorrect designation; in so much as the precedent, so recently established, in Iona, by the founder, could hardly have been departed from, in the case of its fourth abbot.<sup>20</sup> Besides, a century afterwards, Venerable Bede asserts, that in Iona they were always accustomed to have its ruler, a priest abbot.<sup>21</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>22</sup> mentions, as having a festival on this day, Fergna Britt, son of Fáilbhe, Bishop. In the entry of his name, by the compiler of a table added to this Martyrology, it is Latinized, Virgnous.<sup>23</sup> In addition, Duaid Mac Firbis enters Fergna Britt, Bishop and Abbot of Ia-Colum-Cille, at March 2nd.<sup>24</sup> At this date, likewise, the Carthusian Martyrology records his feast.<sup>25</sup> At the 2nd of March, the Drummond Kalendar observes, that the Abbot Fergna, of the Hy monastery, went to Christ.<sup>26</sup> In Ireland, this holy man seems to have had his office recited in nine lessons, as we learn from an old Antiphonarium, belonging to the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.

ARTICLE V.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A MONENDABBIS, OR MOVENDAS, AS ALSO OF TEDGNÆ, TEDQUUS OR TEUGNA, TENGUUS, ABBOTS. In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, as also in the list of Henry Fitzsimons, at the 2nd of March, we find the name of St. Movendas, Abbot. He is entered, likewise, in the Carthusian Martyrology,<sup>1</sup> or Usuard, with the additions of Hermann Greuen, as the Bollandists remark;<sup>2</sup> and again, in the

<sup>16</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 244, 245.

<sup>17</sup> See his Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes, O, pp. 372, 373.

<sup>18</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>19</sup> As the "white Fergna in Hy." See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 336. To Professor O'Looney the writer feels indebted for the following rum, taken from the Leabhar Breac copy of the "Félire" of St. Ængus, in Irish, with the English translation, which is here appended:—

E. iii. n. na mebnaisceher feil
1 páir lucilíae
Zein ren poit élan ooe feil fíno fergna íae.

If it be appropriate to celebrate a Feast

On the passion of Lucilia
Birth of old Paul full of sanctity
The Feast of Find Chief of Iona.

<sup>20</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes, O, p. 373. Here will be found, a research-ful and most complete account of the chro-nology, not only of this abbot's times, but of all the other abbots' periods, at Iona, with annalistic entries.

<sup>21</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iii., cap. iv.

<sup>22</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>23</sup> See, ibid., pp. 414, 415.

<sup>24</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 112, 113.

<sup>25</sup> It states: "In Hibernia Fergna et Monendabbis Abbatum." Colgan, however, corrects this mistake, by stating that these names were substituted for "Fergna et Montani Abbatum," since these are both venerated in Ireland, on this day. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. De S. Fergna sive Fergnao, &c., nn. 10, 11, p. 450.

<sup>26</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 6.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Iberniæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 56.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Among the premitted saints, p. 125.

<sup>3</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Ca-

anonymous Catalogue of National Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 2nd of March, we find Tedquus. On the authority of Floratus, the same Tedquus or Tenguus, an abbot, is noticed in Henry Fitzsimon's list, at the very same date;<sup>3</sup> the Bollandists have this name Teugna. However, they think, this may be a mistake for Fergna, and they state, that otherwise the foregoing saints' names were unknown to the Irish. Colgan accounts for a different mistake of entry, as we have remarked, in a previous note.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. LUGADIUS, OF CLUAIN-FINCHUIL, OR CLUAIN-FIACUL, CLONFEAKLE, COUNTY OF ARMAGH. [Probably in the Sixth Century.] Acts of this saint are inserted, by Colgan, at the 2nd of March.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists have only a few short notices, regarding him, and they deem many of Colgan's statements to be inconsequential, especially in reference to this saint's identification.<sup>2</sup> Great diversity of opinion seems to prevail concerning his age and period. According to Colgan's conjecture,<sup>3</sup> this holy man, the son of Tulchan, was probably a brother to St. Fintan Munnu,<sup>4</sup> and to St. Kieran,<sup>5</sup> as also to their sister, St. Conchenna.<sup>6</sup> Yet, elsewhere, Colgan has a different opinion, that he was the same as Lugatius, a bishop, and a disciple of St. Patrick.<sup>7</sup> The reader will find some account of him, in the notices of St. Meallan,<sup>8</sup> which have been already published, at the 28th of January.<sup>9</sup> However, we must not too hastily assume, that the bishop, there spoken of, was identical with the St. Lugadius, noted in our Calendars, on this day.<sup>10</sup> Among St. Patrick's disciples is classed Lugacius, of Kill-airthir; and, it has been supposed by Colgan, that his festival belonged, either to the 2nd of March, or to the 16th of June.<sup>11</sup> The more generally received opinion seems to be, that he was the son of Tulchan, and born probably in the earlier part of the sixth century. It is also conjectured, that our saint lived some time under the discipline of St. Columba.<sup>12</sup> This saint, in the opinion of Colgan, was abbot over a place called Cluain-Finchuil<sup>13</sup> or probably Cluain-Fiacul.<sup>14</sup> As we have already seen, this latter is identical with Clonfeakle, a parish, partly in the county of Armagh, and partly in the country of Tyrone.<sup>15</sup> It is thought, too, that St. Lugadius flourished, towards the close of the sixth century, in as much as a certain holy man, thus named, had there a vision of St. Columba's death, which took place in the Island of Iona. That holy man was then old, and, it is probable, he did not long survive the illustrious abbot;<sup>16</sup> so that, if such be the case, his death may be referred to near the beginning of the seventh century. Nor does it seem certain, that this tholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 57.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. De S. Lugadio Abbate de Cluain-Finchuil sive Cluain-Fiacul. Ex variis, pp. 452, 453.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 125.

<sup>3</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 483, and cap. x., p. 491.

<sup>4</sup> Venerated, on the 21st of October.

<sup>5</sup> Possibly venerated, on the 9th of January.

<sup>6</sup> Venerated, on the 13th of March.

<sup>7</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, n. 104, p. 113.

<sup>8</sup> Called of Kilrush, or of Cloncraft.

<sup>9</sup> See vol. i., art. ii., n. 12.

<sup>10</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i.; Martii ii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 125.

<sup>11</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 266.

<sup>12</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>13</sup> Colgan could not find any Irish place so called.

<sup>14</sup> This he states was near Armagh.

<sup>15</sup> The ancient church stood in the townland of Tullydowey, in a curve of the River Blackwater, on the Tyrone or north side. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps of the County of Tyrone," Sheet 62. Various references are made to it in old mediæval records, as Cluain-fiacail, Clonfecyna, Cluain-Fiachna, &c. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (t), p. 749.

Lugadius had been elevated to the dignity of abbot; for, our Calendars only record his having been a priest.<sup>17</sup> We find a similar entry, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>18</sup> at the 2nd of March, regarding him. Marianus O'Gorman, Cathal Maguire, and the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>19</sup> register, on this day, a Lughaidh, Priest. As the other saints, bearing his name in our Calendars, are distinguished, by family or place, Colgan thinks it right to assign this festival for St. Lugadius of Cluain-Finchuil.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. SLEBHENE, OR SLEBHINE, ABBOT OF IONA. [Eighth Century.] At this date, likewise, the Irish Church seems to have venerated another abbot of Iona. When or where he was born does not appear to have transpired; yet, we have sufficient proof, that he was of a well-known Irish race.<sup>2</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>2</sup> this day registers, Slebhene, son of Conghal. His father was Dubhduin, son to Slebhine, son of Seghine, son to Ronan or Cronan, son of Loarn, who was the son of Fergus Cennfada or Duach, and of his wife, Erca, the daughter of Loarn Mor. Thus was he in a right line descended from the race of Conall Gulban, son to Niall<sup>3</sup> the Great. The holy man Slebhine seems to have lived under the discipline of Cilline Droicteach, who died abbot of Iona,<sup>4</sup> on the 3rd of July, A.D. 752.<sup>5</sup> The virtues and merits of Slebhine, no doubt, singled him out, among his brother monks, as worthy of succession. He was the fifteenth abbot of Ia, and soon after his accession, the death of Cillen, son of Congaile—probably his own brother—took place in Hy. During the period of Slebhine's incumbency, the Columbian influence in Ireland seems to have been at its height, as may be concluded from the mention of the Lex Coluimcille having been enforced by Domhnall, King of Ireland, in A.D. 753, and also by Sleibene himself, A.D. 757. In the year 754, the Abbot of Iona visited Ireland; and, in the year 758, he returned thither. After the death of Fedhlimidh or Failbe, who discharged the duties of assistant abbot of Hy, Sleibne passed to the rewards of the just, A.D. 754, according to the Annals of Inisfallen.<sup>6</sup> Those of the Four Masters,<sup>7</sup> however, place his demise, at A.D. 762; while the Annals of Ulster have the year 766,<sup>8</sup> and again, the Rev. William Reeves states, that he died, on the 2nd of March, A.D. 767, after an incumbency of fifteen years, over the celebrated monastery of Iona.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>16</sup> St. Columba is generally thought to have died about A.D. 597.

<sup>17</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. De S. Lugadio Abbate de Cluain-Finchuil sive Cluain-Fiacul, nn. 8, 9, 10, p. 453.

<sup>18</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>19</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See the Genealogical Table of the early abbots of Hy, showing their affinity to one another, and their connexion with the chief families of Tirconnell, in Rev. William Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes (N), p. 342.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 482. See also Slevinus, p. 502. Ibid.

<sup>4</sup> For a description of some very interesting crosses, at Iona, the reader may consult that magnificently illustrated work of the late lamented Dr. John Stuart, the "Sculptured Stones of Scotland," vol. ii., pp. 25 to 27. The plates are numbered XL., XLI., XLII., XLIII., XLIV., XLV., XLVI., XLVII. The Irish style of embossing, interlacing and sculpture, prevails in their decoration.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 3rd of July,

<sup>6</sup> See "Annales Inisfalenses," p. 22. Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus ii.

<sup>7</sup> See O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 364, 365.

<sup>8</sup> See "Annales Ultonienses," p. 101. Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv.

<sup>9</sup> See his Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes (O), pp. 385, 386.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. SUIBHNE, ABBOT OF IONA. [Eighth Century.] The pedigree of this holy man is not recorded; but, probably, he was born in Ireland, and of the Tirconnellian race. He seems to have discharged the duties of assistant abbot at Iona, during the lifetime of Slebhine,<sup>1</sup> and in that capacity he visited Ireland, A.D. 765,<sup>2</sup> or 766. On his death, the succeeding year, Suibhne succeeded to the full rule of the monastery, which only engaged his care for four years exactly, for he died, on the 2nd day of March, A.D. 772.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE IX.—DERMIT O'MULRONY, MARTYR, AT GALLBALLY, COUNTY OF TIPPERARY. [Sixteenth Century.] The Bollandists note a festival—taken from the Franciscan Martyrology—of Dermitius Mulronius, at the 2nd of March.<sup>1</sup> The best accounts of this holy man are to be found in Father Mooney's Manuscript,<sup>2</sup> in Rothe,<sup>3</sup> in Wadding,<sup>4</sup> and in the valuable work more recently published, by Major Myles O'Reilly.<sup>5</sup> We know little more regarding him, than that he lived in the Franciscan Convent,<sup>6</sup> in the town of Galbally,<sup>7</sup> in the Glen of Aharlow,<sup>8</sup> at the foot of the Galty Mountains,<sup>9</sup> said to have been in the county of Tipperary.<sup>10</sup> This, however, is incorrect, for the place is within the county of Limerick. It was a rural town, in the diocese of Emly. About the year 1570, while the Viceroy, Sir Henry Sydney,<sup>11</sup> was making an excursion in that part of Ireland, a Franciscan priest, called Dermot O'Mulroney, and two companions, fled from that place, to the town of Clonmel, in order to escape the persecution, which was then vehement.<sup>12</sup> When these had remained there for some time, thinking all was safe, they returned to their former house; but, on a certain day, the English soldiers suddenly came, and surrounded the place, so that there was no way for those brethren to escape. All three mounted into the bell-tower of the church to

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See his Acts, for this day, in the previous article.

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv. Annales Ultionenses, p. 101.

<sup>3</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes (O), p. 386.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Among the pretermitted saints," p. 125.

<sup>2</sup> Now preserved in the Burgundian Library, Bruxelles, and classed No. 3195. "De Provincia Hiberniæ Ordinis Sancti Francisci, Tractatus a Rev. Donato Money," A.D. 1627.

<sup>3</sup> See "Analecta Mira et Nova," part ii.

<sup>4</sup> See "Scriptores Ordinis Minorum," and "Annales Ordinis Minorum."

<sup>5</sup> See "Memorials of those who suffered for the Catholic Faith in Ireland, in the 16th, 17th and 18th Centuries," pp. 18, 19. London, 1868, 8vo.

<sup>6</sup> Excepting the walls, this convent had been destroyed, when Father Mooney wrote. In 1204, it is said, Donagh Cairbre O'Brien, founded here the Abbey for Franciscan or Grey Friars, which, on the 20th of January, in the 35th year of King Henry VIII.'s reign, with its appurtenances, was granted, in capite, to John of Desmond. See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 420.

<sup>7</sup> It is a parish, in the barony of Coshlea, county of Limerick. See it described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheets 41, 49, 50, 57, 58. The town itself is noted on Sheet 49. Ibid.

<sup>8</sup> This picturesque and romantic glen is the only pass into Tipperary, from the northern and eastern parts of Cork, and from the western parts of Limerick. See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. i., p. 637.

<sup>9</sup> This sublime and rugged range has a deserved celebrity in prose and verse description. In Joseph Brennan's ballad, "An Exile's Dreams," allusion to it thus occurs:—

"I will go where the Galtees
Are rising bare and high,
With their haggard foreheads fronting
The scowl of clouded sky."

See Duncathail's "Ballads, Popular Poetry and Household Songs of Ireland," p. 106.

<sup>10</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "The Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 280.

<sup>11</sup> See an account of him in "Memoirs of the Lives and Actions of the Sydneys." Also Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. iv., chap. xlviii., xlix., l., pp. 14 to 87.

<sup>12</sup> He had good reason to seek a place of retreat, from one, whose prejudices against the native clergy, caused him to write to hide, and then they drew up a portable ladder, which was there. The soldiers made a fire to burn the church and tower, and wishing to save both, Father Dermot, having let down the ladder, and signing himself with a sign of the cross, freely descended. He also repeated the psalm, "Have mercy on me, O Lord."<sup>13</sup> Nothing moved, the ruffian soldiers loaded him with blows and wounds. At length, they struck off his head. But, a marvel was then seen; for, no drop of blood flowed from his body. The soldiers seeing this, hacked his body to pieces, and still no blood flowed. The names of his two suffering companions have not been preserved, in the locality, where this outrage happened.

ARTICLE X.—ST. VILLEIC OR WILLEIC, PRIEST, AT KAISERWERTH, ON THE RHINE. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] The Acts of this holy missionary have been published, by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> by the Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> by Capgrave,<sup>3</sup> by Baronius,<sup>4</sup> and by most of the ecclesiastical historians and biographers. Molanus,<sup>5</sup> Miræus,<sup>6</sup> Hugh Menard,<sup>7</sup> Surius,<sup>8</sup> Rosweyde, and the sixth volume of the "Acta Sanctorum Belgii Selecta"<sup>9</sup> record the Acts of St. Willeic, Priest, at the 2nd of March. These are chiefly drawn from the account, contained in Venerable Bede's notices of St. Suitbert.<sup>10</sup> Although it may be admitted, that Villeic or Willeic had been an Anglo-Saxon, by birth; yet, it is supposed, he was educated in Ireland, and that thence he accompanied St. Switbert<sup>11</sup> and other companions to preach the Gospel to those pagans, then living near the Lower Rhine. Whether or not, the present holy man belonged to the twelve companions of St. Egbert, who, under the guidance of St. Willibrord<sup>12</sup> and St. Suitbert, set out from Ireland together, is a question for enquiry, in the opinion of Colgan. He adheres to such a view of the case, yet he deems it possible that St. Willeic and St. Adalbert<sup>13</sup> may have followed the earlier pioneers. According to received accounts, St. Willeic was a man of eminent piety and erudition. He was versed, in the Latin and German languages; and, we may also venture to suppose, he had a knowledge of the Anglo-Saxon and Irish learning. Whether he became a priest, before or after his leaving Ireland, does not appear; but, we are told, he was distinguished for his eloquence, and power, in preaching.<sup>14</sup> By St. Suitbert, he was sufficiently instructed in the Sacred Scriptures, so that he was enabled to glean an abundant harvest of souls from idolatry, to embrace the Christian religion. With a pure heart and singleness of purpose, from his youth, St. Willeic imitated the virtues of his master, St. Suitbert. His chastity, love of prayer and meditation; his meekness and humility; his care of the sick and poor; his zeal for souls and his wisdom in the cares of Queen Elizabeth, about "Irishe preists, or rather Irishe roges, havinge verye little Lattin, lesse learninge or civilitie." See Leland's "History of Ireland," vol. ii., book iv., chap. iii., n., p. 321.

<sup>13</sup> Psalms l., 3.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ii. De S. Villeico Confess., pp. 447, 448.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Willeico Presbytero Discipulo S. Suiberti Ep. Cæsaris-Werdæ ad Rhenum., sects. i., ii., pp. 148 to 150.

<sup>3</sup> In "Nova Legenda Angliæ," &c.

<sup>4</sup> See "Annales Ecclesiastici," &c.

<sup>5</sup> In "Natalibus Sanctorum Belgii."

<sup>6</sup> "In Fastis Belgicis et Burgundicis."

<sup>7</sup> In "Martyrologium Benedictinum."

<sup>8</sup> See "De Probatis Sanctorum Historiis," tomus ii., Martius i. De S. Swiberto Episcopo, cap. 26, p. 24.

<sup>9</sup> His Acts are here given in a commentary by John Bollandus, in two sections. See tomus vi., pp. 640 to 645.

<sup>10</sup> See his Life, already published, at the 1st of this month.

<sup>11</sup> In the first edition of his Anglican Martyrology, printed A.D. 1608, John Wilson states, that he took departure with St. Suibert from England; but, in the second edition, printed 1640, he has omitted some of his statements, regarding St. Willeic.

<sup>12</sup> See his Life, at the 7th of November.

<sup>13</sup> His feast occurs, at the 25th of June.

<sup>14</sup> See Molanus' "In Natalibus Sanctorum Belgii," at Martii 2.

government; all these rendered him a most useful missionary. Willeic is stated, to have been appointed canon, in a convent of Utrecht.<sup>15</sup> Afterwards, he rendered great assistance to St. Suitbert, as we have already seen, and by the latter he was appointed a sub-prior over the monastery of Werda, where he gave great edification to the monks, while his labours equally profited the pagans around him. He was held in great reverence by Queen Plectrude; and, at her request, it is stated, while he was in Cologne, the Governor of this city, Gotebald, labouring under a grievous infirmity, was healed by our saint.<sup>16</sup> Having entered the house, and offering the Holy Sacrifice of Mass, Willeic prostrated himself in prayer, and with tears, he earnestly besought our Lord Jesus Christ, on behalf of the sick man. Then placing his hand on the head of Gotebald, and thrice blessing him, the long-enduring malady left the patient. Then rising from bed, and putting on his garments, Gotebald ordered a grand banquet to be prepared for his guest, who was treated with distinguished honour. Gotebald gave thanks to God for the great favour accorded him, and after it, he lived for many years. On the death of St. Suitbert, the holy Willeic succeeded him as abbot over Kaiserwerth monastery, and he governed it for ten years. His death occurred, A.D. 727, according to Molanus: the Bollandists have A.D. 728.<sup>17</sup> Besides these writers, Usuard and his continuator, Herman Greuen, Petrus Canisius, Constantinus Ghinnius, Trithemius, Arnold Wion, Hugh Menard, Benedict Dorgan, Gabriel Bucelin, the Manuscript Florarius, Franciscus Haræus, and the Calendarists, generally, assign his Natalis, to the 2nd of March.<sup>18</sup> The remains of St. Willeic were deposited in the same tomb, with those of St. Suitbert. In the year 1403, the head of St. Willeic was solemnly translated to Dusseldorp, while Archbishop Frederick Sarwerdan ruled over the see of Cologne.<sup>19</sup> In the year 1626, by Ferdinand Banar, Archbishop of Cologne, the tomb of St. Suitbert was inspected, and found divided in the middle; one part containing his remains, and the other those of St. Willeic, both enclosed in red cambric. From a leaden plate, it was discovered, that both relics were laid in this shrine, A.D. 1264, during the Pontificate of Pope Urban IV.<sup>20</sup> Minor portions of the relics of both saints are said, also, to have been kept, in the chapel of St. Margaret, at Cologne.<sup>21</sup> At the tomb of St. Willeic, frequent miracles were wrought, long after his death, and these afforded sufficient confirmation of extraordinary sanctity during his life.

ARTICLE XI.—ST. FINNIAN. Finnián, is set down thus simply in the Martyrologies of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> on this day. Colgan thinks, he may be identical with a St. Finian,<sup>3</sup> who is noticed in the Life of St. Berach,<sup>4</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Molanus calls him "Canonicus Conventus Nouellæ Trajectensis Ecclesiæ." This statement, however, is doubted by the Bollandists.

<sup>16</sup> Yet, the Bollandists call in question this statement, on account of certain contradictions they detect in it.

<sup>17</sup> This, as they observe, agrees with the "Annales Francorum," written by a contemporary.

<sup>18</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De S. Willeico Presbytero, &c., sect. i., num. 2, p. 148.

<sup>19</sup> He is said to have been elected A.D. 1370, and to have administered its ecclesiastical affairs for forty-four years.

<sup>20</sup> Such is an account, given by Joannes Gelenius, a Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of Cologne.

<sup>21</sup> This statement is to be found, in Ægidius Gelenius Episcopus Aureliopolitanus, "In Fastis Coloniensibus," at the 2nd of March, while asserting the chief portions are kept at Kaiserwerth and Dusseldorp. See ibid., sect. ii., num. 12, 13, 14, p. 150.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>3</sup> In the "Trias Thaumaturga," Colgan enters among the disciples of St. Columkille, a St. Finan or Fenninus of Mag-cosgain, in the diocese of Derry, who he says may have been revered on the 2nd day of March. See Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 61, p. 490.

<sup>4</sup> Only in a note, however, as this name is omitted from the body of the text. See Abbot and Patron of Kilbarry;<sup>5</sup> but, on this he gives no decided opinion. The Bollandists<sup>6</sup> record this feast, likewise, but with that uncertainty, warranted by the obscurity of our records, in reference to him.

ARTICLE XII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. MARNAN, IN SCOTLAND. Falsely alleging the authority of Adam King's Kalendar—which has no such statement—Dempster<sup>1</sup> places the festival of St. Marnan, at the 2nd, instead of the 1st of March. The reader is referred to our account, at the last-named day. By Dempster, however, we are told, that on the 2nd of March, the Scottish Breviary has the festival of St. Marnan or Marran, a holy prelate, who flourished A.D. 962, and who instructed his people with wonderful piety. His writings are stated to be, “Pro Foedere Servando, lib. i., quod Scotiæ rex Indulphus cum Anglis contractum inviolatum servavit, Danorumque reges Hagonem, Morvegum, et Henricum cum universis copiis delevit, post Analassum eorundem regem Septennio ante extinctum acie, et cum suis ad internecionem datis;” also, “Monitorium ad Ecclesias patrias,” lib. i. Other writings of his are said to have been lost;<sup>2</sup> yet, we may well doubt the genuineness of the foregoing information.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. CUAN CAOIN, SON OF TIGHERNAGH. On the 2nd of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> enters the name, Connill-Cuanchaoín. He is differently mentioned elsewhere, and it would appear two distinct appellations are here united. There is a festival, recorded on this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> in honour of Cuan Caoín, son of Tighearnach, son to Fergus, descended from the race of Conall Gulban, son to Niall. This saint had three holy brothers, Begbile, Colman and Conna, all related to the great St. Columkille.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists state,<sup>4</sup> that the present holy man had a surname Placidus or Mansuetus—which probably expressed his gentle character. However, this saint's death is assigned to the year A.D. 743.<sup>5</sup> Now, this will hardly agree with what is said, in reference to Tiprad, King of the Hy-Fiachrach, who bestowed the place, afterwards known as Kill-Chuanna, on St. Cuanna, otherwise called Cuannatus, or Cuannacheus, for the purpose of erecting there a religious establishment. St. Columba<sup>6</sup> set this saint—regarded as one of his disciples—to rule over it.<sup>7</sup> Hence, it would seem, that for some time, he was under the discipline of the future great Abbot of Iona.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. CONALL. The Bollandists state, that in the Martyrologies of Tallagh, and of Marianus O'Gorman, Conallus is noted at the 2nd of March, but that they have no certain knowledge regarding his proper “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xv. Februarii. Vita S. Berachi, Abbatis, n. 24, p. 347.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 15th of February.

<sup>6</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i., Martii ii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 124.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See “Menologium Scoticum,” Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 193.

<sup>2</sup> See Dempster’s “Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum,” tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 852, p. 454.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan’s “Trias Thaumaturga,” Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 480, and cap. x., p. 489.

<sup>4</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i., Martii ii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 125.

<sup>5</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Februarii iv. De S. Cuanna sive Cuannacheo, n. 2, p. 251.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan’s “Trias Thaumaturga,” Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 39, p. 489.

identity.<sup>1</sup> We find a Saint Conall, entered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> on this day. No doubt, the same saint is written Conuill, with the word "Cuanchaoin" erroneously placed in composition, in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>3</sup> It may be asked, if this could have been the holy Prince Connallus, whose shield had been blessed by St. Patrick,<sup>4</sup> and who is mentioned in so many Lives of the great Irish Apostle?<sup>5</sup>

ARTICLE XV.—ST. DAVID, BISHOP OF MENEVIA, WALES. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] In his Scottish Menology, it is said, David Camerarius has a festival of St. David, Bishop of Menevia, at the 2nd of March.<sup>1</sup> This is not found, however, in his Kalendar, as published by Bishop Forbes.<sup>2</sup> His Life will be found, in this work, at the previous day.

ARTICLE XVI.—FESTIVAL OF ST. LUCILIA, MARTYR. It would seem, from the Festilogy of St. Ængus, that this holy virgin and martyr had a feast, on the 2nd of March, in the Irish Church. The only approach to the name we find, in the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> is St. Luciosa, who suffered as a martyr, at the Roman gate or port.

ARTICLE XVII.—FEAST OF THE BIRTH OF OLD PAUL. It seems pretty certain, that this festival, as found in the Festilogy of St. Ængus, must mean the Natalis or birth-day in heaven of the holy martyr, St. Paul, who, with his companions in suffering, is mentioned, at the 2nd of March, in various old Calendars. Little, however, seems to be known, regarding them, beyond the mere account of their martyrdom.

Third Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SACER OR MO-SACRA, ABBOT OF SAGGARD, COUNTY OF DUBLIN.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

THIS saint, variously named Sacer, Mo-Sacer, Mo-Sacra, Mothacra and Moacra, has his Acts given by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> and more briefly still by the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> He was the son of Senan, son to Luachan, son of Roer, son to Loga Lethanglais, son of Conall Anglonn, son to Eochad, son of Fieg, son to Factna, son of Senchad, son to Olild, son of Maelcroc, son to Roderic, ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Among the premitted saints, p. 123.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 60, 61.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxxxviii., and n. 146, pp. 95, 115.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. Among the premitted saints, p. 124.

<sup>2</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 235.

ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii ii. De Sanctis Martyribus Paulo, Heraclio, Secundilla sive Secundola, Januariæ, Luciosa, in Portu Romano. The account of their martyrdom is contained in three paragraphs, pp. 132, 133.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii iii. De S. Sacro sive Mo-Sacro Abbate, p. 454.

King of Ireland.<sup>3</sup> He appears to have been called Sacer, from a Latin word, which expresses holiness of life, by which he had been distinguished; and, to this cognomen, the endearing term, Mo, was prefixed. However, Sacer not being a name in use amongst the ancient Irish, we must suppose it, as only secondary to a previous and more national one. This holy abbot appears to have flourished, before or about the middle of the seventh century, if we are to rely upon accounts, furnished by our Martyrologists, regarding his genealogy. He erected a monastery, afterwards called after him, Tegh-Sacra,<sup>4</sup> or "the house of Sacer;" and, over this foundation, he presided as abbot. The place is now known as Saggard, a small village, and the head of a parish,<sup>5</sup> seven Irish miles S.W. from the Castle of Dublin.<sup>6</sup> The site of Saggard's ancient monastery and chapel is said to have been on a rise of the Dublin mountains, about one mile beyond the modern village.<sup>7</sup> Yet, nearer still is a much frequented graveyard, and here may be traced the foundations of an old quadrangular church, now "sodded with verdure,"<sup>8</sup> and nearly levelled to the ground.<sup>9</sup> Saggard, at first bore the name of Tassagard. It is related, that Mo-Sacra also governed, for some time, Finn-magh monastery, at Fotharta, within the province of Leinster. According to Dr. Lanigan, this

Site of Saggard Old Church, County of Dublin.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>3</sup> According to the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. xxv.

<sup>4</sup> We find allusion to Teach-Sacra or Saggard, and to the festival of Mo-Sacra, in the Ordnance Survey Extracts to illustrate the history of the county of Dublin, at p. 132.

<sup>5</sup> This is shown, in the barony of Newcastle, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheets 20, 21, 24. The town and townland are marked on Sheet 21.

<sup>6</sup> See Archer's "Statistical Survey of County Dublin," chap. v., sec. 2, p. 96.

<sup>7</sup> This is indicated on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 21.

<sup>8</sup> The scolopendrium ceterach, "scaly hart's tongue," grows abundantly within it. Near it is an enclosed burial place and a monument to Mr. Edward Byrne of Mullinahack, but no other tombs of note. See John D'Alton's "History of the County of Dublin," p. 720.

<sup>9</sup> These objects are presented in the present view, drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, from a sketch, by the author, taken in July, 1855. It is engraved by Mrs. Millard. In the background rises the Catholic Church of Saggard.

monastery had been built somewhere, in the vicinity of Wexford.<sup>10</sup> Dr. O'Donovan seems to have entertained an idea, that although Finn-magh<sup>11</sup> be Anglicised "the white plain,"<sup>12</sup> it may possibly be identified with Mayglass,<sup>13</sup> "the green plain," in the barony of Forth, and county of Wexford.<sup>14</sup> However, to us, it would appear, to have been a place, not far removed from Saggart.<sup>15</sup> Mo-Sacra assisted at a synod held, in the reign of Comgall, King of Ireland, about the year 695, and under the presidency of Flann,<sup>16</sup> Archbishop of Armagh. At this council over forty bishops and abbots were present.<sup>17</sup> Colgan had a copy of the Acts of that synod. Our saint is thought, also, to have been abbot, at Clonenagh; but, it is more than probable, a Mosacra<sup>18</sup> who had been abbot lived there, at a later period. He appears to have been confounded with our saint, in the Calendar of Cashel, which states, that Mo sacra lived, in the time of Neill Glandubh, King of Ireland.<sup>19</sup> Mo-Sacra of Saggart must have died, however, during or before the reign of that monarch's great-grandfather; since, he is mentioned, in the Festilog of St. Ængus, which was written, after the year 792, or during Aedh Oirnidhe's reign.<sup>20</sup> The festival of our saint was kept, on the 3rd of March, as appears from the "Feilire" of St. Ængus. His name is entered, at the same date, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>21</sup> as Moshacra mac Senain of Tigh Thacra. The Calendars of Cashel, of Marianus O'Gorman and of Maguire have their relative notices regarding him. In the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>22</sup> is set down on this day, Mohsacra,<sup>23</sup> Abbot, of Cluain-eidhneach or Clonenagh, in Laoighis, or Leix, and of Tigh-Sacra, or Saggart, in the vicinity of Tamhlacht, and of Fionn-mhagh in Fotharta. The Kalendar of Drummond,<sup>24</sup> at the 3rd of March, notices the Natalis of Mo-Sacro and of Cele,<sup>25</sup>

ARTICLE II.—ST. ERECLACIUS, PRIEST OF RATHMOAIN, NOW RAMOAN, COUNTY OF ANTRIM. [Fifth Century.] Little is known regarding this saint, but what can be collected from St. Patrick's Acts—short abstracts of which

<sup>10</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xvi., n. 138, p. 40, and vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. xv., p. 140.

<sup>11</sup> This seems to be identical with Achadh Finnigh, on the bank of the Dodder, where St. Criotan was venerated on the 11th of May, according to our Irish Calendars. Within it, too, was probably his church, called Cill-mo-Chritoc.

<sup>12</sup> Whitehall and Whitechurch are still townland denominations, not far from Templeogue, and most probably within this district. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 22.

<sup>13</sup> This townland and parish, are shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford, Sheet 47.

<sup>14</sup> See an account of this parish in "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Wexford, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1840," vol. i., pp. 288 to 290.

<sup>15</sup> See the notices of Fotharta, in which it is probable Finn-magh was situated, in connexion with St. Cele-Christ's life, at this date.

<sup>16</sup> Flann or Florence, surnamed Febla, began his rule over the see of Armagh, A.D. 688, and he died April 24th, A.D. 715. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 40.

<sup>17</sup> See O'Connor's "Historical Address," part ii., lect. iv., p. 74.

<sup>18</sup> See notices of St. Moshacra, son o Bannan, at the 8th of January.

<sup>19</sup> He flourished, in the tenth century, and reigned, from the year 913 to A.D. 254. See, Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., pp. 453, 454.

<sup>20</sup> According to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," Aedh Oirnidhe reigned from the year "793 [recte 798]," to the year 817. See vol. i., pp. 400 to 429.

<sup>21</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>22</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>23</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says, for "Mohsacra," read "Moshacra."

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 6.

<sup>25</sup> Thus: "V NONAS. In Hibernia insula sanctorum confessorum Moacro et Cele natalicia celebrantur."

ARTICLE II.—<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum

are given, by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> and by the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> In those accounts, we are informed, that Ereclac or Ereclacius had been a disciple to the Irish Apostle, and that the latter was accompanied by him, during various journeys he made, through the Ulster province, to spread a knowledge of the Gospel amongst its people. While in Dal-riadia, St. Patrick<sup>3</sup> founded many churches; and, among these, he built Rathmudhain church.<sup>4</sup> Afterwards, our saint was charged with its government.<sup>5</sup> Colgan assigns about the year 450, as the date of the foundation. In the Tripartite Life, the name is written Rathmudain,<sup>6</sup> which is Latinized, Arx Muadain.<sup>7</sup> It was so called from Muadain, the father of Enan.<sup>8</sup> The modern Protestant parish church occupies the ancient site.<sup>9</sup> While St. Patrick was here engaged in prosecuting his Apostolic labours, Ereclacius assumed his place as a fellow-labourer, at Rathmoain, as it was called in the time of Colgan; and, it is now contracted to Ramoan, or Rathmoran, a parish in the diocese of Connor,<sup>10</sup> barony of Cary, and county of Antrim.<sup>11</sup> The place is also called Rathmona, which has been interpreted "the fort in the bog." It lies on the sea-shore and forms the western boundary of Ballycastle Bay, in the extreme northern part of Ireland.<sup>12</sup> Interesting ruins, antiquities and scenery characterize this locality.<sup>13</sup> The error which Colgan falls into of placing Ramoan in the deanery of Hy-Tuirtre, he elsewhere corrects by describing it as in the territory of Cathruga, in Dalriadia.<sup>14</sup> The River Shesk, which joins the Cary river at Bonamargy, flows from south to north, and divides this parish<sup>15</sup> from Culfeightrin.<sup>16</sup> The year of our saint's death is not recorded; but, his festival has been assigned to the 3rd of March, by the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>17</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire, and of Donegal.<sup>18</sup> His name also occurs in the Rev. William Reeves' diocesan Calendar.<sup>19</sup>

Hiberniæ," Martii iii. De S. Ereclacio Præsbytero et Confessore, p. 455.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>4</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. cxxx., p. 146, and nn. 197, 198, p. 182.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii iii. De S. Ereclacio Præsbytero et Confessore, p. 455.

<sup>6</sup> This is a corruption of ῥατ μωδαιν.

<sup>7</sup> This name Colgan derives from Muadain, who was the father of Enan, the minister of the neighbouring church of Druim-indich.

<sup>8</sup> See notices of him, at the 25th of March.

<sup>9</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (r), p. 79, and Appendix Z, p. 284.

<sup>10</sup> It is said to be in the deaconate of Hy-Tuirtre. Colgan here places Ramoan, in the deanery of Hy-Tuirtre; but, he corrects this statement, in the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," where he describes it, as being in the region of Dalriedia, in a district, called Cathruga, and in the deanery of Tuash-ceart. See iii. Martii. Vita S. Ereclacii, n. i., p. 455.

<sup>11</sup> See its bounds on "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 4, 5, 8, 9, 14.

<sup>12</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 483.

<sup>13</sup> This is elegantly illustrated, in a series of views, to be found in "The Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland," by W. H. Bartlett, vol. i., pp. 36 to 48.

<sup>14</sup> He says: "in regione Dalriedia Cathruga dicta, et in Deconatu de Tuascheart."—"Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii iii., n. i., p. 455.

<sup>15</sup> Besides Ramoan and Killeena, in it are to be found the following churches and cemeteries:—"It is stated that small burying-grounds for infants existed in the townlands Ballydurnian, Ballyveely, Drumavoley, and Killrobert, but their place are not now distinguishable, being under cultivation. In Ardagh there is a spot called Friary, whither it is reported the brethren of Bonamargy retired upon the dissolution of that house. Here also is shown the carn of a MacQuillin."—Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix Z, p. 285.

<sup>16</sup> The bounds of this parish, in the barony of Cary, are found on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 5, 9, 10, 14, 15, 19. Bonamargy, a townland lying within it, is noted on Sheets 5, 9.

<sup>17</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>18</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>19</sup> See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix LL, p. 377.

ARTICLE III.—ST. FOILA<sup>a</sup> OR FOILENNA, VIRGIN, AND PATRONESS OF KILL-FAILE, NOW KILLEELY PARISH, COUNTY OF GALWAY. Colgan could not procure any special Acts of this saint, who was venerated in the southern parts of Connaught, in his own time.<sup>1</sup> However, he and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have short notices of her, at this day. St. Foilenna, Failenna, or Fallenda, or as more commonly called, St. Foila or Faila, also denominated Foilend,<sup>3</sup> or Faoileann,<sup>4</sup> is thought to have been daughter to Aidan, surnamed Draigneach, son to Lugadius, son to Dathy,<sup>5</sup> King of Ireland;<sup>6</sup> and, her mother, Cuillenn, or Cullenda, was likewise descended from a distinguished family.<sup>7</sup> She had three brothers, Colgeus, or Colga,<sup>8</sup> Aidus and Sorarius, who are numbered amongst the saints of our country.<sup>9</sup> At what particular time St. Foila was born, we are not informed; but, it was thought, probably, in an early part or towards the middle of the sixth century. It seems probable, she lived in Kill-faile. This place is identical with the present parish of Killeely, in the barony of Dunkellin, county of Galway.<sup>10</sup> The old church there is yet in good preservation, being, in the opinion of Dr. O'Donovan, modernized during the 14th or 15th century. Measured on the inside, it is 63 feet long by 21 broad.<sup>11</sup> The pointed or Gothic style there prevails. It is remarkable, that this parish joins Kilcolgan, where St. Faile's brother, Colga or Colgan,<sup>12</sup> had been venerated. Both churches were near Ath cliath Medhruidhe, the ancient name for Clarinbridge. Both saints also belonged to the race of the Hy Fiachrach Aidhne.<sup>13</sup> The church of Kill-faile derives its name from St. Foila, and it is situated within the diocese of Kilmacduagh. During her lifetime, St. Foila performed many miracles. The day and year of her death is not recorded; but, the former probably fell on the 3rd of March,<sup>14</sup> when her festival was kept, in the church of Kill-faile. It is commemorated on this day, according to the Martyrologies of Tamlacht,<sup>15</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire and of Donegal.<sup>16</sup> After her death, frequent pilgrimages were made to St. Foila's tomb, from distant parts of the ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iii. Martii. De S. Foilenna, Virgine, p. 456.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>3</sup> Such is the name she bears in Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Martyrology of Tallagh," p. xvii.

<sup>4</sup> See Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 62, 63.

<sup>5</sup> The death of this monarch is recorded, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 428. See vol. i., pp. 128, 129.

<sup>6</sup> Her descent is thus noted in the "Sancitologic Genealogy," chap. 9.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii iii. De S. Foilenna Virgine, p. 456.

<sup>8</sup> The "Martyrology of Donegal" styles him, son to Aedh, of Cill Colgan, at Athcliath Meadhraighe, in Connaught.

<sup>9</sup> In the "Sancitologic Genealogy," chap. 9, their descent is traced through the same ancestral line, as that of their sister. See ibid. But, at the 20th of February, where Colgan gives the Acts of Colgeus, we find the father and grandfather of himself and brothers called Aidus. See ibid. De S. Colgo sive Colgano, Abbate de Kill-Colgan, in Connacia, n. 8, p. 381.

<sup>10</sup> See it defined, on the "Ordnance Survvey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheets 95, 96, 103, 104. The townland so called is to be found on Sheet 103, ibid., and it is distinguished by the denominations of Killeely Beg and Killeely More.

<sup>11</sup> See "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Galway, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1838," vol. i. John O'Donovan's Letter, dated, Galway Oct. 6th, 1838, pp. 364, 365.

<sup>12</sup> Colgan places his festival, at the 20th of February. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Februarii xx. De S. Colgo sive Colgano, Abbate de Kill-Colgan in Connacia, pp. 380, 381. At the 25th of February, with much diffidence, we have ventured to treat on this saint and his festival, vol. ii., art. iii.

<sup>13</sup> John O'Donovan's Letter, dated, Oct. 11th, 1838. See "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Galway, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1838," vol. i., pp. 430, 431.

<sup>14</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iii. Martii, n. 7, p. 456.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

country, by persons afflicted with various maladies. For the cure of these, they reposed great confidence, in her merits and intercession.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. CONNA, VIRGIN. The Bollandists have a brief notice, regarding this holy virgin; although stating, that in other cases, Conna, often written Cuanna, is the name of a man.<sup>1</sup> In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> we find the name, Conna Vir, entered, at the 3rd of March. Colgan entertains an opinion, that she may be identical with a St. Matona—a probable corruption of St. Mo-chonna—who was sister to St. Benignus,<sup>3</sup> and St. Kethech.<sup>4</sup> If so, this saint's father was from the race of Kien, the son of Olioll Olum, and from the territory of Kiennacht.<sup>5</sup> Her mother is supposed to have been from the territory of Tir-Olill. She received the veil, at the hands of St. Patrick,<sup>6</sup> a priest St. Rodan<sup>7</sup> assisting. To the care of this latter, she was afterwards committed, when the Irish Apostle had founded the church, in Domhach, in the territory of Hua-Noella, which church was afterwards called Sencheall Dumhaige.<sup>8</sup> Here, she is said to have been left, and she is regarded, as having been one of St. Patrick's disciples.<sup>9</sup> By Marianus O'Gorman and by Maguire, the festival of St. Conna is set down, at the 3rd of March. On this day, we have recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>10</sup> Conna, a virgin. There is a Condath, daughter of Colman, descended from the race of Laeghaire, son to Niall, add the O'Clerys, as if doubting the correct identification of this holy woman.

ARTICLE V.—FESTIVAL OF A REPUTED ST. HAGGARD, PARISH OF TOM-HAGGARD, COUNTY OF WEXFORD. In the parish of Tomhaggard, county of Wexford, St. Haggard was regarded as the patron, and his day was kept, on the 3rd of March, according to popular tradition. Dr. O'Donovan takes the name of Tomhaggard, to mean "the priest's mound," or "tumulus."<sup>1</sup> The old church of Tomhaggard was 60 feet long, by 16 feet in breadth—inside—at the east end, and 14½ feet, at the west. The cause of this difference is, that 28 feet of the side-walls, a portion of which has the appearance of antiquity, are thicker than the remainder or more modern portion.<sup>2</sup> This church has some curious antiquarian and architectural features.<sup>3</sup> Whether or not, the St. Haggard of Wexford tradition has been confounded with St. Sacer<sup>4</sup> or Mo-Sacra of Saggart is only offered, as an informal conjecture, yet to be solved.

ARTICLE VI.—DEOCHAIN REAT, OR ST. REAT, DEACON. When St. Patrick<sup>1</sup> visited the territory of Innishowen, he met three deacons, his ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>3</sup> Colgan thinks, he may have been venerated, on the 3rd of April.

<sup>4</sup> His feast is supposed to fall, on the 16th of June.

<sup>5</sup> There was a Northern Kiennacta Glinne Gemhin, in Ultonia, and a Southern one, within the bounds of Meath, called Kiennacta Breagh, and sometimes, Kinnacta Arda. Both obtained name, from their being inhabited by the race of Kien.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>7</sup> It is thought, his feast may have been on the 18th of January, or on the 24th of August.

<sup>8</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. xli., p. 135, and nn. 81, 82, 83, 84, 89, 109, pp. 176 to 178. Ibid.

<sup>9</sup> See Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 270.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Thus, by corruption, τῶν ἀν τ-παγάρτ. He says it might be also a corruption, τοῖς μο παρτα, like Saggart, in the county of Dublin.

<sup>2</sup> Within about three feet of the west gable, the ancient character disappears, in nephews, by one of his sisters. This happened in the territory of Bredach, where he built the church of Domnach bile, afterwards known as Moville, in the county of Donegal.<sup>2</sup> Colgan remarks that the name of Reat is not a common one, among the Irish.<sup>3</sup> He is mentioned, at the 3rd of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> as Deochain Reat. We find, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> that the deacon, St. Reat,<sup>6</sup> had a festival on this day. His name has been Latinized, Reatus, Deacon, in the table appended to the same published record.<sup>7</sup> The Bollandists<sup>8</sup> have some notices, with dubious comments regarding his identity, at the present date.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. MODIMOC OR MODHIOMOG, BISHOP. The name, Modimoc, Bishop, occurs in the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> and of Marianus O'Gorman, at the 3rd of March.<sup>2</sup> He is recorded a little more fully elsewhere, and some particulars regarding him are found. We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day, regarding Modhiomóg, it is found, in the Life of Barre,<sup>4</sup> that Modhiomog was at school with him [i.e. with Barre] at Loch Irce, and that he offered his church to God and to Barre<sup>5</sup> in perpetuity. However, according to Colgan,<sup>6</sup> the Modimicus, Dodimocus or Dimanus, venerated on this day, was an anchorite, as also an abbot, at Clonard, and Kildare. He is said to have died, in 743.<sup>7</sup>

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. CELE CHRIST, OR CHRISTICOLA, BISHOP OF KILL-CELE-CHRIOST, IN UI-DONCHADHA, IN FOTHARTA, LEINSTER. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] This devoted servant of Christ, in after time, deserved well the name he seems to have obtained in baptism, of Cele-Chriost, Latinized, Christicola, i.e. "worshipper of Christ."<sup>1</sup> He descended from an illustrious family; his father being called Euchoaid or Euchodius, the son of Corbmac, the son of Eugene,<sup>2</sup> son to Niall of the Nine Hostages, according to one account;<sup>3</sup> although, his pedigree must be regarded as greatly deficient here, in some of the intermediate generations. The Rev. John Francis Shearman states, that the immediate progenitor of St. Celechrist and of his brother St. Comghall<sup>4</sup> is missing; while the order of backward descent should thus run:—Eochaidh, son of Cormac, son to Eochaidh, son of Illann, the walls; but, their thickness continues the same, in that direction, as in the older portion.

<sup>3</sup> See a more detailed description of this parish, in "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Wexford, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1840," vol. ii., pp. 198 to 201.

<sup>4</sup> Already noticed, at this day.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. cxxii., p. 145.

<sup>3</sup> He would not affirm, however, that this deacon was one of St. Patrick's nephews. See ibid., nn. 176, 177, p. 181.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>6</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says at this word Reat: "i.e. Reat, the Deacon."

<sup>7</sup> See, Ibid., pp. 400, 401.

<sup>8</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i.,

Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>4</sup> Chapter x.

<sup>5</sup> His Life occurs, at the 25th of September.

<sup>6</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Appendix Quinta ad Acta S. Brigidæ, cap. ii., p. 629.

<sup>7</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 344 to 347.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Dr. O'Donovan renders it "Servant or Vassal of Christ."—"Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (k), p. 320.

<sup>2</sup> He died A.D. 465.

<sup>3</sup> That of the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. i.

<sup>4</sup> He was Abbot of Bochnais, and his festival will be found at the 4th of September.

son to Niall of the Nine Hostages. Judging by the date assigned for his death, this holy man must have been born about, or after, the middle of the seventh century. His birth probably took place, in the northern part of Ireland,<sup>5</sup> inferring from his family pedigree. But, he resolved on leaving Ulster, and betook himself to a place called Hi-Donchadha, in the western part of Leinster. It is also said to have been in Fotharta.<sup>6</sup> Here he erected a cell, which is called Cella-oc. It may be asked—and the situation warrants such suspicion—could this have been the place, which subsequently had been converted into the denomination of Templeoge,<sup>7</sup> where yet, a small enclosed graveyard contains the ruins of a mediæval church, the side walls of which are now almost completely gone, and only a single gable is standing perfect.<sup>8</sup> The present form of the name would lead one to believe, that it means "little temple" or "church."<sup>9</sup> Probably at some former period, it obtained the appellation Kill-Cele-Chriost,<sup>10</sup> or "the cell of the worshipper of

Templeogue Church, County of Dublin.

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vi., p. 162.

<sup>6</sup> See the Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 62, 63. In a note to this word, Dr. Todd writes: "The MS. has 1 ƿƿƿƿƿ, a mere clerical error, which has therefore been corrupted in the text. But perhaps the true reading is, 1 ƿ ƿƿƿƿƿƿƿ ƿƿƿƿ ƿƿƿ, 1 ƿƿƿƿ." In a copy of the "Martyrology of Donegal," belonging to William M. Hennessy, I find here the MS. annotation: "Perhaps it should be 1 ƿƿƿƿƿƿƿ."

<sup>7</sup> This townland denomination is to be found on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 22. It lies in the parish of Tallagh, and barony of Uppercross, county of Dublin.

<sup>8</sup> The accompanying sketch, taken on the spot, by the writer, in April, 1874, has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wake-man, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>9</sup> According to remarks of Dr. P. W. Joyce, in a letter to the writer; however, he adds: "But this is not so, for in the Repertorium Viride of Archbishop Alan, it is written Tachmeloge, and similar forms are found in Inquisitions. (I have them, but I have failed to put my hands on them.) This at once shows the name to mean, the teach, 'house' or 'church,' of a saint, whose name has been reduced in the Irish-Latin documents to 'Meloge.' There is good reason to believe, that this saint was Molagga or Lochein. See Temple molagga, in my first series of 'Irish names of places.' Tachmeloge would be pronounced Tahmeloge or Christ," in honour of the founder's name. Besides this church, as noted, the district of Ui-Dunchadha contained the church denominations of Cill-mochritoc,<sup>11</sup> on the banks of the Dodder, i.e. Achadh-Finnigh—already identified with Finnmagh—and Cill-na-managh,<sup>12</sup> in the parish of Tallagh. Here Cele-Chriost desired to spend his days in retirement, and solely engaged, in Divine contemplation. Yet, although declining ecclesiastical rank, it was urged on him as a duty, when he accepted the office of bishop.<sup>13</sup> It is stated, that he felt a great desire to make a pilgrimage to Rome, and that taking a band of companions with him, Cele-Chriost set out for this purpose. On the way, however, they were proffered hospitality, by an evil-minded man, who really intended their murder, to obtain money he supposed them to possess. The pretended host fastened his door, on the outside, when the strangers entered his house. These, suspecting an evil design, took counsel among themselves, as to what should be done, when Cele-Chriost addressed them as follows: "This seems to me the best course for you to adopt; allow me to take charge of your effects, and to collect them into one wallet, so that when he comes to take your lives, and when he opens the door of your enclosure, let each one of you rush out who can escape with life." His companions cried out: "Caoin-erain."<sup>14</sup> This was agreed upon, and the consequence was, all safely obtained their freedom. Afterwards, we are told, our saint bore the name Cele-Christus, Coin-erael. Little more is known regarding him, save that he returned to Ireland, and died A.D. 731<sup>15</sup> or 732,<sup>16</sup> having been buried, in his church, at Cill-oc. The Annals of Ulster defer his demise to the year 726. Colgan<sup>17</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>18</sup> have some notices regarding him, at this day. His church was situated, in the district of Ui Dunchadha,<sup>19</sup> that, through which the River Dodder, near Dublin, flowed. The Mac Gillamocholmogs ruled over it, and their lands extended southwards to Glen Umerim or Glanunder, now Ballyman,<sup>20</sup> on the confines of Dublin and Wicklow counties.<sup>21</sup> There seems to be great difficulty in identifying the exact site of this ancient church. Duaid Mac Firbis records under the heads of Both Chonais<sup>22</sup> and Cill Cele Christ, the Bishop Cele-Christ, of Cill-Cele-Christ, at the 3rd March. In Hy Dunchada, in the Fotharts of Leinster, he adds, is the church of Cele-Christ, of Both Chonais.<sup>23</sup>

Tammeloge, by English speakers, which easily gave rise to the modern Templeoge."

<sup>10</sup> In a comment on the "Feilire," in the "Leabhar Breac," at this day, we have appended to this saint's name 1 o cill celi christ in uib doonoch do a 1 laigen, i.e. from Cill Celi Crist in Uib Dondchada in Leinster.

<sup>11</sup> A notice of this appears, in the Calendar, at the 11th of May.

<sup>12</sup> This is mentioned, in the Calendar, at the 31st of December.

<sup>13</sup> So state, the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Donegal.

<sup>14</sup> This is rendered, in Latin: "Bonum concilium invenisti." It is more than probable, the Irish designation, in the text, should read, cáin aipile, which means "good counsel."

<sup>15</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 320, 321.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vi., p. 162.

<sup>17</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iii. Martii. Vita S. Christicolæ, pp. 454, 455.

<sup>18</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>19</sup> This was the name of that tract of land, extending between the River Liffey and the Dublin mountains. It was the patrimony of Mac Gilla Mocholmog, for an account of whom see John T. Gilbert's "History of Dublin," vol. i., pp. 230, 403.

<sup>20</sup> This townland, in the parish of Old Connaught, and barony of Rathdown, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheets 26, 28.

<sup>21</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (f), p. 12.

<sup>22</sup> Both Chonais is pronounced Bochonais. This establishment, Mr. Hennessy says in a note, is now represented by the old graveyard, in the townland of Binnion, parish of Clonmany, barony of Inishown, and county of Donegal.

<sup>23</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 90, 91, and again 94, 95.

The "Feilire" of St. Ængus, in the "Leabhar Breac,"<sup>24</sup> has his commemoration, at the 3rd of March; while, the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>25</sup> likewise, enters the name of Celicriist. Marianus O'Gorman has even a more detailed statement. The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>26</sup> at the same date, has Cele Christ, Bishop of Cill-Cele-Christ in Ui Dunchadha, in Fotharta,<sup>27</sup> in Leinster, with the statement, that he sprung from the race of Eoghan, son to Niall. In the Kalendar of Drummond<sup>28</sup> his feast is this day noted. It is supposed possible, that the name of Christ Church, Dublin, may have been derived from this Cele Chriost, a saint of high reputation.<sup>29</sup>

ARTICLE IX.—ST. MOCHUA, OF CLUAIN DOBHTHA. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> records this name and place, at the 3rd of March. That of Marianus O'Gorman also enters Mochua, of Cluaindobtha, as the Bollandists remark.<sup>2</sup> The festival of Mochua, of Cluain Dabhtha was celebrated, on this day, as we read in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE X.—ST. CONNALL OR CONAILL. According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> we find Connall registered, as having a festival, on this day. Probably from the postfix S., in the subsequent entry, we are to understand, that he was a soggart, or priest. Thus, the name, Connall, S., occurs in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> at the 3rd of March. His identity we cannot surmise.

ARTICLE XI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A TRANSLATION OF ST. CEDDE'S RELICS. The relics of St. Cedde<sup>1</sup> brought into Scotia, and religiously placed in Dundrain, is a festival entered by Dempster, at the 3rd of March, in his "Menologium Scoticum."<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists merely refer to this notice.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE XII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. MAGOR. We find a St. Magor set down, at the 3rd of March, in the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare.<sup>1</sup> Elsewhere, we find nothing, to clear up this entry.

<sup>24</sup> The following Irish stanza, with its English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

f. u. In pair fíorainn feil na peirlainn neman celi cript cain aipail mo macru mac rianain.

On the feast of Florianus,
The feast of two stars precede us;
Cele Crist of gentle counsel
Noblest of youths was the son of Senan.

<sup>25</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>26</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>27</sup> This should probably be í portuathas, "in the Fortuathas" or border lands, as the Fortuatha of Leinster included the southern part of the county of Dublin, says Mr. Hennessy. He adds: the Fortuatha was not confined to the territory of Ui-Mail, in Wicklow, as O'Donovan thought. See "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights,"

p. 250, note.

<sup>28</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 6.

<sup>29</sup> See John T. Gilbert's "History of the City of Dublin," vol. i., chap. iii., p. 98.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 2nd of March.

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 193.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historiæ Catholice Ibernice Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

ARTICLE XIII.—FEAST OF THE MONK OWEN OR OWINI. We have already noticed this devoted religious, in connexion with the Acts of St. Cedda.<sup>1</sup> Edward Maihew, and Bucelin, as also the Bollandists, have his feast, celebrated on the 3rd of March, according to Menard's "Martyrologium Benedictinum," or, on the 29th of July, according to the "English Martyrology." The name Owen was always a common one in Ireland, and it seems probable Owini is only the Saxon form for it.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. FACHTNA, OF CRE BEG. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> note a feast, in honour of Fachtna, of Cre-big, at this date, citing as authority the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> at the 3rd of March, which inserts the following entry: Fachtna o Chraebhaig. Marianus O'Gorman also enters Fachtna of Cre-big. Fachtna, of Cré Beg, occurs likewise in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day. The place seems to be Creevy, and it is probably identical with the place where St. Critan<sup>4</sup> is venerated.

ARTICLE XV.—ST. CONCRADA OR CONCHRAIDH, BISHOP. In the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> is inserted Concrada, at the 3rd of March, and in that of Marianus O'Gorman, this Conchrad is set down as a bishop. We also find, that Conchraidh, Bishop, is entered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> at this date. The Bollandists observe,<sup>3</sup> that there was a Regulus of Ossory, a worthy man, called Conchradius, who was contemporaneous with St. Kieran,<sup>4</sup> Bishop of Saigir; yet, it is not certain, the former had been classed among the saints.

ARTICLE XVI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. PATTO, BISHOP OF VERDEN, AND ABBOT OF ARMARBARIC. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] At this date, the Bollandists<sup>1</sup> remark, that Gelenius<sup>2</sup> has a festival for the present holy man. At the 30th of March, further particulars, regarding him, will be found.

ARTICLE XVII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. DAVID, ARCHBISHOP OF MENEVIA, WALES. Under the head of Cill Muine,<sup>1</sup> Duaid Mac Firbis records, David, Bishop of Cill Muine, and Archbishop of the Isle of Britain, at March 3rd.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE XVIII.—ST. CILLENE OR CILLEN, PERHAPS OF INIS DOIMLE, NOW INCH, COUNTY OF WEXFORD. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> allude to Killenol, Inisdomle, a monastery, according to Colgan, within the confines of Munster.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 2nd of March.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>4</sup> See notices of him, at the 15th of January.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i.,

Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 5th of March.

ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints," p. 223.

<sup>2</sup> In the Menology of Cologne.

ARTICLE XVII.—<sup>1</sup> Now St. David's, Wales.

<sup>2</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy." Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 96, 97.

ARTICLE XVIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii iii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 222.

One conjecture is, that he may have been an anchorite, named in the Acts of St. Brigid,<sup>2</sup> and another, that he may have been Killen, a disciple to St. Finbar, of Cork.<sup>3</sup> The Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> at the 3rd of March record, Cillen, of Inis Doimle. His place would appear to have been identical with Inch,<sup>6</sup> situated in the barony of Shelmaliere West, and county of Wexford.<sup>7</sup> In 1840, some part of the old church walls remained. These were built with very large stones, and they had every appearance of being old; but, owing to the ruins having been covered with thorns and briars, the length and breadth of the old church could not be exactly measured. The cemetery adjoining had then long been disused, as a place for interment.<sup>8</sup> According to the Manuscript,<sup>9</sup> to be found in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, this saint was a bishop and a confessor, having an office of nine Lessons.

Fourth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MUKNA, MUICIN, OR MUKINUS, BISHOP OF MAIGHIN, OR MOYNE, COUNTY OF MAYO.

COLGAN<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have some notices of this saint, at the 4th day of March. The latter authorities doubt, how the name Mucinus can be resolved into Mucna, or even, if the identity of the Mucna, mentioned in St. Patrick's Tripartite Life, with the present holy man, be admitted, why, they ask, should the former be classed among our Irish saints? We shall not attempt the solution of these difficulties, but only relate what we find on record. In one instance, at least, this saint is placed, among those holy persons connected with the county of Louth,<sup>3</sup> where, according to some authorities, Maighin was located. However, we do not incline to such an opinion. Again, he is placed at Mines church, in Jenkinstown, county of Kilkenny, by Rev. Mr. Shearman. There is no account, regarding the time, in which St. Mucna or Muckin, of Magin, in Tyrawly, lived. Although we find him classed, by Colgan,<sup>4</sup> among St. Patrick's disciples; still, there is not the least foundation for an assertion, that he was made bishop, by our Irish Apostle. This may be gleaned from all omission in the Tripartite—the only authority cited for this occasion—which only makes mention of Muckna, not as having been placed by St. Patrick,<sup>5</sup> a bishop, over Domnach-mor church,<sup>6</sup>

See her Life, at the 1st of February.

See his life, at the 25th of September.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>6</sup> It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheets 35, 40.

<sup>7</sup> See O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (b), p. 380.

<sup>8</sup> The name is an Anglicizing of inir or inpe, which signifies "an island" or "the holme of a river." See John O'Donovan's rendering in "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Wexford, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1840," vol. ii., p. 356.

<sup>9</sup> Classed B. 3. 10. It mentions, in the Calendar, at March 3rd, Nones. V. Sancti Kelani, Epis. et Conf. ix. Lect.

ARTICLE I.—See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iv. Martii. De S. Mukna sive Mukino, Episcopo, p. 457.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 299.

<sup>3</sup> See "Louth Extracts" of the Irish Ordnance Survey, vol. i., p. 140.

<sup>4</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 267.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

in Tyrawly, but, rather as having been buried, in that place.<sup>7</sup> It has been identified with Moyne, in the parish of Killala,<sup>8</sup> barony of Tirawley, and county of Mayo. The foundation of a church is supposed to have been laid there, about A.D. 440, when the Apostle prosecuted his successful mission, in that western district. It seems, Colgan adopted an opinion, that Muckna ruled over this church as a bishop,<sup>9</sup> but, without any sufficient foundation for referring it to St. Patrick's time; and, then finding himself puzzled about the period when this supposed disciple lived, he threw out a conjecture, that such appointment took place, A.D. 470. He assigns as a reason for this conjecture, that the Tripartite seems to indicate, by the term "est," that Muckna was alive, about the year 520; for, this has been very uncritically considered, as the period when the Tripartite Life had been written.<sup>10</sup> Yet, nothing is more common in some of St. Patrick's Lives than to use est for requiescit; so that, the meaning of the passage now quoted may be, that Muckna's remains were at Domnach-mor; still, at what time they were deposited there, we have no means left for discovering. Apparently, for no more sufficient reason, than not to make Muckna live too long, Colgan affixed this appointment as bishop there, to the year 470, so that he might probably be living, about A.D. 520.<sup>11</sup> An entry appears, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>12</sup> at the 4th of March, which thus reads: "Mucini Maighni." Marianus O'Gorman, also, commemorates him. In the Manuscript of Florarius, we find an entry of Mokinus, Abbas,<sup>13</sup> at the same date. According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>14</sup> we read, about Muicin, of Maighin, as having a festival on this day.

ARTICLE II.—ST. ADRIAN AND HIS COMPANIONS, MARTYRS, IN THE ISLAND OF MAY, SCOTLAND. [Ninth Century.] There are accounts of these holy martyrs, in the works of the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> of William F. Skene,<sup>2</sup> and of Bishop Forbes.<sup>3</sup> These are taken, chiefly from the Breviary of Aberdeen.<sup>4</sup> Various other accounts have been added,<sup>5</sup> and it would seem the authentic narrative of their Acts can hardly be composed, at present, so misty have become the popular and recorded traditions. Now, in the Calendars of the Catholic Church, a feast is assigned to a St. Adrian of Nicomedia,<sup>6</sup> at the 4th of March, and in the Bruxelles "Auctuarium" of Usuard, we find a St

<sup>6</sup> Archdall states very incorrectly, that St. Patrick here founded an abbey. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 502.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. lxxxi., p. 141, and n. 134, p. 180.

<sup>8</sup> Its bounds are traceable on the "Ordinance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheets 14, 15, 21, 22. On the latter Sheet is the townland of Moyne, near the mouth of the River Moy. Here are ruins of a former abbey.

<sup>9</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii iv., p. 457.

<sup>10</sup> The passage reads: "Venit Patricius ad Ecclesiam de Domnach-mor, ubi est Episcopus Muckna."—Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. lxxxi., p. 141.

<sup>11</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xii., pp. 253, 254., and n. 119, p. 255.

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>13</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum."

Among the pretermitted saints, p. 299.

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii iv. De Sanctis Martyribus Adriano Epis. S. Andreae, Stolbrando Episc. Glodiano, Caio, et aliis plurimis, in Maia Insula Scotiæ, pp. 326 to 328.

<sup>2</sup> See "Celtic Scotland: A History of Ancient Alban," vol. ii., chap. vii., pp. 311 to 317.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 266 to 268.

<sup>4</sup> Pars Hyemalis, f. lxii.

<sup>5</sup> See also the "Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," p. 423.

<sup>6</sup> In the Bollandists' account, the number of martyred companions is thirty-three, and we are told the most ancient Martyrologies, as also the Roman Martyrology, edited by Baronius, are of accord. See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii iv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 300.

<sup>7</sup> "Apud Nicomediam natale beati Ad-

Gagius,<sup>7</sup> who seems to correspond with Gayus of the Aberdeen Breviary, at the same date. For illustration of what we are about to convey, the reader is requested to give some little consideration to the notices of Saints Mannan and Tiaan, of Aredh-Suird or Airiudh h-Uird, at the 23rd of February.<sup>8</sup> In addition we may observe, that the Breviary of Aberdeen contains an account, that St. Adrian was born in the province of Pannonia in Hungary; that he was of royal descent and of episcopal rank; his diligence in the sacred order being testified, by the many clerics and seculars, who were his companions. Inflamed with missionary zeal, it is said he betook himself to the eastern and Pictish parts of Scotia. The incredible number of 6,606 companions, including Glodian,<sup>9</sup> Gaius,<sup>10</sup> Monan,<sup>11</sup> Stolbrand, and others not specially named. Although called Bishop of St. Andrew's, St. Adrian is supposed to have been a bishop, yet without a fixed see.<sup>12</sup> But, it seems most probable, that the present holy man, and his companion martyrs, came from Ireland; since, Boece states, that they were of the Scots and Angles.<sup>13</sup> It has been supposed, by a learned and critical Scottish historian,<sup>14</sup> that the Angles may have represented the church of Acca,<sup>15</sup> who, driven from Northumberland, had founded a bishopric among the Picts, in A.D. 732, while the Scotti or Irish may have represented the church of Adrian, who, in some of the lists, is placed at the head of the bishops of St. Andrew's.<sup>16</sup> A conjecture has been hazarded, that the Irish contingent had been forced out of Ireland, owing to the Danish invasions, which prevailed, especially during the ninth century. It is thought, that when Kenneth MacAlpin had established his sway over the Picts, and when his son Constantine II. reigned, the holy Irish emigrants arrived, and acquired a habitation in the Firth of Forth.<sup>17</sup> The martyrdom of St. Adrian, and of his companions, is referred to about A.D. 875, and in the Island of May, where they were massacred by the Danes. Fordun makes out the number of those martyred, to be one hundred. The legend has this measure of corroboration, that a fight occurred, A.D. 875, between the Scots and Danes, when many of the former were slaughtered.<sup>18</sup> There was anciently a monastery of fair-coursed masonry, in the Island of May; but, it was destroyed by the English. There, too, was a celebrated cemetery, where the bodies of these martyrs repose,<sup>19</sup> and on this hallowed spot, various miracles were wrought, in favour of pious pilgrims, who frequented it. Gaius or Gayus is noted, as one of those martyrs, who suffered with St. Adrian, on the 4th of March.<sup>20</sup> Near Lochleven, in Fife, was the land of Kylemagage.<sup>21</sup> Ganinius is also noticed, as one of these sufferers; yet, he riani cum aliis viginti tribus qui omnes sub Diocletiano post multa supplicia crucifragio martyrium consummaverunt. Ipso die passio S. Gagii Palatini in mare mersi et aliorum viginti septem."—Soller's edition of Usuard, p. 138, printed at Antwerp A.D. 1714.

<sup>8</sup> See vol. ii., of this work, Art. iv.

<sup>9</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 357.

<sup>10</sup> See ibid., p. 354.

<sup>11</sup> The reader is referred to the particulars already given, in this work, vol. ii., at February 23rd, Art. iv., Saints Mannan and Tiaan, of Aredh-suird or Airiudh h-Uird.

<sup>12</sup> See Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," Introductory Dissertation, pp. 36 to 87.

<sup>13</sup> He says, they were "ex Scotis Anglique gregarie collectis."—"Scotorum Hysto-ria, a Prima Gentis Origine," fol. ccxiii.

<sup>14</sup> William F. Skene. See Notes of Early Ecclesiastical Settlements at S. Andrew's. "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. iv., p. 316.

<sup>15</sup> See an account of him, at the 19th of February, and at the 20th of October.

<sup>16</sup> See "Records of the Priory of the Isle of May," edited by John Stuart, LL.D., A.D. 1868.

<sup>17</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: A History of Ancient Alban," vol. ii., chap. vii., pp. 312 to 315.

<sup>18</sup> It is stated, at that year, "Occisi sunt Scoti co Achcochlam."—"Pictish Chronicle."

<sup>19</sup> See the "Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," p. 423.

<sup>20</sup> See Pars Hyemalis, f. lxii.

<sup>21</sup> Retours of Fife, 173.

may not be different from the preceding, in the opinion of Bishop Forbes.<sup>22</sup> Wyntoun gives a minute account of the incidents connected with this martyrdom, in his quaintly rhymed "Chronicon."<sup>23</sup> The holy Adrian and his companions, martyrs, are venerated on the 4th of March, as we find in the Calendar of the Breviary of Aberdeen, and they had an office of nine Lessons.<sup>24</sup> In Adam King's Kalendar, at March 4th, we read: S. Adriane bisch. of S. Andrew mart. in scotl. be ye dannes vnder King Constantine ye 2.<sup>25</sup> Again, in the Island of May, it is stated, St. Adrian a distinguished bishop of the Scots was martyred, and, with many thousands of both sexes and of every order slain, went to Heaven.<sup>26</sup> Also, David Camerarius, at 4 Die Martii, enters, St. Adrian or Hadrian Archbishop of St. Andrew's and Martyr.<sup>27</sup> It must be acknowledged, our Irish Calendars have no corresponding notices.

ARTICLE III.—ST. PHILLIP, BISHOP, OF CLUAIN BAINBH. This saint is merely named, in the Irish Martyrologies and Calendars, as being a bishop of Cluain Bainbh.<sup>1</sup> Colgan was unable to discover the age, in which he flourished. He hazards a conjecture, however, that Philip might have been identical with a reputed saint, to whom a feast has been assigned, at the 4th of March. Thus, in the Carthusian Martyrology, it is stated, that a Saint Moggrudo, a Bishop and Confessor, was venerated in Ireland, on this day;<sup>2</sup> but, nothing is contained, in our home Martyrologies or Annals, regarding him, at this, or at any other, date. Perhaps, he only distinguished himself, on a foreign mission.<sup>3</sup> On this day, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>4</sup> commemorates the Natalis of a certain holy bishop, whose name is suppressed.<sup>5</sup> However, he is called Bishop of Clocharbainni, probably another name for Cluain-Bainbh.<sup>6</sup> Under another form of insertion, Colgan thinks the former an erroneous one, and that it should accord with that in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> where we find, on this day, recorded, Philip, Bishop, of Cluain Bainbh. The Bollandists have their doubtful notices of Philip and of Moggrudo.<sup>8</sup> Again, under the head of Cluain-bainbh, and Clochar, Duald Mac Firbis enters, Philip, Bishop of Cluain bainbh, a holy bishop of Clogher, at March 4th.<sup>9</sup> Besides this, in the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 4th of March, we meet with Moggrudo. On the authority of the Carthusian Martyr-

<sup>22</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 354.

<sup>23</sup> Thus he writes :—

"And upon Haly Thursday
Saynt Adriane thai shoe in May Wyth mony off hys company ;
In to that haly Ile thai ly."

—Book vi., chap. viii.

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 113.

<sup>25</sup> See ibid., p. 146.

<sup>26</sup> See Dempster's "Menologium Scotticum," Ibid., p. 193.

<sup>27</sup> See ibid., p. 235.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iv. Martii. De S. Muggrudone, Episcopo et Confessore. Item de S. Philippo Episcopo, p. 457.

<sup>2</sup> The Carthusian Martyrology, at the 4th of March, says : "In Hibernia Moggrudonis Episcopi et Confessoris." And Herman Greuen finds in a MS. Carthusian Martyrology of Cologne : "S. Moggrudonis Episcopi et Confessoris in Hibernia."

<sup>3</sup> Colgan here remarks, that unless some error has been introduced, in writing the name, this saint must have lived and died out of Ireland.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>5</sup> It is entered in this form, in the work as published : "Noeb, Eps. o Clochair boinni."

<sup>6</sup> I am unable to discover the location of Cluain-Bainbh.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>8</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 299.

<sup>9</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 98, 99, 100, 101.

ology, at the same date, he appears, in Henry Fitzsimon's list, as, Mogradó, a bishop.<sup>10</sup> The reader is referred to what we have to state, on the succeeding day.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. OWEN OR OWINI, MONK, AT LICHFIELD, ENGLAND. [Seventh Century.] Several Calendarists place the festival of this holy man, at the present date, when the Bollandists give his Acts.<sup>1</sup> He must have survived St. Cedda or Chad, his master, and Bishop of Lichfield,<sup>2</sup> who is thought to have departed, about 672. There are good reasons for supposing Owini or Owen to have been an Irishman.<sup>3</sup> It is said, a church was dedicated to him, in the city of Gloucester, on the River Severn, and in the Kingdom of the West Angles. His other Acts will be found recorded, with those of St. Cedda or Chad, Bishop of Lichfield.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE V.—FIRST DEPOSITION OF ST. FURSEY'S RELICS. [Seventh Century.] From various sources, Colgan collects the inference, that the first deposition of St. Fursey's relics took place, at the present date.<sup>1</sup> It is related, in the old Acts of St. Fursey, that his body lay unburied, within, and, not after, thirty days. Venerable Bede states, that it lay unburied for twenty-six days;<sup>2</sup> but, Colgan suggests, that twenty-three should probably be the correct rendering. Hence, he considers, that Trithemius<sup>3</sup> and others, who make this the day of St. Fursey's death, ought rather regard it, as that for his first interment. The life of this great servant of God has been already given, at the 16th of January, while his death by many writers has been assigned, either to that date, or to the 9th of February. Supposing this latter to be the correct date for it, Colgan thinks the present day should be marked in the Calendars, for the first deposition of his relics.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE VI.—FEAST OF ST. LUCIUS, POPE AND MARTYR. [Third Century.] At the 4th of March, the Irish Church celebrated the festival of St. Lucius.<sup>1</sup> He was the son of Porphyrius, and of a distinguished Roman family. He was the twenty-second Pope, but he only ruled over the Church for a brief period, and suffered martyrdom, during the second consulate of Volusianus, on March 4th, A.D. 253.<sup>2</sup> He is commemorated, on this day, in

<sup>10</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 56.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii iv. De S. Owino Monacho Lichfeldiæ in Anglia Commentarius historicus, pp. 212, 213.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 2nd of March.

<sup>3</sup> His Life is included in Jerome Porter's "Flowers of the Lives of the most illustrious Saints of England, Scotland and Ireland."

<sup>4</sup> See an account of him in "A Memorial of Ancient British Piety," p. 46.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iv. Martii. S. Fursey Abbatis Depositio, pp. 456, 457.

<sup>2</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iii., cap. xix.

<sup>3</sup> See "De Viris Illustribus Ordinis Benedictini," lib. iii., cap. lxxxvi.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Januarii. Appendix ad Vitam S.

Fursæi, cap. x., p. 98.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> The following Irish stanza, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, and found in the "Leabhar Breac" copy, has been furnished, with the English translation, by Professor O'Looney:—

§. 1111. n. Sluinn ceapao in eppuic
1 puam pigoa coinolech
Co pluag abul amglech lucur lepp loimpech.

Celebrate the passion of the bishop,
In Rome, the kingly, the luminous,
With a mighty angelic host,
Lucius the brilliant torch.

<sup>2</sup> See Bert's "Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ Breviarium." Pars Prima. Sæc. iii., cap. i., p. 96.

the Roman Breviary.<sup>3</sup> His Acts, by the Monk Guaiferius, are set forth in the great Bollandist collection, with some preceding commentaries.<sup>4</sup>

Fifth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. KIERAN, OR CIARAN, FIRST BISHOP OF SAIGIR KING'S COUNTY, AND PATRON OF THE DIOCESE OF OSSORY.

[FIFTH AND SIXTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—THE ACTS OF ST. KIERAN—FAMILY AND BIRTH—HIS DESIRE TO BECOME A CHRISTIAN, AND TO VISIT ROME.

IN guiding to the light of Faith those who have been immersed for a long time in pagan darkness, conversions would be numerous and more easily effected, if it were only possible, to remove the moral and material obstacles which obstruct their way. Traditions and ties of race and family have weight, with the unconverted. They perform superstitious practices, frequent their temples, and, on certain days, have absurd rites and ceremonies, merely in conformity with prevailing national usages. Their parents were superstitious, their friends and neighbours are likewise so. With difficulty can they make up their minds to break that chain which strictly binds them to all these things: it would be a breach of filial or natural piety, to recede from the customs of their forefathers. Considerations like these keep back a great many honest-minded pagans, from embracing the pure Faith, which leads to the most admirable code of morality. Left to themselves, the people are not generally hostile to Christianity. Were they but free in their movements, they would follow the attraction of what they see and understand. This would be all the easier, since their trust in spells and idols is of the faintest kind. Yet, those vested interests, which tend to sustain the tottering fabric of unsound and impious institutions, are with difficulty counteracted, because fanaticism and deep-rooted prejudices combine, to prevent truth from appearing lovely to human minds. For a long time, our ancestors were "sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death," until the people became the Lord's portion and the lot of his inheritance.<sup>1</sup> However, Christianity was not unknown, in parts of Ireland, during those years preceding the arrival of St. Patrick,<sup>2</sup> according to many respectable authorities.<sup>3</sup> After Ireland's early reign of Druidism and Heathendom, the land, that was desolate and impassable, was to be made glad; the wilderness was to rejoice and flourish like a lily; the eyes of the blind were to be opened, and the ears of the deaf were to be unstopped; waters were to break out in the desert, and streams in the wilderness; the dry land was to become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water; the redeemed of the Lord were to come into Sion with great praise, everlasting joy was to be upon their heads; they were to obtain joy and gladness; sorrow and mourning were to flee away;<sup>4</sup> while

<sup>3</sup> Pars Verna. Die iv.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., iv. Martii. De S. Lucio Papa et Martyre, pp. 301 to 308.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> Deuteronomy. xxxii., 9.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>3</sup> See Sigebert's "Chronicon," at A.D. 432. This writer died, A.D. 1112.

<sup>4</sup> See Isaias, xxxv.

the light of the Gospel was destined to arise and to beam with effulgence over the land.

The primitive form of Irish society appears to have been based, on the clan or sept system; the chief was regarded as the patriarch, father and defender of an extended family, whose members were generally united by ties of relationship and kindred.<sup>5</sup> However, there was an Ard-Righ, or chief monarch over Ireland, and under him were subordinate princes, whose powers were well defined, and subject to the chief monarch. One of these ruled over each considerable province or district. The chief was a petty sovereign, within his own territory. Notwithstanding, the chieftains acknowledged a qualified allegiance, either directly or indirectly, to the monarch of the Island. According to a very general opinion of our historians, Ireland was governed by a sort of pentarchy, as the chief ruler's authority was supposed to immediately and directly affect four other powerful kings, his suzerains. There can be little doubt, that from a community thus constituted at Saigher, the first preachers of Christianity went forth, among the rude and turbulent tribes of ancient Ossory. Nor is it at all improbable, that on this spot was also erected one of the earliest Christian churches in Ireland. A date, anterior to the advent of St. Patrick, is very generally assigned for the founding of the cell at Saigher, by St. Kieran, or Chiarain, the son of Lughaidh.<sup>6</sup> Several matters, connected with his transactions and period, have been questioned, notwithstanding, and it shall be our object to give these the fairest consideration, we are able to afford, consistently with the involved difficulties of our theme.

Some Irish Lives of the holy man, who has been so affectionately styled, "Primogenitus Sanctorum Hiberniæ,"<sup>7</sup> are yet preserved in manuscript. Among these, a Life of St. Kieran of Saigir, in Irish, has been transcribed by Brother Michael O'Clery.<sup>8</sup> Among the Messrs. Hodges and Smith's collection of Irish Manuscripts, in the Royal Irish Academy, is a Life of St. Kiaran of Saighir.<sup>9</sup> In Marsh's Library, Dublin, in the manuscript, called "Codex Kilkenniensis," there is a Life of St. Kieranus (Ossoriensis).<sup>10</sup> There is an imperfect "Vita S. Kierani,"<sup>11</sup> in a 4to parchment manuscript, belonging to Trinity College, Dublin.<sup>12</sup> A Life of St. Kieran is contained, among Messrs. Hodges and Smith's MSS., No. 12,<sup>13</sup> in the Royal Irish Academy. Another is to be found, in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford,<sup>14</sup> and it is a vellum folio of the fourteenth century. Colgan furnishes two Lives of this celebrated saint.<sup>15</sup> One of these is taken from the manuscript described

<sup>5</sup> See Goldwin Smith's "Irish History and Irish Character," p. 15.

<sup>6</sup> See Rev. James Graves' and John A. Prim's "History of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny," p. 2.

<sup>7</sup> In an eloquent sermon, preached, on the Feast of St. Kieran at Saigher, A.D. 1877, the Rev. N. Murphy, C.C., in vindicating for the patron that foregoing title, adds the following translation of an Irish stanza in his praise:—

"Kieran, the faithful, noble coharb,
The senior of the heaven-loving saints of Erin,
Illustrious, the festival of the royal one,
Whose peaceful cathedra is great Saigher."

<sup>8</sup> It is in the Burgundian Library, at Bruxelles, classed vol. iv., Nos. 2324—2340, fol. 139. Again in vol. xxii., Nos. 7672 to 7674, we find a Vita S. Kierani, fol. 197.

<sup>9</sup> It is numbered 150, a 4to paper MS.

<sup>10</sup> Fol. 107 to 110.

<sup>11</sup> It only gives a few sentences, however, beginning at fol. 71, the succeeding folios to 91 being defective.

<sup>12</sup> This is classed E. 3. 11.

<sup>13</sup> A small 4to paper MS.

<sup>14</sup> It is classed, Rawl. B. 505, pp. 223 to 227.

<sup>15</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii. Vita S. Kierani Episcopi et Confessoris. Ex Codice Kilkenniensi, pp. 458 to 467. Alia Vita ejusdem seu Lectiones Officii ejus ex MS. Salmanticensi, pp. 467 to 469. An Appendix, in four chapters, follows, pp. 470 to 473.

<sup>16</sup> The author has obtained the loan of an English translation, from an Irish version of this Life, made by the well-known Irish as the Codex Kilkenniensis,<sup>16</sup> with a shorter one, extracted from a Salaman-can MS., and which is said to contain his office lessons, distributed into twelve parts. In the opinion of Colgan, the writer of the longer Life must have been a monk,<sup>17</sup> living under St. Kieran's rule.<sup>18</sup> Such a conclusion, however, may not safely be inferred from the evidence cited. The style of this foremost composition indicates a remote age, being remarkable for its conciseness and simplicity, not less than for its occasional violations of grammatical rules. Colgan inclines to a supposition, that this Life had been written by St. Evan, who also compiled St. Patrick's Acts, and most of the other Lives, contained in the Codex Kilkenniensis. Such, likewise, seems to have been the opinion of Father Hugh Ward. The first published Life, in Colgan, had been collated with others, not differing much in substance from it; while the office lessons, which are published, have probably been extracted, from some one or other of the earlier Lives. However, events therein related appear to have been selected from more copious materials, and they are probably written in a more elegant style, than found in the originals. The extant Lives of St. Kieran are unquestionably of great antiquity, and although comprising much that is fabulous, they do not bear the marks of documents, forged to support a preconceived theory. Perhaps, it is assuming too much in supposing, that they are altogether without foundation; especially, when we recollect, that they derive support, from almost every historical authority, bearing on the ancient Church History of Ireland.<sup>19</sup> For the 3rd of the March Nones, John Capgrave has noted the Acts of St. Piran,<sup>20</sup> Bishop and Confessor.<sup>21</sup> In the great Bollandist collection, the Acts of St. Kieran and of St. Carthac, his disciple, bishops and abbots of Saigir, in Ossory, a province of Ireland, are found united, at the 5th day of March.<sup>22</sup> Bishop Challenor treats about this saint.<sup>23</sup> The Rev. Alban Butler<sup>24</sup> gives some notices of this St. Kieran, or as he is also styled, Kenerin, B. C., called by the Britons, Piran.<sup>25</sup> The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has also a Life of St. Kieran or Piran, Abbot of Saigir.<sup>26</sup> But, by far the most complete and re-scholar, Mr. John O'Daly, of 9 Anglesea-street, Dublin. In some few particulars, it differs from the Life, as published by Colgan.

<sup>17</sup> Thus, he is thought to have lived, before the year 550, according to these words: "Hic indicat clare author se vixisse inter Monachos S. Kierani tempore patrati hujus miraculi, dum dicit quia nemini ex nostris hoc indicavit." See ibid., n. 30, p. 465. And, also, speaking of this particular passage, Colgan says: "Quibus verbis videtur indicare & se Monachum S. Kierani fuisse, & interfuisse, dum illa, quæ refert, gerebantur. Unde videtur vixisse ante annum 550, ante quem illa constat gesta fuisse: quo tempore & S. Evinum vixisse ostendimus in notis ad vitam Tripartitam S. Patricii, num. i." See ibid., n. 1, p. 463.

<sup>18</sup> From a passage in the former Life, cited by Colgan, it is supposed, that its author had been contemporaneous with our saint. "Nos autem latet quomodo ibat aut redibat, quia nemini ex nostris hoc indicavit."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii. Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkenniensi, cap. xxv., p. 461.

<sup>19</sup> See "The History of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny." By Rev.

James Graves, A.B., and J. A. Prim, p. 2.

<sup>20</sup> The original is in MS. Cott. Tiber E. i., ff. 56-58 b.

<sup>21</sup> See "Nova Legenda Angliæ," fol. cclxvii., cclxviii., cclxix., cclxx.

<sup>22</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii v. A previous commentary, in three sections, and afterwards, the Life, taken from the Salaman-can MS. of the Irish College of the Jesuits, as published also by Colgan, together with an Appendix, containing additional miracles taken from the Codex Kilkenniensis, published by Colgan, with some few corrections or additions in the general Appendix: all these matters comprise the Bollandist notices. See pp. 389 to 399, and pp. 901, 902.

<sup>23</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 154, 155.

<sup>24</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March v.

<sup>25</sup> These notices profess to be extracted, from Leland's "Collections," published by Hearne, tome iii., pp. 10, 174, from Ussher, and from John of Tinmouth.

<sup>26</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March v., pp. 66 to 72.

<sup>27</sup> This volume, so creditable to local searchful Life of St. Kieran,<sup>27</sup> which has yet appeared, is that so carefully produced, by Mr. John Hogan, of Kilkenny City. Not alone are the Acts of the holy patron rendered interesting and attractive, but the topography of ancient and modern Ossory is graphically sketched and historically illustrated, by the author. The Rev. John Francis Shearman has also very learnedly and laboriously investigated this subject;<sup>28</sup> but, forming conclusions, at variance with many of Mr. Hogan's statements.<sup>29</sup> Dr. Lanigan,<sup>30</sup> the Bollandists,<sup>31</sup> and many respectable authorities, consider the two Lives of St. Kieran, published by Colgan, as very incorrect and abounding in fables.<sup>32</sup> Such unquestionably, in our opinion, is the case; however, having no more ancient<sup>33</sup> or authentic documents, on which to rely, for particulars of our saint's life, we are mainly compelled to present some of their details, with the substance of certain dissertations, contained in Colgan's Appendix, and in his principal notes. From such of the foregoing materials, as have become typography, is intitled: "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory, a Memoir of his Life and Times, comprising a Preliminary Enquiry respecting the period of his Birth; an Historical Commentary on the Legend of his Life; some Notes on his Death, and on the Surviving Memorials of his Mission." By John Hogan, Kilkenny. Printed at the Journal Office, A.D. 1876. 8vo.

<sup>28</sup> In connexion with the valuable series of Papers, denominated "Loca Patriciana," published in "The Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland." See especially vol. iv. Fourth Series, January, 1877, No. 29. No. xi.

<sup>29</sup> From the initials, J. H., appended to a Review of Rev. John Francis Shearman's statement, we may probably regard it as a reply of Mr. Hogan, published in the Kilkenny Journal of June 13th, 1877. It is headed "Kilkenny Archæological Society. St. Patrick and St. Kieran."

<sup>30</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xiv., p. 29.

<sup>31</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii v.

<sup>32</sup> The Rev. Mr. Shearman, criticising the legend of St. Ciaran's Life, writes: "This Life or Memoir is so filled with absurd and ridiculous miracles that the Bollandists altogether rejected it. We must demur to their judgment, which was to some extent ill-grounded and premature; apart from the legendary portion of this Life, which indeed may, with advantage, be set aside, there are references to persons who can be identified in the history and genealogies of the period. Of this process the Bollandists, from want of historical materials, were incapable of forming a proper estimate, and this document in the form it has reached our time is founded on some very ancient and authentic records." The writer then ventures a suggestion, that "it appears to have been recast," for the purpose of sustaining the ante-Patrician claims, presumably of an earlier Apostolate, for Ciaran, Ibharr, Declan and Ailbhe. See "Loca Patriciana," No. xi., pp. 214, 217. In addition, he supposes, that the emenda-tions were made "at a period when gross ignorance and laxity of morals were prevalent."

<sup>33</sup> The following arguments are used in the Review, with the initials, J. H., to establish the probable period for the composition of Colgan's First Life:—

"From its intrinsic evidence the Life of Ciaran must have been compiled before the first assault of the Danes on the monastery of Saigher. In the year 842 we read: 'Birand Saighir were plundered by the Gentiles.' In a century later, i.e. A.D. 952, the city of Saighir-Ciaran was demolished and its monastery burned to the ground by 'The men of Munster.' In twenty years later, Sabia, Queen of Ireland, found the cemetery of Saighir, an unprotected commons, and procured masons out of Meath to enclose it with walls, to save it from desecration. After this, the church of Saighir never regained its former opulence. Now the legend of Ciaran's life was written when the monastery of Saigher had attained the culminating point in its affluence, and whilst in the undisturbed enjoyment of its primitive institutions. Two years after the first raid of the Danes on Saigher, in A.D. 842, Cormac MacEladach was promoted to the abbacy of that church, he is the only one in the long list of its ecclesiastics to whom the Four Masters give the title of scribe 'Cormac MacEladach, Bishop and Scribe of Saigher,' and to him we can with safety assign the authorship of the legend of Ciaran's Life. If he did compile it he must have done so before his elevation to the abbacy, as the Danish raid on the monastery occurred two years previous to that event. It might have been written at an earlier period, but it could not have been done after his time, as at the date of its compilation the monastery was in the most ample enjoyment of its original immunities, privileges and material possessions; and no reference whatever is made to any encroachment on its rights by either foreign or native assailants. Whence we can conclude with certainty that the legend of St. Ciaran's Life was written be-accessible to the writer, he must endeavour to work out the somewhat perplexing subject of St. Kieran's memoir. Among other matters in question, the subject of St. Kieran's ancestry and natal place has divided opinion.<sup>34</sup> However, he is numbered among the twelve principal Irish saints; and, according to the most generally received pedigree, he descended from an illustrious Ossorian family, in the western part of Leinster province.<sup>35</sup> Thus do we find the matter stated.<sup>36</sup> Kieran was the son of Lughaidh, or Lugneus, son to Rumond,<sup>37</sup> son of Conaill, or Conall, son of Corpre,<sup>38</sup> son of Nia Corb, or Niedcorb, son to Becan,<sup>39</sup> son of Eochaid Lamdoit, or Eochad Lamhdoid, son to Amalgaidh, or Amalgad, son of Loagair or Leoghaire Birn, who was the son of Aengus Osraighe, or Ænguss, of Ossory.<sup>40</sup> According to the O'Clerys, this last-named prince belonged to the posterity of Labhraidh Lorc, from whom are the Leinstermen, and who was also of the seed of Heremon.<sup>41</sup> Again, the mother of St. Kieran, variedly named, Lighain,<sup>42</sup> Lidania, or Liuen,<sup>43</sup> according to the O'Clerys,<sup>44</sup> was the daughter of fore the first attack of the Danes on Saigher in A.D. 842, and apparently by Cormac MacEladach, the bishop and scribe of that church, at the same period."

<sup>34</sup> Maguire tells us, in chap. i. that his father was Brandubh, the son of Bressal, son to Bran, &c. However, as Colgan remarks, the pedigree thus given refers to another St. Kieran, about whom St. Ængus treats in his "Opuscula," lib. ii., pars. i., cap. 7.

<sup>35</sup> Authors differ regarding his father's name, and pedigree. Capgrave and Hammer state, that his father was Domnel, and his mother Wingella.

<sup>36</sup> In the Biography of Mr. Hogan, we learn, that "of the Dal Birn of Ossory was Ciaran." According to the author, this "confines him to the Royal family of the Ossorian tribe—for the Dal Birn was the tribe name of the MacGillaphaidraig Clan, and came originally from Leorghaine Birn, the second King of Ossory." The pedigree of Ciaran is preserved in the Book of Lecan, and in the Book of Leinster, with direct descents from Aengus Ossory, through his successors to Lughaidh or Luaghe, the father of Ciaran. Mr. Hogan asserts, that this determines with certainty the tribe and the territory of Ciaran's ancestry. We must refer the inquiring and curious reader to Mr. Hogan's work, in order that he may ascertain the means, by which the genealogical problem is worked out, and how he develops those principles and establishes those facts, on which he vindicates the Royal descent of the illustrious wonder-worker, the patron saint of Old Ossory. The first chapter is wholly devoted to this portion of the subject. See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," chap. i., pp. 3 to 12.

<sup>37</sup> Also called, Ruman Duach.

<sup>38</sup> Also called, Cairbre Caem.

<sup>39</sup> I find him called, likewise, Buan Osraighe.

<sup>40</sup> According to the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," the "Calendarium Casselense," the "Psalter of Cashel," Seluacius, Ussher and Ware, the foregoing is our saint's detailed genealogy on the father's side.

<sup>41</sup> See Drs. Todd's and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 64, 65.

<sup>42</sup> In the second chapter of Mr. Hogan's work, the maternal genealogy of St. Ciaran is given. "The name of his mother was Liadhan, and she was a native of Corca Laighe." In the Books of Lecan and of Ballymote, the genealogy of Corca Laighe is given, with clearness and accuracy. In the "Miscellany of the Celtic Society," Dr. O'Donovan published, with a translation and notes, the genealogy. We learn from this authority, the following traditional circumstances, that———— Lighain, daughter of Maine, who was the Mother of Ciaran of Saighir. He was born at Finntract-Clere, And the Angels of God attended upon her, The orders of Heaven Baptized him. Here was (dwelling) the chieftain who first believed In the Cross in Ireland; for Ciaran had taken Saighir Thirty years before Patrick arrived, as the poet said.

Saighir the cold
Found a city on its brink,
At the end of thirty years
I shall meet there and thou.

It is calculated, by Mr. Hogan, that Lighain was thirty years of age in 373, when Ciaran would be first making his appearance on the scene of life; and, the last lines of the above rann refer to the meeting between St. Patrick and Ciaran at Saighir in 455, when the latter was eighty years of age. See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," chap. ii., pp. 13, 14.

<sup>43</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says, at this proper name, Luien, "This is probably a clerical error for Luuen, i.e., Leduin, Leduina, or Liadain, the name given in the Kilkenny MS. of his life, as printed by Colgan."

Manius Kerr, son to Ænguss, of Lugad's race, and he was son of Ith, according to Maguire.<sup>45</sup> She was descended from a family of Corca Laighde,<sup>46</sup> in the most southern part of the present county of Cork.<sup>47</sup> The question of accuracy in the several links of descent has been controverted.<sup>48</sup> Now, it has been stated, in some genealogies, that St. Kieran of Saigir was a brother<sup>49</sup> to St. Nem Mac Ua Birn,<sup>50</sup> who succeeded St. Enda,<sup>51</sup> an abbot of Aran, and who died A.D. 654.<sup>52</sup> This is apparently inadmissible; but, while it might be reconcilable with the existence of supposed contemporaries, mentioned in his Acts, both chronology and genealogy<sup>53</sup> are too conflicting to render pronouncement very certain, in many of their details.

<sup>44</sup> For this, they quote the xxi. chap. of his own Irish Life.

<sup>45</sup> All other writers are said to be of accord in the foregoing statement, excepting Capgrave and Hanmer, who call St. Kieran's mother, Wingella.

<sup>46</sup> The reader will find the fullest account of this ancient territory and its tribes, with a map preceding, in the "Miscellany of the Celtic Society," edited by John O'Donovan, LL.D., M.R.I.A. See the First Tract, Seinealac Copca Larbe, or the "Genealogy of Corca Laidhe."

<sup>47</sup> The English MS. says, "Corca Laidhe, in the eastern part of Munster."

<sup>48</sup> The Rev. Mr. Shearman writes: "The patrons of the pre-Patrician date of St. Ciaran rely on the place he holds both in his paternal and maternal genealogies: which, if perfectly reliable, would appear to sustain their views; but they are not so, as some generations are evidently either lost or omitted, and in consequence, no theory can be formed on them."—"Loca Patriciana," No. xi., p. 214. The writer then pursues his statements, by adding ingenious arguments to prove them, but which are of too complicated and elaborate a character for our powers of analysing or resolving; however, we should recommend our readers a reference to several of his subsequent pages.

<sup>49</sup> The Rev. John Francis Shearman appears to attach some weight to the account of this relationship, in his "Loca Patriciana," No. xi., pp. 224, 225.—"Journal of the Royal and Archaeological Association of Ireland," vol. iv. Fourth Series, January, 1877, No. 29.

<sup>50</sup> See his Life, at the 14th of June.

<sup>51</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of March.

<sup>52</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 266, 267.

<sup>53</sup> In reply to Rev. Mr. Shearman's argument, J. H. writes in his Review:

"There is no evidence to show that even one descent or generation is missing or lost in either the paternal or maternal lines, or if there be, why not produce that evidence? The paternal genealogy of St. Ciaran is found in very many and very different authorities, as no one knows better, and few so well, as our Rev. author. In the Felire of Aengus, written during the eighth century, transcribed by our author from Hennessy's copy of that MS. In the 'Sanctilogium Geneal,' translated into Latin by Colgan from the 'Book of Lecan.' In the 'Book of Leinster,' copied by Father Shearman for the present writer. In O'Mahony's edition of Keating's 'Ireland,' and in Dr. O'Donovan's genealogy of the Ossorian Family the paternal genealogy of Ciaran is preserved, and in each the pedigree is numerically the same, the only difference found to exist being confined to the orthography, which is not material. Each version of the pedigree gives nine descents or generations from Aengus Ossory, to Lughaidh (Lewy), the son of Roman Duach and father of St. Ciaran. Those nine descents at 30 years each make 270 years, which, added to A.D. 105, which represents Aengus Ossory the head of the race, in his manhood, bring us to Ciaran's father at A.D. 375, then thirty years of age, and which represents the date of the birth of his son, St. Ciaran. We shall now test the authenticity of this pedigree and the accuracy of its results by collating it with the genealogy of St. Ciaran's mother, Liedania. This lady was not an Ossorian; she descended in the fourth degree from Lughaidh MacCon, Monarch of Ireland, A.D. 253. The intervening generations are given in the 'Genealogy of the Corca Laighe,' preserved in the Books of 'Lecan' and 'Ballymote,' translated and edited for the 'Celtic Society' by the late Dr. O'Donovan, 1849. The pedigree is as follows:—'Lughaidh MacCon, Maichnaidh (Mainay), Aengus Bolg, Mainn Cherr, Liedanie (Leann), St. Ciaran.' Liedanie is here fourth in descent from Lughaidh MacCon. Four descents at thirty years to each make 120 years, which, added to A.D. 253, the date of MacCon's death, bring us to Liedanie at A.D. 373, when she would be thirty years old, and when her son Ciaran would be just born. Ciaran's paternal pedigree represents him as being born in A.D. 375. His maternal genealogy represents his birth in A.D. 373—a difference of only two years—occurring in the result of the comparison which proves that no generations are missing or lost in either line; if there were the result could not so closely approximate. But if we test the maternal genealogy of Ciaran by analysing its component parts, it gives us the following result, which ought to settle the Various dates have been assigned for the birth of Kieran. According to Ussher<sup>54</sup> and O'Flaherty, our saint was born in the year 352;<sup>55</sup> and, at a time, when Paganism universally prevailed throughout Ireland, as stated in his Life. Mr. Hogan deems the year 375 to accord more nearly, with the date for his birth.<sup>56</sup> This early period will not be allowed, by other learned writers,<sup>57</sup> who would seem desirous of bringing that event, at least into the fifth century, if not into the age next succeeding.<sup>58</sup> However this may be,<sup>59</sup> Ware makes our saint a native of Ossory;<sup>60</sup> but, Harris corrects this mistake,<sup>61</sup> assigning his birth to Clare Island,<sup>62</sup> on the authority of Ussher's MS. Life. This island of Cape Clear<sup>63</sup> is the most southern land, in Ireland; but, it had been misplaced in several old maps and sea-charts. Smith professes to indicate its position more exactly, than it had been previously defined, on the map of his County History. The north side of Clear Island bears potatoes, barley, and a little wheat, while the south is mostly a craggy rock. On this island, there were about 400 families,<sup>64</sup> who had a good quantity of sheep and cows, some swine and horses, but all their cattle were very small. The islanders were often obliged to have provisions from the main shore, and in the most plentiful years, they never sent any to market.<sup>65</sup> question of its accuracy. Lughaidh MacCon was the grandfather of Aengus Bolg, and this Aengus Bolg was the grandfather of Ciaran's mother. This chieftain had a son named Mainn Cherr, and a daughter named Abinda. Mainn Cherr had a daughter named Liedania, and Abinda, becoming the wife of Core, the first king of Cashel, had by him a son named Nadfrach; hence Liedania, the daughter of Mainn Cherr and Nadhfrach, the son of Abinda, were first cousins. Nadfrach, the second king of Cashel, had a son named Aengus, the first Christian king of Munster, and Liedania becoming the wife of Lughaidh, an Ossorian chieftain, gave birth to Ciaran, the 'first-born of the saints of Ireland,' hence Aengus MacNadfrach and St. Ciaran of Saighir were second cousins. Aengus was King of Munster, and a married man when he was baptized by St. Patrick circa 447-8, and, as a matter of course, both himself and his cousin Ciaran must have preceded St. Patrick in Ireland; and, now, with those statistics before us, how are we to hold with our Rev. author that St. Ciaran belonged to the middle of the sixth century, though himself and his cousin, Aengus MacNadfrach, were full-grown men in the middle of the fifth?"

<sup>54</sup> At this year, Ussher remarks, in his Index Chronologicus: "S. Kiaranus Saigrius in Hibernia natus est," p. 511. In the "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvi., p. 410, Ussher says, "In Lagenia, vero provincia inter Ossorienses, circa annum cccclii., natus est Kiaranus &c.," although he afterwards acknowledges, that from a MS. Life of our saint, which he possessed, —and which as appears from his quotations was identical with that first Life published by Colgan—our saint is related to have been born and reared, "in regione Corculagide, videlicet in Clera insula." Ibid.

<sup>55</sup> O'Flaherty says, at "Anno 552. S. Kiaranus Saighir Ossoriorum patronus in lucem editus,"—"Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxv., p. 360.

<sup>56</sup> See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part i., chap. i., p. 12, chap. ii., p. 14.

<sup>57</sup> Among the number may be mentioned the Rev. Drs. Lanigan and Todd, the Rev. John Francis Shearman, and a writer, in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," who gives the initials B. M. C., vol. iii., October, 1866. "St. Ciaran of Ossory and our Correspondents," pp. 25 to 35.

<sup>58</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd states, that the genealogy of his father Luaigre is preserved in nine descents from his ancestor Aengus of Ossory, who was expelled from his lands, by the Desii, in the reign of Cormac Ulfada (A.D. 254-277). "If this be so, St. Ciaran's father could not have been born much before A.D. 500."—"St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," Introductory Dissertation, n. 6., pp. 202, 203.

<sup>59</sup> To understand the elaborate reasoning of Mr. Hogan, in reference to various objections occurring against his theory, the reader must carefully study his "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part i., chap. iii., iv., v., vi., vii., pp. 15 to 29.

<sup>60</sup> See "De Præsulibus Lageniæ," lib. i. Episcopi Ossorienses, p. 68.

<sup>61</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Ossory," p. 400.

<sup>62</sup> In Irish, it is called Inis-Clere, which is Latinized "Insula Clericorum," according to the Irish Life of St. Ciaran.

<sup>63</sup> It is a parish of itself, containing twelve ploughlands; in the Ecclesiastical Books it is called Insula Sancta Clara; and in the old Irish MSS., Inish Damhly. It contains over 1,500 acres in the barony of West Carbery (E. D.), and it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cork," Sheet 153.

It is said, that our saint's mother, before conception, had a vision during her sleep, when a star seemed to fall into her mouth; and, having afterwards related this circumstance to the Magi, these declared, she should bring forth a son, whose fame and virtue must be diffused throughout Ireland, and to the end of time. After a sufficient period had elapsed, Kieran was born, in the territory of Corcalaghde. Almost from the moment of his birth, Ciaran seemed to be a favoured child of heaven. As he grew up, his parents and acquaintances, although pagans, admired the piety of his disposition, the sweetness of his discourse, his well-regulated mind, his prudent counsels, his frequent fasts, and all those other actions, which specially characterize the perfect Christian.<sup>66</sup> The virtue of purity particularly distinguished him, and the darkness of pagan error seemed fast disappearing, before that light of Divine Grace so wondrously imparted to his soul.<sup>67</sup>

As a mere youth, we are told, that while Ciaran lived at Cape Clear,<sup>68</sup> a kite suddenly pounced upon a small bird, which was seated on her nest. This latter, in his presence, became a victim to the bird of prey, having been caught in its talons, and taken off into upper air. On seeing it, the child grieved much, at the fate of this small bird; and, his innocent sympathies being moved to prayer for its preservation, the kite again returned, and placed its prey, but only half alive and wounded, before him. This poor bird was then restored to its nest, which it seemed to occupy with great satisfaction. Thus, even in such a trifling incident, it seemed that the Almighty was not unmindful of the desires and prayers of those, who are innocent and clean of heart.<sup>69</sup>

In a state of holiness, while following the law of nature and of grace, Kieran continued to his thirtieth year, without being regenerated in the waters of baptism, as the legend of his Life relates. At this time, having received some account of the Christian religion, as practised in Rome, he resolved on setting out for this renowned city, to gratify his laudable desire, for receiving more exact information, regarding its doctrines and observances. Having left Ireland, and proceeded to the capital of the Christian world, he was duly instructed in Catholic doctrine. In the year 382, according to Ussher,<sup>70</sup> Kieran was regenerated, in the saving waters of baptism; but, those who adopt other data for the time of his birth, proportionately advance the year, for succeeding events in his life.<sup>71</sup>

<sup>64</sup> When Smith wrote his "History of the County of Cork," about the middle of the last century.

<sup>65</sup> In the work of Charles Smith, we read: "Towards the middle of the island, is their chapel, a large building, but as destitute of any ornament as a barn. Here most of the inhabitants meet on Sundays and holidays."—"History of the County of Cork," vol. i., book ii., chap. iv., pp. 278, 279.

<sup>66</sup> Such is the statement, in his First Life, as published by Colgan, cap. ii., p. 458.

<sup>67</sup> See "Officium," lect. i., p. 467. Salamancan MS.

<sup>68</sup> In the second volume of "Memoranda on Antiquities and Local Names of the County of Cork," we find some interesting information, regarding the parish of Clear Island, and our saint's memorials, yet remaining. These are now preserved, in the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>69</sup> This is related, in the First Life, cap. iii., p. 458; as also in the Office of St.

Kieran, lect. ii., p. 467.

<sup>70</sup> See "Index Chronologicus," p. 512. Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvi., p. 412, where we read: "Deinde ordinatum ibi Episcopum, ad patriam suam Hiberniam missum fuisse subicit, triginta annis ante adventum B. Patricii, quem anno Domini ccccxxii. contigisse postea docebitur. Unde inita subductaque ratione, anno ccclii. in lucem editum, cccclxxii. Romam adisse, & cccclii. in patriam rediisse Kiaranum comperimus."

<sup>71</sup> According to Mr. Hogan's calculation, his departure for Rome brings us to A.D. 405, the same year, in which Nial of the Nine Hostages fitted out an armada, and set sail for the coasts of Gaul. This, it is thought, may have furnished the opportunity for St. Kieran's voyage. See Mr. Hogan's Review, already quoted, from the Kilkenny Journal of June 13th, 1877.

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> See Mr. John Hogan's

CHAPTER II.

ST. KIERAN'S ORDINATION AND CONSECRATION—HIS MEETING WITH ST. PATRICK, AND THEIR INTERCOURSE—HE IS RECOMMENDED BY THE LATTER TO PREACH THE GOSPEL IN IRELAND—CONJECTURES REGARDING THE PLACE WHERE HIS MISSION BEGAN.

HIS fame for eloquence and virtue had preceded him,<sup>1</sup> and St. Kieran remained for twenty years at Rome, according to both his Lives, as published by Colgan; but, only for a period of fifteen, according to Capgrave. During this time, as we are told, he was diligently employed in studying the Sacred Scriptures, and in collecting copies of them; whilst, at the same time, he was engaged in acquiring a knowledge of the Church Canons. His wisdom and knowledge, his piety and faith, so far recommended him, that after receiving priesthood, it is said he was promoted to the episcopal rank.<sup>2</sup> Were we to credit some calculations—which we believe to have no better basis to rest on other than ingenious conjecture—St. Kieran may have been living in Italy; yet, that he received episcopal consecration in Rome, or that he derived a direct commission therefrom, to preach the gospel, as a bishop, in Ireland, may be regarded as doubtful. If in Rome at all, a writer of our saint's life supposes, that he must have left it, before the year 418, and, on his way homewards, he is thought to have visited one of the greatest schools of that age in Italy, where his clerical studies were either commenced or prosecuted. This is conjectured to have been Lerins, now St. Honorat, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, not far from the western coast of Italy. Here, the period of his stay is imagined to have procured St. Kieran's first acquaintance, with the future great Apostle of Ireland. In the second part of Mr. Hogan's book, we are given an account, of how St. Ciaran remained some time in Rome, of how he was ordained bishop, of how on his journey homewards, he met St. Patrick in Italy, and ordained him priest. To the work itself, we must refer the reader for comprehension of the probability of such narrative. Again, Kieran is identified with a St. Senior, to whom St. Patrick was referred by an angel to receive instruction, and who is regarded, as having already attained to the grade of bishop. Among those Irish saints the Apostle of Ireland met abroad,<sup>3</sup> the sixth was Senex Kieranus de Sagir, according to the Tripartite Life;<sup>4</sup> and, from "Senex" to "Senior" the transposition is easy, while, when the work in question was written, "S. Senior Ciaranus episcopus" was our saint's proper designation,<sup>5</sup> and it is thought, by accident or design, the word "Ciaranus" being allowed to drop out of St. Patrick's memoirs, the qualifying adjective was allowed to form the proper name for our bishop.<sup>6</sup> After due instruction, at Lerins, Mr. Hogan would have it, that Bishop Ciaran ordained St. Patrick a priest, and afterwards continued to exercise the relationship of tutor towards the future Apostle, as supposed, for seven years. To this period is assigned St. Patrick's vision, which urged him to labour for the conversion of the Irish, as also his advice to St. Ciaran, pending a pre-

<sup>1</sup> "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. vi., pp. 69 to 73.

<sup>2</sup> See Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. iv., p. 458, also Vita S. Kierani ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. 2, p. 467.

<sup>3</sup> See an account of this transaction, in the notices of St. Meallan, of Kilrush, or of Cloncruff, at the 28th of January.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. ix.,

p. 130. There, too, our saint is classed among the disciples of St. Patrick.—"Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii," cap. xxiii., p. 266.

<sup>5</sup> In the Feinealaë Copca Laròe, we read: Acuf ip é Ciaran pínorep naem Ereno, in English, "And Ciaran is the senior of the saints of Eire."—"Miscellany of the Celtic Society," edited by John O'Donovan, Esq., LL.D., M.R.I.A., pp. 22, 23.

paration for that mission, to precede him, in prosecution of their joint labours. After these events, as said about 428,<sup>7</sup> St. Ciaran was sent on a mission to his native island. It is stated, in our saint's Life, that on his return, in company with St. Declan,<sup>8</sup> he met St. Patrick in Italy, when the latter was on his way to Rome. Other accounts represent, that Kieran's meeting with St. Patrick, somewhere out of Ireland, occurred several years after the latter had commenced his apostolical labours in this country. In Colgan's Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, the precise place of meeting is not given;<sup>9</sup> but, it is represented, as having occurred, at least twelve years after St. Patrick had begun his mission in Ireland.<sup>10</sup> Jocelin places it at an epoch, when St. Patrick was returning from Britain. Thither he had gone some time before, to procure a supply of additional helpers for his mission.<sup>11</sup> The future Apostle of Ireland had not been consecrated bishop at that time; as this meeting took place, according to Ussher, about the year 402.<sup>12</sup> Yet, according to Dr. Lanigan, so far from being a bishop at Rome, in the year 402, he was not one, until a considerable time after St. Patrick's mission to Ireland, when Kieran, having returned from abroad, was consecrated.<sup>13</sup>

At that time they met on the Continent, St. Patrick said to Kieran, "Proceed to Ireland before me, and go to a fountain, in the middle of Ireland, which is called Fuaran,<sup>14</sup> on the northern and southern line of division in the island; build a monastery on that spot,<sup>15</sup> for there thou shalt be held in honour, and it shall be the place of thy resurrection." To this St. Kieran replied, "The place where that fountain springs, I do not know." Then, St. Patrick answered, "My dearly-beloved brother, proceed with full confidence, and the Lord will be your guide; receive this bell, which shall be the companion of your journey, and which shall not sound, until you come to the fountain indicated. When you arrive there, the bell shall ring out clearly, and sound sweetly; and after thirty years, I will meet you in that place." With the kiss of peace and mutual benedictions, these great saints departed to the respective places of their destination.<sup>16</sup> It is thought most rational to suppose, that St. Patrick directed Kieran, on landing in Ireland, to visit his own part of the country, and to commence his mission, among the influential persons of his own family, and among his tribesmen. Now, it seems probable enough, that

<sup>6</sup> See Mr. John Hogan's "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. vii., pp. 74 to 83.

<sup>7</sup> According to Mr. Hogan's calculation, in his "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. ix., p. 95.

<sup>8</sup> See his Life, at the 24th of July.

<sup>9</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. ix., p. 130, and n. 34, p. 174. Ibid.

<sup>10</sup> "Kieran is stated to have then received directions from the saint concerning the district, in which he should erect his monastery. Accordingly Colgan, notwithstanding his credulity elsewhere, reckons him among the disciples of St. Patrick."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xiv., p. 30.

<sup>11</sup> In addition, he tells us, that Kieran was then one of six Irish clerics, who were proceeding to foreign countries for religious improvement. All of these afterwards became bishops in their own country. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xciii., p. 86, and n. 104, p. 113. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

turga."

<sup>12</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvi., p. 413, and Index Chronologicus, A.D. ccccii., p. 513.

<sup>13</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xiv., n. 118, p. 32.

<sup>14</sup> According to the English MS. Life, this fountain is styled Uaran, "in a solitary place in the north-east part of the country." The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick has the injunction, that St. Ciaran should build his monastery near the River Huar. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. ix., p. 130. Now, Mr. Hogan contends, that under any of the preceding forms, the River Nore, anciently called, Eoir, Eoire, Eoir, Heoir and Feoir, must be understood. See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. ix., pp. 98, 99.

<sup>15</sup> To our mind, this seems to indicate the site of Saighir Ciaran, and nearly all writers on the subject agree in giving the prophecy such interpretation.

he went first to his native place ; and, in point of fact, an ancient tradition prevails, that the Corca Laidhe first of all other people were believers in Ireland. Most likely, St. Ciaran first landed there, and if so, he undoubtedly began, at once, to open his mission. There, too, it is stated, that the chief or the inhabitants first granted him the site, on which afterwards stood the church known as Cill-Chiarain, or "St. Ciaran's church," near Fintract-Clere,<sup>17</sup> now Traigh-Chiarain, on Cape Clear Island. Here, too, it seems probable, his mother's first cousin, Eiderscel,<sup>18</sup> on her father's side, became a convert, and in consequence, as a reward for his faith, Ciaran predicted for his progeny, reign and chieftainship over their race, while he left to the king of Corca-Laidhe the eniclann of a provincial king.<sup>19</sup> The ruined church of Temple or Kill-Chiaran, stands, on the north-west point of Cape Clear Island, over the cove, called Traigh-Chiarain.<sup>20</sup> The inhabitants of Cape Clear stated, that there never was an old parish church on the island, except Templekieran. One John Gauley,<sup>21</sup> in 1845, carefully examined about this old ruin, and he could find no trace of any other old parish church. There was a stone, of which he presented a handsome pen and ink sketch. It was called, Gallaun-Kieran, which signifies, "St. Kieran's standing-stone." It was of a circular form, tapering towards the top, and it stood on the sea-shore. It measured four feet nine inches in height, by six feet in circumference ;<sup>22</sup> while, near the top, there is a cross, sunk in the stone, and said to have been cut, by St. Kieran's own hands. There was formerly a cross on the western side, and on its top. These could hardly be traced in 1845, being much defaced through the effects of time.<sup>23</sup> Whether or not, St. Ciaran remained long among the Corca Laidhe can hardly be known ; but, Mr. Hogan seems to bring him directly to the Nore, after he landed in Ireland, and to the present site of Kilkenny City.<sup>24</sup> To those who have visited the lovely valley of the Nore, and the territory lying between the Suir and the Barrow—the accredited scene of Ciaran's apostolic labours—the topography of that territory is graphically sketched and historically illustrated by the author, and it forms one of the most attractive features of his work.<sup>25</sup> In the ancient territory of Ossory, it is supposed, the missionary met his own people, and planted his cross, in view of the Ard-Righ's mansion, which occupied the site of the present magnificent castle in Kilkenny.<sup>26</sup> Here he collected a

<sup>16</sup> See the First Life, as published by Colgan, chap. v.

<sup>17</sup> In English "the fair," or "white strand of Cape Clear Island."

<sup>18</sup> Not from him, but from his twelfth descendant, Eiderscel, son of Finn, the Ui-Eidersceol, or O'Driscolls took their hereditary surnames.

<sup>19</sup> See Seinealaí Corca Laidhe, in "Miscellany of the Celtic Society," and nn. (c. f. g), pp. 20 to 23.

<sup>20</sup> See Charles Smith's "Natural and Civil History of the County of Cork," book ii., chap. iv.

<sup>21</sup> To certain queries, addressed to this locality, by Lieutenant Leach, R.E., we have the substance of what is related here, as returned by John Gauley, in the May of 1845.

<sup>22</sup> We must suppose, at the base.

<sup>23</sup> Being questioned, if St. Ciaran's cross were one separate from the Gallaunkieran, Mr. Gauley replies, that "there is no other object in the island with a cross cut on it save this." The same writer tells us, that in Comillane townland, in Clear Island, there is a remarkable group of Gallauns, two of which are standing, and one is lying, on the ground, a fence crossing it. There is a hole, about eight inches in diameter, on the top, getting narrow, as it goes inward, perforated through one of them. It has evidently been made by art, at a remote period. The inhabitants call these stones Gallauns, but nothing more could be learned regarding them. A handsome pen and ink sketch of them accompanies this account. There are burial grounds, in Clear Island, called Keels, by the inhabitants. Those burial places can hardly be distinguished from surrounding fields. See, pp. 440 to 445, of the "Cork Memorandums," now in the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>24</sup> It is marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheet 19.

<sup>25</sup> See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. i., ii., iii., iv., pp. 42 to 65.

<sup>26</sup> For a charming engraved illustration, band of disciples, established his first Irish monastery, chaunted his psalms, practised the rule of Lerins, confronted the Druids and their pagan followers, and succeeded in establishing the nucleus of a religious community. Here, too, was erected one of the earliest Christian churches, in Ireland. His well is also known, and it indicated the site of his old church—the representative of which stood to the end of the last century—inside of the present public market, as you enter it from King-street, on the west bank of the River Nore. St. Ciaran's well is still flowing, outside of the market wall, in the adjoining yard, and to the south. Here, it is said, he established a seminary, and from the alumni of this primitive school issued eloquent preachers and distinguished bishops, the first evangelizers of Ossory.<sup>27</sup> For such a conclusion, however, no sufficient evidence is adduced. The saints of his family and school are renowned, notwithstanding, in our Calendars and History.<sup>28</sup>

Mr. Hogan disposes of all that Dr. Todd had urged against the Roman mission of Saint Patrick,<sup>29</sup> and, he maintains, that Ciaran had a pre-Patrician mission. This latter conclusion seems the most difficult to establish, beyond question;<sup>30</sup> however, traditional and recorded statements have very generally prevailed, in leading to such an inference. The oldest and most intelligent inhabitants of Northern Ossory, as the result of enquiries elicited, appear to hold, and with remarkable unanimity, an old tradition, affirming the pre-Patrician mission of St. Kieran. In fact, as we are told, they would not be at all pleased to have any doubts cast on its authenticity.<sup>31</sup>

CHAPTER III.

FORMER EXTENT OF OSSORY—ACCOUNT OF ST. KIERAN'S FIRST MISSION THERE—ST. KIERAN'S HOLY WELL IN TUBBRID—HIS FOUNDATION OF SAIGIR, AND ITS POSITION—HIS MIRACLES.

THE name and fame of the founder, Ængus Osraidhe, gave an early prestige to this ancient territory. He was a renowned warrior. Originally, Ossory included the district of Magh Feimhin, which he had subdued; and then, it is stated, that from the River Suir to the Barrow, and from the mountains of Slieve Bloom to the meeting of the three waters, in the harbour of Waterford, its boundaries extended.<sup>1</sup> But, during the reign of Cormac Mac Art,<sup>2</sup> the Desii drove the conqueror from Magh Feimhin, and at Baille Urluidhe, as and a letter-press description, the reader is referred to W. B. Bartlett's "Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland," vol. i., pp. 151 to 153.

<sup>27</sup> See John Hogan's "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. ix., pp. 99, 100.

<sup>28</sup> See ibid., chap. x., pp. 101 to 114.

<sup>29</sup> See "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. i.

<sup>30</sup> Mr. Hogan, in the Review, writes: "The earliest known reference to the 'pre-Patrician' mission of Ciaran is that found in the 'Tripartite' Life of St. Patrick. This venerable memoir of our Apostle is attributed to St. Evan, who died towards the end of the sixth century, so that the memoir was compiled probably as early as A.D. 580. Dr. Lanigan, generally over-sceptical, objects to so early a date; but the late Professor O'Curry, who had Lanigan's objections on the point before him, unhesitatingly assigns the authorship of the 'Tripartite' to St. Evan." He then refers to the "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," and we presume to lect. xvi., where Mr. O'Curry treats on this subject; but, where he shows—that if, as Colgan supposes, St. Eimhín were the author—interpolations afterwards crept into the tract, as published.

<sup>31</sup> See an interesting Paper, read before the Ossory Archæological Society, and intitled, "Vindication of the Claim of St. Kieran, of Saigher, to the title of 'Primogenitus Sanctorum Hiberniæ.'" By the Rev. N. Murphy. Published in the Kilkenny Journal, of Wednesday, October 31st, 1877.

CHAPTER III.—See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Geart, or Book of Rights," n. (a), pp. 17, 18.

<sup>2</sup> He reigned from A.D. 227, to A.D. 266, according to the Chronology of the Four Masters.

also at Mulloch Aindeonach, he seems to have suffered signal defeats.<sup>3</sup> Gradually, the Ossorians were driven eastwards and northwards; but, the traditions and records of this period are very obscure, and rather difficult to be reconciled. It is thought, by Mr. Hogan, that when St. Ciaran first began his missionary career in Ossory, its boundaries extended into the county of Tipperary;<sup>4</sup> and, if so, perhaps, this will afford some clue to the memorials of religion, connected with his name in this part of the country. There is sufficient evidence to show, in the opinion of a distinguished authority, that since the introduction of Christianity, the limits of its territory, never extended beyond the present diocese of Ossory.<sup>5</sup>

We find it incorrectly stated, that Tubbrid,<sup>6</sup> in the county of Tipperary, and the parish to which Dr. Jeffery Keating had been so long attached, contains a holy well, dedicated to St. Kieran Clearagh,<sup>7</sup> one of the four bishops, said to have come from Rome to Ireland, before the illustrious St. Patrick's advent. This holy well springs out of a rock, in perpetual abundance; and, it flows from a hill, on which the Irish historian used to walk, during the days of his pastoral care. It is popularly said, from it, Dr. Keating<sup>8</sup> often viewed the charming scenery of mountain and valley, while therefrom, he was enabled to catch a distant glimpse of persecutors approaching, and so was he enabled to fly for concealment to the woods of Rehill.<sup>9</sup> The old cemetery and chapel of Tubbrid are of special interest to the Irish tourist, as within both repose Dr. Keating's remains, with a slab inscription, commemorating the circumstance, over the front entrance of the sacellum.<sup>10</sup> Tubbrid chapel is only 27 feet 4 inches in length, by 18 feet 7 inches in breadth, on the inside:<sup>11</sup> the side walls are 3 feet in thickness, and, in 1840, about 8 feet in height. The name, Tubbrid, signifies "a well;" it evidently had originally some distinguishing epithet, which has long been forgotten.<sup>12</sup> Not many miles removed

<sup>3</sup> See Dr. Geoffrey Keating's "History of Ireland," book i., pp. 275, 276.

<sup>4</sup> See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. xi., pp. 115 to 123, where an attempt is made to explain this subject.

<sup>5</sup> See the "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagáin and Gilla na Noamh O'Huidhrin," edited by John O'Donovan, LL.D., p. lviii., n. 482.

<sup>6</sup> In the barony of Iffa and Offa West, it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 74, 80, 81, 82, 87, 88. The townland proper is to be found on Sheets 81, 87.

<sup>7</sup> Kieran Clearagh has been rendered, by Maurice Lenihan, Esq., "Kieran of the County Clare." I should rather think, as referring to this saint, it must be "Kieran of Clear Island," or of "Cape Clear." Yet, the real Patron, Ciaran, was venerated, on the 10th of November.

<sup>8</sup> The "History of Ireland," by Dr. Jeffery Keating, contains much information relative to Irish saints, and various Irish copies of it in MSS. are yet found. Among these, in the Royal Irish Academy's collection, may be noticed, Messrs. Hodges and Smith's folio paper MSS. Nos. 48, 49, 50, 62, 63, 122, 123, 173, 174, are different copies of Keating's "History of Ireland." Besides these, there is a small 4to paper MS. (No. 94), containing an imperfect copy of it. Again, the 4to paper MS., No. 124, in the R.I.A., contains a copy of Dr. Keating's "History of Ireland," written in Irish, by Andrew MacCurtin, A.D. 1703. Several editions of this popular History have issued from the press, and the original Irish has been translated into English, by different editors.

<sup>9</sup> This townland extends through the parishes of Tubbrid and Shanrahan, and it is marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 80, 81, 86, 87.

<sup>10</sup> On a Tablet, over the door, and about 1 foot 7½ inches in width, by 2 feet 3 inches in height, there is an inscription, commemorating P. Eugenius Duhý and D. Doct. Galf. Keating, founders of this chapel, with the date 1644. An elegant pen and ink drawing of the Tablet is given, in the Tipperary Letters," O.S., vol. i., and this was taken in 1840.

<sup>11</sup> The accompanying engraving of Tubbrid chapel is by George A. Hanlon, and copied, by the writer, from George V. Du Noyer's sketch, No. 189, of "Tipperary Sketches," vol. iv., for the Irish Ordnance Survey, and now preserved in the Royal Irish Academy. William F. Wakeman drew it on the wood.

<sup>12</sup> In a description, given by John O'Donovan, an interesting account of this parish will be found, in "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Tipperary, collected during the

are the ruins of Shanrahan<sup>13</sup> church—also celebrated as containing within the adjacent burial grounds the grave of the iniquitously executed Father Nicholas Sheehy,<sup>14</sup> the former parish-priest.<sup>15</sup> The square belfry of a fifteenth century church yet stands, and it is built of red sandstone. About it are said to be the ruins of a much more ancient church and abbey, the founder of which is believed, by some, to have been St. Kieran Cleragh, but rather is he to be regarded as a Ciaran, whose feast occurs on the 10th of November. The chancel arch remains, and inside is a venerable yew-tree of rich foliage, with masses of clustering ivy around the ruins.<sup>16</sup>

Tubbrid Old Chapel, County of Tipperary.

According to the legend of his Life, after our St. Kieran arrived in Ireland, the Lord directed his course to the fountain of Fuaran.<sup>17</sup> Now, this is generally thought to have been identical with a stream,<sup>18</sup> which passes near the present Seirkyran<sup>19</sup> or St. Kieran, which was formerly known as Saighir,<sup>20</sup> and some-Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1840," vol. i., pp. 40 to 44.

<sup>13</sup> Shanrahan signifies "the little old fort," according to John O'Donovan, who describes this parish and its antiquities. See ibid., pp. 44 to 46. The extent of this large parish, in the barony of Iffa and Offa West, may be seen on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 74, 80, 81, 86, 87, 89, 90. The townland proper is shown on Sheets 87, 90.

<sup>14</sup> The complete account of this infamous proceeding will be found, in the admirable work of Dr. Richard R. Madden, "The United Irishmen, their Lives and Times," First Series. Second edition, chap. ii., pp. 21 to 89.

<sup>15</sup> The inscription on a slab over the grave dare only state "HE DIED MARCH 15TH, 1766, AGED 38 YEARS."

<sup>16</sup> The foregoing particulars have been extracted from an interesting contribution to The Limerick Reporter and Tipperary Vin-

icator of April 25th, 1871, written by Maurice Lenihan, Esq., M.R.I.A.

<sup>17</sup> Its meaning is thus stated: "Huaran enim sive Fuaran sonat quod fons vivus sive viva vel frigida aqua e terra scaturiens." In St. Kieran's First Life, this fountain is called Fuaran; in St. Patrick's Tripartite Life, it is called Huar. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," cap. v., vi., p. 458, and "Trias Thaumaturga," pars. ii., cap. ix., p. 130.

<sup>18</sup> It has no name, however, on the Ordnance Survey Maps, but it joins the Little Brosna River, near Killyon, and its source is traceable, from the western slope of the Slieve Bloom Mountains.

<sup>19</sup> Its parochial bounds are marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheets 35, 36, 38, 39, 43. The village and surrounding antiquities are defined on Sheet 39. Ibid.

<sup>20</sup> In the gloss on the Festilogium of Ængus, (5th of March), the name is written Saighar, and explained as nomen fontis, times called, from its founder, Saighir-Chiarain. It is a small village, at present, situated in the barony of Ballybritt, King's County, not far from the north-western extremity of the Slieve Bloom mountains.<sup>21</sup> It gives name to a parish, which, although insulated by the diocese of Killaloe, is under the jurisdiction of the Ossorian bishops; thus, affording an extremely interesting landmark, indicating the sway borne in ancient times by the kings of Ossory, over the territory of Eile O'Carroll. In the first Life of Kieran,<sup>22</sup> the geographical position of Saighir<sup>23</sup> is most accurately marked: it is described as lying within the district of Eile, in the very centre of Ireland, on the confines of its ancient northern and southern divisions, Leath-Chuinn and Leath-Mogha, in the region of Munster.<sup>24</sup> All over Ireland, at this time, paganism was prevalent; indeed, we can trace the existence of the pagan priesthood there, at a much later period.

Bell Hill, opposite the present church of Seir Kieran, to the north, is said to have been the hill on which St. Kieran's bell miraculously rang, thus pointing out to him where the fountain was to be found, at which St. Patrick told him to erect his church.<sup>25</sup> It appears to be that stream, which takes its rise on the western slope of the Slieve Bloom mountains, and which flows into the Little Brosna River, before it arrives at Birr.<sup>26</sup> It is said, St. Ciaran's bell rang, according to the prediction of St. Patrick, when he arrived at that fountain. According to St. Kieran's First Life, that bell obtained the designation of Bardan Kieran,<sup>27</sup> or as Colgan suggests an emendation, Bodhran, which signifies, "the mute."<sup>28</sup> It was afterwards held in great honour,<sup>29</sup>

"the name of a well," and there can be little doubt that such was the true and ancient orthography, Ṣaig being the proper name, and uair, in Latin, gelidus, "cool," the descriptive epithet. The "Leabhar Breac" contains that injunction, given by Patrick to Kieran, when on his way to Rome. The Apostle of Ireland met the latter returning home to his native country. The English runs as follows: "Saig, the cold (refreshing) Erect a city on its brink. At the end of thirty revolving years, There shall I and thou meet."

<sup>21</sup> These were called in Irish, Sliabh Bladhna.

<sup>22</sup> This peculiarity of description furnishes a strong proof of its antiquity.

<sup>23</sup> John O'Donovan thinks Ṣaig means Ṣaig uair, "approach the fountain:" if not Ṣaig (Ṣaig), "the seat of the fountain." See "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the King's County, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1837-8," vol. ii., p. 101.

<sup>24</sup> Thus run words in the First Life: "Vade ad Hiberniam ante me, et adi fontem in medio Hiberniæ in confinio Austrarium et Aquilonalium Hiberniensium, qui vocatur Fuaran," &c.

<sup>25</sup> Thus do we find it recorded:—

—Ṣaig uair
Cúmhlaig caétair fonaibh.

"There is a bush on the top of this hill, which is believed to have vegetated since the time of St. Kieran. The legend about the bell is told by the author of the Life of St. Kieran, as published by Colgan, thus; and, it is not very different from the one preserved by oral tradition."—"Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the King's County, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1837-8," vol. ii., pp. 98, 99. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated Birr, February 3rd, 1838. Mr. O'Donovan afterwards gives the account, as found in the pages of Colgan. Rev. J. Purcell, P.P. of Seirkyran, having secured for this parish the historic ground of Bell-hill, hopes to be able to erect on its summit a church, more worthy of the founder of the diocese, than the present unwholesome and unsightly edifice.

<sup>26</sup> The parish of Birr, in the barony of Ballybritt, is defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheets 35, 36, 38. The town itself is marked on Sheet 35. A writer, well conversant with the locality, tells us, that "a small stream, even yet called Fuaran, still purls away on the east side of the ruins at Seir Kyran."—Thomas Lalor Cooke's "Early History of the Town of Birr," &c., chap. x., p. 168.

<sup>27</sup> This bell is said by some, to have been made for St. Germanus, the bishop, and master of St. Patrick.

<sup>28</sup> Because as suggested, it continued so, until it sounded on the spot destined for St. Kieran's foundation. The destiny of Saigher, and the meeting of St. Patrick and St. Kieran, are well told, in the following beautiful verses, by "Enigenensis." They have been transmitted to the writer, and included, in the published tract: "The Feast of St. Kieran at Saigher." Panegyric sermon by throughout the city and province of Kieran.<sup>30</sup> Even to the present day, tradition preserves a recollection of these circumstances, as connected with our saint. The place which Kieran had chosen for his dwelling was untenanted, save by wild beasts. From his disciples, we are told, he removed into a desert, thickly covered with woods. Here, having constructed a rude and humble habitation, the walls being of wicker-work, and the roof of dried grass,<sup>31</sup> Kieran lived the life of a hermit, until such time as he could undertake the erection of a monastery.<sup>32</sup> In this place, a city afterwards grew up, which went by the name of Saigir.<sup>33</sup>

Deterred by the many difficulties which beset the advocacy of an earlier date, Dr. Lanigan has fixed on the latter end of the fifth century, as the more probable era for the foundation of Saigir.<sup>34</sup> But, thus, totally to reject all testimony, in favour of the earlier epoch, does not seem to be in accordance with the rules of sound criticism, much as it may tend to smooth the path of the historian.<sup>35</sup>

Rev. N. Murphy, C.C. The composition in question is called "St. Kieran's Bell," and it is well worth insertion here, as a pleasing Irish poetic tradition.

A hawthorn stands on yonder hill,
Bare, desolate, and lone—

A token frail, but faithful still,
Of centuries long flown.

The startled ear, at even-time,
When weird-winds wander free,
May hear the ghostly Mass-bell chime
Beneath that hoary tree.

And still, around the peasant's hearth,
The legend strange is told,
How, never touched by hands of earth,
Rang out that Bell of old.

They tell how sainted Patrick's hand
On Kieran's head was laid,
While thus he spoke in a stern command—
"Ne're shall thy step be stayed,

"Till sweet as song by seraphs sung,
Which saints alone may hear,
A chime by hands unseen be rung,
To charm thy mortal ear.

"There churches seven thou shalt build;
But ages yet shall see,
Their trampled dust—and see fulfill'd,
For age this prophecy.

"When strewn the Temples thou shalt raise,
A tree, sown by thy hand,
Shall live and preach to distant days,
God's blessings on the land."

He wandered forth, and wandered far,
That ancient pilgrim Saint—
Nor flood nor foe his path could bar,
Till way-worn here and faint,

He paused—when, hark! upon his ear,
With joy no tongue can tell,

Like seraph-songs the sainted hear,
Rang out the unseen Bell!

And here he built his churches seven,
Ere summer thrice was gone—
Won many a soul from earth to heaven,
And spread God's benison.

And though above his cloisters fair
Now rots the clotted weed,
Though all their beauties blighted were
To glut a tyrant's greed,

The hushed ear still, at even-time,
When weird-winds wander free,
May hear the mystic Mass-bell chime
Beneath yon aged tree.

<sup>29</sup> "And it is now deposited as a relic in the parish and cathedral of St. Ciaran." English MS. Life.

<sup>30</sup> That is in Seir-Kieran and in the territory of Ossory.

<sup>31</sup> See "The History, Architecture and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny." By the Rev. James Graves, A.B., and John G. A. Prim, sect. i., chap. i., pp. 2 to 5.

<sup>32</sup> "Archdall (at Seirkeran), after saying that Kieran founded this abbey in 402, adds, that the monastery was founded in succeeding ages. For this nonsense he refers to Ware, who has it not."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. 2, n. 24, p. 8.

<sup>33</sup> A description of this place, by T. O'Connor, will be found in "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the King's County, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1837-8," vol. ii., pp. 59 to 66.

<sup>34</sup> See Todd's "Church of St. Patrick," p. 15.

<sup>35</sup> See "The History, Architecture and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny." By Rev. James Graves, A.B., and John G. A. Prim, sect. i., chap. i., p. 2.

A more beautiful site could not have been selected, than that beside a flowing stream, which runs under a sloped hill, where may be seen, at the present time, artificial ridges in a circular form around the stone-enclosed cemetery.<sup>36</sup> A fragment of a curious and nondescript Round Tower<sup>37</sup> stands about 16 feet in height. There is an entrance, at the N. W. side, which runs the whole height of the building.<sup>38</sup> Only the north side, and the west wall of the old church near it, are now traceable.<sup>39</sup> Down in a field, and some distance removed from the cemetery, is shown St. Kieran's well, near the adjoining stream. A large whitethorn over it is called St. Kieran's bush. A very remarkable moat, with three circular mounds, in Oakley Park demesne, is a special feature of the scene. Within the Round Tower, now open to the ground, on one side, are five very small square perforations, on the outer face of the wall; but, these are deeply splayed internally, so as nearly to meet. A coved roof rises over them, and on the outside, this part is thickly coated with ivy. Numbers of modern headstones, with inscriptions, rise over the graves around, and the cemetery grounds are irregular, while old walls surround them on every side. Elder and hawthorn bushes grow over the surface.<sup>40</sup> Another curious object here shown is the bush of St. Kieran, growing in the centre of a public road, and underneath it is a stone, with a cross, while the impression of St. Kieran's fingers, there, according to popular tradition, is imaginatively supposed to remain. Not far removed, the old fort of Ballybrit—once a place of some importance and from which the barony obtained its name<sup>41</sup>—is remarkable for its curious circumvallations, and for its subterranean chambers, as the neighbouring inhabitants relate.

Seirkyran Round Tower and Old Church, King's County.

<sup>36</sup> Other curious ramparts are in the neighbourhood.

<sup>37</sup> An Inquisition, dated December 27th, xi. Elizabeth, states, that this small tower, the great stone house covered with thatch, then used as a parish church, and two other houses, the residences of the Canons, were within the walls of this cemetery.

<sup>38</sup> On either side the walls are four feet in thickness.

<sup>39</sup> The accompanying illustration, sketched on the spot by the writer, in June, 1873, was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>40</sup> A modern Protestant Church has replaced that older one, represented in the

We are told, when Kieran came to this site of Saigir, for the first time, he sat down under the shade of a certain tree. Then, the saint's sole companions were the wild animals, many of which he appears to have tamed, and, except for their presence, he there lived as a solitary dweller in the desert.<sup>42</sup> A wild boar fled from the same covert, on his approach, but it afterwards returned, and became domesticated with the servant of God. This animal, with his tusks, cut down twigs and grass, to furnish poor materials for constructing the holy man's hermitage.<sup>43</sup> The early saints were thus satisfied, to have their cells constructed of wattles, interwoven with twigs, and thatched with hay, reeds or straw.<sup>44</sup> The walls were probably coated with mud or plastered mortar. While Kieran lived alone in this place, various animals,<sup>45</sup> such as a fox, a wolf, a deer and a badger,<sup>46</sup> came from the forest recesses, and are said to have subjected themselves to him, as if they had been monks devoted to his rule.<sup>47</sup> However this may be, soon his disciples discovered the place of his retreat, and in course of time, the wicker hut grew into a famous monastery, and subsequently into an ecclesiastical city, which gathered around the walls of his church.<sup>48</sup>

After living an eremitical life at Saighir, St. Kieran began to attract great attention, among people dwelling in the adjoining country, to whom he announced sublime Gospel truths. Many, at length, were induced to embrace the Christian faith; and, numbers among the Ossorians received baptism at his hands. About the same time, it is stated, three other holy bishops were engaged in spreading the Gospel, throughout Ireland's more southern parts, and with partial success. These prelates were Saints Ailbe,<sup>49</sup> Ibar<sup>50</sup> and Declan,<sup>51</sup> who laboured in this neglected vineyard of the Lord, before the great Irish Apostle, St. Patrick, arrived.<sup>52</sup> The fame and sanctity of Kieran

"Dublin Penny Journal." See vol. iii., No. 119, October 11th, 1834.

<sup>42</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 549.

<sup>43</sup> See "The History, Architecture and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny." By the Rev. James Graves, A.B., and John G. A. Prim, sect. i., chap. i.

<sup>44</sup> So states the First Life of St. Kieran, chap. vi., vii., p. 458.

<sup>45</sup> Thus, St. Voice built his poor cottage of reeds and twigs. See "Breviary of Aberdeen," Pars Hyemalis, fol. xlv. St. David's original chapel was adorned only with wood-moss and ivy intertwined. See Giraldus Cambrensis' "Itinerarium Cambriæ," lib. i., cap. 3. St. Gwynllw, towards the close of the sixth century, founded a teampull in the middle of the cemetery, and it was constructed of planks and twigs. See Rev. Mr. Rees' "Lives of the Cambro-British Saints," p. 148. St. Kevin of Glendalough wove for himself a hurdle oratory. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Junii iii., p. 316.

<sup>46</sup> Colgan has a note at this passage, where he endeavours to establish the possible truth of this narrative, by showing, that the Creator of all things, could thus dispose the affections, even of irrational animals, to honour his servants. He refers to accounts, contained in ecclesiastical history and in the Lives of the Saints, for similar examples. See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii, n. 10, p. 464. A very ingenious conjecture is hazarded by Mr. O'Kearney, in his edited work, intitled, reis tighie Chonam Chinn-Shleibhe, or "The Festivities at the House of Conan of Ceann-Sleibhe." After giving an extract from a manuscript Life of St. Kieran of Saigher, in Ossory, announced for publication by Mr. John O'Daly of Dublin, and which embraces the account contained in the first published Life of this saint, by Colgan, the editor endeavours to show, that these animals spoken of, were impersonated by St. Kieran's monks or disciples, bearing a fanciful resemblance to them. See, Introduction, pp. 41 to 44.

<sup>47</sup> Or Broc, as it is called in the Irish language.

<sup>48</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkenniensi, cap. vii., pp. 458, 459.

<sup>49</sup> See, "The History, Architecture and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny." By the Rev. James Graves, A.B., and John G. A. Prim, sect. i., chap. i., pp. 2 to 5.

<sup>50</sup> His feast occurs, on the 12th of September.

<sup>51</sup> His festival is held, on the 23rd of April.

<sup>52</sup> See his Life, at the 24th of July.

<sup>53</sup> The same remarks are made, in the Lives of St. Albeus (cap. xvi.), and of St. Declan (cap. xiv.)

See Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkenniensi.

drew to Saigir many neophytes, who became his disciples, and who embraced a fervent life, under his direction. This increasing religious family obliged him to erect a monastery, for their accommodation, at the place of his retreat.<sup>53</sup> Here necessities of life were supplied to St. Kieran, and to his disciples, in a miraculous manner. One day, the steward of his monastery told our saint, that swine were wanting for their use, and that it would be necessary to purchase some. But, Kieran replied, that the Lord, who already granted them what had been required, would also send these. On the day following, a sow, with her numerous litter, was seen within their enclosure, and from this stock a sufficient number of swine was afterwards procured.<sup>54</sup> In like manner, his steward declared, that sheep were wanting, and should be bought. But the saint answered, that he who sent the swine would also present sheep to them. On going forth, without the gate of their monastery, the steward beheld twenty-seven<sup>55</sup> sheep grazing, and from that number, in due course, a large flock issued.<sup>56</sup>

CHAPTER IV.

ST. LIADAIN AND HER NUN BRUINECHA—ST. KIERAN RESTORES FINTAN'S SON TO LIFE—ÆNGUS, SON OF NATFRAICH, KING OF MUNSTER—RESTORATION OF HIS HARPERS—THE QUEEN, ETHNEA HUATHACH—ST. PATRICK BECOMES THE GUEST OF ST. KIERAN—THE KING OF TEMORIA INVADES OSSORY—ST. KIERAN'S RULE—MIRACLES OF THE SAINT—THE HOLY MEN WHO ARE SAID TO HAVE BEEN HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

We learn from the Acts of St. Kieran, that his mother Liadain<sup>1</sup> embraced a religious life—probably after the death of his father—and she lived under her son's protection, at a place, called Killyon<sup>2</sup> after her, and where a nunnery was founded not far from Saigher. Among her nuns was a virgin, named Bruinecha.<sup>3</sup> Further accounts of these must be sought for in other pages of this work. Among the many miracles of St. Kieran must be recorded instances, in which the dead were even raised to life, through his merits. A certain rich man, named Fintan, brought his son's dead body to our saint, requesting him, in the name of Christ, to resuscitate the deceased. Kieran approached the corpse of this young man, who had been named Leogaire; when, through his faith in Christ, Fintan's son was restored to life, and presented to his father. The young man lived, afterwards, for a lengthened period. As a mark of gratitude, he presented the village of Rathfera,<sup>4</sup> with its lands, to the saint.<sup>5</sup> About this time, too, it is said, that Ængus, son of Natfraich, King of Munster, had been baptized, by St. Patrick, in the city of Cashel. A son of Erc, a descendant of Duach, and inhabiting the region of Ossory, had maliciously killed a horse, belonging to St. Patrick. Being apprehended, by the soldiers of Ængus, that man was cast into chains previous to his being put to death.

niensi, cap. ix., p. 459, and Vita S. Kierani ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. iii., p. 467, in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ."

<sup>54</sup> See Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xiii., p. 459. Ibid.

<sup>55</sup> "Twenty-eight," according to the English MS. Life.

<sup>56</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ." Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xiv., p. 459.

CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> See her Life, at the 11th of August.

<sup>2</sup> It is now a townland, in the parish of Drumcullen, and barony of Eglish. It is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps of the King's County," Sheet 36.

<sup>3</sup> Colgan has a conjecture, that she may be identical with a St. Brunsecha, or Brunsech, of Magh Trea, and who is venerated on the 29th of May. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," n. 18, p. 464.

<sup>4</sup> "The land called Rath-fearainn this day," according to the English MS. Life.

<sup>5</sup> See Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xv., pp. 459, 460.

At the intercession of friends, however, St. Ciaran procured his ransom from Ængus, on paying a considerable amount of money. But, after this prisoner's liberation, the gold and silver disappeared. The royal recipient angrily asked our saint, how he had dared to impose a phantom treasure on a king. To this query, our saint answered, that all precious metals were made from nothing, and must be reduced to nothingness. The king's anger not being appeased by such reply, he held forth threats against Kieran. Immediately, as the legend states, Ængus became blind, and fell on the ground. At this time, St. Carthage,<sup>6</sup> grandson to Ængus, was a disciple of our saint, whom he entreated to restore again the king's sight. Kieran replied, "He sought gold in his power, and now suffers punishment to death." Then, it was said, by some persons, that the king had died. Carthage, with others, entreated our saint to restore him the use of his faculties. Approaching the prostrate form, and after giving a sharp admonition, the servant of God was thought to have raised the king to life. Ængus, giving thanks to God for his recovery, and being restored to the use of sight, bestowed many gifts upon St. Kieran.<sup>7</sup> This same Ængus had certain harpers in his court, who were accustomed to sing the praises of heroes, accompanied by the music of their instruments; and, while passing through the territory of Muscrya Thire,<sup>8</sup> in the province of Munster, these bards were murdered, by some enemies. Their bodies were afterwards thrown into a lake, in a retired part of the country, and their harps were suspended from a tree, on the borders of this lough. The king was ignorant regarding his harpers' fate, for a long time; when, recollecting that Kieran was gifted with a spirit of prophecy, and being unwilling to consult Magi or diviners, after he had become a Christian, Ængus came to our saint, and learned from him all particulars, concerning those murdered men. On being asked by the king, Kieran accompanied him to the lake; and, having fasted there a whole day, towards its close, the waters of this lake dried up, and then the bodies of his seven harpers were discovered—a month having already elapsed, since the time of their death. In the name of the Most Holy Trinity, Kieran commanded them to arise; when, awaking as it were from a profound sleep, and taking their harps, they played sweet strains before King Ængus, the bishop, and a crowd then present. This lake, in which they were drowned, was afterwards named, Loch na Cruitireadh, which signifies, "Lake of the Harpers;" although, from that time forward, it contained no water. Having received the thanks and blessings of Ængus and of the people present, St. Kieran returned to his own city of Saigir.<sup>9</sup> On another occasion, a chief of Ængus, while passing through Ossory<sup>10</sup> with his retainers, saw swine, belonging to St. Etchean.<sup>11</sup> This chief ordered his soldiers to kill one of them; but, whilst they were preparing to roast it in the wood, their enemies surprised them. This chief and twenty of his soldiers were killed, on the banks of a rivulet, called Brosnach.<sup>12</sup> An account of this disaster being brought to St. Kieran,

<sup>6</sup> The festival of this saint is celebrated on this same day, the 5th of March.

<sup>7</sup> See Vita S. Kierani ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xvi., p. 460. Also, Vita S. Kierani ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. vi., p. 468.

<sup>8</sup> The territory was formerly the principality of the O'Kenedys. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. vii., sect. i., p. 52.

<sup>9</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xvii., p. 460.

<sup>10</sup> The English MS. Life substitutes,

"Musgraidhe Tíre," and "steward," instead of "one amongst the chiefs."

<sup>11</sup> Colgan prefers this emendation to the name Ecianus, as written in the Life of our saint. See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii, n. 23, p. 464. His Life has been already given at the 11th of February, if he be the same to whom allusion is made.

<sup>12</sup> This appears to have been the Little Brosna River, which, from this passage, may be inferred as running formerly on the bounds of Ossory, or perhaps flowing through them, at that time.

his disciple, Carthage, besought him to have the bodies removed, lest they should be devoured by wild beasts. But, when Kieran came to that spot, he found only a few vehicles, which were quite insufficient to remove the dead bodies; he then cried out, with a loud voice, that all who were killed should arise, in the name of Christ, and follow him. All of those men, thus miraculously restored to life, afterwards became monks, under St. Kieran's rule, and they lived, in a religious manner, to the time of their respective deaths.<sup>13</sup> One day, it is said, St. Kieran spread some clean linen, over a bush, which bore many black berries. This he did, that they might be preserved during winter, for an occasion of which he had some foreknowledge. After the ensuing Easter, Ængus, King of Cashel,<sup>14</sup> with his queen, Ethnea Huathach,<sup>15</sup> came to the castle of Conchryd, or Conchrydhuis, Chieftain of Ossory. Here, this distinguished retinue had been entertained, at a great banquet, by the chief, who was a man remarkable for his personal attractions. But, unfortunately, the queen conceived an unlawful passion, which was accompanied by a dishonorable proposal, on her part. Being a man of probity and virtue, Conchryd rejected these advances; when, the queen feigned sudden illness, that she might remain in his castle, after her husband's departure. Being asked, what might prove an effectual cure for her illness, Ethnea replied, that if blackberries could be procured, these should cure her on being eaten. She supposed, most naturally, at that season they could not be obtained. At this time,<sup>16</sup> the whole region of Ossory was a missionary district, under St. Kieran's charge. To him the chief repaired, with an account of the foregoing circumstances; at the same time, he expressed some apprehension and dislike, should the queen remain in his castle, after the king's departure. On hearing this statement, Kieran had a measure of blackberries taken from bushes growing in the wood. These had been covered, from the preceding autumn, until that present month of April, and their berries were sent to the queen. On eating them, Ethnea found her passion for the chieftain yield to the requirements of reason and religion. On recognising such miraculous effects, the queen prostrated herself at the feet of our saint, confessed her crime, and asked absolution from him. The holy bishop replied, with a sigh, "Oh, queen, I cannot release you, from a death impending; for, my daughter, your enemies shall kill both yourself and our sovereign, the king, on the same day." This prediction was accomplished, A.D. 489,<sup>17</sup> when Ængus and his queen were killed,<sup>18</sup> at the battle of Cell Osnadha,<sup>19</sup> now Kelliston,<sup>20</sup> in

<sup>13</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xviii., p. 460.

<sup>14</sup> He is said to have ruled as king of Munster, for thirty-six years.

<sup>15</sup> She was sister to Crimthann, son to Endeus Kinsellagh, according to some accounts; while, the old Life of St. Kieran makes her to have been the daughter of Crimthann. The latter is held to have been the slayer of Oilíoll Molt, King of Ireland, at the battle of Ocha, A.D. 478. Colgan thinks, that Lughaidh, who succeeded to the Irish throne, had been a captive to Crimthann, before the period, assigned for his death, viz., A.D. 503. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v., nn. 25, 26, p. 464.

<sup>16</sup> Dr. Lanigan appears willing to allow St. Kieran's elevation to the Episcopacy of Saigir, not until about the year 538. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. ii., p. 7.

<sup>17</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 152 to 154, and nn. (n, o). Ibid.

<sup>18</sup> The English MS. Life has it, that such an occurrence took place, on "the 8th Ides of the month of October, A.D. 493, and St. Patrick died the same year."

<sup>19</sup> The English Manuscript Life states, that Cill Uosny was in Magh Feimhlin Failghe.

<sup>20</sup> In the "Anthologia Hibernica," vol. iv., at p. 105, we have an engraving, which represents the ruins of a church and a round tower, now destroyed. "The tower, which stands on elevated ground, about five miles N.E. of Carlow, and not on the Barrow, as asserted in some late publications, is built of grit stone with which the county abounds, and about twelve feet internal diameter, but at present much destroyed. The church appears to be very ancient, with semicircular arches, but all the sculptured stones are the county of Carlow,<sup>21</sup> and which was fought against them, by Muirheartach Mac Erca, by Illann and Ailill, sons of Dunlaing, and by Eochaidh Guineach.<sup>22</sup> These events are rendered very notorious, through the accounts left, in our ancient annals.<sup>23</sup>

At one time, St. Patrick, the King of Munster, and twenty<sup>24</sup> chiefs, with their attendants, were guests of Kieran, who ordered eight oxen, with various other refreshments, to be prepared for their entertainment. When it was said, that this should not be sufficient for their refection, our saint replied, that through the grace of God, who fed many thousands on a few loaves and fishes, their guests should be satisfied with what was already prepared. It is stated, so long as this company remained, they found a sufficiency of food; and that the saint, having blessed a fountain, wine of a good quality was therein found.<sup>25</sup>

The King of Temoria,<sup>26</sup> who was the supreme monarch of Ireland, came with an army, to subjugate the Munster people; but, he was met by Ailill, called King of Cashel,<sup>27</sup> who hastened towards Saigir to give him battle. St. Kieran endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between them, yet he could not succeed. However, offering his prayers to the Almighty, when both armies were about to engage, an effective obstacle was presented to their approach. For, the trees of a wood, which intervened, were torn from their roots, and directed against the van of the Munster army; while, the River Brosnach<sup>28</sup> became swollen to such a degree, that the Temorian king's forces were unable to pass it. Both armies were affrighted, at these portents. The King of Temoria, with his forces, retired from the river, which, at first, had been fordable for man and horse. The Munster army encamped, for that night, near St. Kieran's monastery. The bishop sent a cow, and one of his swine, as a present to their king. The Munster soldiers feasted upon these animals taken away. It is said to have been built by St. Patrick, and dedicated to him. The cemetery was frequently, and is at present, a much frequented burying ground. Under the church are vaults appertaining to the ancient family of the Cummins; a name still surviving, and numerous in that part of the country.

<sup>21</sup> Such is Dr. O'Donovan's identification, in his "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., p. 152, n. (n.) The parish of Kellistown is situated, partly in the barony of Forth and partly in the barony of Carlow, and it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Carlow," Sheets 7, 8, 12, 13, 17. The townland itself, divided into East and West, is in the barony of Carlow, and defined on the four first sheets. Ibid.

<sup>22</sup> A poet of sufficient credit thus informs us, in these lines:—

"The martial prince Aongus, son of Nad-fraoch, Fought in Cill Osnach's bloody field, and fell
By the victorious sword of Oilioll, Son of Dunlaing," —Dermod O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., p. 350. Duffy's edition.

<sup>23</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," Martii v. First Life, chap. xix.

Second Life, lect. vii. Officium, pp. 460, 468.

<sup>24</sup> In a marginal note at "viginti Duces," Colgan has "alias novem."

<sup>25</sup> See Vita S. Kieran ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xx., pp. 460, 461. Ibid.

<sup>26</sup> Capgrave, in his Life of St. Kieran, and the Irish Life of this saint, represent the aforesaid King of Temoria, as no other than the incredulous monarch Laeogaire. But, if the order of occurrences were observed in St. Kieran's Life, it must be observed, this Laeogaire did not live, in the time of Ailid, King of Cashel; for, the author leaves us reason to suppose, that the miracle here recorded took place, after the death of Ængus. Ailill, who is here called King of Cashel, was brother to this Ængus.

<sup>27</sup> No Ailill is to be found, among the princes of Munster, after the Christian faith had been preached in Ireland. Wherefore, this particular Ailill seems to have been called King of Cashel, because he was son to that king, and because he lived at Cashel. See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," v. Martii, nn. 27, 28, pp. 464, 465. I find Colgan's assertion fully borne out, that there had been no Ailill, as King of Cashel, after the preaching of St. Patrick, by referring to O'Dugan's "Kings of the Race of Ebhear," as edited and translated, by Mr. John O'Daly.

<sup>28</sup> Thus do the Bollandists rightly name to repletion, and afterwards left fragments uneaten. All, who were encamped there, gave thanks to God ; and, the saint's reputation was widely divulged, in consequence of this miracle.<sup>29</sup>

Among his other Acts, St. Kieran, first Bishop of Saigir, is said to have composed a rule for monks. It was traditionally held, by local antiquaries, that it had been written, in St. Crohan's hermitage,<sup>30</sup> at Kilcroghan, or Kilcrohane<sup>31</sup> parish, in the barony of Dunkerron South, and within the present county of Kerry.<sup>32</sup> A band of robbers, having penetrated into the territories of Munster, caused devastation and loss of life, during their foray. A Munster chief, named Lonan,<sup>33</sup> opposed them, and put them to flight ; when, despairing of escape, they threw themselves under the protection of St. Kieran. When Lonan wished to follow up his victory, by their utter destruction, a fiery globe<sup>34</sup> fell between his forces and the retreating band. Being terrified at this apparition, the pursuers returned, without further molesting their enemies. These latter, knowing that they had been saved, through our saint's intervention, gave him an account of what had taken place. After mature deliberation, they became monks, under his guidance, persevering in a religious life, for the remainder of their days.<sup>35</sup> Another time, a Leinster robber, named Carbre, stole an excellent cow, belonging to the monks of our saint. On coming to the mountain, Smoil, now better known as Slieve Bloom, a sudden darkness surrounded him. Then, losing his way, and falling into a river, he was drowned ; while the cow returned, by a direct path, to the herd, from which she had been taken.<sup>36</sup> A holy woman, named Cocchea or Coca,<sup>37</sup> who had been his nurse, lived a holy life, at Ross-Bennchoir. We are told, in his Irish Life,<sup>38</sup> that St. Kieran of Saigir often went to the sea-rock, which was far distant from the shore, where his nurse, i.e. Coca lived, and this he used to accomplish, without ship or boat. He was wont to return again, as appears from his own Life.<sup>39</sup>

A woman, named Eathylla fell, and such a severe fracture of her body had been caused, that death soon followed ; but, in three days afterwards, it ; apparently, through a press error, it is printed Brosnach, in Colgan's account.

<sup>29</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xxi., p. 461. Vita S. Kierani, ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. 8, p. 468.

<sup>30</sup> In a wild mountain range, the writer visited this remarkable cave—whether natural or artificial he cannot undertake to say—in July, 1871, in company with the Rev. James Gaffney, M.R.I.A., and Rev. Eugene Murphy, C.C. of the place, and a very learned Irish scholar, since dead, and who compiled a valuable Irish Dictionary, yet extant, but unpublished.

<sup>31</sup> Its bounds are described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kerry," Sheets 82, 90, 91, 92, 98, 99, 100, 101, 105, 106, 107, 108.

<sup>32</sup> "Others say it was in an adjacent grotto," adds Smith. "Be this as it may, the stalactical exudations of the above-mentioned cell are held in great estimation by the country people, who carefully preserve them, as imagining them to have many virtues in them from the supposed sanctity of the place they grow in."—"Natural and Civil History of Kerry," chap. v., p. 93.

<sup>33</sup> It may be asked, could this have been the Lonan, the chieftain, who lived on Mount Kea, and who was visited by St. Patrick ? If so the reader will find more regarding him, in the Life of St. Montan or Mantan, at the 2nd of this month.

<sup>34</sup> The writer cannot forbear mentioning a remarkable phenomenon, of a nearly similar character, which took place, and on a bog-road, not many miles distant from Seir Kieran. I have been told, by a highly respectable lady and by her servant—now over forty years ago—that while driving in a fashionable vehicle, a globe of fire suddenly appeared, beside the road, and almost as instantly vanished. The horse became terrified, and with much difficulty could be restrained from running away, or causing imminent danger to the travellers.

<sup>35</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xxii., p. 461. Vita S. Kierani, ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. 9, pp. 468, 469.

<sup>36</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xxiii., p. 461. Vita S. Kierani, ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. 9, p. 469.

<sup>37</sup> See her Life, at the 29th of June.

<sup>38</sup> Chapter xix.

<sup>39</sup> See Rev. Drs. Todd's and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 64, 65.

<sup>40</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilken-

she was restored to life, through the prayers of our saint. As a mark of her gratitude for this favour, she bestowed a portion of her property on St. Kieran, giving thanks at the same time to God, for his mercies to her. This place was called from her own name, in after time, "the wood of Eathylla."<sup>40</sup> An officer of the Munster king, called Keandfoylius, having killed a man named Cronan, the friend of our saint, Kieran restored him to life in the name of Christ, after an interval of seven days had elapsed.<sup>41</sup> One day, Ailill, King of Munster, spoke certain reproachful words, in presence of the saint. Immediately afterwards, he was deprived of the use of speech, for seven whole days.<sup>42</sup> At the end of this time, he returned a penitent to Kieran, and prostrated himself, at the feet of our saint. Seeing his contrition for the former offence, St. Kieran blessed Ailill's tongue; when, in the presence of all, the king spoke, and employed his speech thenceforward, in magnifying the power of God. Having received the saint's blessing, Ailill returned towards the palace, together with his retinue.<sup>43</sup>

A most interesting and an elaborate modern work supplies many incidents, connected with Seir-Kieran and its patron saint, with a history and dissertation regarding the antiquities of this locality. The letter-press descriptions are accompanied, by beautifully engraved illustrations.<sup>44</sup> That very ancient and interesting place, commonly called St. Kyran's, is reputed to have been the seat of the oldest bishopric in Ireland.<sup>45</sup> While St. Ciaran lived here, besides the holy persons already mentioned, St. Carthage<sup>46</sup> and St. Baythen<sup>47</sup> were disciples under him; and, he was visited by St. Medran<sup>48</sup> and St. Odhran,<sup>49</sup> who were brothers; by a religious pilgrim, called German;<sup>50</sup> by St. Kieran,<sup>51</sup> Abbot of Clonmacnoise,<sup>52</sup> who is said to have been his fellow-disciple,<sup>53</sup> under St. Finian,<sup>54</sup> Abbot of Clonard; by the two Saints niensi, cap. xxix., p. 461. In the English MS. Life of our saint, this place is called, Leim Eitill, or "Etel's Leap." Most probably this is the townland, now known as Leap, in the parish of Aghancon, in the barony of Ballybritt, and which is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheet 39.

<sup>41</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xxx., p. 461. The English MS. Life of St. Kieran adds, "and on his being made whole, in the presence of others, Ciaran said, 'He that murdered you unlawfully, i.e., Ceamfaela, soon shall be murdered himself and his body burnt, in the castle, called Rathmoy, in Eilean or Eil-each.'" This is probably, the present townland of Rathmoy, in the parish of Glankeen, barony of Upper Kilnamanagh, and shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheet 34. North Riding.

<sup>42</sup> "Eight days," according to the English MS. Life.

<sup>43</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. 6, p. 468. Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xxxi., p. 462.

<sup>44</sup> See, "The History, Architecture, and Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of St. Canice, Kilkenny." By the Rev. James Graves, A.B., and John Augustus Prim, sect. i., chap. i., pp. 2 to 14, with accompanying notes.

<sup>45</sup> See Thomas Lalor Cooke's "Early History of the Town of Birr," &c., chap. x., p. 166.

<sup>46</sup> It is thought, by Colgan, that he lived after the year 540.

<sup>47</sup> It is suspected, he may have been the St. Baithen of Inis-Baithin, venerated on the 22nd of May, and who flourished about A.D. 550.

<sup>48</sup> Colgan supposes him, to have been venerated, at the 6th of June. His death does not appear on record.

<sup>49</sup> Colgan thinks, his feast should be referred to the 2nd of October, and that he died A.D. 548.

<sup>50</sup> Colgan supposes, he was the same as German, who was bishop in the Isle of Man, and whose festival was kept, on the 30th of July. He is thought to have lived contemporaneously with St. Patrick, the Irish Apostle.

<sup>51</sup> He is said to have died rather young, and about A.D. 549.

<sup>52</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of September.

<sup>53</sup> In that list of illustrious men, mentioned in Finnian's Acts, as having studied under him, the two Kierans are placed first. Dr. Lanigan does not pretend to state, as certain, that our Kieran was a bishop, at A.D. 538. He adds, however, "yet, it is more than probable, that he was not, prior to it. But, as he is not named, among the second-class of Irish saints, who flourished after the year 544, we may suppose, that he had become distinguished some years earlier."—Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesias-

Brendan—he of Birr,<sup>55</sup> and he of Clonfert;<sup>56</sup> as also by St. Ruadhan, Abbot of Lothra.<sup>57</sup> The latter, who enjoyed this distinction, it is supposed, from A.D. 550,<sup>58</sup> had afterwards intercommunication with our saint; while this circumstance and the contemporaneous persons, mentioned in his Life, seem to carry the series of our St. Kieran's Acts beyond the middle of the sixth century.

CHAPTER V.

STATEMENTS REGARDING ST. CIARAN'S MISSIONARY CAREER, AMONG THE BRITONS AND SCOTS—HIS LEARNING AND VIRTUES—HIS CLOSING YEARS AND DEATH—PLACES WHERE HE IS REGARDED AS SPECIAL PATRON—MEMORIALS AND FESTIVAL—CONCLUSION.

VARIOUS accounts have received currency, that this holy bishop and abbot left Ireland, for the purpose of labouring on the mission, among the Britons and Scots. However, he may have been venerated, in after time, by these people; there appear to be no authentic records, that might establish his preaching and founding of religious houses in Britain, or on the Continent. As there were many Irish saints, called Ciaran, it seems probable, that to some other than to the patron of Ossory must such apostolate be accorded.

However, our St. Kieran, is placed second on the list,<sup>1</sup> in an ancient Catalogue of the Abbots over St. Ilud's monastery. Around it there were no mountains or steep inequalities, but an open and a fertile plain; there was a wood, very thick, with various trees growing in it, while many wild beasts inhabited it; a very pleasing river flowed therein, and spring-fountains, mingled with a rivulet, ran in delightful courses.<sup>2</sup> It is thought, that about A.D. 505, St. Kieran dwelt there. Thence, he proceeded, it is said, to a small island, in the River Wye, where he erected a monastery. Thither, many devout persons flocked, to receive at his lips lessons of heavenly instruction. Soon after, he returned to Saigher. In Brittany, he is supposed to have laboured; and, he is honoured there still, in many places, it is said, as St. Sezin. This, however, is clearly a mistake. Thence, he went to Cornwall, which retains many memorials of St. Ciaran's or Piran's Apostolate,<sup>3</sup> and several churches there have such a name.<sup>4</sup> In our own days, the church of Peranzabulo,<sup>5</sup> or "St. Kieran's in the Sands"<sup>6</sup> has been brought to light, after having been imbedden on the strand, for about 800 years.<sup>7</sup> It is almost perfect, in its tical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. ii., n. 22, p. 8.

<sup>54</sup> See his Life, at the 12th of December. He died, about the middle of the sixth century.

<sup>55</sup> See his Life, at the 29th of November. His death took place, after the middle of the sixth century.

<sup>56</sup> See his Life, at the 16th of May. His death is usually referred to A.D. 577.

<sup>57</sup> See his Life, at the 15th of April.

<sup>58</sup> His death is usually assigned to A.D. 584. See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," Index Chronologicus, p. 533.

CHAPTER V.—<sup>1</sup> See Williams' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities."

<sup>2</sup> See Rees' "Lives of the Welsh Saints," p. 163.

<sup>3</sup> There were a Dean and Canons of St.

Pieran, at Perranzabuloe, a parish in the Union of Truro, on the west coast of Cornwall, in the days of King Edward the Confessor. The church was endowed with lands, and the privilege of a sanctuary. See Tanner's "Notitia Monastica," Cornwall x. St. Piran's College and its possessions are also alluded to, in the Domesday Survey, tomus i., fol. 121, col. 2.

<sup>4</sup> Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 24.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. C. T. Collins Trevelyan's "Peranzabulo: The lost Church found." It has a frontispiece, and it was published, A.D. 1843, in 8vo.

<sup>6</sup> Near Lambourne is the well of St. Peran, to which a miraculous efficacy was attributed, in the cure of diseases; and about one mile and a-half from it is St. Peran's Round, an ancient Cornish amphi-

rude masonry. It has sculptured corbels and zig-zag ornaments so complete, that we might be almost tempted to imagine, that one of our old Irish oratories had been transplanted to its site, on the Cornish shore.<sup>8</sup> Again, Camden mentions a chapel,<sup>9</sup> dedicated in his name, on the road between Padstow<sup>10</sup> and St. Iles. The Kyran, however, to whom the Cornish churches had been dedicated, and who is generally called there Piran, was the holy Abbot of Clonmacnoise, in the opinion of Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy,<sup>11</sup> of William F. Skene,<sup>12</sup> and of Bishop Forbes.<sup>13</sup> The oratory of St. Gothian, near Hayle, Cornwall, is the second instance of a church, which had been buried in the sands for centuries, being brought to light once more.<sup>14</sup> In the parish of Tintagel, Shire of Cornwall, there was formerly a chapel dedicated to St. Piran.<sup>15</sup> Were we to credit Dempster,<sup>16</sup> this holy man lived chiefly in the western Isles of Scotland. Yet, Dr. Lanigan avers, that the St. Kieran, so much respected in that country, and to whom the Scottish writer alluded, was not Kieran of Ossory, venerated on the 5th of March, but Kieran of Clonmacnoise, whose festival was kept, on the 9th of September.<sup>17</sup> Nor do our ancient Irish writers sanction any different conclusion.<sup>18</sup>

Our saint was distinguished for his great humility, and for his love of Sacred Scripture, which he delighted in hearing and reading, even in his old age. But, what we are told, that in common with other saints, Kieran became a disciple of St. Finian of Clonard, with whom he studied the inspired writings, towards his closing years,<sup>19</sup> seems wholly inadmissible; although, it imposed on the inadvertence of Sir James Ware,<sup>20</sup> when referring to the Life of St. Finnian, what is found only in the Life of St. Kieran. It must be very strange, if, after twenty years of study, at Rome, and after having become a bishop, in A.D. 402, as stated by some, he should be found studying under Finnian, about the year 540. Nor, can these studies of his be reconciled with St. Kieran having been a disciple of Patrick, and of his exercising, during that time, the duties of a bishop. Yet, in the Lives of Finnian and of Kieran of Clonmacnoise, there is not the least hint of his great age, when at-theatre for the celebration of games and sports. See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. iii., p. 556.

<sup>7</sup> Leland writes: "S. Piranes, alias Kenerine, wher the Sanctuarie was . . . Miles from S. Antonies: and not a Mile from the Main se."—"Itinerary," vol. iii., p. 24.

<sup>8</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. i., p. 25.

<sup>9</sup> See "Britannia."

<sup>10</sup> Also called St. Petrock, a seaport in the Union of St. Columb Major, on the west coast of Cornwall.

<sup>11</sup> See "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, to the end of the reign of Henry VII." vol. i., p. 102.

<sup>12</sup> See "Four Ancient Books of Wales, containing the Cymric Poems attributed to the Bards of the Sixth Century," vol. i., chap. viii., p. 124.

<sup>13</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 435.

<sup>14</sup> From the rudeness of the work, St. Gothian appears to be of a still more ancient date than the church of St. Pyran, which was found a few years ago at Perranzabuloe. See The Illustrated London News, vol. lviii.,

No. 1653, p. 539. Saturday, June 3, 1871.

<sup>15</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. iv., p. 363.

<sup>16</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," toms ii., lib. x., No. 774, p. 420.

<sup>17</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. 2, n. 32, p. 9.

<sup>18</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v. Appendix ad Acta S. Kierani, cap. i., pp. 470 to 472.

<sup>19</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensis, cap. xxxix., p. 463. Dr. Lanigan remarks: "The author, of that Life, well knowing that Finnian's school was held in the sixth century, and acknowledging that Kieran was universally considered as a pupil of Finnian, cunningly endeavoured to reconcile this circumstance with his former positions, by telling us, that Kieran was then very old, but that he was so humble as not to be ashamed to attend Finnian's lectures."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xiv., n. 124, p. 32.

<sup>20</sup> See "Opuscula S. Patricii," Annotationes, p. 106.

<sup>21</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect.

tending at the school of Clonard; and, he is simply mentioned, as one of the ordinary pupils.<sup>21</sup>

This great saint, from his youth to the very day of death, denied himself the use of fine garments, flesh meat, and intoxicating drink. What an admirable example is here set, by a man, whose passions were always under control! From it we may infer, that total abstinence is almost the only remedy for those, who cannot control their passion for drink, once they have taken any; but, to impose such restriction indiscriminately upon all, old and young, temperate and intemperate, taking people as they are, is likely to be violated, in many cases, and, once broken, the proclivity to further indulgence is too frequently increased. Religious habits and sacramental aids are required, to secure the entire victory. St. Kieran slept little, and he despised all carnal delights. He converted the Ossorians and many others, from the errors of paganism to Gospel truths and morality; he consecrated and ordained a great number of bishops, priests and minor clergy. He had frequent angelic visions; while miracles were wrought, through God's celestial messengers. Amongst other things recorded, having asked for the production of a fountain, in a certain place, shown him by an Angel, his prayer was soon granted; and many sick persons were afterwards healed, by the water of this spring, which was called "the Well of Kieran." Most likely this refers to the "holy well," at Saigher,<sup>22</sup> although, it is not the only one in Ossory, and probably elsewhere, dedicated to him.

Our saint's office informs us, that he was a faithful practitioner of virtuous acts of humility, prudence, bounty, chastity, faith, hope and charity. He lived in poverty, during his term of life, but he was rich in grace. He is called, a balance of the law, an ark of justice, a doctor of youth, the guide of old persons, and the incomparable tower of all. In the language of an ancient Irish writer, he was a true priest, "whose heart was chaste and shining, and his mind like the foam of the wave, or the colour of the swan in the sunshine; that is, without any particle of sin, great or small, resting in his heart." A very ancient vellum old book, which has been mentioned in the Life of St. Bright, at the 1st of February, states, that Ciaran of Saighir was, in his manners and life, like unto Pope Clement.<sup>23</sup>

A short time before our saint's death, whilst engaged at prayer, the Angel of God appeared to him. At this time, the holy bishop, bowed down with extreme old age, asked these following three favours, from the Almighty, though the celestial messenger:<sup>24</sup> First, that all who were buried in the xiv., n. 124, p. 33. Among other wonders, we are told, that St. Kieran of Saigir made fish, honey, and oil, from a small morsel of meat, during the time of a fast, when Brenainn of Birr and Ciaran of Cluain came on a visit to him.

<sup>22</sup> In his sermon, the Rev. N. Murphy says: "And as to the efficacy of the intercession of our glorious patron, and the healing powers of the holy well of Saigher, can we not ourselves bear testimony? and exclaim with the Queen of Saba:—"Even the half has not been told to us of those things which we have seen with our own eyes."

<sup>23</sup> See Rev. Drs. Todd's and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 64, 65.

<sup>24</sup> At the account of those favours, received by our saint, Colgan has a long note, in which he replies to possible objections, that may be urged by captious critics, or against controvertists of little faith. He remarks, in the first place, that the promises or privileges, which are said to be graciously given by God to his saints, are not proposed to us as articles of faith, which we must indubitably receive, but only as subjects worthy of pious belief and of veneration, when they contain nothing contrary to faith or good morals, nor savour of vanity and superstition, but rather excite to a love of piety and virtue. Secondly, the narrative, given in this Life of St. Kieran, seems to be of a character comprised in the latter category; for, of the three requests made by the saint, we know, that pious and useful objects had been intended; advantages to soul and body were sought, through a lawful medium; pious and virtuous ends were proposed, such as the Almighty's worship, through his servants, when desiring to be buried in a church or cemetery, dedicated to a patron saint, when invoking or honouring the memory of God's cemetery, near this Cathedral, should be released from punishments in the next world, after the day of judgment; Secondly, that whoever should celebrate the festival day of his death,<sup>25</sup> might be prosperous in this life, and happy in the next; and, Thirdly, that the people of Ossory territory, of which he was patron, should always be victorious over invading enemies, provided the assistance of their patron were invoked, and that the inhabitants of this region did not invade people, belonging to another territory. These three petitions, our saint is said to have obtained from God.<sup>26</sup>

In one of this saint's five Lives, in Colgan's possession, we are told, that when the hour of Blessed Kieran's death approached, he called his monks together and said to them: "The Lord now summons me to himself, and I am solicitous about you; wherefore, I commend you to the care of God, and to my son, Carthage."<sup>27</sup> In the published Life, it is said, he called his people to him, and on blessing them, he expounded the divine precepts. Having received the sacraments of Holy Church, he happily expired, on the 5th of March,<sup>28</sup> according to all our most ancient Martyrologies.

There can hardly be a doubt, that our saint departed this life, at Saigir; both, from the circumstance of St. Patrick's recorded prediction, which declared it should be the place of his resurrection,<sup>29</sup> and likewise from the context of the narrative, as found in both his published Lives.<sup>30</sup> Yet, some English writers and Martyrologists, who mention the festival of our saint, whom they call indifferently, Kieran and Piran, relate, that he ended his days at Padstow, or near it, in the county of Cornwall. Colgan, also, seems to coincide in this opinion, owing to the place of our saint's departure not being named, in any of the Lives, which were in his possession.<sup>31</sup> There is no mention made of his dying at Saigir, or in any other part of Ireland; with the single exception of a statement, found in an Irish Life, which is supposed to be of doubtful authenticity. Besides, none of our domestic chronologists mention the year of his death,<sup>32</sup> as they were accustomed to do, when treating of actions concerning Irish saints, even less renowned than he had been. We are told, in the Life of Saint Kieran, that no less than thirty holy bishops, faithful worshipper, &c. Thirdly, Various instances are cited of privileges, which have been granted to particular orders and confraternities in the Church, particularly those referring to the Cistercian and Franciscan orders, in which we find similar special favours, sanctioned by Bulls, issued by the Sovereign Pontiffs. Colgan then proceeds, in a lengthy note, to prove this latter part of his case, by quoting authorities, and by solving objections, which infidels or sceptics might urge. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v., nn. 38, 39, 40, pp. 465, 466.

<sup>25</sup> St. Kieran's Day (March 5th), appears to have been kept as a special holyday of the early Irish Church. In an old Antiphonarium, kept amongst the Trinity College MSS., Dublin, and which formerly belonged to the ancient church of Clondalkin, there is a calendar, in which it is noted, that no servile work should be performed on the Feast Day of our saint. It is classed, B. 1. 3.

<sup>26</sup> See the First Life of St. Kieran, taken from Codex Kilkenniensis, cap. xxxviii., in Colgan's work.

<sup>27</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiber-

niæ," v. Martii, n. 6, p. 475.

<sup>28</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensi, cap. xl., p. 463. Also, Vita S. Kierani, ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. xii., p. 469. Ibid.

<sup>29</sup> See Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkeniensi, cap. v., p. 458. Ibid.

<sup>30</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. 2, n. 30, p. 9.

<sup>31</sup> A lady writer mentions this supposition, with that of St. Kieran having been identical with St. Piran, "an Irish saint, whose little church of Piranzabuloe or Piran-in-the-Sands, has been covered and so preserved for centuries by the sands, which have gained on that part of the English coast."—Mrs. M. C. Ferguson's "Story of the Irish before the Conquest," chap. v., p. 165.

<sup>32</sup> "It is rather singular that, notwithstanding all that is said in the tracts, called his Lives, in praise of Kieran, he is not much spoken of in the accounts of our saints, who were his contemporaries, and that none of our annalists or hagiologists have marked the year of his death."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. 2, p. 8.

whom he had ordained, departed to the mansions of bliss with him, on the very day of his own decease. This occurrence is said to have taken place, in accordance with a manifestation of his desires, which were approved by the Almighty.<sup>33</sup>

According to his ancient biographers, Kieran's life was prolonged to the extraordinary term of almost three hundred years.<sup>34</sup> This extraordinary age was even exceeded, according to an account we find in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>35</sup> as follows : Sixty years and three hundred was his age, when he yielded his spirit. However, rather doubtful narratives, regarding our saint's recorded miracles and Acts, have given rise to much controversy among writers, who endeavour to reconcile them with chronological probability. While he furnishes instances of many long-lived persons, from Scriptural, as also from ancient and mediæval history, proving the possibility of such an age as three hundred years being attained,<sup>36</sup> Colgan nevertheless holds an opinion, that our saint had not even reached two hundred years of age, at the time of his death. The conclusion at which he arrives is, that our Kieran lived in part of the fourth century, during the whole of the fifth, and that he probably died in the sixth, before A.D. 540.<sup>37</sup> So that, instead of Kieran's old biographers being understood, as meaning his life had been prolonged, for almost three hundred years, which would appear from their text ; it is thought, they had only read of his having lived, during three different ages or centuries.<sup>38</sup> But, this explanation is not very satisfactory ; especially, when we take into account, the apparent fact, that he who wrote the first Life had been a contemporary with our saint, and must have survived him. Those saints, who are mentioned as Kieran's contemporaries, in his Life, might indeed be found existing, within the time specified by Colgan ; and, their intervention in matters pertaining to our saint might also be included in his Acts, with the single exception of St. Ruadhan, of Lothra, who is described as abbot of that place, before the death of Kieran. Now, it is thought, the Abbey of Lothra had been founded, about the year 550, and from the first Life of our saint, we may infer with Dr. Lanigan, that Kieran must have died, after the middle of the sixth century. In his account of the Bishops of Ossory, it is incorrectly stated,<sup>39</sup> that Ware confounds our saint with his name-

<sup>33</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii. Vita S. Kierani, ex Codice Kilkenniensi, cap. xl., p. 463. St. Ængus, however, only mentions fifteen saints, who departed with St. Kieran. "Quindecim qui cum S. Kierano Sagirensi migraverunt per Jesum Christum invoco in auxilium meum," lib. 5, Opuscula, c. 65. Colgan adds : "Non reperiō tamen tot natales hac die ab ullo Martyrologio celebrari."—Ibid., n. 44, p. 467.

<sup>34</sup> Vita S. Kierani, ex Codic Kilkenniensi, cap. xl., p. 463. Vita S. Kierani, ex MS. Salmanticensi, Officium, lect. 12, p. 469.

<sup>35</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 64, 65.

<sup>36</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v., n. 42, p. 466.

<sup>37</sup> That he did not live after A.D. 540, would seem to be indicated, from the circumstance, of his name not being found, in the very ancient Catalogue of the principal saints of the second order, who flourished in Ireland, from A.D. 540 to A.D. 598. This is the more remarkable, for in that Catalogue are to be found many other names, inferior to his, both with respect to age and to celebrity. This will appear, by referring to the list, in Ussher's "Primordia Ecclesiarum Britannicarum," p. 914, and following pages, where this author fully treats about those saints therein mentioned. Again, this matter is rendered more probable, from the Lives of Saints Cannech, Colman-Elo, Mochudda, Fintan of Clonenagh, Ruadan and others, who, from A.D. 540, flourished in adjoining monasteries, and when no mention of our saint occurs, whereas certain names of the principal saints, who lived, not alone in the surrounding country, but even saints of greatest renown, in more distant parts of Ireland, are there distinctly noted.

<sup>38</sup> This can be collected, as Colgan thinks, not only from five different Lives of this saint, but also from the Acts of other Irish saints. From such accounts, it may be inferred, that he did not live to be quite two hundred years of age.

sake of Clonmacnois;<sup>40</sup> and, even elsewhere, he conjectures, as Dr. Lanigan asserts,<sup>41</sup> that our saint might have been living, in the time of Pope Gregory the Great.<sup>42</sup> Dempster absurdly places his death in 665, on the authority of the Breviary of Dunblane; while, he is made to suffer death by martyrdom, having been murdered by robbers.<sup>43</sup> It is stated, too, that his memory was famous in Kyntyre, where was the lake, called Lochkilkeran, or "the lake of Kyran's Cell," and that it was remarkable for miracles performed, and for the visits of pilgrims.<sup>44</sup>

St. Ciaran was buried, it is said, near the relics of St. Martin, distinguished as the Elder, a remarkable Patrician missionary, left to evangelize the Ossorians.<sup>45</sup> It is supposed, he lived a recluse, on Tory Island, which was called "Torinis Martain."<sup>46</sup> A relic, which was denominated the Socela Martain, and which had been preserved in Derry down to the thirteenth century,<sup>47</sup> is said to have had relation to this ancient saint.

The illustrious bishop, Ciaran, is revered, as principal patron of Ossory diocese, where his festival is celebrated on the 5th of March, as a double of the first class. On that day, or on the Sunday immediately following, permission is granted to the priests and people to reverence St. Kieran, with suitable devotion at these places, where he has been regarded as special patron. In the Cathedral Church; in Kill-Kieran, belonging to St. John's parish; in Rathkieran;<sup>48</sup> in Clashacrow;<sup>49</sup> in Stamcarty; in Glashecron; in Fartagh;<sup>50</sup> in Knocksciragh; in Johnstown;<sup>51</sup> in Kilmacow;<sup>52</sup> in Mooncoin;<sup>53</sup> in Errill;<sup>54</sup> in Kilkieran;<sup>55</sup> in Tullagherin;<sup>56</sup> but, it must be remarked, that where those numerous deep ditches and high ramparts, encompassing nearly ten acres,<sup>57</sup> are to be found at Seir-Kieran,<sup>58</sup> the site of his

<sup>39</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. 2, n. 28, p. 9.

<sup>40</sup> He is said to have died A.D. 548. Sir James Ware expressly distinguishes them. See "De Præsulibus Lageniæ," p. 68.

<sup>41</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xiv., n. 124, p. 33. He quotes the twenty-ninth chapter of the Antiquities of Ireland, which is incorrect, as the twenty-eighth is the last. Elsewhere, I must confess myself unable to verify such a statement.

<sup>42</sup> He sat in the chair of St. Peter, from A.D. 590 to A.D. 604. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 209.

<sup>43</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," toms ii., No. 774, p. 420.

<sup>44</sup> For this, Dempster cites Gilbert. Brun. Histor., pag. xxix.

<sup>45</sup> His churches or places there are said to be Temple Martin, Dysert Martin, and Kyledelig.

<sup>46</sup> His feast is assigned to the 11th of November, the same day as that on which St. Martin, Bishop of Tours—with whom he is often confounded—was venerated.

<sup>47</sup> For the previous particulars, the writer is indebted to the Rev. John Francis Shearman, who permits reference to his "Loca Patriciana," part xii.

<sup>48</sup> In the parish of Rathkieran, and barony of Iverk. It is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheet 42. The parish itself is defined on Sheets 39, 40, 42, 43.

<sup>49</sup> In the parish of Clashacrow, and barony of Crannagh. See ibid., Sheet 13.

<sup>50</sup> This parish, in the baronies of Crannagh and Galmoy, is shown on Sheets 8, 9, 12, 13. Ibid.

<sup>51</sup> In the parish of Fartagh, and barony of Galmoy. See Sheet 8, ibid.

<sup>52</sup> In the parish so named, in the barony of Iverk. See Sheet 43, ibid. The parish itself is on Sheets 40, 42, 43, 46.

<sup>53</sup> In the parish of Pollrone and barony of Iverk. See Sheet 42, ibid.

<sup>54</sup> In the parish of Rathdowney and barony of Clandonagh. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps of the Queen's County," Sheet 27.

<sup>55</sup> There is a place so called in the parish of Instioge. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheet 29. There is another, in a parish of the same name. See Sheets 14, 15. Both are in the barony of Galmoy.

<sup>56</sup> In the parish so called and barony of Galmoy. See Sheet 24, ibid. The parish is on Sheets 24, 28.

<sup>57</sup> See Thomas Lalor Cooke's "Early History of the Town of Birr," &c., chap. x., p. 167.

<sup>58</sup> See the "Statuta Dioecesis Ossorien-sis," edita Kilkenniae, in Synodo Dioecessana, die 3 Junii, 1873. Monita, sect. 8, pp. 22 to 29.

celebrated monastery,<sup>59</sup> that the memory of our saint was most revered.<sup>60</sup> Knockseera,<sup>61</sup> said to be dedicated to St. Kyran, of Seir Kyran, and founded by him, according to tradition, is an ancient burial place, on the very summit of a rounded, rocky, and elevated site, unrivalled for the picturesque views it commands, on every side. The foundations of an old church, here, are levelled with the ground. The church appears to have consisted formerly of a nave and chancel. The nave was about 30 feet in length, by 20 in width. The chancel was about 9 feet, in addition to the nave. The present notes were taken on the spot, August, 1872, and about 70 years previously, the people there stated, the old church was almost perfect, two gables standing and a vestry attached. The cross wall was broken down, however, but a round arched-doorway entered it. A small end window was in one gable, while the side walls were then somewhat broken and defaced. Westwards extended this chancel, preserving the aforesaid width, following the side-walls. On the north side, there appear to have been few interments, but as the subsoil is limestone, much of the surface on this direction has been excavated for material, probably used in building the ancient church, or for more modern houses, about the neighbourhood. There are several tombs and headstones, yet none presenting a very antique appearance, on the south and east of the old building. Formerly, there were no defined boundaries around the graveyard; but, of late years, it has been enclosed with a stone-wall. A solitary hawthorn bush crowned the eminence, and served with some upright headstones, to mark the spot, from a very considerable distance. Knockseera lies one mile south-east from Borris-in-Ossory.<sup>62</sup> From its top extends a magnificent landscape range of vision, bounded by the Slieve Bloom mountains, the hills of Dysart, the Slievenamon and northern Kilkenny heights, the distant haze-covered Galtees and the nearer Keeper mountains, in Tipperary. Popular tradition, regarding the old church founder, seems all but lost; nor is the patron's name remembered, by people of the present generation. Still, some hallowed remembrances are connected with the place; and, deceased persons are brought by their friends from remote distances to be interred, on this lonely eminence. There can be no doubt whatever, regarding the extreme antiquity of Knockseera church, for a visit to the site will impress the initiated in Irish antiquarian lore, with evidences sufficiently convincing, that long ages must have rolled over, since the very primitive structure had been first built, on its present scarcely traceable foundations. Immediately near, and in the hollow of an adjoining field, St. Kieran's well may be seen, issuing from beneath a venerable hawthorn tree.<sup>63</sup> Formerly the spring was frequented by devout pilgrims, on the 5th of March. Besides this, a St. Kieran's well may be seen, near the ruined churches of Cill

<sup>59</sup> See, also, Rt. Rev. Patrick Francis Moran's, "Spicilegium Ossoriense : being a Collection of Original Letters and Papers illustrative of the History of the Irish Church from the Reformation to the year 1800," First Series, sect. ii., pp. 6 to 10.

<sup>60</sup> Mr. O'Donovan, in writing from this neighbourhood, remarks, that the present wall is exceedingly ancient, and that there are two round towers, on a small scale, standing in the churchyards of Seirkieran and of Killyon; the establishments of St. Kieran and his mother Liedania. They seem to have been attached to other buildings, and to have been used as Sacristies or Dearthachs. They are about 17 feet high, and rather of rude masonry. See the King's County Letters, of the Ordnance Survey, vol. ii., p. 98. Mr. O'Donovan's letter, dated Birr, February 3rd, 1838. In this letter, Mr. O'Donovan also gives a rough map tracing, in which Seirkieran occupies a central position. The names of ancient places and territories are marked thereon, according to their supposed former relative positions. Ibid., p. 95.

<sup>61</sup> This townland, in the parish of Aghaboe, and barony of Clandonagh, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheet 22.

<sup>62</sup> This town, in the parish of Aghaboe, and barony of Clandonagh, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 21, 22.

Ossory and Stonecarthy, not far from an old road of some historic importance.<sup>64</sup> There is a townland, called Saint Kieran's, in the parish of Tintern, and barony of Shelburne, county of Wexford.<sup>65</sup> In the King's County, there is a Kilkeeran,<sup>66</sup> in the parish of Cloneyhurk, and barony of Upper Philipstown. In the Island of Cape Clear<sup>67</sup> and on the mainland coasts adjoining, his name is, also, held in veneration, by people living there, even to the present day. Kilkieran, an ancient church, and a part of the coast, called Kieran's Strand, are even yet mementoes of his celebrity.<sup>68</sup>

This saint's festival is commemorated, throughout Ireland, as a double, and, in the diocese of Ossory, as a double of the First Class. Formerly it was celebrated, with an Office, containing Nine Lessons.<sup>69</sup> Abstinence from servile works was enjoined, in the olden times, when his feast occurred, as we learn from the Antiphonary, supposed to have belonged to Clondalkin Church.<sup>70</sup> In the diocese of Ossory, it is thought, that St. Ciaran's feast formerly ranked

Well of St. Kieran, under Knockseera, Queen's County

<sup>63</sup> The accompanying sketch, by the writer, was taken on the spot, in August, 1872. It was transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved, by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>64</sup> See the "Journal of the Kilkenney and South-East of Ireland Archæological Society," vol. iii. New Series, part ii., p. 385.

<sup>65</sup> It is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheet 45.

<sup>66</sup> See it defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheet 33.

<sup>67</sup> On this island, towards the north-western point, we are told by Smith, that the ruins of a castle, called Dunanore, Anglice, the "Golden fort," stand on a rock, which extends into the sea. "A little to the east of the castle, is a cove called Tra-Kieran, i.e. "St. Kieran's Strand," on which is a pillar stone, with a cross rudely cut towards the top, that, they say, was the workmanship of St. Kieran; and near it stand the walls of a ruined church, dedicated to the same saint. This stone they hold in great veneration, and assemble round it every 5th of March, on which day, they celebrate the festival of their patron."—"History of the County of Cork," vol. i., book ii., chap. iv., p. 279. After describing this island, Smith enters these following remarks: "Adjoining to Cape Clear, between it and the mainland, is the island of Inishkieran, which I take to be Iniskieran, or the island of St. Kieran, rather than the former."

—Ibid., p. 281.

<sup>68</sup> See Thomas Lalor Cooke's "Early History of the Town of Birr," &c., chap. x., p. 167.

<sup>69</sup> The Trinity College, Dublin, MSS.

as high as St. Patrick's day, or as a festival equally remarkable. In fact, the learned bishop of the diocese, Thomas De Burgo,<sup>71</sup> in 1761, directs the Easter duty there to commence on St. Ciaran's day, and to end on Ascension day.<sup>72</sup> The same direction is to be found, in a Pastoral of his successor, Most Rev. Dr. Troy, and dated A.D. 1778.<sup>73</sup> The former memorials of the saint, throughout ancient Ossory, before the dark Penal Days, have been largely increased since, by the erection of St. Ciaran's College, the fine new Cathedral, as likewise other churches, chapels and religious institutions.<sup>74</sup> It is remarkable, also, that to about the year 1838, the people kept the feast of St. Kieran, on the 5th of March, as a local holiday, and long afterwards, no works were there carried on. We rejoice to learn, that the old celebration has been lately revived, with great religious solemnity, and we trust, it shall never more fall into disuse.<sup>75</sup> St. Ængus the Culdee<sup>76</sup> and the Calendar of Cashel have this holy bishop's festival set down, for the 5th day of March. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>77</sup> at the same date, he is simply recorded as Ciaran Saighre. In the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire, of Salisbury, and in the Martyrologium Anglicanum, he is also recorded.<sup>78</sup> This saint's name is frequently written Piran or Piranus,<sup>79</sup> and under this form, he is commemorated, at the present date, in an anonymous list of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare<sup>80</sup> In the list of our saints, published by Henry Fitzsimon, on the authority of Floratius, at the 5th of March, this saint is commemorated as Kirianus, Epis. et Mart.<sup>81</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>82</sup> records, as being venerated on this day, Ciaran, of Saighir, Bishop classed B. 1. 3., B. 3. 1., B. 3. 10., B. 3. 12. have in their Calendars, at March 5th, or Nones iii., Sancti Kerani Epis. or Abb. et Conf., ix. lect.

<sup>70</sup> It is now classed B. 1. 3., among the T.C.D. Manuscripts.

<sup>71</sup> Author of those invaluable works—now so rarely met with—the “Hibernia Dominicana,” and “Supplementum Hiberniæ Dominicanæ,” privately printed in Kilkenny, but, for concealment of existing publication disabilities, published Coloniæ Agrippinæ, A.D. MDCCCLXII.

<sup>72</sup> In 1773, the same prelate issued a Pastoral to the clergy of his diocese, stating that among the other holydays retrenched by Pope Clement XIV., in his lately published Indult, the obligation of hearing Mass, on St. Ciaran's day, and on St. Kenny's day, as also on the festival days of parochial patrons, had been removed. “From this date, ‘St. Ciaran's day’ was gradually being lost sight of in popular estimation.”—John Hogan's “St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory,” part iii., chap. viii., pp. 217, 218.

<sup>73</sup> Instructions for Lent.

<sup>74</sup> See the work already quoted, for further details and historic particulars than our disposable space will permit us to introduce.

<sup>75</sup> In connexion with this subject, however, it is only just to observe, the present learned and distinguished successor of St. Kieran, the Most Rev. Patrick Francis Moran, consecrated Bishop of Ossory on St. Ciaran's Day, A.D. 1872, has taken every care possible to perpetuate the religious and popular veneration due to his illustrious patron. Among his clergy and people has he also revived a taste and research, in local and general Irish and ecclesiastical studies, which must be fraught with the most happy results, and which must redound creditably to his own future celebrity, and to the best interests of our national Church.

<sup>76</sup> The following extract, from the “Feilire,” in the “Leabhar Breac,” with its English translation, was furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

A. 111. ā. Ro leblāing in balboa achlu oap fāl pāipoe
Cārteach nģoa ruamach
Cīaran rģuagach pāigpe.

The Balbda bounding sent
His fame across the eastern sea,
Carthach the kingly of Rome,
Ciaran Saigher of hosts.

<sup>77</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>78</sup> See Colgan's “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii v., n. 43, p. 467.

<sup>79</sup> St. Kiaran is called Kenerin, in the “Circle of the Seasons,” p. 65, and there too he seems to have been distinguished from St. Piran, in Cornwall.

<sup>80</sup> See “Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium,” tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

<sup>81</sup> See ibid., chap. xii., p. 55.

<sup>82</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 64, 65.

<sup>83</sup> The same notice appears in that copy, preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, and formerly belonging to the Irish Ordnance and Confessor.<sup>83</sup> Again, under the head of Saighir, Duaid Mac Fírbis enters, Ciaran of Saighir, a bishop who was in Erin before Patrick.<sup>84</sup> The Scottish people venerated the memory of this renowned bishop. Thus, we read, in the Kalendar of Drummond, at the 5th or iii. Nones of March, that in Ireland the holy Confessors, Ciaran and Cartac, who were devout servants, went to Christ. The feast of St. Ciarain Saigre is noted, in the "Kalendarium Celticum," at the ii. Nones, or 6th of March: this, however, must be a mistake for the 5th. In his "Menologium Scoticum," Dempster places the feast of our saint, in this manner: "Kiriani episcopi." Florarius is quoted as his authority.<sup>85</sup>

We cannot better conclude this account of St. Kieran, than by reproducing the eloquent and eulogistic words of a devout client,<sup>86</sup> and which may serve to warm our affections for the subject of his panegyric, on this heavenly birthday of Ossory's great patron. Let us "beg of him to obtain for us grace to eradicate from our hearts the roots of our former vices, and to plant in them the seeds of every virtue, so that they may grow up, and flower, and fructify, a hundred fold, and shed the good odour of Christ around us. And so, when for us the trials and storms of this life shall have terminated, the finger of God will come upon our eyes, and the voice of the turtle will sound in our ears, telling us to arise and come away to that blessed country, where winter can appear never more, where God shall wipe away all tears from the eyes of His faithful servants, and where the gloom of the valley of death shall be exchanged for the golden sunlight of a happy eternity."

ARTICLE II.—ST. CARTHACH, OR CARTHAGE, SAID TO HAVE BEEN BISHOP OF DRUM-FERTAIN, AND OF INIS UACHTAIR, IN LOUGH SHEELIN, COUNTY OF WESTMEATH, OR, OF SIER-KIERAN, KING'S COUNTY. [Sixth Century.] Immediate successor to St. Kieran,<sup>1</sup> the present holy man grew up under a strict discipline, and it is generally thought, that his birth may be referred to some closing part of the fifth century. However, regarding the exact period for his nativity, nothing of a very specific nature can be gleaned. Most generally, this St. Carthage is designated, the Elder, in our Irish Calendars, probably to distinguish him from others, bearing a similar name.<sup>2</sup> Indeed, it seems probable, that accounts relating to these may have found misplacement in the Acts of our St. Carthach or Carthage.<sup>3</sup> These are doubtfully presented by Colgan,<sup>4</sup> and by the Bollandists.<sup>5</sup> However, the succeeding particulars may not all have reference to the saint, whose feast falls on this day. Colgan could not discover any ancient Acts, specially relating to him; yet, being in doubt, if such might not afterwards come to light, he forbore to state much he had gleaned, lest this should be repugnant to any possible future development. The Acts of this saint, notwithstanding, Survey Archives. It is known, as the "Common Place Book F." See p. 27.

<sup>84</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 126, 127.

<sup>85</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 6, 83, and 194.

<sup>86</sup> See "The Feast of St. Kieran at Saigher." Panegyric Sermon by Rev. N. Murphy, C.C. To this published Tract is appended a communication to the Ossory Archaeological Society: "Vindication of the Claim of St. Kieran of Saigher to the Title of Primogenitus Sanctorum Hiberniæ." By the Rev. N. Murphy.

ARTICLE II.—The illustrious bishop, whose Acts have been previously given, at this same day.

<sup>2</sup> One so called was venerated on the 26th of March, and another, surnamed Mochuda, at the 14th of May.

<sup>3</sup> It is said, by Colgan, that in Irish, his name is Carthach, and, in the genitive case Carthaigh; while, in Latin, he is denominated Carthochus, Cartagus, Carthacius and Carthogius.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v. De S. Carthagio Epis. et Confess. Ex Variis, pp. 473 to 476, and n. 1.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii v. De S. Kierano et S. Carthaco ejus Discipulo Episcopis et Abbatibus Sagi-riensibus in Ossoria Hiberniæ Provincia, pp. 389 to 399.

do not appear to be extant, so that little can be said regarding him.<sup>6</sup> In the "Memorial of Ancient British Piety," the feast of St. Carthac the Elder at Seir-Kieran is commemorated, at the 5th of March.<sup>7</sup> This pious servant of God was a son of Aenghus, son to Nadfraech, King of Munster, according to a prevailing opinion;<sup>8</sup> but, by other authorities, he is called the grandson of Aengus.<sup>9</sup> Thus is he alluded to, in the Lives of St. Kieran of Saigir; and, it would be difficult to arrive at any other conclusion, except we should suppose him to have been born, but a very short time before the death of Aengus, who was slain towards the close of the fifth century.<sup>10</sup> According to one statement, our saint was either a brother or a grandson to King Aengus; while, he is called a foster-brother to St. Kiaran of Saighir.<sup>11</sup> It is supposed, too, that St. Carthach had been the son of a wife to Aengus Nathfraich, before his union with Eithne Vathach.<sup>12</sup> A pious servant of God, Carthacus, is classed among St. Patrick's disciples;<sup>13</sup> but, it has been conjectured, that another Carthach may have lived at a still earlier period than our saint, and that he may have belonged to the same family, for nothing seems to be distinctively known regarding him.<sup>14</sup> It is generally admitted, that our Carthach was educated, at an early age, under St. Ciaran of Saigir;<sup>15</sup> and, Colgan thinks that he received such instruction, before the year 489. While this too early date, for his scholarship, has been denied by Dr. Lanigan; yet, he deems it probable, that, as both master and disciple were natives of Munster, and as both were well known, at the Court of Cashel, the latter might have been entrusted to the care of the former, after Kieran had left the school of St. Finnian,<sup>16</sup> at Clonard, about the year 532.<sup>17</sup> It is also conjectured, that at this time Carthage was young, and probably not more than seventeen or eighteen years of age.<sup>18</sup> While at Saighir, we can have no doubt, that every care was bestowed on his religious education and discipline; yet was it permitted, by Divine Providence, that the youth should be tried in temptation, only to overcome it, however, by miraculous interposition, to escape from the snare through exemplary penance, and to become still more holy, after the danger had passed.<sup>19</sup> He had formed the acquaintance of a female pupil, under the care of St. Liedania,<sup>20</sup> and their intimacy ripened into a violent passion, which becoming known to St. Cieran, his prayers were interposed, and the disciple escaped, with sorrow for having transgressed against the discretion necessary to be observed, especially in the religious state.<sup>21</sup> In tears, he sought advice

<sup>6</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 155, 156.

<sup>7</sup> See p. 46.

<sup>8</sup> So is he called, in the Martyrologies of Tallagh, of Marianus O'Gorman, or by his Scholiast, and of Cathald Maguire. Yet, elsewhere, the latter has some false statements regarding his family and descent.

<sup>9</sup> Rev. A. Cogan says "a grandson." See "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 572. See, also, Miss Cusack's "History of the Kingdom of Kerry," chap. iv., p. 58.

<sup>10</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., and n. 39, pp. 98, 99.

<sup>11</sup> See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. xvi., p. 146.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid., chap. xix. For some interesting speculations, on this subject, the reader is referred to the work just quoted.

<sup>13</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga,"

Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. v., n. 36, p. 338.

<sup>15</sup> Mr. Hogan thinks he was probably fifteen years old, when he became the foster-brother or daltha of St. Kiaran. See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. xix., p. 157, and note ibid.

<sup>16</sup> See his Life, at the 12th of December.

<sup>17</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks this school was opened, about A.D. 530, and that St. Kieran of Saighir was one of St. Finnian's first scholars.

<sup>18</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., and nn. 40, 43, 44, pp. 98 to 100.

<sup>19</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii. First Life of St. Kieran, chap. xxvii. Office, lect. 10. Also, Acts of St. Carthage, chap. iii., pp. 461, 469, 474.

from his master. St. Kieran enjoined on him, as a penance, to leave Ireland. He spent some years in Gaul;<sup>22</sup> but, in what particular part of it has not transpired. He is said to have led a penitential life there, and to have been employed in a study of the Holy Scripture.<sup>23</sup> Thence he is said to have set out for Rome,<sup>24</sup> according to the account of St. Ængus and of Maguire. A conjecture of Mr. Hogan's is, that he was present, at Saighir, when St. Patrick and King Ængus visited that place, A.D. 455, and that after this date, he spent seven years of his life away from Ireland.<sup>25</sup> St. Carthage is said to have been consecrated at Rome;<sup>26</sup> although this is not certain. For the love of God, whom he served, St. Kieran of Saigir used to be often immersed in a vat of cold water.<sup>27</sup> In pursuance of his accustomed mortification, and in company with a holy stranger, called German, he had one day gone into a cold stream, which the pilgrim told him he found it too difficult to remain in much longer. Then St. Kieran signed the water with a cross, and it seemed warm about him, as if it had been a tepid bath, and at the same time he predicted to German the immediate return of his disciple, St. Carthage, while he desired a large fish swimming near them to be caught for his refreshment. The very next day, Carthage came to the place. When he returned back to Ireland, St. Ciaran welcomed him with great joy, and it is thought, our saint once more was received under his direction, and admitted to his confidence. He obtained holy orders not long afterwards, as seems probable, and from St. Ciaran himself.<sup>28</sup> The pious disciple's life was afterwards a most exemplary one, and soon he began to cultivate the Lord's vineyard, in which he worthily laboured, and he even set about the erection of various monasteries, in different parts of Ireland. It is said, that Ciaran dedicated his congregation to God and to Carthach,<sup>29</sup> and, that this happened, a little before the death of the former.<sup>30</sup> Hence, it has been concluded, that our saint immediately succeeded the founder in the see of Saighir. Yet, it is thought, that whatever superintendence Carthach might have exercised for some time in the place, he may have acted in the capacity of a friend, and not as a bishop. The Irish Calendars only call him the alumnus, and not the comorban, or successor, of St. Ciaran. Supposing that the latter died, about A.D. 540, Colgan thinks, that Carthach became his inheritor of the see, at that period.<sup>31</sup> However, Harris mentions him, as having been a bishop at Saigir;<sup>32</sup> yet, the time when he ruled there does not seem possible to be determined. This matter, on the whole, is rather doubtful; still, it is not questioned, that he became a bishop, in course of time, but when, or by whom, he was consecrated, we cannot discover.<sup>33</sup> One of his places, we are told, was Druimfertain, and in Cairbre Ua Ciardhe<sup>34</sup> is Druimfertain.<sup>35</sup> Under this latter head, Dual

<sup>20</sup> See her Life, at the 11th of August.

<sup>21</sup> The foregoing incident is also alluded to, in Capgrave's account of St. Ciaran or Piran.

<sup>22</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's "History of the Kingdom of Kerry," chap. iv., p. 58.

<sup>23</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., p. 98.

<sup>24</sup> See ibid., n. 46, p. 100.

<sup>25</sup> See "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," part ii., chap. xix., p. 158.

<sup>26</sup> According to these lines, translated from Ængus:—

"The silent man went with renown
Eastwards over the sea,
Carthage, the royal one of Rome."

<sup>27</sup> According to his Irish Life, as quoted in Rev. Drs. Todd's and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 64, 65.

<sup>28</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., p. 98.

<sup>29</sup> According to the Irish Life of St. Ciaran, chapter xxxiv.

<sup>30</sup> Archdall has this appointment made by St. Kieran, when on his death-bed. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 404.

<sup>31</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii. Appendix ad Vitam S. Kierani, cap. v., p. 473, and De S. Carthagio Epis. et Confess., cap. vii., viii., pp. 474, 475.

<sup>32</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Ossory," p. 402.

<sup>33</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical His-

Mac Firbis enters, Carthach, bishop,<sup>36</sup> and it is added, that Drum Feartan belongs to him.<sup>37</sup> This denomination, however, does not appear on the Ordnance Survey Maps. Inis Uachtair,<sup>38</sup> on the upper Island of Lough Sheelin, bordering on the half barony of Fore, in the county of Westmeath, is stated<sup>39</sup> to have been another of his places. Here, it is stated, the saint's abbey had been erected, in the sixth century;<sup>40</sup> and, Archdall assigns its foundation, on this island, to about the year 540, while a little after this period, St. Carthag is said to have presided over it, as abbot.<sup>41</sup> Under the head of Inis-Uachter,<sup>42</sup> Duaid Mac Firbis enters Carthach, bishop.<sup>43</sup> This island seems also to have obtained from him the name of Inis-Carthaigh.<sup>44</sup> However, a mistake probably occurs here, in confounding him with his celebrated namesake, the Bishop of Lismore.<sup>45</sup> To him, likewise, belonged Cill Charthaigh, in Tir Boghaine, in Cinel Conaill, state the O'Clerys. This place is supposed, by Archdall, to be represented by Kilcarr, a parish church in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the county of Donegal.<sup>46</sup> Yet, Dr. Lanigan suspects, this church got its name from some other Carthaich or Carthagh, rather than from him. The Calendar of Cashel, which may be considered as good authority regarding this saint, does not place it among his churches, and its great distance from Munster strengthens the doubt.<sup>47</sup> The name of a monastery, Thuaim, is introduced by Colgan, as one where St. Carthagh and his companions happened to be entertained, on a particular occasion. This, he supposes, to have been the same as Tuaim-nava, alias Iniscarra. Kerry is said to have been the see or scene of his labours,<sup>48</sup> and, as conjectured by Dr. Lanigan, his place there was near the River Mang. It is thought by him, that Thuaim perhaps may have some reference to the mountain, called Toomish, in the barony of Dunkerron.<sup>49</sup> Here, he met with St. Carthage the younger, or Mochuda,<sup>50</sup> a native of Kerry, who became his scholar, and who was afterwards advanced by him to priesthood. This is thought referable to about the year 577, or perhaps even later, when our saint was old.<sup>51</sup> Hence, it is supposed, an inference may be drawn, that towards the close of life, he must have been living in the kingdom of Kerry. That he was connected, tory of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., p. 99.

<sup>34</sup> This place is identical with Carbury, county of Kildare, according to William M. Hennessy's note.

<sup>35</sup> Dr. Todd says, in a note at this etymon, Druimfertain. "The more recent hand adds: 'no פֶּרְוֹאִיחַ, T. ;' meaning that the Mart. Tam. reads Druim ferdaimh."

<sup>36</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 5th of March.

<sup>37</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 108, 109.

<sup>38</sup> In the townland and parish of Foyran, there is a ruined church marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 1. Near it is Tober Aidan or Bishop Hugh's Well. From the Ordnance Survey Maps, however, it does not seem possible to identify the obsolete Inis Uchtair, with any island on Lough Sheelin.

<sup>39</sup> See Rev. Dr. Todd's and Dr. Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 64, 65.

<sup>40</sup> See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 572.

<sup>41</sup> See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 716.

<sup>42</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 116, 117.

<sup>43</sup> His feast is referred, to the 5th of March.

<sup>44</sup> See ibid., pp. 114, 115.

<sup>45</sup> His feast is also wrongly placed, at March 3rd. However, he is the same, whose name appears under Druim-fertain and Inis-Uochtar as above. See William M. Hennessy's note. Ibid., pp. 118, 119.

<sup>46</sup> See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 101. Here our saint is placed as Bishop of Killen, about the year 540.

<sup>47</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., n. 47, pp. 100, 101.

<sup>48</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's "History of the Kingdom of Kerry," chap. iv., pp. 58 to 60.

<sup>49</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., and n. 50, pp. 99, 102.

<sup>50</sup> See his Life, at the 14th of May.

<sup>51</sup> This would be, to allow about sixty years, for the priesthood of St. Carthage, Junior, who died A.D. 637.

with this part of the country, is said to be provable from other circumstances ; such as an allusion to the chieftains of Kiarraghe, and of the shore of Leamhna, thought to be no other than Lough Leane, or the Lake of Killarney.<sup>52</sup> Being at a spot, called Feoran, near the shore of Leamha, St. Carthage the Elder recommended the Chieftain Moeltul to his disciple St. Carthage, the Younger, who was to become Patron of Kerry.<sup>53</sup> Moreover, the former offered his church and see to the latter, and this resignation betokened our saint's great humility, while it indicated a Providential disposal of the privileges both were to enjoy. It does not seem at all likely, that our saint followed his disciple to Lismore, near which, it is said, the church of Inis-Carthach<sup>54</sup> had been dedicated to him. This his great age, would hardly allow ;<sup>55</sup> yet, it may well be supposed, that as master and instructor of the great St. Mochuda, his memory had been afterwards revered in that district.<sup>56</sup> The year date of his death is unknown, but by some it is placed about A.D. 540 ;<sup>57</sup> yet, probably it happened, about or after A.D. 580 ;<sup>58</sup> for, it is thought, from certain dates and circumstances, that it could not have been prior to this period.<sup>59</sup> In many churches, his feast was kept on the 5th of March—probably that of his demise, or possibly for the sake of convenience, to make it accord with the festival of his great predecessor. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>60</sup> enters the name, at the 5th of March, as Carthach, son of Ænguss, of Droma Ferdaim. There seems even to be a double entry of this saint's name, in the foregoing record.<sup>61</sup> The Calendars of Cashel, of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Cathald Maguire, are of accord, as to the date for his festival.<sup>62</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>63</sup> this day records, Carthach, Bishop, alumnus of Ciaran of Saighir. As we have already seen, under different headings and places, this holy man is commemorated by Duaid Mac Firbis, at the 5th of March, and, in our early Irish Church, he must have acquired considerable celebrity.

ARTICLE III.—ST. COLMAN, SURNAMED THE THIRSTY. [Supposed to be of the Fifth Century.] Obedience is better than sacrifice has often been advanced, as a maxim, by spiritual writers ; but, in the present instance, we may discover both virtues, distinctly placed, and yet combined. Colgan assigns the festival of a particular St. Colman, to this day ; although, he confesses himself unable to determine such a position, with a full degree of certainty.<sup>1</sup> This saint is thought assignable, to the early period of our Christian history. Still, our national hagiologist seems to err in his conjecture, that the present saint may have been a St. Colman, son of Enan, and a brother to three other saints.<sup>2</sup> Elsewhere, he is of opinion, that the present

<sup>52</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., n. 50, p. 102.

<sup>53</sup> See this account more fully related in the old Irish Life of St. Carthage the Younger, chap. i., num. 8, as contained in the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Maii xiv.

<sup>54</sup> The Calendar of Cashel states, that this was one of his churches.

<sup>55</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v. De S. Carthagio Epis. et Confess., cap. xi., and n. 12, pp. 475, 476.

<sup>56</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., n. 53, p. 102.

<sup>57</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Ossory," p. 402.

<sup>58</sup> See Miss Cusack's "History of the Kingdom of Kerry," chap. iv., pp. 59, 60.

<sup>59</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. v., nn. 51, 52, pp. 99, 102.

<sup>60</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>61</sup> Thus, "Carthach i Saighir in uno die ocus," &c., precedes the textual notice.

<sup>62</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii, nn. 14, 15, p. 476.

<sup>63</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 64, 65.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v. De B. Colmano, dicto Sitiente, p. 476.

<sup>2</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 482, and cap. x., p. 489.

holy man was one of St. Patrick's disciples.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists have some brief notices of him.<sup>4</sup> According to Colgan's inferences, this Colman was a monk,<sup>5</sup> under the rule of St. Patrick.<sup>6</sup> So exact was he, in complying with all things required, that he became a martyr to monastic discipline. Whilst employed with other monks in collecting the harvest, at a place denominated Trian Conchobhuir,<sup>7</sup> one of these called Colman felt extremely thirsty.<sup>8</sup> Although a tub of cold water had been placed in the field, to be used by the labourers; yet, an injunction was issued, that no one should drink from it, until the hour for saying Vespers had passed.<sup>9</sup> Colman's strength began to fail, however, on account of the intolerable thirst experienced; still, the patient monk did not wish to infringe an established rule. At length, unable to bear this privation, to which he had voluntarily subjected himself, the holy servant yielded up his spirit to the Maker of all things, having sunk on the ground exhausted and lifeless. He was buried at the cross, which had been erected before the newly-built Cathedral Church of Armagh; and, on being consigned to the tomb, in this consecrated spot of ground, much as he no doubt lamented the circumstances attending this death,<sup>10</sup> the Irish Apostle felt gratified, that the body of a saint should repose in his graveyard, as the first fruits of deposition. He is even said to have prophesied, that the church, which was consecrated by such a happy sepulture, should afterwards be prosperous, and should abound in riches and honours.<sup>11</sup> St. Patrick, also, saw the soul of his departed brother ascend to heaven, where it found rest, in company with the martyrs.<sup>12</sup> The 5th of March was the Natal day of a St. Colman—probably the present—according to our Irish Martyrologies. At this date, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>13</sup> records a festival in honour of Colman, designated Isirni. Marianus O'Gorman and Charles Maguire record him; but, they neither add time, place, or other circumstances, to identify him.<sup>14</sup> The name of a Saint Colman has been omitted from the published Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>15</sup> at this day; but, the simple name, Colman, has been inserted by the compiler of a table subjoined, with the remark appended, that he had not been noticed in the body of this work.<sup>16</sup> About the year 445 must have been the period for his death, were we to credit Ussher's statement, that at this date, the foundations of Armagh church were laid.<sup>17</sup> The O'Clerys, however, refer this event, to the year 457.<sup>18</sup> As many bodies, no doubt, were early interred within the cemetery of Armagh, and as Saint

<sup>3</sup> See ibid. Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii v. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 359.

<sup>5</sup> This, however, he acknowledges to be a negative inference only; as among one hundred and twenty or more saints, named Colman, and mentioned in our Calendars, circumstances seem most favourable to place him, at the 5th of March—misprinted the 2nd.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>7</sup> This means, "Conor's Quarter," or "district."

<sup>8</sup> According to the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, he was afterwards called "Itadach, z.e. Sitiens."—Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. lxxvii. In Irish, ioṫac means, "thirsty."

<sup>9</sup> Many of the early Christians, on fasting days, were accustomed to abstain, not only from food, but even from the simplest kind of drink, until the time allowed for refectio had come.

<sup>10</sup> Had the saint been apprized of the danger Colman was in, he would certainly have dispensed with his not observing the rules on that occasion.—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. I, p. 320.

<sup>11</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. lxxvii.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid. Jocelin's or Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. 165.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>14</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v. De B. Colmano, dicto Sitante, n. 2, p. 476.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves.

<sup>16</sup> See, ibid., pp. 380, 381.

<sup>17</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," Index Chronologicus, A.D. ccccxlvi., p. 518.

Colman's remains were the first therein deposited, we may probably refer his death and burial, to that very year, in which the church foundations had been laid. His cognomen of the Thirsty was obtained, not from his being often obliged to satisfy such a distressing want of nature ; but, owing to that heroic yet misconceived resolution, whereby he overcome natural requirements, even at the sacrifice of his own life. What an example of abstemiousness ought not this be for many unhappy drunkards, who end their days prematurely, when indulging in habits of intoxication, and in the frequent use of spirituous liquors. That wholesome beverage, pure water, is abundant, especially in "Erinn of the streams," and it, at least, can be obtained free from charge or hindrance. It usually promotes health, and it can hardly be used to excess by any of our people, while it never can deprive them of reason or sense. Notwithstanding his exemption from rule, for grave moral and physical reasons, yet, it is to be lamented, that a conscientious and good man, in the present instance, mistook the nature of his engagements, when by a moderate draught of this pure element, he might have saved a valuable and an exemplary life.

---

ARTICLE IV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A SAINT MOGGRUDO, MUGGINS OR MUCKOLINUS. On the 5th of March, in Molanus' edition of Usuard, there is notice of the martyrs of St. Adrian, at Cæsarea, in Palestine.<sup>1</sup> But, the saint, with whom we have to deal, is he whom Usuard describes as Muggrudo, a Bishop and a Confessor, unknown to that time. The honorific "mo," added to the Celtic name, Odran, gives a name similar to Macgidran, to whom are dedicated the churches of Lindores and Flisk, where he appears as St. Muggins, while both within the parochia of S. Andrew.<sup>2</sup> There, he appears, also, as Muckolinus.<sup>3</sup> His name is found, in the dedication of a church, near Dron, Exmacgirdle ; also, possibly, at Mugdrum ; and, as Magidrin, he appears in Macduff's Cross. There is a St. Odran, at March 6th, in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>4</sup> We are obliged to request the reader, to examine again what has been stated, at the 4th of this month, when treating about St. Phillip, Bishop of Cluain Bainbh.

---

ARTICLE V.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. KOLANUS, OR ST. KOIANUS, BISHOP. In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 5th of March, a St. Kolanus is found. He seems to be identical with the St. Koianus, Bishop, entered at the same date, in Father Henry Fitzsimon's list,<sup>1</sup> as copied from the Carthusian Martyrology. It is probable, that neither entry differs, except in misspelling, from the name of Colman, venerated on this day, and already noticed.

---

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FEAST OF FINGHIN, ANCHORITE AND BISHOP OF IONA, SCOTLAND. [Tenth Century.] About this pious recluse, and the dignity which he obtained in the Monastery of Iona, we learn nothing more, <sup>18</sup> At this year, they say : "Ard-Macha was founded by St. Patrick, it having been granted to him by Daire, son of Finnochadh, son of Eoghan, son of Niallan."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 142, 143.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See what has been previously stated, at the 4th of March, when treating about St. Adrian and his companions, in the Island of May, Scotland.

<sup>2</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland." Fife, p. 601.

<sup>3</sup> Commissary Records, St. Andrew's.

<sup>4</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 267, 268.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 55.

than that he flourished, during the tenth century. He is noticed by Colgan, as Finginus, Bishop of Iona, and at the 5th of March, with A.D. 964,<sup>1</sup> the date assigned for his death.<sup>2</sup> Again, his decease is noted, at A.D. 966.<sup>3</sup> Whether or not there be a warrant, for classing him among the Irish Saints, at this date, the writer is unable to determine.

Sixth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FRIDOLIN, THE TRAVELLER, ABBOT OF SECKINGEN, AND PATRON OF GLARUS CANTON, SWITZERLAND.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.—WRITERS OF ST. FRIDOLIN'S ACTS—HIS COUNTRY AND FAMILY—HIS PERIOD—HIS YOUTH AND EARLY TRAINING—HIS EDUCATION AND PIOUS DISPOSITIONS.

IT has been justly remarked, that in many parts of Europe, it was the monks who first reclaimed the barren mountain, drained the swamps and valleys, built the towns, and imparted civilization and letters to the rude populations. Among these pioneers of civilization, our countrymen from Ireland were not the least known. An early Irish missionary, on the Continent of Europe, must have been the illustrious saint, whose memory is celebrated on this day. As the monks had a twofold mission, social and religious, their rule prescribed labour and study, as well as prayer—the science that elevates the understanding and which enlarges the heart. The biography, that now engages our attention, fully shadows forth their benign influence, on the destinies of nations uncivilized.

The Acts of St. Fridhold—which seems to have been the ancient and most correct form of Fridolin's name<sup>1</sup>—were preserved in a monastery,<sup>2</sup> on the Moselle, founded by our saint. Still, it is probable, that these had also existed, at Seckingen or Sickingen,<sup>3</sup> the great house over which he presided as abbot; yet, owing to the fact of its having been destroyed by the Hungarians, in 937<sup>4</sup> or 938,<sup>5</sup> every trace of his authentic actions were thought to

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 502.

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 686, 687.

<sup>3</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes, O, p. 395.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> The latter is deemed to be the diminutive of his original name. See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii. March vi., p. 91.

<sup>2</sup> This is called Helera, or according to Bruschi, Hilariacum, which he supposes to be the cenobium of St. Nabor. See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii v. De S. Fridolino, Abbate Seck-ingæ in Germania. Vita, lib. i., cap. iii., n. (b), p. 438.

<sup>3</sup> The Rauraci were a people, formerly living on the banks of the Rhine, near the city of Basle, in Switzerland. Their chief city was Augusta Rauracorum, now Basle, or Augusta Pretoria, now Aoust. Seckingen is below that branch of the Rhine, which is known as the River Limat, and the site of the ancient monastery lay near the Canton of Argau, in Switzerland. Formerly, it was called, Seckinga, Secanica insula, or Secanis, Sancio, or Sacconium.

<sup>4</sup> See an account of these ravages, in Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus iii., lib. xiii., A.D. 937, sect. lxxix., pp. 434, 435.

have been lost, down to the commencement of the twelfth century. Then, the Moselle foundation having been visited; by one Baltherus or Balther,<sup>6</sup> a monk of Sickingen; he there found the Life of St. Fridhold, which he asked for, but the Prior refused to give it. However, during his stay, in that place, he contrived, as he had neither ink nor parchment, partly to carry away in his memory the words, and partly the subject matter. Afterwards, he set to work, and by a process of his own, Balther contrived to re-write the Life,<sup>7</sup> probably in a more ornate style, and such as we now have it. This Baltherus<sup>8</sup> studied in the Monastery of St. Gall, and his work was dedicated to Notker,<sup>9</sup> who presided over that celebrated religious establishment. There were six Notkers at St. Gall, and these are severally distinguished by Mabillon.<sup>10</sup> Notker Balbulus flourished, about the beginning of the tenth century; another Notker Decanus lived under the Emperor Otho the Great;<sup>11</sup> another was chaplain and preceptor to Otho II.;<sup>12</sup> another was Notker Decanus, who lived in the eleventh century; a fifth, named Notker Junior, flourished about the middle of the twelfth century, while a sixth lived, during the pontificate of Pope Innocent III.<sup>13</sup> The Notker, addressed by Baltherus, must have been one among the latest mentioned.<sup>14</sup>

With some other accounts to illustrate St. Fridolin's Acts, this Life is given by Colgan,<sup>15</sup> at the 6th of March, but with many incorrections. These have been amended, by the Bollandists, who also give a preceding commentary, at the same date.<sup>16</sup> Although the Acts of our saint are well recorded in this Life, yet difficulties occur, in determining the chronology of the transactions. The Jesuit Father, Petrus Canisius, and Henric Murer, have written the Life of this saint;<sup>17</sup> while many of the Swiss, German, and

<sup>5</sup> This is the date, according to several respectable authorities.

<sup>6</sup> He gives a curious account of his previous travels, in quest of information, and he offers an apology for the rude style of his composition, which was accompanied by a little hymn, in praise of St. Fridolin, and set for music.

<sup>7</sup> It is preceded, by the author's Prologue of Dedication, "Notkero Doctrinæ Sophiæ, meritorumque sanctitate Beatissimo, Baltherus infimus servorum Dei Seruulus." Then, after a Preface, follow two Books. The first Book contains the Legend of St. Fridolin's early life, and the second his foundation of Seckingen, with his death and miracles.

<sup>8</sup> Dr. Lanigan supposes, that he lived, not before the eleventh or twelfth century.

<sup>9</sup> Colgan and the Bollandists falsely imagine this person to be the celebrated Notker Balbulus, who died in 912. Yet, the Life itself bears intrinsic evidence, of its having been composed, at a later period; since it makes allusion, in two places, to the invasion of Seckingen by the Hungarians, in the year 938, as having occurred long before the work was written. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., n. 135, p. 479, and n. 136, p. 480.

<sup>10</sup> See "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomos i., lib. viii., sect. xxvii., p. 221.

<sup>11</sup> He reigned from A.D. 936 to 973. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 392.

<sup>12</sup> He ruled from A.D. 973 to 983. See ibid.

<sup>13</sup> He occupied the Chair of St. Peter, from A.D. 1193 to 1216. See ibid., p. 210.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., n. 135, p. 479.

<sup>15</sup> See his "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. i. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, ex Gasparo Bruschio de Monasteriis Germaniæ. ii. De eodem S. Fridolino, ex Ivdoco Coccio Societatis Jesu in Lib. de Dagaberto Rege, cap. 6. iii. Alia Vita S. Fridolini, ex Bibliotheca Santgallensi, Anthore Balthero Monacho. iv. The Capitulum, Response, Hymn, Versicle, Antiphon and Prayer of St. Fridolin's Office, at Vespers. v. An Extract from St. Peter Damian's Sermon, on the Translation of St. Hilary's Remains, by St. Fridolin. vi. An Extract, referring to our Saint, from the work of Francis Guillimann, "De Rebus Helvetiorum," lib. 3, cap. 6. Some notes accompany these documents, the whole being wound up with an original Appendix, in five chapters. See pp. 479 to 493.

<sup>16</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii vi. These writers publish Balther's Acts, with a different arrangement from that found in Colgan, and they add "Miracula," ex Vita Germanica Henrici Mureri. Their commentary is in three sections and eleven paragraphs. See pp. 430 to 441.

<sup>17</sup> These were written in the German language.

French writers have laboured much, in endeavouring to assign the actions recorded of him to various epochs, and to the period of different French dynasties. Among the chief writers, who have treated about this holy man, we may mention, Goldast,<sup>18</sup> Guillimann,<sup>19</sup> Hermann Crumbach,<sup>20</sup> Christianus Urstitius,<sup>21</sup> Gaspar Bruschiu,<sup>22</sup> Judocus Coccius,<sup>23</sup> Joannes Stumphius,<sup>24</sup> Ægidius Tschudius,<sup>25</sup> Fortnatus Specherus,<sup>26</sup> Martinus Crucius,<sup>27</sup> and Matthæus Merianus.<sup>28</sup> In a work, known as "Topographia Helvetiæ,"<sup>29</sup> as also in Joannes Jacobus Grasserus' and in Joannes Gulerus' works, "De Rebus Helueticis," mention is made of the Blessed Fridolin.<sup>30</sup> The Life of our saint is to be found in John Bale's work, on the writers of Britain.<sup>31</sup> Buce- lin,<sup>32</sup> Cratopolius,<sup>33</sup> Dempster,<sup>34</sup> Bishop Challoner,<sup>35</sup> Sir James Ware,<sup>36</sup> Walter Harris,<sup>37</sup> Dr. Meredith Hanmer,<sup>38</sup> Adrien Baillet,<sup>39</sup> the Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>40</sup> Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>41</sup> with various other ecclesiastical writers, have recorded the labours and virtues of St. Fridolin. While it is announced, that St. Fridolin was a Scotto-Hibernicus; the old writer of his Acts only states, that it is not doubtful, his origin must be traced to the extreme parts of Lower Scotia, which extended towards the ocean. Dr. Lanigan seems inclining to an opinion, that he was a native of the province of Connaught;<sup>42</sup> in opposition to Colgan, who thought that by Lower Scotia, some part of Northern Ireland must have been meant.<sup>43</sup> Now, instead of the divisions of North and South, as understood by the latter writer, Dr. Lanigan prefers Eastern and Western divisions, as more in conformity with the ancient biographer's description of that place, in question, being at the extremity of Lower Ireland. It is supposed, the sort of sea, separating them, may have been the water boundary of the Shannon, and near the mouth of this river, perhaps, our saint was born; yet, it is also admitted, so vague is the reference to locality, it might be possible, that the East of Ireland was meant by the writer, living more eastwardly still, that even by Lower and Upper Scotia, he intended, not two divisions of Ireland, but Old Scotia or all Ireland, and New Scotia or all modern Scotland, and that the ocean he mentions was the

<sup>18</sup> "Rerum Alamannicarum," tomus i., pars. ii.

<sup>19</sup> "De Rebus Helueticorum," lib. iii., cap. 6.

<sup>20</sup> He translated the German Life, by Petrus Canisius, into Latin.

<sup>21</sup> Lib. i. "Historiæ Basileensis," cap.

21.

<sup>22</sup> "In Monasteriis Germaniæ."

<sup>23</sup> "De Dagoberto Rege," lib. i., cap. 6.

<sup>24</sup> "Rerum Helueticarum Chronico," lib. xii., cap. ix.

<sup>25</sup> "De Rhætia Alpina," cap. xii.

<sup>26</sup> "In Chronico Rhætia," lib. ii., iii., viii.

<sup>27</sup> "Annalium Suevicorum," pars. i., lib. viii., cap. 9.

<sup>28</sup> "In Topographia Alsatia," p. 36. There is a copper-plate engraving of Seckingham, in this work.

<sup>29</sup> In describing Glarus.

<sup>30</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckinge in Germania. Commentarius Prævius, sect. i., num. 1, 2, 3, 4, pp. 430, 431.

<sup>31</sup> See "Scriptores Britanici," cent. 14, num. 10.

<sup>32</sup> "In Germania Sacra," pars. ii., p. 81.

<sup>33</sup> "De Sanctis Germaniæ."

<sup>34</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. vi., num. 515.

<sup>35</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 159.

<sup>36</sup> See "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. i., p. 6.

<sup>37</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. ii., pp. 9, 10.

<sup>38</sup> See "Chronicle of Ireland," pp. 95, 96.

<sup>39</sup> At March the 6th, in Baillet's "Les Vies des Saints" occurs St. Fridolin, Abbot of St. Hilary's, at Poitiers, afterwards of Secking, in Germany, tome i., pp. 61, 62.

<sup>40</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March vi.

<sup>41</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., pp. 91 to 93.

<sup>42</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., n. 136, p. 480.

<sup>43</sup> His argument appears to be, that a distinction was made by the old writer, in reference to superior or higher Ireland, the southern division of our Island, and so called because the mountains there rise to a greater altitude; and inferior or lower Ireland, the northern part, where the hills are less ele-

one, which separates both countries.<sup>44</sup> Nothing can be gleaned, however, from such loose geographical indications ; and, the enquiry must be relegated to the obscurity of mere conjectures. The Scottish writers have contended, that St. Fridolin was their countryman ;<sup>45</sup> but, this claim is meritedly rejected by the Bollandists,<sup>46</sup> and his natal place is expressly called Hibernia, by the mediæval writer of his Acts.

The century that gave birth to this saint has been disputed, and of his early years we have few authentic particulars. There are writers<sup>47</sup> who maintain, that Fridolin flourished as early as the fourth century, and that he was a contemporary of St. Hilary ;<sup>48</sup> but, this is clearly inadmissible. But, the greater number of those, who have written his Acts, state, that he flourished towards the close of the fifth century. Following Possevin, and some German authors, Sir James Ware states, that Fridolin lived in the year 495.<sup>49</sup> Father Colgan, too, has endeavoured to maintain this date,<sup>50</sup> and Harris has left it uncontradicted.<sup>51</sup> But, it is more reasonably thought, that the saint lived about 200 years later ;<sup>52</sup> and, this opinion seems more conformable to received accounts.

St. Fridolin is said to have been of royal pedigree,<sup>53</sup> or, at least, to have been nobly born. The Life by Balthar proclaims, that his family connexions were among the most powerful persons in the kingdom. Yet, this consideration only caused the boy to ask with the Psalmist, "What profit is there in my blood, whilst I go down to corruption?"<sup>54</sup> So far was he from priding himself, on his distinguished parentage, that he regarded goodness as the sole test of merit, and soon he learned to approve the words of our Divine Redeemer, as recorded in the Gospel, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father, that is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother."<sup>55</sup> In the time of our saint, Ireland is related to have enjoyed an extraordinary amount of material resources, and of secular riches ; while the wealthy gave in abundance, the very poorer classes bestowed from their means, what was necessary to sustain the schools, and all manner of useful learning. The people believed in the words of Holy Writ : "Give to the Most High according to vated. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, &c., n. 6, p. 490.

<sup>44</sup> At the time, when Balthar lived, Northern Britain had probably begun to assume the name of Scotia. Dr. Lanigan adds : "how are we to explain what he says of Fridolin having been born in the extremity of lower Scotia (Ireland) and his proceeding there by a long journey to that sea for the purpose of sailing for France? Could he have meant by said extremity the Southern part of Ireland as being the most remote from Scotland? Yet, in this case, how account for his going to the North to procure a passage for France?"—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., n. 136, p. 480.

<sup>45</sup> Especially Dempster, in his "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. vi., num. 515, p. 280.

<sup>46</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckingæ in Germania. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., num. 7, p. 432.

<sup>47</sup> Among these are Coccus, Dempster, &c., and others, who make him a disciple of St. Hilary.

<sup>48</sup> His festival day is at the 13th of January. It is entered in our Irish Calendars, probably owing to close national affinities ; and this holy bishop was held in especial veneration by St. Fridolin, and by the early Irish Christians.

<sup>49</sup> See "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. i., p. 6.

<sup>50</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Appendix ad Acta S. Fridolini, cap. i., pp. 491, 492.

<sup>51</sup> See Harris's Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. ii., p. 9.

<sup>52</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. viii., sect. xvi., p. 428, and n. 214, p. 430.

<sup>53</sup> On the authority of the English Martyrology, Henry Fitzsimon, in his list of Irish Saints at the 6th of March, calls St. Fridolinus, Confessor, "Filius Regis Iberniæ." See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Iberniæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 54. P. Gibbonus Cepam, de persecutione, follows the previous words by Fitzsimon.

<sup>54</sup> Psalms xxix. 10.

<sup>55</sup> St. Matt. xii. 50.

<sup>56</sup> Ecclesiastes xxxv. 12, 13.

what He had given to thee, and with a good eye do according to the ability of thy hands: For the Lord maketh recompense, and will give thee seven times as much.”<sup>56</sup> Almost from his very cradle, Fridolin thirsted after knowledge, and he applied to the study of polite literature.

The education, received by St. Fridolin, is reported to have been of a nature, suited to the circumstances of his parents and to his own rank. He very soon recognised the great truth, that “all wisdom is from the Lord God;”<sup>57</sup> and, he began with success the study of profane and sacred literature, particularly the latter. While he learned the speculations of Pythagoras and of Plato,<sup>58</sup> he was most assiduous in poring over the Sacred Scriptures, and in reducing their precepts to practice, through his pious mode of thinking. The spirit of piety, evoked by the Irish Apostle, St. Patrick,<sup>59</sup> in the hearts of a people, but newly awakened to the embraces of the faith, seems to have shed its benign influence on the parents of our saint; and, this spirit they were careful to instil, into the mind of their youthful son. Fridolin, from his most tender age, was destined by the gifts of grace, for the state and duties he was afterwards to assume; and, he began to feel, that no longer had he any reason to be a mere laic, as the evidences of his religious vocation beckoned to the service of the altar, and his way led to the gates of heaven. “The friendship of this world is the enemy of God,” says the Apostle;<sup>60</sup> and, Fridolin resolved, that all his natural and acquired talents should be devoted wholly to the honour of his Creator, and to his own spiritual gain.<sup>61</sup>

CHAPTER II.

ST. FRIDOLIN'S ORDINATION, AND HIS APOSTOLIC LABOURS IN IRELAND—HIS RESOLUTION TO BECOME AN EXILE—HIS DEPARTURE FOR FRANCE—ENQUIRY CONCERNING THE PERIOD—HE PROCEEDS TO POITIERS—HIS DISCOVERY OF ST. HILARY'S RELICS—HIS VISIT WITH THE BISHOP TO KING CHLODOVEUS—HIS HONOURABLE RECEPTION—HE RESTORES THE CHURCH AND MONASTERY AT POITIERS—TWO PRIESTS ARRIVE THERE FROM NORTHUMBRIA.

AFTER passing through the gradations of several orders, Fridolin was duly promoted to the priesthood; and, the ministerial functions of his office were executed with zeal, fervour, and success. His talents were of a brilliant nature; and, his character was found so perfectly accordant with his profession, that the regards of all men were fixed upon him. He was gifted with eloquence, and this gift was applied to the most legitimate and desirable of all ends—the gaining of souls to God. By his earnest and pressing exhortations, he bowed down the most obstinate and hardened sinners, to the practices of humility and penitence. He went through nearly all the cities of Ireland; and, through their adjoining districts, to preach the word of God, and to confirm the people, in a love for the Catholic Faith, as a safeguard against pagan superstitious rites, yet in existence. While he doubled that talent, entrusted to his management, by the Divine Master, the means, contributed for his support, were sparingly applied to his own wants, while they were generously spent to forward religious objects. The princes, nobles and people of the land received him as some great and illustrious Pontiff. His humility became alarmed, at length, and he pondered on the words of Christ,

<sup>57</sup> Ecclesiasticus i. 1.

<sup>58</sup> Such casual allusions as these, found in the old Acts of the saints, serve to present a very exalted opinion of the classic taste and acumen of mediæval monastic students, especially in Ireland.

<sup>59</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>60</sup> St. James iv. 4.

<sup>61</sup> See the Bollandists' “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate, &c. Vita, lib. i., cap. i., num. 4, 5, 6, 7, p. 434.

"Every one of you that doth not renounce all that he possesseth, cannot be my disciple."<sup>1</sup> Fearing the applause of men, which spread his fame on every side, and finding himself moved to embrace a life of greater perfection, he adopted the resolution, to divest himself of all he possessed, that he might run more lightly, in the footsteps of his Divine Master. He made a division of his effects among his relations, and especially in favour of the different churches, the poor, and the orphans. But, he conceived himself as yet bound to the earth, by much stronger ties, whilst attached to his relatives, friends, and native country. Those he resolved to break, by quitting the latter, and no amount of persuasion could induce him to change his purpose. Neither the entreaties of the Irish Primate, in his day, united with those of the bishops and clergy, nor the tears of his relations and acquaintances, could prevent him from seeking a foreign shore, although he had then little idea of his future destination. When Fridolin's resolution was unalterably taken, a great number of his relations, friends and the poor ran after him, to the port of debarkation. He addressed these, in the following terms: "O my dearest friends, not alone my relations, but also my fosterers and fellow-countrymen, is it unknown to you, that no pride of worldly life can prevent me from setting out for that exile, which Heaven has indicated? Why should you seek to prevent, what the whole world is unable to resist, if the Lord only wills me to accomplish it?" He then arrived at a certain sea, which spreads out between inferior and superior Scotia.<sup>2</sup> As we have already stated, the exact locality cannot be defined.

This journey to the sea seems to have been long and fatiguing, so that the people present wished Fridolin to rest there, at least for a day. It was anticipated, that some such delay might present the waves in an angry mood, which should detain the vessel about to sail, or that additional prayer might cause him to return. To their request, the holy man graciously assented; but, the next morning, he preached to the multitude, there assembled, his parting exhortation, on the great mysteries of religion, and he bestowed on them his blessing. In sorrow for his loss, after he had gone on board the ship, the people followed its course through the waves, with straining eyes and beating hearts. Mutually giving adieux and good wishes, soon was the vessel only a speck, on the waste of waters, and the companions of Fridolin to the sea turned sadly towards their respective homes.<sup>3</sup>

These occurrences took place, according to Dr. Lanigan, after the middle of the seventh century.<sup>4</sup> Other writers wish to place them, at a still earlier date. Thus, some will have it, that Fridolin was in France during the lifetime of St. Hilary, who lived in the fourth century.<sup>5</sup> It is said, again, that Clovis,<sup>6</sup> the first Christian King of France, swayed, at this time, the destinies of that country,<sup>7</sup> and that thither St. Fridolin directed his course. This

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> St. Luke xiv. 33.

<sup>2</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate, &c. Vita, lib. i., cap. i., num. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, pp. 434, 435.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., num. 11, 12, 13, p. 435.

<sup>4</sup> The latter part of the seventh and the early part of the eighth is Dr. Lanigan's opinion, respecting his period. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., p. 479, and n. 145, pp. 482 to 486.

<sup>5</sup> Such is apparently the supposition of Coccius, and Dempster. Baronius places the death of St. Hilary at A.D. 369, while other writers have A.D. 372.

<sup>6</sup> The Bollandists assert, that his reign began, A.D. 479, and that in 494, he embraced the Christian Religion. Colgan maintains, that he began to reign, about A.D. 484, and that he died about A.D. 514, according to the generality of writers.

<sup>7</sup> Such is the opinion of Colgan, in "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, &c., n. 9, p. 490. Also the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino, Abbate, &c. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., pp. 431, 432.

opinion should bring him to France, in the fifth century.<sup>8</sup> Others, with a greater degree of probability, state, that Clovis II.<sup>9</sup> or III.<sup>10</sup> was, at this time, the reigning monarch. This variation of statement and opinion, regarding the time when Fridolin lived, has tended to introduce confusion of deduction; yet, they should not excite doubts as to Fridolin's existence, for not only has Balther's Life of him every mark of authenticity, but his memory has been inseparably connected with the various monasteries he founded, and which have been most celebrated for centuries in Lorraine, Alsace, Germany and Switzerland.<sup>11</sup> The Bollandists<sup>12</sup> and Calmet<sup>13</sup> will not allow, that Fridolin arrived in France, until about the commencement of the sixth century,<sup>14</sup> and while Clovis I. was yet reigning. Mabillon states, that the Acts of our saint are referable to the reigns of later kings, and he introduces them, under the date of 590.<sup>15</sup> Now, it is to be observed, that Balther does not indicate what King Clovis or Clodoveus had been the contemporary of our saint; but, we learn from his biography, that Christianity had been well established in Ireland, at the time of this arrival in France.<sup>16</sup> Nor, does it seem much more likely, that Clovis II. then ruled;<sup>17</sup> for, Neustria and Burgundy were only subject to him,<sup>18</sup> whereas, Balther represents his Clovis as reigning far and wide. Now, Clovis III. flourished, during the latter end of the seventh century; and, although he did not directly exercise much jurisdiction, yet, under the protectorate of Pepin de Heristal,<sup>19</sup> his empire was very extensive, and he enjoyed the title of king. He died, A.D. 695, and, it is thought most probable,<sup>20</sup> that he was the recognised monarch of France, when Fridolin sailed from Ireland, and reached that country, to begin his missionary labours. Again, Claudius Robert and the Sammarthann have deferred his arrival in France to the beginning of the eighth century.<sup>21</sup> This, however, must be rejected, as altogether too late a period.

When our saint landed in France, he received kind welcome from a man of good family, who dwelt near the port of his arrival, and with him the holy missionary remained for a few days, as well to recruit his strength after the fatigues of his travel, as to learn the condition of things in the new country.

<sup>8</sup> Among the writers who hold it are Coccius, Canisius, Bruschius, Guillemann, Possevin, Bale, Gesner, Ware, Hanmer, Cratopolius, and Colgan. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Appendix ad Acta S. Fridolini, cap. i., pp. 491, 492.

<sup>9</sup> His nominal reign lasted about eighteen years, and he succeeded on the death of his father Dagobert I., when he was a mere infant. The maires of his household were Æga and Erchinoald. Clovis II. only lived to the age of twenty-one. See an account of him in L. P. Anquetil's "Histoire de France," Première Race dite des Mérovingiens, sect. v., p. 53.

<sup>10</sup> He was the son of King Thierry III., and succeeded on his death, when only ten or eleven years old. He only lived to be fifteen, and Pepin le Gros, or as sometimes called de Héristal, governed the Kingdom of Neustria in his name. See ibid., sect. vi., p. 54.

<sup>11</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., n. 145, pp. 486, 487.

<sup>12</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino, Abbate, &c. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ii., p. 431.

VOL. III.—No. 3.

<sup>13</sup> See "Histoire de Lorraine," lib. vii., sect. 18.

<sup>14</sup> This is inferred from the fact, that in 494, the city of Poitiers and all Aquitain were under the power of Alaric, King of the Goths. Over these, Clovis I. obtained a great victory A.D. 507, at Vouillé, when Aquitain was taken from them, so that, during this year or the two years succeeding, it is thought likely, the arrival of St. Fridolin may agree with the facts of history.

<sup>15</sup> See "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus i., lib. viii., sect. xxvii., p. 221.

<sup>16</sup> Were it otherwise, there should have been an ample field for his labours at home. Nor does it appear, that Irish missionary expeditions to the Continent were known, at the commencement of the sixth century. Should we refer our saint's period, to the time of Clovis I., Fridolin must, probably, have been one of St. Patrick's converts; yet, no where do we find him classed among these disciples.

<sup>17</sup> His reign lasted from A.D. 638 to 656.

<sup>18</sup> He had no power in Austrasia, the scene of Fridolin's later proceedings.

<sup>19</sup> He was also remarkable, for being a great encourager of missionaries.

He was informed, that some of its inhabitants were worshippers of the true God, while others were still addicted to pagan rites and worship.<sup>22</sup> This urged our saint to begin the work of preaching, and he expounded the Catholic Faith, in the Most Holy Trinity, to the people of all those cities and places, through which he passed. Fridolin seemed to multiply himself, to meet the various demands on his time and labours, and he ran from town to town, from province to province, without allowing himself a moment's relaxation. Among other places, he visited the city of Poitiers, where its great Patron, St. Hilary, was held in such universal veneration.<sup>23</sup> He entered first as a guest, and he remained in that part of the monastic precincts, which was denominated the castrum, or fort,<sup>24</sup> probably, because it had been built to guard against the attacks of hostile marauders. How long he continued in the position of a subject, we are unable to determine. It is not correct to state, as has been done, that Fridolin built the monastery of St. Hilary, at Poitiers.<sup>25</sup> It is certain, that this foundation not only preceded the time of St. Fridolin's arrival in that city, but even it appears to have been in a flourishing state, when he sought hospitality from its inmates. Our saint spent some time here as monk, subject to ecclesiastical obedience. He was afterwards called to the government of the Monastery of St. Hilary. In either capacity, he became distinguished for his prudence, moderation, and exact observance of religious discipline.

Fridolin's devotion to St. Hilary was very great, and he felt an eager desire to procure the relics of the holy bishop. The love of his fellow-creatures was such, as to induce him to undergo all labours and privations to gain souls to Christ. But, he was not neglectful of the means, which most powerfully contributed to his success as a missionary, since he chastised his body, according to the advice of St. Paul, with macerations and austerities, lest whilst he preached to others himself might become a reprobate. He spent much time in prayer and watching, while especially were his devout wishes offered, to be enabled to find the object of his most earnest desires. The relics of St. Hilary, the founder of this monastery at Poitiers, had long lain undiscovered, beneath the ruins of his church;<sup>26</sup> but, they were miraculously revealed to St. Fridolin, and one night, the holy bishop himself appeared, and said to him: "Brother, thy prayer is heard, and, so far as power is granted me, I do not cease, through the suffrages of the ever Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and through the intervention of all the saints, to help your prayer to the Divine Majesty; for know, that God himself hath selected thee, to renew in this place honours reserved for me, and a great reward thou shalt have, in placing immediately my relics, in a more distinguished part of the church." On hearing such words, Fridolin awoke, his mind filled with great consolation; and, arising from his humble pallet of straw, he entered the church, giving humble thanks to God and to St. Hilary, for this result of

<sup>20</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>21</sup> See "Gallia Christiana," p. 628.

<sup>22</sup> This indicates rather an early date for his mission in France.

<sup>23</sup> It would seem, that St. Hilary's monastery had been, at first, in the suburbs; but, in the time of St. Peter Damian, it was known as the greater basilica of St. Hilary, within the city. There was another church, known there as St. Hilary's cell, where it is thought he lived and died.

<sup>24</sup> It seems to have corresponded with the early castral or mur of our ancient Irish monasteries.

<sup>25</sup> See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. i. Proloquium, p. 28.

<sup>26</sup> This was probably owing to the fact, that about the year 409, the Vandals, Alani and Suevi passed through Aquitain, on their passage to Spain. Afterwards, Poitiers was under Gothic sway, so that it is probable, the Christians were unable to pay suitable honours, at the tomb of the founder, while they had even forgotten the exact spot where his body had been buried.

<sup>27</sup> In the year 508 or 509, Adelsius, "Episcopus ex civitate Pictavis," subscribed to the decrees of the Council of Orleans.

his long-practised devotions. Then, he began to fast in a manner, incredibly austere, until all his religious brothers noticed that he was reduced to an extreme degree of leanness. He was asked his reasons for such excessive rigour, and at length he was obliged to state what had occurred, and how in gratitude to the Almighty for so great a favour, he had thus redoubled his austerities. Fridolin declared, moreover, the necessity for carrying out certain restorations in the church, and this was agreed to by his fellow-religious, in the manner he should best approve. He signified, that without consulting the bishop, and without his concurrence, and without obtaining aid from King Clodovæus, nothing could be undertaken, in reference to the translation of St. Hilary's relics, or in the matter of restoring his church. Now, owing to the love entertained for him, the Bishop of Poitiers,<sup>27</sup> and his subjects, were accustomed to visit St. Hilary's monastery very frequently, because there his eloquence was the theme of universal approbation. Taking with him some familiar friends, Fridolin held an interview with the bishop and his clergy. A council was convened,<sup>28</sup> and learning where St. Hilary's relics reposed, it was agreed, that all should proceed to the spot. On this occasion, Fridolin appears to have been chosen as abbot over the monastery. Then, too, a solemn engagement was entered upon, to have the church restored, and the relics of St. Hilary honourably placed therein, while in a fervent spirit of self-sacrifice, the bishop, clergy and laity resolved, that no expense should be spared, in carrying out a most laudable ambition of the holy abbot.

Thus, being obliged to lay aside the pilgrim's staff, and to assume most reluctantly the abbatial crozier, Fridolin was counselled to appear, with the bishop in company, before King Clodovæus. According to the usual custom of those times, the bishop rode on horseback, while the abbot travelled on foot. The king was greatly rejoiced to hear of their approach, and leaving the throne, with a number of his courtiers accompanying, he went forward to welcome the bishop and the abbot, for he had heard much concerning the holiness of Fridolin. A great banquet was prepared for their arrival in the palace, and at it several nobles sat down to table. Among the guests were many pagans, and one of the most celebrated of Fridolin's miracles now took place, when filling with wine a stone vessel, the colour of glass, and adorned with gold and precious stones in a wonderful manner,<sup>29</sup> Clodovæus presented it to our saint; but, it fell over a grade of the table, and it was then broken into four pieces. One of the attendants gathered them together, and presented them to the king, who, in playful allusion to Fridolin's power of working miracles, asked him to do so in the present instance, and to magnify God's name before the pagans. Taking the fragments together, and bending in humble prayer over them, the vessel was presented whole to the monarch, nor could any person observe a single flaw throughout, so that all present expressed the greatest amazement. The king and those who were at table immediately arose, and poured forth prayers most fervently, for this manifestation of God's power. In consequence of such a miracle, Fridolin con-

The Bollandists think he was the contemporary of our saint. The people of Basle, however, claim Adelsius, and suppose he should be called "Episcopus Rauracorum." In his chronological list of Councils, Sir Harris Nicolas has that of Orleans, on Discipline, assembled July 10th, A.D. 511. See "Chronology of History," p. 219.

<sup>28</sup> We cannot discover any probable record of this council. Yet, there was one at Poitiers, A.D. 590. See ibid., p. 222.

<sup>29</sup> This description naturally reminds us of the celebrated Ardagh Cup—probably a banqueting one of the old Irish chiefs—and now carefully preserved in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin. The latter, however, is of more costly materials, and we presume of a greatly superior style and ornamentation, as compared with the French cup here mentioned.

verted many French nobles, in the presence of King Clodovæus,<sup>30</sup> while the bishop baptized them at the font. Greatly rejoiced, the king retired to his chamber the first night after the bishop and abbot had arrived, while they were honourably lodged in the guest-house; and, early on the day following, he arose to assist at the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, offered by the pious visitors. Afterwards, Fridolin asked permission to have an audience, the bishop being present, and the king graciously assented; when, hearing the whole wonderful account of Fridolin's vision, and about the discovery of St. Hilary's remains, Clodovæus not only highly approved of an intention to restore the monastery, and to depose the relics there, but he even promised to contribute a large amount of gold and silver, to aid in that pious object.

Then taking leave of the king, Fridolin and the bishop returned to Poitiers. There, the church and monastery, with the assistance of King Clovis, were both rebuilt by our saint, as they had already fallen in a great measure to decay. His next object was to have a shrine prepared for the reception of St. Hilary's relics. The bishop and people of the city rendered every possible assistance, to have all that was necessary provided, so that the occasion should be one of great ceremony and solemnity. Part of the illustrious founder's remains was placed in a suitable manner, within the precincts of the restored edifice: another portion being reserved by our saint, for ulterior purposes. This honourable deposition was executed, with befitting rites and magnificence; while, it is stated, with great respect and veneration on the 13th day of January,<sup>31</sup> that of his commemoration, the body of St. Hilary was enshrined in the city of Poitiers.

Whilst in this place, St. Fridolin was visited by two very near relations,<sup>32</sup> who were priests, and who came from Northumberland. They had long desired his companionship, and they wished to labour with him on the mission. Our saint acknowledged the relationship, and received his kinsmen with great honour and affection. They were likewise overjoyed to have found him, and they took up their abode under the same roof.<sup>33</sup>

CHAPTER III.

A VISION OF ST. HILARY WARNS ST. FRIDOLIN TO LEAVE FOR SECKINGEN—THE HOLY PILGRIM BUILDS SEVERAL CHURCHES AND MONASTERIES, IN HONOUR OF ST. HILARY, THROUGHOUT THE TERRITORIES OF MEIZ, ALSACE, LORRAINE, BURGOGNE, AND AUSTRASIE—HE DEPARTS FOR RHÆTIA, AND ARRIVES AT THE SITE OF SECKINGEN—OPPOSITION OF THE PEOPLE THERE—HE OBTAINS A CHARTER FOR FOUNDATION FROM THE KING—A NUNNERY IS FOUNDED AT SECKINGEN, AND GREAT MIRACLES ARE WROUGHT BY THE SAINT.

AN apparition of St. Hilary to the holy abbot warned him to proceed towards Germany. For after he had entertained his nephews from Northumbria, and having retired to bed, first signing himself with the cross, St. Hilary thus addressed him: "Brother Fridolin, why delay you the accomplishment

<sup>30</sup> See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. i., Prologue, p. 28.

<sup>31</sup> Yet, other accounts have it, that the Translation took place on the 26th of June, and according to Bouchet, in his Annals, many miracles were wrought on this occasion.

<sup>32</sup> Colgan remarks, Petrus Canisius, in his Life of St. Fridolin, chap. xiv., and St. Peter Damian, in his Discourse on the Translation of St. Hilary's Relics, hold the opinion, that both were natives of Ireland. Bruschius, "De Monasteriis Germaniæ," states, that they were his nephews on the father's side; while Bauchet, in his Annals, relates, how twelve or thirteen years before he wrote, their bodies were found as perfect, as if they had been only four days buried, in the church of St. Hilary.

<sup>33</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiber-

of what you promised to God and to me, when you were obliged to separate a certain part of my remains to carry with you. Therefore, do not tarry longer in this place, which your nephews shall take care to have dedicated to the service of the Almighty, after your departure." Then Fridolin asked, whither he should proceed, and he was told to a certain island<sup>1</sup> in the Rhine. Awaking from this dream, word was brought, that the bishop had been stricken with paralysis; and, with his nephews, our holy abbot, at once, went to render spiritual and temporal comfort. Almost at the point of death, the prelate lay prostrate, but Fridolin bent down in prayer. He arose in tears, and in great perturbation of spirits, but he found, that the patient was entirely restored. All those, who were present, devoutly gave thanks to God. Then, Fridolin told the bishop, to his great regret, what admonition he had received from St. Hilary. Not the prelate alone, but all his clergy and people, bewailed the inevitable loss their district must suffer, owing to the holy abbot's enforced absence; yet, the will of God should be accomplished, and surrounded by the sorrowing citizens of Poitiers, Fridolin, taking with him the relics of St. Hilary, bade them adieu. He set out immediately to visit King Chlodovæus, according to the Life, and he related the particulars of his vision. From that monarch, he obtained permission to occupy the island indicated, but as yet unseen by him, and to accomplish there whatever the Providence of God decreed.

With joy, St. Fridolin parted from the king, who had so graciously assented to his request, and his steps were first directed towards the Moselle. Before leaving France, however, he founded several churches, especially in the provinces of Bourgogne and Alsace. On the banks of that river already named, he began to build the monastery of Helera;<sup>2</sup> and, perhaps, at a different place, called Hilariacum,<sup>3</sup> he erected another church. This, or these, he dedicated to St. Hilary, but he only remained, until his work was completed. From the Moselle, he departed, as we are told by Balther, and his course lay through a gorge of the Vosges mountains.<sup>4</sup> There he selected the site for a church he built—perhaps not different from Hilariacum<sup>5</sup>—and he dedicated it to St. Hilary. Thence, he passed on to the city, called nize," Martii vi. Vita S. Fridolini, lib. i., cap. iv. to xvi., and nn. 10, 11, pp. 482 to 490. Also, the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii vi. Vita S. Fridolini, lib. i., cap. ii., num. 14 to 23, pp. 435 to 437.

CHAPTER III.—<sup>1</sup> St. Peter Damian qualifies it, by the epithet "Gallinariam," but the Bollandists think this should be "Secaniam."

<sup>2</sup> Helera was a distinct place from Hilariacum, according to Mabillon. While the former was on the banks of the Moselle, the latter was situated not far from the Saar, a considerable distance from the former river. Helera had been long extinct, but Hilariacum was extant, in the time of Mabillon, and then called Nova-cella, or the Benedictine Monastery of St. Nabor or St. Avol. See "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," toms i., lib. viii., sect. xxvii., p. 221. Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, that the name of Hilariacum indicates it had been dedicated originally, not to St. Paul, but to St. Hilary, and he thinks it to have been one of St. Fridolin's foundations, and that being in the eastern and mountainous part of Lorraine, it answers Balther's description of a church he erected, after leaving the banks of the Moselle. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. xiv., n. 130, pp. 481, 482.

<sup>3</sup> According to the Sanmarthann, Sigebold; Bishop of Metz, gave this place to St. Fridolin, and dedicated it A.D. 714. But, according to another account, Hilariacum was built from its foundations, by Meurissius, Bishop of Metz, dedicated to St. Paul, and endowed A.D. 734. This latter statement was to be found, in an old MS. of that monastery. Wherefore, the Bollandists, remarking on the lateness of these dates, state, that either Helera was a different place from Hilariacum, or that the first house, built there by St. Fridolin, having been destroyed, it must have been rebuilt by Sigebold, or Sigebald, Bishop of Metz.

<sup>4</sup> So early as the fifth century, Christianity was planted, by some religious men, among those mountains. According to Dempster's "Menologium Scoticum," Fridolin founded eight monasteries.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., p. 92.

Argentina<sup>6</sup> by the Latins, and now known as Strasburg, situated on the River Rhine. Here again, our saint erected another church, in honour of his patron, St. Hilary.

The same course of labour was undertaken by him, in the territories of Metz and Austrasia, through which countries he travelled for some time. He left Argentoratum, however, and he appears to have visited several monasteries, on his way through the Kingdom of Burgundy, until at last he came to the Bishop<sup>7</sup> of Curia,<sup>8</sup> in the territory of Rhætia. Here the holy pilgrim remained, for some time, and here, once more, he built a church, dedicated to St. Hilary.<sup>9</sup> Yet, impelled by the Divine admonition to seek his ultimate point of destination, he enquired from those, who knew the neighbouring territories, if they could direct him to any island, in the Rhine, as yet uncultivated and uninhabited. They spoke of one, the eligibility of which they knew not, and they indicated where and how it might be reached. Fridolin set out on his travels, and, after incredible fatigue, he arrived at the spot. He felt rejoiced to behold this scene of his future labours; but, it seems, the people of that country mistrusted his motives, for coming among them. Being noticed as a stranger, wandering about, and making observations on the site, he was upbraided by the neighbouring inhabitants, that he had taken up his quarters, in the island, as a robber, intending to seize on their cattle. They offered so violent and persistent an opposition, that Fridolin barely escaped from a violent death; and, he was obliged to return, so that he might obtain the king's charter for possession of lands, claimed as a royalty, from time immemorial. This the king granted to him, and to his monks, for ever, and signed the document with his own hand. Nor was this all, for royal messengers or guards were sent back with Fridolin. These signified the king's grant, and also his decree, that if any intruder should further interfere with the holy pilgrim's labours or title to the place, death without reprieve should be the punishment for such an offence.<sup>10</sup>

In fine, he obtained a grant of the island and territory at Seckingen.<sup>11</sup> This island lay in the Rhine, and at its entrance into Suabia. But, whether the grant was made to him by Thierry I., King of Austrasia,<sup>12</sup> or by Sigismond, King of Bourgogne,<sup>13</sup> is disputed among those, who adhere to, or dissent from, the opinion of our saint's early arrival in France.<sup>14</sup> Here, according to Dr. Lanigan, he built a church and a stately monastery, under the patronage of <sup>6</sup> Argentoratum is the name it receives, from the more ancient writers.

<sup>7</sup> In Bruschiu's "Catalogus Episcoporum Curienſium," he is called Puriciuſ, or Pruriciuſ.

<sup>8</sup> Now Coire, in the Grisons of Switzerland. See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., p. 92.

<sup>9</sup> This, we are told, by Bruschiuſ, was afterwards dedicated to St. Martin. Specheruſ asserts, that the vestiges of this church and its adjoining cell were to be seen there in his time. See "Chronicum Rhætiae," p. 223.

<sup>10</sup> The writer Balthar affirms, that for the foregoing account, so far, he had depended on the Helera MS. as an authority, and then closes his First Book. The old MS. was illegible towards the end, and his Second Book is made up, mainly of what he learned on good authority, in the monastery of Seckingen. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," vi. Martii. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, &c. Vita, &c., lib. i., cap. xvii. to xxiii., pp. 485, 486. Also, the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckingae in Germania. Vita, &c., lib. i., cap. iii., num. 24 to 31, and nn. (a, b, c, d, e, f, g.), pp. 437, 438.

<sup>11</sup> Bishop Challoner states, that Seckingen lay on the borders of Switzerland. See "Britannia Sancta," part I., p. 159.

<sup>12</sup> Metz was the capital of his kingdom, which included a part of the present German Empire, beyond the Rhine, as also a portion of that country, between the rivers Rhine and Meuse.

<sup>13</sup> The ancient kingdom of Burgundy comprised what was afterwards known as the Duchy of Burgundy, Franche-Comté, Provence, Dauphiné, Lyonnais, Switzerland and Savoy. In his "Menologium Scotticum" Dempster makes our saint the Apostle of nations lying on the Meuse, and of the Rhaeti.

Pepin of Heristal, Mayor of the French palace. They were dedicated to St. Hilary.<sup>15</sup> In after times, this celebrated religious establishment had a history of great interest to recommend its perusal, and the fortunes of Secking or Seckingen<sup>16</sup> were mingled with singular vicissitudes. The place itself is situated a few miles, eastward from the famous city of Basle. Seckingen lies between Switzerland<sup>17</sup> and the duchy of Baden, but within the bounds of this latter province. The Canton of Glarus was formerly subject to the Abbess of Seckingen, under whom and a mayor,<sup>18</sup> the people enjoyed very considerable privileges, and a democratic form of government. Towards the latter end of the thirteenth century, the Emperor Rodolph I. obtained there an exclusive administration. The mayoralty had gradually become hereditary, and it was purchased by his son Albert, who reunited in his own person the whole civil and judicial authority. The Dukes of Austria oppressed the people, who, after several struggles, at last obtained their freedom, in 1388.<sup>19</sup>

When St. Fridolin got secure possession of the island, it happened, that the relics of St. Hilary, which were carried in a shrine and usually borne on his shoulders, happened to be left hanging on the branch of a certain tree, while he slept near them, for his long journey had caused him great fatigue. What must not have been his surprise, on awaking, and on commencing his prayers, to find that the large tree<sup>20</sup> had bent down like a slender twig towards him, and to the earth, while inclined from its topmost to its lowest branches, as if to do him reverence ! This the holy pilgrim judged to portend his being obliged to remain in that place, and he removed, with great joy, the shrine from its resting place, in order to set it up in a more suitable position. It occasionally happened, while our saint was on his missionary tours, he and his religious were obliged to apply for a night's lodging and for hospitality, from the country people. Once he entered the house of a respectable man, called Wachter. But, the wife of this man met the saint, and, in a vehement manner, she thus addressed him : " Brother, I wonder why you pass others in this village, and come to our house, as you see, with the exception of one room, in which my husband and myself are obliged to lodge, all the remaining part has been destroyed by fire, and moreover, do not you and your travelling companions know, that famine has greatly pressed on our means this year ? " Yet, the husband palliated the violent language of his wife, and toned down her anger ; since, he had heard of Fridolin's reputation for sanctity, so he contrived to make the best provision possible for the visitor's entertainment and rest. That very night, his wife gave birth to a daughter ; and, notwithstanding a reluctance still expressed by the mother, Wachter desired St. Fridolin to baptize it. With this request he complied. Not only did the father afterwards bestow property on the holy abbot, for religious purposes, but he even sent this daughter to receive instruction, and to take the veil, at Seckingen, where she subsequently served God, in the religious state. This daughter is said to have been the first nun professed there ; while her parents and friends bestowed many charitable gifts on St. Fridolin.

St. Fridolin is supposed to have established a house for female religious, at Seckingen, having obtained some lands for its endowment, from Urso,<sup>21</sup> a

<sup>14</sup> See an account of these kings and their period, in L. P. Anquetil's "Histoire de France." Première Race dite des Mérovingiens, sect. ii., iii., pp. 45, 46.

<sup>15</sup> See Godeau's "Eloges des Eveques Français," Siecle iv., pp. 10, 22.

<sup>16</sup> An account of this religious establishment will be found in L'Abbé Migne's "Dictionnaire des Abbayes et Monasteres," &c., col. 714.

<sup>17</sup> The main channel of the Rhine flows on the Swiss side.

<sup>18</sup> He was appointed by the abbess, but chosen from among the inhabitants.

<sup>19</sup> See Cox's "Travels in Switzerland, and in the Country of the Grisons," vol. i., Letter vi., pp. 41 to 44.

<sup>20</sup> Balther adds, that many, living in his time, had often seen the tree in question.

wealthy Swiss noble of Glarus. His brother Landolph seems to have had an interest, also, in these lands, but which he ceded, in our saint's favour. A community of Canonesses reside in the same place, to the present day.<sup>22</sup> According to a custom, then prevalent, the aforesaid grant was confirmed, by an instrument in writing. Soon afterwards, however, Urso died, and then his brother, Landolph, unjustly seized upon all the conventual possessions. This action was brought before the judges, by St. Fridolin, and these required the fullest evidence of his rights. The Landgrave, Baldeberch,<sup>23</sup> appointed a certain day for Landolph and Fridolin to meet, at the tomb of Urso, in Clarona or Glaritz. The saint raised its occupant to life, calling upon him, in the name of Christ to arise. Taking him by the hand, Fridolin brought the dead man to the Villa of Ranckwail, where the Landgrave presided in court, with a great number of attendants. Landolph was present, to hear these words spoken by Urso: "Brother, why have you injured your conscience, by taking what belonged to me?" Landolph in amazement cried out: "My dear brother, not only do I restore your part of these possessions, but I shall even add what belongs to myself, as a gift to Seckingen." Then Fridolin, according to the mediæval legend, led Urso back to the tomb.<sup>24</sup> Another very incredible story is related, about the saint having released a certain man from his position, in a bath; and, for this service, the person thus delivered gave a part of his inheritance, for support of the monastery at Seckingen.<sup>25</sup>

CHAPTER IV.

ST. FRIDOLIN MAKES IMPROVEMENTS, AT SECKINGEN—HIS RIGHT TO THE ISLAND MIRACULOUSLY CONFIRMED—HIS PIOUS WORKS AND MISSION—HE IS SAID TO HAVE COMPOSED A BOOK OF EXHORTATIONS TO SACRED VIRGINS, AND OTHER WRITINGS—HIS DEATH—MIRACULOUS OCCURRENCES AFTER HIS DEPARTURE—MEMORIALS AND VENERATION FOR THIS SAINT—CONCLUSION.

At first, Seckingen was covered with a thick growth of trees and brushwood. This was cleared away by St. Fridolin, in order to build his monastery, and to bring the lands under cultivation. But, when King Chlodoveus departed this life, those, who had opposed the saint on a former occasion, still persisted in their hostility. They affirmed, that the island belonged to them, by hereditary right. It was resolved, however, by mutual concession, obtained through some prudent friends of the contending parties, that the contestants should assemble at a place, agreed upon, and where, at a time subsequent, the great current of the Rhine flowed. Then, the case was different, for

<sup>22</sup> Urso is said to have been one of St. Fridolin's converts, by Canisius, in his Life, chapter xxiv.

<sup>23</sup> See L'Abbé Migne's "Dictionnaire des Abbayes et Monastères," &c., col. 714.

<sup>24</sup> By some, his name is written Baldebrecht.

<sup>25</sup> Balthar tells us, that in memory of the foregoing miracle, the following Latin verses were written there:—

"Prædia pro Domino dant Fratres hæc Fridolino:

Tempore post multo, negat alter fratre sepulto,

Suscitat hunc dignus testem, ducitque benignus:

Tu ba timore tremis, Sanctus sua jura redemit."

<sup>25</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," vi. Martii. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, &c., lib. ii., cap. i., ii., iii., vi., pp. 486, 487. Also the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckingæ in Germania. Vita, &c., lib. ii., cap. i., num. 1, 2, 3, 8, pp. 438 to 439, with notes.

CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S.

Alpine snows, melting in summer time, ran from the mountain hollows, through another channel. Fridolin prayed earnestly, both by day and night, that the power and justice of God might be made manifest, in the decision to be arrived at; so that, when the moment came, he entered the island alone, and at a particular spot, he prayed in presence of a multitude, "May the Almighty himself, who has created all good things in Heaven and on earth, turn this water against his enemies, so that henceforth, they may not, so persistently as heretofore, pass over to destroy this place." During the whole of that night, he remained in prayer. On the day following, the course, which could be passed over dry-shod, became the great bed of the Rhine; and, the saint's enemies departed, not alone in admiration and prayer, but asking Fridolin to offer his petitions, so that they might not incur Divine displeasure.

The fame of our saint's learning and eloquence thus went abroad; and, the fruits of his ministry fell ripe, before his sickle. Without further molestation, he was allowed to build his church, in honour of St. Hilary, and there, too, various miracles took place, both during his lifetime, and after his death. In the good government of his religious brethren, and in a sort of religious retreat, he passed the remaining years of his life. We may infer, from his Acts, that the saint here established a sort of Lyceum for boys of tender years, and Fridolin's gentleness of manner gained on the confidence and affection of these youths; for, he encouraged their sports, and even lent himself, as it were, to promote their innocent hilarity. It is indicated, also, that he had a community of Canonesses, under his charge, at Seckingen, and probably these had female pupils in training.<sup>1</sup> His affability and patience were among the most remarkable traits of his noble character. St. Fridolin is surnamed Viator,<sup>2</sup> on account of his many travels, to spread amongst the people of different nations a knowledge and an observance of the Gospel of Christ. Especially are we told, that he brought over the people of Glarus, to the Christian religion.<sup>3</sup>

When we know, how in early youth, he had such a passion for learning and literature, it should not be surprising, that in more mature years, he undertook the task of composing several useful works. He is said to have written, a Book of Exhortations to Sacred Virgins, probably intended for the guidance of the female community he had established at Seckingen. Another Book, intitled, "Præcepta ad Monachos," another "Ad Augustanos," and again, one denominated, "Acta D. Hilarii," are ascribed to him, by Dempster.<sup>4</sup> Notwithstanding, such assertions, we ought desire, somewhat better authority than his statement, that Fridolin wrote the foregoing works.

After a serious and pious preparation for the closing struggle, his happy soul went to heaven, the day before the Nones of March.<sup>5</sup> On the division of the kingdom of Bourgoigne, between the Kings Clotaire and Chilbert, Seckingen was included in the principality of the Upper Rhine. It fell under the dominion of their nephew, Theodobert, King of Austrasia. During the reign of this latter prince, the translation of St. Fridolin to bliss, is said, by many writers, to have taken place; according to the most probable Fridolini Abbatis, lib. ii., cap. iv., v., vi., pp. 486, 487. Also, the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckingæ in Germania. Vita, &c., lib. ii., num. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, pp. 439, 440.

<sup>2</sup> While offering this statement, Dempster, who seeks to make him the son of a king of Scotland, adds, "nisi fallor, Dongardi XLII. filius, vel Courani XLV. regis."— "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomos i., lib. vi., num. 515, p. 280.

<sup>3</sup> See Cratopolius, "In Episcopis Germanie," p. lxi.

<sup>4</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomos i., lib. vi., num. 515, p. 281.

<sup>5</sup> So state, the old Acts, by Balthar.

<sup>6</sup> He quotes Arnold Wion's "Lignum

accounts, however, his death must be assigned to a much later period. Dempster has it, that our saint lived, in the year 495, or in 560.<sup>6</sup> Father Stephen White says, that he died A.D. 514.<sup>7</sup> Another statement places his demise, at A.D. 538.<sup>8</sup> It seems more probable, however, that his death fell within the seventh century.<sup>9</sup>

After death, the body was consigned to its tomb, within the enclosure of his church, at Seckingen; and, the remains have been piously kept there, as the richest treasure of the place. But, they were not destined to remain undisturbed; for, frequent irruptions of the Pagans caused the monks and nuns, to fly for their lives, to other places of refuge. On a certain occasion of this kind, the sarcophagus and body of the holy abbot were left behind. A devoted lover of Fridolin, named Wenilo, declared, that he could not bear to live any longer, if the sacred remains were burned by the Pagans. Full of this agonizing thought, and yet inspired by Faith, he entered the church, and kissing the tomb, he lay prostrate over it, for a time, and then cried out: "O my master, Fridolin, I beseech thee, through the Almighty power, that either you would have me killed, at once, by the Pagans, or grant that I may be able to bear your body hence." Saying these words, he laid his hand on the covering stone, and raised it, an effort of strength, ordinarily speaking, which six men could only effect. Then the mausoleum being exposed, the coffin was raised, and Wenilo bore it, without any difficulty, to the fugitives, while it was thought, the saint himself directed this miraculous action. The clergy and the nuns greatly rejoiced, at such an occurrence; but, when certain clerics, noble laics and others tried to move the coffin for protection to a fortified castle, its weight was found to be an insuperable obstacle. Yet, when a few of Fridolin's own monks and nuns approached, they carried his precious remains very easily.<sup>10</sup> It is related by Balther, that occurrences, similar to what have been just related, took place, when the barbarians made inroads, on the territory around Seckingen.

After the death of St. Fridolin, various miracles are recorded. A man, who was a paralytic from his infancy, continued to live for many years, yet hardly able to move his limbs, to speak, or to walk. Prostrated by excessive weakness, the feast of St. Fridolin was near, and his parents brought the poor creature to the church, whither so many of the faithful flocked. During the time of Mass, the cripple lay prostrate, over the tomb of the saint; then, owing to the power of God, and to the merits of Fridolin, he arose unexpectedly and perfectly restored to health, and to the enjoyment of his long-deprived faculties. The clergy and people present gave thanks to the Almighty, while the fame of this miracle was spread far and near. An abbess of noble or regal birth happened to be with her father,<sup>11</sup> in a certain royal mansion. It took fire, and great was the danger of flames extending to the adjoining church. The people and servants there made every effort to save the latter building; for, the superioress ran and threw herself over the tomb of St. Fridolin, while declaring her purpose not to leave it, until she should be consumed to ashes. The flames advanced to the building where she was, and when all hopes of extinguishing them had vanished, the people Vite," lib. iii., p. lxi., after making this statement. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. vi., num. 515, p. 281.

<sup>7</sup> See "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. iv., p. 44. Coccius, also, has this date.

<sup>8</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 66.

<sup>9</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical

History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. viii., sect. xvi., p. 428, and n. 214, p. 430. Ibid.

<sup>10</sup> Stumphijs relates, that the Hungarians invaded Seckingen, A.D. 938, when they were repulsed, by a certain countryman, named Hermigerus. Perhaps, the foregoing account may be referred to this period.

<sup>11</sup> The Bollandists think, that some Re-ran away to save their lives ; when lo ! an apparition of St. Fridolin, clothed in priestly robes, was seen, and suddenly, from roof to foundation, the fire went out, and even every trace of smoke vanished. In numberless instances, the blind, the deaf, the mute, the lame, and those oppressed with other diseases, obtained relief, in a wonderful manner, owing to the merits of this renowned abbot.<sup>12</sup>

It is related, in the German Life of St. Fridolin, by Henric Murer, that Jacobus Wyssius, a respectable citizen of Bremgarten, in Argovia, had a son, by his wife Margaret Seggina, and, for a time, this son could neither walk or stand. His parents spared no cost to effect a cure. At last, taking counsel with some pious persons, they brought this youth, tied on a horse, to the tomb of St. Fridolin, at Seckingen, where their prayers were offered. There, to their great joy, the son was enabled to walk, while he was restored to health, through the mercy of God, and the intercession of St. Fridolin. Another miracle, like this, occurred in 1572, when the son of a certain Saloma Hofmann,<sup>13</sup> hostess or an innkeeper of Baden, had attained his tenth year. He was afflicted with a grievous illness for twenty successive weeks ; and, for two months, he could only move from place to place, when lifted by others. No human remedy seemed to avail him, and his complaint even became more aggravated. At last, by advice of friends, it was resolved, he should be brought to the tomb of St. Fridolin, at Seckingen ; when, during the night, he removed to its church, and a priest there, at the mother's request, putting on the sacred vestments,<sup>14</sup> with which St. Fridolin was accustomed to celebrate Mass, touched the boy with the saint's abbatial staff. Having prayed to the holy patron, and offered Mass, the child arose, and asked permission to walk alone to the hospice. This he did, to the great admiration of all beholding such a miraculous incident.

The remains of St. Fridolin were exposed to the veneration of the faithful, in the year 1637, when his bones and ashes were found enshrouded, in the most costly stuffs.<sup>15</sup> The Abbesses and Canonesses of Seckingen had their establishment richly endowed, owing to the munificence of nobles and people ; while, they enjoyed special secular privileges and honours, as a mark of respect for their holy founder.<sup>16</sup>

In conjunction with St. Hilary, he is honoured as patron of Seckingen, his office being found in the breviaries of many churches, and his name occurring in the Martyrologies, on the 6th of March, the day of his festival. Among these may be mentioned, the Breviaries of Constance, of Basel, of Poitiers ; also, the Martyrologies and Calendars of Herman Greuen, of Molanus, of Canisius, of Felicius, of Ferrarius, of Galesinius, of the Treves Manuscript of St. Martin, of the English Martyrology ; while, in nearly all the collections of Saints' Acts, his feast is thus noted.<sup>17</sup> The Benedictine writers, Wion, Dorgan, Menard and Bucelin claim him, as one of their order.<sup>18</sup> In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, gulus or Dynast, near Seckingen, is here meant.

<sup>12</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, lib. ii., cap. vii., viii., ix., pp. 487, 488. Also the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckingæ, in Germania. Vita, &c., lib. ii., cap. ii., num. 9, 10, 11, pp. 440, 441.

<sup>13</sup> She lived, at the sign of the Angel.

<sup>14</sup> Murer declares, that these relics were preserved, at Seckingen, when he wrote.

<sup>15</sup> See Baillet's "Vies des Saints," tome i., Mars. vi., sect. ii.

<sup>16</sup> See allusions to these matters, in the Life of St. Fridolin, by Canisius, chap. xxvi.

<sup>17</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S. Fridolini Abbatis, &c., n. 21, p. 490. Also "Acta Sanctorum" of the Bollandists, tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Fridolino Abbate Seckingæ in Germania. Commentarius prævius, sect. i., num. 5, p. 431.

<sup>18</sup> This Colgan denies, for he assumes,

the name of Fridolin occurs at this date;<sup>19</sup> although, in most of our home Martyrologies, his name is strangely omitted, as frequently happens, when a saint who was a native of our country had lived and died on the Continent of Europe.

In all the houses of his foundation, his memory is held in veneration; and, to this day, the Canton of Glarus, in Switzerland, retains the image of St. Fridolin, in the provincial escutcheon of its arms, and it honours our saint, as chief patron of the state.<sup>20</sup> Among the coins of Glarus is an inscription and an image of him, represented as a pilgrim with a staff and book; while, a dead man, rising from the grave, is likewise emblematical of him, in art.<sup>21</sup> Devotion to St. Fridolin was extended, after his death, to many parts of France, Switzerland, Germany, England, Scotland, and especially to Ireland, his native country.

The travels of this holy man seem to have had a fascination for pious adventurers, who formerly set out from Ireland as religious pilgrims. The Scoti, who went to Rome, in the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries, generally followed the course of the Rhine, and they visited first St. Fridolin's Convent at Seckingen, then the Island of Richenau;<sup>22</sup> and afterwards Lake Constance. Thence they went to St. Gall, and then to Pfäfers<sup>23</sup> or Pfäfers<sup>24</sup> (Fabaria) Convent, in the valley of the Rhine. Afterwards, they continued their journey to Coire, and passed either the Splügen or the Julier Pass.<sup>25</sup> Many are the fashionable tourists—and some of them deemed to be highly educated and accomplished—from Ireland, at the present day, who pass through the glorious scenes of Switzerland; and yet, how few among them dream even of that share their missionary countrymen had, in an early and exclusive moulding of the minds and habits of those hardy, brave and industrious mountaineers, in a noble civilization, or, in building those numerous monuments, that are yet treasures of Irish art and literature, in the midst of the glaciers, the valleys, and those stupendous mountains, that frown so grandly over broad lakes and rushing rivers. Truly has the real culture of Irish men and Irish women sadly degenerated in our own age!

---

ARTICLE II.—ST. SEZIN, BISHOP AND ABBOT, PATRON OF THE PARISH OF GUIC SEZNI, LEON, IN BRITANNY. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] The birth of this saint was ushered, by a portent, not uncommon, in the hagiographical Celtic relations. It indicated, that like a bright star, St. Sezin should bring a light upon the world, whereby many ought find their way to a heavenly place of rest. From older Acts,<sup>1</sup> Albert le Grande has compiled that St. Fridolin came to France and Germany before the Benedictine Order had been introduced to either of these countries. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Appendix ad Acta S. Fridolini, cap. iv., p. 493.

---

<sup>19</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernix Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

<sup>20</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., p. 93.

<sup>21</sup> See Very Rev. F. C. Husenbeth's "Emblems of Saints," p. 68.

<sup>22</sup> Now called Rheineau, below the falls of Schaffhausen.

<sup>23</sup> An interesting account of the Benedictine Monastery, and of the warm baths of Tamina, at this place, will be found in Cox's "Travels in Switzerland and in the Country of the Grisons," vol. iii., Letter lxxxiv., pp. 211 to 214.

<sup>24</sup> St. Pirminius is said to have founded the Convent of Pfäfers, in 713.

<sup>25</sup> The foregoing old Irish route of our ancient pilgrims has been brought under my notice, by Samuel Ferguson, LL.D., M.R.I.A.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> These he states to have been MSS., belonging to the church of Leon, and to the Collegiate Church of the Blessed Virgin, at Follcoat, as also one, kept at the Parochial Church of Guic-Sezni, and a MS. account by Dominus Magnus, a noble and discreet Canon of Leon. The ancient office of our saint, in nine lessons, celebrated in the churches of Leon and of Cornwall, on the 19th of September, also, were sources for this biography.

some accounts,<sup>2</sup> which are here to be noticed. Of this abbot, little is known, with any great degree of certainty. Indeed, the lections, in an old Breviary of St. Pol de Léon, from which Albert le Grande made up our saint's history, for the most part, are taken, word for word, from the Life of St. Kieran:<sup>3</sup> Colgan<sup>4</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>5</sup> have separate accounts of the present holy man. The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, in like manner, has given a few brief notes, regarding him.<sup>6</sup> We may allow, probably, that the saint was an Irishman; although, we must reject much of what has come down to us, in tradition. According to Albert le Grande, St. Sezin was born in Ultonia, or Ulster,<sup>7</sup> a province of Ireland, A.D. 402, during the Pontificate of Pope Innocent I.,<sup>8</sup> Arcadius and Honorius<sup>9</sup> being Emperors, and Grallon<sup>10</sup> being King of Britain. His father is called Ernut,<sup>11</sup> and his mother Wingella. On the night of our saint's conception, his mother is said to have had a vision of the firmament, studded with stars, and one, the brightest among these, seemed to fall into her mouth. This incident was thought to be the presage of her child's future sanctity. When brought to the baptismal font, he got the name of Sezin. Soon he learned, to disregard childish sports, to addict himself to the study of letters, and to the practice of piety. He resolved, then, to leave his parents, and to retire into an island, called Clarc.<sup>12</sup> He remained there, until his twenty-fifth year had been completed, when he had a Divine inspiration to visit Rome. Here, the legend states, he arrived, A.D. 435, the Emperor Valentinian reigning,<sup>13</sup> and he began to frequent the schools. Here, also, he formed the acquaintance of St. Patrick,<sup>14</sup> already consecrated a bishop, and destined for the Apostolate of Ireland, where so many Gentiles had yet to be received within the Church. It is added, that having found in Sezin a capable mind and holy manners, St. Patrick presented him to Pope Celestine I.,<sup>15</sup> who consecrated the pilgrim a bishop, and appointed him to have a share, in the mission of Ireland's great Apostle. Owing to such recorded circumstance, and inferring from a fancied similarity

<sup>2</sup> See "Les Vies des Saints de la Bretagne Armorique, avec un ample Catalogue des Evêques d'icelle."

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 5th of March.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S. Sezini, Episcopi Confess. et Patroni Tutelararum Parochiæ de Guic-Sezini in Urbe Leonensi, pp. 477 to 479.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Seznio Abbate Patrono Parochiæ de Guic-Sezini Diocesis Leonensis in Britannia Armorica, pp. 429, 430.

<sup>6</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., p. 90.

<sup>7</sup> Albert le Grande states, in that part of it, known as Ostrinct; yet, Colgan remarks, that such a title in or for the province was not to be found, elsewhere, while Ulaigh or Ulaich was the Irish etymon.

<sup>8</sup> He reigned from A.D. 402 to 417. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 210.

<sup>9</sup> The chief events of their reigns, commencing A.D. 395, will be found, in the "Ancient Universal History," vol. xiv., chap. lxiii., lxiv., pp. 324 to 407.

<sup>10</sup> The accounts, about Grallon, Comte de Cornouaille, are regarded as very mythical, by the learned Lobineau, in his "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. i., num. xxviii.

He is thought, by Dr. Lanigan, to have lived about the latter end of the fifth century. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. xii., n. 181, p. 493.

<sup>11</sup> Colgan thinks, his real name should be Ernan, while, the mother's was rather Fingella; for, these were names common enough, in Ireland, at the period, and those in the text were unknown.

<sup>12</sup> Colgan observes, that no island, similarly named, is to be found among those of Ireland; but, there is an island, called Gluaire, in Connaught; one, called Clothra, and one, called Cealtra, between Meath and Connaught; as also one, called Clere, in the south of Munster. This latter is probably the one meant; although, we believe this part of his St. Sezn's Acts to be fictitious.

<sup>13</sup> His reign is computed to have lasted, from the 23rd of October, A.D. 425, to the 17th of March, A.D. 455, by the authors of the "Ancient Universal History," vol. xiv., chap. lxv., p. 419.

<sup>14</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>15</sup> This holy Pontiff reigned, from A.D. 422 to 432. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 209. This Chronology, however, as we may see, conflicts with what is given in the text.

of name, Colgan thinks he may not be a different person from a St. Sesan,<sup>16</sup> or St. Serenus, or Esserinus,<sup>17</sup> or Iserninus. The latter holy man is regarded, as having been Bishop of Kilcullen,<sup>18</sup> and as having been sent into Ireland, to assist St. Patrick, in the year 439.<sup>19</sup> Now, on the island of Aranmore, off the west coast of Galway, there is a very old ruined church, or oratory, almost boat-shaped, at the side walls, and only 19 feet 6 inches in length, by 14 feet 6 inches in width, on the outside. The interior is choked up with a thick growth of brushwood; hawthorn and ivy encircling the massive lime-stones. It lies, in a fertile spot, not far from the sea-shore, and under a high Tempull-Assurnuidhe, on Aranmore, County of Galway.

ledge of rock. The people call it Teampull Sciernan,<sup>20</sup> and this they interpret, as "the Church of St. Isserninus."<sup>21</sup> Whether it had any connexion or not, with St. Sezin, is more than we dare affirm. It is said in his Acts, when the holy man had received the Sovereign Pontiff's blessing; with several relics of the saints and other gifts, he set out for Great Britain, and thence he went to Ireland. St. Patrick alone excepted, he was there received with great joy by all; but, the Apostle finding his residence to be in that part of Ireland, called Warrham,<sup>22</sup> he relegated some priests and monks to be his

<sup>16</sup> See notices of him, at the 31st of August.

<sup>17</sup> His death is noted, in the Ulster Annals, at A.D. 469. See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," Index Chronologicus, p. 522.

<sup>18</sup> The Townland, so called, in a parish and barony of the same name, will be found, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheets 23, 28.

<sup>19</sup> According to the "Annales Ultonienses." See O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," toms iv., p. 1.

<sup>20</sup> The accompanying engraving, by George A. Hanlon, has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, from a sketch, taken by the author, on the spot, in June, 1877.

<sup>21</sup> In Archbishop Malachy Keely's list, it is called Tempull Assurnuidhe (said to be dedicated to St. Assurnidhe, or perhaps Esserninus), and, we are told, this church is held, in the greatest veneration, by the islanders. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxi. Appendix ad Acta S. Endei, cap. vii., p. 715.

<sup>22</sup> For this strange name, Colgan prefers reading Garrchon, the name of a region and people in Leinster, in which he thinks the church of Kilcullen was located. See, regarding Sezin or Isserin, what he states companions and assistants. Here, after his arrival, frequent, zealous, and affectionate exhortations, to the people, drew towards him a great multitude of believers, when they were obliged to build a tempull,<sup>23</sup> and around it were placed several houses, in the shape of a monastery. In these, the holy bishop and his companions dwelt. So many pilgrims flocked there, that he soon required to increase the number of his ministers, and he ordained other priests for the administration of the sacraments. In fine, when his mission had so happily succeeded, he first communicated this success to St. Patrick, and afterwards to Pope Sixtus III.<sup>24</sup> By this Pontiff, the monastery of our saint is said to have been erected into an episcopal see, and he was set over it, as the first bishop. When the tempull of the monastery thus became a Cathedral Church, St. Sezin built a larger monastery, and in this he received a great number of youths, whom he assiduously trained to studies and to virtue. For thus, he wished to utilize their labours and preaching, in the churches belonging to his diocese. Several miracles are related, which he publicly wrought, and which through Almighty assistance served to confirm the truth of his doctrine, in the people's minds. Thus, on a certain day, when the lamps were extinguished in the church, his prayers obtained from God, that they should be re-lighted, and without pain, he carried fire in his hands. Once, when a St. Rhodonus<sup>25</sup> paid him a visit, in the middle of winter, he was brought to the hospice, where there was no fire, but only some faggots of wood. But, no sooner had Sezin offered his prayers, than they blazed up on the hearth. A noble chief, named Geran, had a servant, and the latter was torn in pieces by a ferocious wolf. The dead body lay, in an adjoining wood, but our saint restored the man to life. The wife of Prince Onegia,<sup>26</sup> who ruled over the territory, where our saint had planted the Gospel, came on a visit, but illness prevented her from leaving. She expressed a desire to have some blackberries, which St. Sezin procured; and, on eating these, through his prayers, her illness disappeared. From respectable authorities, it may be believed, that the grape was cultivated, in early Christian times, throughout Ireland; but, once, when St. Patrick visited Sezin, he wanted wine,<sup>27</sup> until making a sign of the cross over water, contained in some vessels, it was turned into wine, and so kept for three days, that St. Patrick remained. Again, he brought out from a lake seven men, who had been drowned there, by certain robbers; he sought the release of a captive from that chief, whose horse he had killed, and obtained his request by restoring the horse to life; he also effected reconciliation between two princes of Ireland, by telling them that the Almighty should stay their hands in a miraculous manner, and this happened, when a large tree fell before the contending armies, so as to prevent them from meeting in a hostile manner, while the astonished leaders, thanking God and our saint for sparing the effusion of blood, entered into a treaty of amity. Some of the foregoing legends so closely resemble those found in the Life of St. Kieran,<sup>28</sup> Patron further, in "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xviii., and n. 31, pp. 152, 185.

<sup>23</sup> The Latin Acts have it "templum vnum."

<sup>24</sup> He immediately succeeded Pope Celestine I., and ruled from A.D. 432 to A.D. 440. See Berti's "Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ Breviarium," pars. i., sec. v., cap. i., p. 131.

<sup>25</sup> Colgan rather thinks, this name should be St. Rodanus, who flourished about this time in Ireland, and who was that disciple, mentioned in the Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. xli., xliii., and pars. iii., cap. xviii. Also, is he mentioned, in Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xcii. See "Trias Thaumaturga," pp. 96, 135, 167.

<sup>26</sup> Most probably intended for Ængus.

<sup>27</sup> The Latin Life states, at this passage, "deficiebat vinum quod ista in insula rarissimum est."

<sup>28</sup> The Bollandists seek to account for this confusion, by stating, that about the year 560, there was a St. Serenicus, Abbot of Sagiensis, near Normandy, and whose feast is celebrated by Saussay, in his Gallic Mar-

of Ossory, that it has been supposed, they are only abridged from his Acts.<sup>29</sup> Having confirmed many among the Irish in the faith, Sezin desired a rest from his labours; but, he was admonished by the Lord, to pass over the sea into Armoric Britain, and to take several of his religious with him. Obeying such mandate, and selecting seventy disciples, by a prosperous navigation he reached that territory about Leon, and he landed in the port of Pollukel, which is in the parish of Keriovana. This is said to have occurred in 477, when passing the Rhine, the Franks entered as the conquerors of Gaul.<sup>30</sup> At this time, too, it is stated, that Hoel the Great was king over Britain. Near that port, when he landed, Sezin selected his place, and erected his hermitage or monastery; for, the latter was required to accommodate his disciples. It was called Penati San Sezni. Afterwards, he came to the place, which is now denominated Guic-Sezni, and there he built a monastery, where with his religious, Sezin is said to have lived, until he attained the one hundred and twenty-seventh year. As he died, in this monastery, and as in Guic-Sezni his feast has been constantly celebrated, on the 6th of March, this is thought to have been his Natalis. The year 529 is that generally assigned for his departure. He was buried in the monastic church of Guic-Sezin, under the high altar, where even yet a certain cave is shown, as the spot, where he was interred. The fame of his miracles was so great, that after death, the Irish sent a fleet to Pollukel, and took away his body by force, to bury it in the place where his episcopal see had been erected in Ireland. The people of Leon, however, by much entreaty, obtained some of his relics, which were long preserved in the parochial church of Guic-Sezni, where he is regarded as the special patron. The 7th of May, and the 19th of September, are festivals relating to this holy man;<sup>31</sup> and these probably represent some elevation, translation, or special veneration, referring to his relics. We are told, in the ancient Acts, that Sezin<sup>32</sup> was remarkable for his humility and patience; that he was never tired in seeking the salvation of souls; that he was chaste, loving poverty, frugal, meek to all, constant in his vigils, prayers and heavenly contemplation. He preached to the people by example, as well as by words; he never tasted wine or intoxicating drinks. He chose to be clothed in the skins of wild beasts, and he used neither linen or wool, except on occasions, when he wore pontifical vestments. Thus was he dead to all self-love, that he might be loved only by God.

ARTICLE III.—ST. CAIRPRE OR CORPRE CROM, BISHOP OF CLONMAC-NOISE, KING'S COUNTY. [Ninth Century.] The days of this holy man were cast, in a dangerous period; for, the Danish and Norwegian invasions were then rife, over many districts, in Ireland. Yet, the heirship of sanctity did tyrology, at the 7th of May. His cultus possibly prevailed, among the Armoric Britons; and, as they often substitute a z, where two liquids occur, so they may have written for that name, Seznius, and they may have mistaken Sagiensis for Sagiriensis, thus thinking him to have been identical with the patron of this latter place. Then, finding St. Kieran's Acts, these may have been assigned to St. Seznius.

<sup>29</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Vita S. Sezini, &c., cap. i. to xiv., pp. 477, 478.

<sup>30</sup> Such date has been questioned, by the Bollandists, as one much too late, for the epoch assigned; since, in the commencement of the fifth century, when the Roman power began to decline, the Franks crossed the Rhine, and the Salii, another band of these people, under their king, Clogio, who commenced his reign in 428, invaded Cambray, and subjected all the surrounding country to his sway.

<sup>31</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii vi. De S. Seznio Abbate Patrono Parociæ de Guic-Sezni, &c., num. 4, p. 430.

<sup>32</sup> According to Lobineau, little more is known of Sezni than his name, and that he is patron of Guic-Sezni. See "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. ii. Num. ccxv., p. 76.

not depart from our island, and the present bishop was renowned, in his time. From various sources, Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have legendary Acts of this St. Corpre, at the 6th of March, on which day, we find him noted, as Carpre cruim [no Cruinn], in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>3</sup> The designation Crom, meaning "crooked," or "curved," had probably some relation to a personal deformity. Bishop Challoner commemorates him, at this date.<sup>4</sup> So Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire, likewise, record his feast. We find entered, on this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> Cairpre Crom, who was son of Feradhach, son to Lughaidh, son of Dallan, son to Bresal, son of Mainè Mór, from whom descend the Ui Mainè, of the race of Colla da chroich. This saint belonged to the posterity of Heremon. It is probable, he was born, in the earlier part of the ninth century, and that he belonged to the community, at Clonmacnoise. He succeeded to the Blessed Moeldarius, or Maelodhar, Bishop of this place, who died in the year 886.<sup>6</sup> Cairpre Crom is styled, Bishop of Cluain-mic Nois, and head of the religion of the greater part of Erin, in his time.<sup>7</sup> Hence, we may infer the great eminence, as an ecclesiastic, he attained. The legend of Coirpre Crom, Bishop of Clonmacnoise, who died A.D. 899, and of Melaghlán or Malachy, Monarch of Ireland, who died A.D. 860, is contained in the Leabhar Breac,<sup>8</sup> which belongs to the Royal Irish Academy. In the O'Longan Manuscripts,<sup>9</sup> R.I.A., Dublin, there is an ancient prose legend, regarding St. Ciaram of Cluain Mac Nois and Cairbre Crom. This is likewise contained in Scholia, affixed to the Festilog of St. Ængus. From this, Colgan infers the Acts of St. Carpre were formerly extant, and that this fragment may be deemed an excerpt, which the O'Clerys have thus abridged. It is stated, that to Corpre was shown the spirit of Maelsechlainn,<sup>10</sup> son of Maelruanaidh, King of Erin,<sup>11</sup> according to an old legend. To their account, the O'Clerys append the following observation: A.D. 1022, on the 4th of the Nones of September, Maelsechlainn died.<sup>12</sup> On a certain day, when Cairpre was praying alone in his church,<sup>13</sup> after vespers, he saw a coal-black figure, coming towards him,

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. De S. Corpreo Episcopo Cluanensi, pp. 508, 509.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Corpreo seu Carbreo Episcopo Cluain-Mic-Nosie, in Hibernia, pp. 468, 469.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>4</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 159.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 66, 67.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 538, 539.

<sup>7</sup> Thus is he styled, in the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman.

<sup>8</sup> It is a large vellum folio MS., classed, at present, No. 40, 6.

<sup>9</sup> It is marked Vol. vi., pp. 93, 94.

<sup>10</sup> This king reigned sixteen years—from A.D. 845 to 860—according to the "Annals of the Four Masters." Regarding him is told a romantic story, evidently of bardic origin, of his freeing Ireland from the tyranny of Turgesius, through a stratagem, alluded to by Giraldus Cambrensis, in his "Topographia Hiberniæ," Dist. iii., cap. 40. It is related, more at length, in Dr. Jeffery Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., and it is said to have occurred, while Malachy was only the provincial king of Meath. Afterwards, by the suffrages of the nobility of Ireland, he is stated to have reigned as supreme monarch, from A.D. 879 to 897. However, he was dead before this period.

<sup>11</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," his death is placed, at A.D. 860. See vol. i., pp. 494, 495. The "Annales Ultonienses" have it, at A.D. 861. But, the true date is Tuesday, 30th November, A.D. 863. See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xciii., p. 434.

<sup>12</sup> This latter clause is found within brackets, in a more recent hand, than in the original, but the date is wrong, as Dr. Todd remarks. He says: "The writer, by an oversight, has given the year and day, on which Maelsechlainn II. died, not the year and day on which Maelsechlainn I. died."

<sup>13</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says at this passage, "The word here used to signify church is Regles, ecclesia regularis or abbatis; it generally signifies a church, specially devoted to burials."

<sup>14</sup> The Leabhar Breac narrative states, moreover, that this figure had a bright circle

so that it stood in his presence.<sup>14</sup> The bishop asked who he was,<sup>15</sup> when the apparition answered, that it was Maelsechlainn, son of Maelruanaidh, and he told him every kind of pain which he was suffering in Purgatory, with other particulars, besides the cause why himself and his spiritual director had been thus punished. Then we are told, that the bishop undertook to make intercession for the king; and, he ordered certain priests<sup>16</sup> to pray for the priest, to bring him from pains. The bishop announced, that he should himself pray for the king. They did so, respectively, and to the end of the half year. As Cairpre was at prayer, towards the end of that period, he saw the king coming towards him, and half-speckled;<sup>17</sup> when, he returned thanks to the bishop, for what had been done for him.<sup>18</sup> The king then implored around the neck, and it was clothed only in an under garment, which wanted one sleeve.

<sup>15</sup> The Leabhar Breac version adds: "I know you not." He answered, "I am a spirit." "What hath made thee black?" said the bishop. "The number of my sins, and the greatness of my punishment," he replied. "Were not prayers offered for thee?" asked the bishop, "or had you ghostly friends among the clergy, while you were living?" "It availed me more, that I had been buried at Clonmacnoise," said the spirit, "than any aid they afforded me. Through the intercession of St. Kieran, I shall be saved on the day of judgment." "It is unfortunate," the bishop answered, "if you had not some confessor or spiritual director to advise the good works you should do." "I had a certain priest of Clonmacnoise as a director, nor did I pay much attention to his counsels; however, I gave him this golden ring. But, how doth it profit me, while I am now so greatly tortured? Woe to that man, who is carnal, and who hath not a spiritual director, or who doth not good works while living." On this, the bishop enquired, if he had an opportunity for practising good works, and was answered in the affirmative. "I am Malachy, son of Moelruanac, the grandson of Dunchad, and the King of Ireland, so that I had power to do good." "O dreadful matter," said the bishop, "what happened to the priest, thy director, did he turn thy gifts to good account?" "He suffers still greater torments," replied the king, "and the ring, which I gave him, is a fiery circle around his neck; alas! he cannot aid me, for he is in a worse state himself." "And why have you that bright circle about your neck?" asked the bishop. "That is the reward, and a token of the ring, I gave to the priest." "But why are you clothed in this garment?" enquired the bishop. The king replied, "At one time, certain scholars, belonging to this church, came to me, asking me to provide a garment for a poor and half-naked student. I directed the queen, as I had nothing else, to bestow, a precious undergarment of mine to be given him, and therefore you see me covered with that garment." The holy man then asked, "What is the reason for your appearance at present?" The king answered, "When, a short time previously, demons tormented me in the air, driving me hither and thither, we heard the psalms of your choirs, and then terrified the demons were dispersed and fled through space. For, in no place, on the earth or in the air, can evil spirits rest, when they hear your psalmody." After such colloquy, the king continued: "O woe, woe is me, now I must return to those tortures, but if, for the solace you have so briefly afforded me, you will accept some small compensation, I shall give it." "How?" enquired the holy man. "On a certain occasion, when I made an attack on Dublin, and when engaging the Northman enemy, I obtained among the spoils one hundred ounces of gold, and one thousand ounces of silver, which I hid under the earth, only one of my servants being present, and whom I ordered to be killed, lest he should reveal this treasure to others, or take it away himself. No one is now living, who knows where it is deposited, and there it remains to the present date; yet, I will indicate the spot for you, and then dispose of the money as you please." "I protest," cried the bishop, "I cannot receive the greater gift, when the lesser one bestowed by you, when living, brought such little profit; and therefore, I absolutely renounce your present." Then the spirit vanished, with the exclamation, "Woe, woe, to him, who doth not do good while the time for doing it is afforded."

<sup>16</sup> The Leabhar Breac states, these were twelve in number.

<sup>17</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says at this word, half-speckled, "Colgan explains this to mean, that one half of the spectre appeared shining as if in glory, the other half black as before, to intimate that the deliverance of the king was but half effected:—Rex apparuit fulgentem media ex parte, ex altera atram, ut prius, proferens speciem."

<sup>18</sup> The Leabhar Breac relates, that Malachy stated, how his condition was ameliorated, but that his spirit was on the top of a very high tree, and over a deep abyss; again, that it was exposed to the buffeting of winds and great cold, while, no matter how slight were those punishments in the other life, the king declared, that those who

him to do the same, until the end of another half-year. The clerics obeyed this request, while they fasted and prayed fervently, giving frequent alms, to the end of another half-year. Then the king came in a bright form towards Cairpre, and returned thanks to the holy bishop, for what he had done. The monarch told him, that he should go to heaven, on that day, and that the priest should enter it on the next day. Cairpre asked why the king should go before the priest. The king said, it was owing to the excellence of the bishop's prayers, and to the superiority of his over the priests' intercession. This was in allusion to twelve priests, who were at Cluain Mic Nois, at that time. Then, the king, giving thanks to and blessing the bishop, ascended into heaven, in his presence. Among other things related, in the year 894, St. Cairbre Crom, with a Synod of Seniors, assisted at a convocation, held at Inis-Aingin, now Hare Island, in Lough Ree, on the River Shannon. At this time, the place itself was invaded, by the people of Connaught. A man was mortally wounded there, and the shrine of Ciaran<sup>19</sup> was profaned.<sup>20</sup> This bishop died A.D. 899, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters."<sup>21</sup> An eloquent and a distinguished bishop of the Church,<sup>22</sup> alluding to the words of a venerated and learned ecclesiastic,<sup>23</sup> has remarked, when we hear of those marvellous things, concerning miracles and visions, the Catholic does not believe, that he is bound to accept them all, since those reported miracles have to be examined, upon the very same laws of evidence, by which any other facts are examined. Thus, in the legend of the present holy prelate, an old tradition is here set down, but solely as a curious illustration of our Irish mediæval folk-lore.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MUADAN, BISHOP OF CARN FURBAIDHE. The identity of this saint, his epoch, and locality, are involved in the greatest obscurity. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> we find this record, Muadan Cairnforbaidhe,<sup>2</sup> registered at the 6th of March. We are informed, that the church of Kill-Modain, or of Kill-Mhodain, was near this latter place, and that it had been within the county of Longford, in a part, too, which formerly belonged to Connaught. In the Irish Life of St. Columkille,<sup>3</sup> whose contemporary he is stated to have been, Mudan is designated only as Abbot of this latter place. If we regard the statement of Marianus O'Gorman, who styles him, in his Martyrology at this date, Modan, he was Bishop of Carnforbuidhe. This St. Muadan, or Modan, is entered in the Martyrology of Cathald Maguire.<sup>4</sup> At the 6th of March, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>5</sup> enters the festival of St suffered them seemed to think they were punishments of the damned. Then the spirit disappeared.

<sup>19</sup> This was St. Kiaran, Abbot of Clonmacnoise, whose Life may be seen, at the 9th of September, the day for his feast.

<sup>20</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 552, 553.

<sup>21</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 558, 559.

<sup>22</sup> See a late most interesting tract, by the Rt. Rev. Patrick J. Ryan, Bishop of Tricoma, and Coadjutor to the Archbishop of St. Louis: "What Catholics do not believe," a Lecture delivered in Mercantile Library Hall, on Sunday evening, December 16th, 1877, p. 35. Second edition, St. Louis, 1878. 8vo.

<sup>23</sup> Very Rev. John Henry Newman, D.D.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> I find the word Furbaidhi written distinctly away from this entry, in Dr. Kelly's published copy, as if it were the proper name of a saint. Probably, however, it is only a second entry for this locality.

<sup>3</sup> According to Colgan, the passage is indicated, as being in chap. 115. However, in O'Donnell's or Quinta Vita S. Columbæ, lib. ii., cap. vi., p. 410, and n. 8, p. 452, a legend is related, about a certain Mudan, who inhospitably received St. Columba, at Kill-Mudain, after he had taken leave of Crunnther Fraech. Colgan acknowledges himself unable to decide, if that Mudan were identical, with the saint, celebrated at the 6th of March.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiber-

Muadan, Bishop of Carn Furbaidhe. Besides the objection, that what is related in O'Donnell's Acts of St. Columba, by no means establishes Modan's claim to be a saint; if, as conjectured, our Muadan was a disciple to St. Barr of Cork,<sup>6</sup> he could hardly have been St. Columba's contemporary. He flourished about A.D. 561, at the time when the battle of Culadremhne had been fought.<sup>7</sup> The legend, relating to the Modan, by whom St. Columba<sup>8</sup> had been so inhospitably received, is ridiculously absurd; and, in addition, it is stated, that the great abbot pronounced a malediction on Kill-Mudain, as a consequence; so that, it was predicted, not to flourish long as a domicile for clerics, but rather it must become a receptacle for wild beasts. Again, on the same day, Columba left it, fire consumed the temporary place of refuge his disciples occupied, and only St. Columba's Book of Gospels, which had been forgotten there, remained unconsumed. This was recovered, by one of Columba's disciples, who returned to seek it.<sup>9</sup> Among St. Patrick's disciples, we find classed a St. Muadan, Abbot of Cluain-Dionech, and bishop of Carn-futbhuidhe, according to Colgan, and, whose festival has been assigned to this date.<sup>10</sup> He is said to be noted, in the Life of St. Albeus.<sup>11</sup> However, elsewhere, Colgan acknowledges, that he does not know, but the St. Muadan, Bishop of Carn-Furbhuidhe, had been identical with Mudain, mentioned in St. Columba's Acts.<sup>12</sup> In the Life of St. Barr,<sup>13</sup> one of his disciples is called Muadan, of Aill Nuaitin.<sup>14</sup> He and many other nixæ," iv. Februarii. De S. Modano Abbate. Also nn. 1, 2, 5, p. 253.

Kilmoon Church, County of Clare.

<sup>5</sup> See Drs. Todd's and Reeves' edition, pp. 64, 65.

<sup>6</sup> He died, on the 25th of September, and as generally thought, in the seventh century.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," iv. Februarii. De S. Modano Abbate, n. 4, p. 253.

See his Life, at the 9th of June.

See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

Quinta Vita S. Columbæ, lib. ii, cap. vi., vii., p. 410.

<sup>10</sup> See ibid. Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 269.

<sup>11</sup> Chapter xxxiii.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid. Vita Quinta S. Columbæ, n. 8, p. 452.

<sup>13</sup> Chapter xviii.

<sup>14</sup> So it is, in the O'Clery's Manuscript, says Dr. Todd, yet he thinks we ought rather read Aill Muaidin. See "Martyr-

saints were at school, under Barr, at Corcach. These offered themselves and their churches to God and to St. Barre.<sup>15</sup> We find a parish of Kilmoon,<sup>16</sup> in the barony of Burren and county of Clare, and there is to be found the fragments of an ancient church.<sup>17</sup> A portion has been converted into a family vault, and the mouldering walls stand within an ancient graveyard, fenced only by a loose stone wall. The old church is not far from the now celebrated sulphur and iron springs of Lisdoonvarna.<sup>18</sup> It seems probable enough, that place was called after a St. Muadan. Mr. William M. Hennessy seems to intimate, that All Muadain, or more correctly Cill Muadain, may probably be found, in the county of Monaghan.<sup>19</sup> There is a townland of Kilmoon,<sup>20</sup> in the parish of Tullagh, in the eastern division of West Carbery Barony, and in the West Riding of Cork County. We find, that under the head of Carn Furbaidhe,<sup>21</sup> Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Muadan, bishop of Carn-Furbaidhe, at March the 6th.<sup>22</sup>

ARTICLE V.—ST. CADROE, OR HADROE, ABBOT OF WASOR, BELGIUM. [Tenth Century.] The celebrated English antiquary, William Camden, acknowledges, that after the conversion of Ireland to the Christian Faith by St. Patrick, none could be found more holy or more learned than its Scottish monks, and that it sent forth swarms of saintly men, into all parts of Europe, while many cities and monasteries owe their origin to Irish founders. In Glastonbury, and in other places, throughout England, our countrymen established seminaries for learning, with several religious houses.<sup>1</sup> And at a time, when learning was at a low ebb, in nearly all other countries, about the tenth century, it flourished in Ireland, whither many holy men resorted, in order to obtain a finished religious and secular education.<sup>2</sup> In the Monastery of St. Gall, and in other Irish foundations, on the Continent of Europe, at this period, many eminent Irish teachers and scholars were to be found.<sup>3</sup>

ology of Donegal," n. 3, p. 65. Mr. William M. Hennessy remarks, that there is evidently a mistake here for Cill Muadain, and as a proof he refers to the Index Topographicus, in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ."

<sup>15</sup> Finding only the present St. Muadan, and another St. Muadan, venerated at the 30th of August, in our Martyrologies, O'Clery says, he is in doubt, as to the identification of St. Barr's disciple, called Muadan of Aill Nuaitin.

<sup>16</sup> Its position is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 4, 5, 8, 9. The townlands of Kilmoon East and West are found on Sheets 4, 8.

<sup>17</sup> The accompanying illustration was drawn on the spot, by the writer, in June, 1877, transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved, by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>18</sup> This townland is within the same parish, and it is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheet 8. An interesting account of the springs, hotels, antiquities, and scenery, will be found in the "Hand-Book to Lisdoonvarna and its Vicinity," with a map and woodcuts. Dublin, 1876, 12mo.

<sup>19</sup> There is a MS. note (with a query) appended, in his copy of the "Martyrology of Donegal,"

<sup>20</sup> This is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cork," Sheets 149, 153.

<sup>21</sup> Here William M. Hennessy adds a note: "It is stated in the Dinnsenchus, 'Book of Lecan,' fol. 231, that this was the name of a large carn, on Sliabh Cairbre, or the Carn Mountain, in the north of the county of Longford; and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 253) observes, that Cill Modani was 'juxta Carn furbaidhe.'"

<sup>22</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy." Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 92, 93.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Britannia," sive Florentissimorum Regnorum Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ et Insularum adjacentium ex intima antiquitate Chorographica Descriptio. Authore Guiljelmo Camdeno, pp. 647, 648. The first edition of this valuable work appeared in 1586; but, it was much improved and enlarged in subsequent editions.

<sup>2</sup> Thus, in the case of St. Sulgenus, who flourished in Britain, between 900 and 1000, we read, "exemplo patrum, commotus amore legendi, ivit ad Ibernios sophia mirabili claros."—"Vita S. Sulgeni." Camden's "Britannia."

<sup>3</sup> See the account of Hermannus Contractus, in Henricus Canisius' "Antiquæ Lectiones," tomus i.

The ancient author of Blessed Cadroe's Life has dedicated his performance to Immonus,<sup>4</sup> or, according to Colgan, Immonius Ousmann.<sup>5</sup> The patron appears to have been Abbot of Wasor,<sup>6</sup> and a successor to our saint. The writer<sup>7</sup> of this tract, called Reimann, or Ousmann,<sup>8</sup> seems to have been a monk of the same establishment; but, although he does not claim to have been a Synchronus,<sup>9</sup> a Scotus, or an Irishman,<sup>10</sup> he indicates, that some of our saint's disciples were alive, when he wrote.<sup>11</sup> Hence, it has been assumed, that he flourished about A.D. 1040.<sup>12</sup> His biography has been praised for its good Latinity, notwithstanding the writer's apology for its rudeness to Immonus, who appears to have urged him to a task, not reluctantly undertaken. He acknowledges having access to histories, in his Preface, and from these, he has epitomized an account of ancient people, and the migrations of Ireland's former colonists, not greatly inconsistent with our present accepted records.<sup>13</sup> Such notices, however, we are obliged to eliminate from the present Life, as being extraneous, and yet accessible. Certain pious reflections, which precede, are also of necessity omitted. The old Acts of this saint have been published, by Colgan,<sup>14</sup> with notes, and an Appendix.<sup>15</sup> The Bollandists have given it, likewise, with a previous commentary.<sup>16</sup> Mabillon and D'Achery have an account of St. Cadroe, Abbot, in a Life, containing, with prologue, 37 paragraphs, as also six paragraphs of preliminary

<sup>4</sup> According to the Bollandists.

<sup>5</sup> The Bollandists suppose, that some error of a copyist has been adopted by Colgan, when thus confusing the name of the dedicatory, with that of the abbot to whom the work had been dedicated. And, in the copy, which they obtained, through the kindness of Dominus Rumold Hancart, Prior of the Monastery (Andainensis) of St. Hubert, in Ardennes, the writer is called Reimann or Ousman, who is thought to have lived, about twenty years after St. Cadroe's death.

<sup>6</sup> In the "Chronicon Valciodorensis," an interesting history of this religious house will be found, although there are many errors in the narrative.

<sup>7</sup> Colgan calls him an anonymous writer, whose biography of our saint, with the Acts of other Irish saints, had been transmitted, by Dominus Nicolaus Fasonius, Abbot of St. Hubert's Monastery, in Ardennes. The piety and zeal of this superior are extolled, by Colgan; while the abbot transcribed those documents and sealed them with his own hand, as taken from the parchments, belonging to his Abbey.

<sup>8</sup> According to the copy of a manuscript, obtained by the Bollandists, from the Monastery of St. Hubert.

<sup>9</sup> He excuses himself, alluding to the subject of his memoir, that he was not "ita viro illi familiaris," and that beyond what was related to him, he knew nothing of St. Cadroe's Acts. Yet, in this account, the Bollandist editor infers, that dedicating the work to Immonus, Abbot, who flourished about A.D. 990, most likely the writer was a monk of Wasor, and a native of the country near it, and that he certainly did not belong to the Monastery of St. Clement and of St. Symphorian, for, in the latter case, he should have more intimately known St. Cadroe. The editor considers, as our saint presided over Wasor for some years, before the time of Forannan, and as it had an Abbot, named Immonus, and as the "Chronicon Walciodorensis" alludes to a volume, kept at Wasor, and containing the miracles of Blessed Cadroe, it must be deemed a reasonable inference, that allusion is made to the present Life, of which the monks there should be likely to have preserved a copy, as relating to their former Superior's Acts. Or again, it may be urged, that as there had been an Immonus, Abbot of Gorzé, in Lorraine, about A.D. 1006, he was contemporaneous with the Wasor Immonus. Now, there was a Monastery of St. Vincent and of St. Arnulf, in the city of Metz, where sacred literature was encouraged, and where the Acts of various saints had been written. Nothing, however, can be pronounced with certainty, in reference to this matter.

<sup>10</sup> The Teutonic name given to him appears to remove such a suspicion.

<sup>11</sup> The Bollandists seem to allow, that he may have been a contemporary of our saint.

<sup>12</sup> Such is Colgan's opinion.

<sup>13</sup> These narratives take in the early settlement of Scotland, as well as of Ireland; but, the foreign writer seems to have confused certain names of places, and some matters of detail.

<sup>14</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," vi. Martii. Vita B. Cadroe, Abb. Valciodorensis, &c., pp. 494 to 505.

<sup>15</sup> In two chapters. See ibid., pp. 505 to 507.

<sup>16</sup> In four sections and twenty-three paragraphs. See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i. De S. Cadroe Abbate Metis in Lotharinga, pp. 469 to 481.

observations.<sup>17</sup> In the Annals of the Benedictine Order, various notices of Blessed Cadroe occur.<sup>18</sup> Bishop Challenor,<sup>19</sup> the "Circle of the Seasons"<sup>20</sup> and Bishop Forbes have notices of St. Cadroe.<sup>21</sup> Many other authorities treat about the incidents of our saint's life, but his Acts are greatly confused by different writers. Those, borrowed from the "Chronicon Valciodorensis," are especially open to such objection. Some of the Scotch writers have entertained opinions, that St. Cadroe must have been their countryman: first, because his country is called Scotia;<sup>22</sup> secondly, because his parents are stated to have prayed, at the tomb of Blessed Columbanus, assumed to have been at the tomb of St. Columkille,<sup>23</sup> in Iona; thirdly, because St. Beanus is called his cousin-german<sup>24</sup> on the father's side, and he is thought to have been the Blessed Beanus, Bishop of Murthlacensis, venerated at Aberdeen, a city of Scotland, on the 16th of December;<sup>25</sup> fourthly, because Dunwallon, or Douenaldus, King of Cumbria,<sup>26</sup> or Strathclyde, was a relation of St. Cadroe; fifthly, because our saint went across the sea<sup>27</sup> to St. Beanus from the city of Armagh; and, sixthly, because, the king presiding over Cathroe's country is called Constantine,<sup>28</sup> who thought to retain him at home, and who afterwards accompanied him into Cumbria. Yet, however specious these arguments seem, at first sight, they are supposed to have little weight, when examined; and, as taken, in context with the old Acts. Some very elaborate and ingenious arguments<sup>29</sup> are used, by Colgan, to demonstrate the fallacy of the foregoing

<sup>17</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," vol. vii., sec. v., pp. 487 to 501.

<sup>18</sup> In the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Books of the Third Volume.

<sup>19</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 159.

<sup>20</sup> See p. 66.

<sup>21</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 293.

<sup>22</sup> See the sixth chapter of his Life, as occurring in Colgan's arrangement. Hence, it has been thought, Albanian Scotia was meant.

<sup>23</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>24</sup> In the eighth chapter of Cadroe's Life. Bishop Forbes says he was probably St. Bean of Kinkell, venerated on the 16th of December. He died A.D. 1012.

<sup>25</sup> According to the Roman Martyrology, Molanus, and other authorities.

<sup>26</sup> In our saint's time, Cumbria was subject to the kings of Scotland, and Domnaldus VI., grandson to Malcolm II., by his daughter Beatrice, and eighty-fourth king of Scotland, was Prefect of Cumbria, according to Buchanan, in his "Rerum Scotticarum Historia," lib. vii., pp. 188 to 192.

<sup>27</sup> This is assumed to have been the sea, between Ireland and Scotland.

<sup>28</sup> There were four kings, bearing this name, over Scotland; and, it is even remarkable, that the third king of this name, and the seventy-fifth of Scotland, flourished a short time before the middle of the tenth century. The reader will find an account of their several reigns in Buchanan's "Rerum Scotticarum Historia."

<sup>29</sup> These may be summarised, in reference to the first objection, that Scotia was a name applying to Ireland, as well as to Scotland, that the historical introduction to our saint's

Acts shows how Ireland's early colonization is alone intended, while many of the places named have solely existence in Ireland, that even his country is expressly called Hibernia, and the companions of his journey Hibernians, while these notions are confirmed from other sources. The second objection is resolved, by the fact, that there were many holy men, called by the name of Columbanus, who were buried in Ireland, and even were St. Columkille meant, his remains had been transferred from Iona to Down, A.D. 816, in the time of King Diarmid. To the third objection, answer is made, that there were seven or eight distinct saints, called Beanus, in Ireland, and, if we admit Beanus, Bishop of Murthlacensis, was meant, his recorded period will not tally with that of our saint. To the fourth objection, it may be urged, that if Douenaldus, King of Cumbria, were a Scoto-Briton, this need not prevent him from being a relation of St. Cadroe, for the Irish and Albanian Scots often intermarried; while, we cannot tell, whether or not, Douenaldus was Scot, Welch, English or Dane, by descent, and again, the account of Donaldus, Prefect of Cumbria, can hardly be reconciled with our saint's age. To the fifth objection, it is shown, how easily Cadroe might go to Beanus, by some large inland lake, or even by an arm of the sea, without at all leaving Ireland. To the sixth objection, Colgan replies, that there was a King Constantine, who became a monk, in Ireland, and who died A.D. 943, while there was another Constantine, in the north of Ireland, to which part St. Cadroe is supposed to belong, and who flourished about his period.

<sup>30</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vi. Appendix ad Vitam S. Cadroe, objections.<sup>30</sup> However, the Bollandists are not convinced—and they seem to have sufficient intrinsic evidence to deduce from Cadroe's Acts—that this saint was a native of Ireland, although it is certain his education was received there. In this opinion, we likewise concur. We shall now proceed to relate the recorded facts of his history. St. Cadroe is sometimes called Kaddroë, and, sometimes, Hadroe. As a new olive, from a good parent stock, he was the son of Foitheach<sup>31</sup> or Fochereach,<sup>32</sup> a nobleman, and the second husband of Bania,<sup>33</sup> who had sons by her former spouse. Yet, when afterwards married, no child was born to them, until her husband and herself prayed fervently to St. Columbanus;<sup>34</sup> when, one night, while in fasting and prayer, they watched at his tomb, having lighted candles in their hands, suddenly, the separate tapers seemed to form only one light. Then appeared a man, in a beautiful habit, saying, "Thy tears, O woman, hath moistened my stole, and thy prayers have been accepted in God's sight; so that as Samuel had been granted to the entreaties of Anna,<sup>35</sup> and her conception of those of Rebecca,<sup>36</sup> it hath been decreed, that you shall conceive and bring forth a son, called Kadroe, a future light of the Church, who, in accordance with his name, shall be an invincible warrior<sup>37</sup> in the army of the Lord, always opposed to danger, while fighting for the house of Israel." Aroused from sleep, and full of joy for the favour obtained, the pious couple took their departure, confident that their future son should prove a source of untold blessings to all. Accordingly, in due course, the child was born, and his parents bestowed on him the name of Kaddroë. Colgan thinks he was born in the north of Ireland.<sup>38</sup> The noble or respectable families, according to a custom prevalent in the Irish nation, no sooner heard of his birth, than they severally sought to become his fosterers.<sup>39</sup> To avoid all cause for jealousy, Kaddroë's mother declared, that she should not withhold her son from that person, to whom God would assign him. In a vision, which took place during sleep, the mother clearly saw that matron, who was destined to take charge of him, and with general consent, she assumed the task of suckling and nursing Kaddroë. His father earnestly sought to have him instructed in useful pursuits; for, even in his tender age, the child showed an aptitude for cap. ii. De Patria, pp. 505 to 507.

<sup>31</sup> Such was the name, as found in Colgan's copy, of St. Cadroe's Acts.

<sup>32</sup> This is the form, the Bollandists met with, in their copy. Colgan conjectures, however, that Ferathach or Fochartach is probably the correct rendering, and more in accordance with ancient Irish names. He shows, too, from the Irish Annals, that Fogartach and Feradhath were names known in Ireland, about our saint's period.

<sup>33</sup> We are informed, by Colgan, that in the Irish language, this name has a signification, which means "white" or "fair."

<sup>34</sup> It seems no easy matter to determine, who this St. Columban had been, since there are so many thus called, in our Irish Martyrologies. Colgan argues, it could not have been Columkille's tomb, at Iona, that is here meant; because about the year 831, for greater security, Diarmait, Abbot of that Monastery, brought his relics to Ireland. See Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes, O, p. 389. The Bollandists assert, however, that even if this be admitted, Cadroe's parents could have visited that place, where St. Columba's relics formerly reposed, and which, in consequence, might be regarded as his tomb.

<sup>35</sup> i. Kings, i

<sup>36</sup> See Genesis xxx.

<sup>37</sup> As in the manuscript copy he had, Colgan sometimes found the name, written Caddroe, and sometimes Cadroe; he thinks the author mistook the original spelling or pronunciation of the name; for, cath, in Irish, has the signification of "war," or "battle," and roe, the same as agon, means the place "for battle." Or, if for Cathroe, we read Cathoer, its derivation means "warring," and becomes identical with "warrior;" this was also a name, frequently met with, in our Irish Annals.

<sup>38</sup> To us, Scotland seems more likely to have been the country of his birth.

<sup>39</sup> This has been a very prevalent custom in Ireland, from times remote, and even to a comparatively recent period. This habit was supposed to involve the duty of alliance and protection, from the fostered and his family to the fosterer, in after time. Dependents were regarded in the light of relations, under such conditions. The Bollandists remark, that it is likely these customs of older such education. The saint had a cousin-german on the father's side, and who was named Beanus.<sup>40</sup> This was a very pious man, who was addicted to the offices of prayer, of alms, and of self-restraint. He offered prayers for the child's salvation, and the old man had a vision, that the boy should be sent to school, so that he might be prepared to enter upon the clerical state. When this was related to the father, he felt unwilling to be deprived of an only son, who, it was hoped, might inherit his temporal possessions, and who should become towards him as a staff in old age. But, the Lord was pleased to bless Cadroe's parents with another son, whom they called Mattadanus.<sup>41</sup> Then Beanus was urged in a vision, once more to see the father, and to warn him, that he should not hesitate to make the sacrifice Divine Providence required. Even a miracle was performed, to urge on his determination. The parents again sought the tomb of Columbanus, and there with prayers, they made an offer of their son, Cadroe, to their old relative, who undertook the charge of training him in holy wisdom, and in a knowledge of the Divine law. Cadroe answered well to these efforts, for as he advanced in years, he soon outstripped his other schoolfellows, in ability and knowledge. While thus engaged, some disturbances arose in the neighbourhood, and his fosterers urged the youth to take up arms, in order to protect them from the raids of their enemies. Notwithstanding the care of a cleric, to whom Beanus had entrusted Caddroe, during a temporary absence, the youth marched with his friends and pursued their invaders to the banks of a swollen river. This the pursuers could not cross, for want of boats; and, meantime, the cleric brought word to Beanus, about Caddroe's action. Being sharply reproved for his neglect, the cleric was told to hasten with all speed, and to command the pupil to desist from his purpose. Soon Beanus followed, and asking, why his relative had been inflamed with such rage, was told, that honour or duty urged him to assist his fosterers. These reproved the old man's efforts, in soothing the youth's anger. A test was proposed, that Cadroe's Book of Gospels should be produced and opened. The first text read was this: "Of him, that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again."<sup>42</sup> This not pleasing the young man, another text was produced, "All that take the sword shall perish by the sword."<sup>43</sup> Again was it necessary to have recourse to the Book, in order to procure Cadroe's obedience. This text Scotia had been introduced into Albanian Scotia.

<sup>40</sup> The Bollandists consider it likely enough, he was Cadroe's father's brother, inasmuch as he is called an old man. Colgan remarks, that there were many Irish saints, bearing this name; yet, it does not seem necessary to notice the dates of their festivals, for the Bollandists remark, that our saint's instructor may not belong to the number, and that he may not have been an Irishman.

<sup>41</sup> It is observed, by Colgan, that in his day, there was a noble and an ancient family of Southern Connaught, called O'Mattadhan, or O'Madden; but, he would not assert this family name had been derived from the present Mattadanus. However, it is remarkable, that during his age, and in that of his brother, St. Cadroe, many bearing the former name are known to have lived in Ireland, as instanced in our annalistic entries. Thus, in Sil-nannchada, its chief Mattadanus died, A.D. 1008. Thus, at A.D. 947, Mattadanus, the son of Aidus, King of Ultonia, was killed; and again, at A.D. 1005, Mattadanus, the son of Domhnall, King of Ultonia, was slain, at Down. Colgan seems to hold it as probable, the latter was related to St. Cadroe's family, inferring that it belonged to Ulster, as did also the St. Beanus, mentioned in the Life. Again, he thinks, that the Dalfiatach family, from whom these kings descended, lived away from the eastern shore of Loch Eachach, or Lough Neagh, so that, when Cadroe returned home from Armagh, this would seem to be the sea over which he sailed. Colgan also supposes, that St. Brigid's church, in which Cadroe prayed, was to be found in the same tribe-land. The Bollandist editor urges, however, as an objection, that from Ultonia, too, the Albanian Scots derive their common origin, language and names, so that little can be inferred, from the name of Mattadanus, to elucidate Caddroe's native place.

<sup>42</sup> St. Luke, vi. 30.

was then quoted : "Thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all the debt, because thou besoughtest me : shouldst not thou then have had compassion, also, on thy fellow-servant, even as I had compassion on thee?"<sup>44</sup> Cadroe then yielded to the entreaties of Beanus, and returned to his studies and devout course of life. While the old man Beanus rested one day on his bed, and Kaddroe, with his companions, reposed near ; the Blessed Virgin appeared, so full of years, as if she belonged not to that century, but having a countenance brighter than the sun, while clothed in a septiform garment of wonderful magnificence and of an intricate pattern. This vision filled the old man with delight, so that he enquired who she was, and whence she came. She then said : "I wisdom dwell in counsel, and am present in learned thoughts."<sup>45</sup> Afterwards, she expressed a desire, that the young man might be given to her, and then she vanished from Beanus' view. Meantime, a great desire possessed Cadroe, to engage on the study of humanities,<sup>46</sup> and, to gratify his tastes, Beanus prepared whatever was necessary, to send him on his way to Ireland,<sup>47</sup> and to fit him out for the schools, at Armagh. Here, after being imbued with a knowledge of the Divine precepts, he did not fear to acquire secular learning, which even serves to elucidate the more necessary science.<sup>48</sup> In his extensive course of studies, Cadroe surpassed all his class-fellows ; and, we are informed, that he read, whatever the Poet sung, the Orator spoke, and the Philosopher thought. Nothing escaped his research ; he learned the sciences, which treat about number, measure and weight,<sup>49</sup> touch and hearing ;<sup>50</sup> he was able to describe the most occult courses, and the spaces occupied by the stars.<sup>51</sup> Thus instructed, he crossed the sea, and returned to Beanus. Then, throughout the whole of Scotia, he faithfully spread that good seed, he had gleaned among his fellow-servants ; for, although the Scots had many pedagogues, they had few masters, and Cadroe greatly spread a knowledge of the arts among them. Wherefore, as his lips taught science to many, affliction fled from him ; for, from the time of his arrival, none of the learned had crossed the sea, but they remained in Ireland.<sup>52</sup> His aged relative was rejoiced to find the improvement in Cadroe, and in all he did or attempted, no other person was known to excel him. Besides, old Beanus prayed God to direct him, while the youth was growing to man's estate ; when, one night, fatigued with vigil and with singing the Divine praises, he rested on his bed. While between asleep and awake, he beheld the vision of a great assembly. Wondering what this could mean,

<sup>43</sup> See St. Matt. xxvi. 52.

<sup>44</sup> St. Matt. xviii. 32, 33.

<sup>45</sup> Prov. viii. 12.

<sup>46</sup> The Acts have "secularibus tradatur studiis."

<sup>47</sup> Colgan would have us believe, that our saint was not living out of Ireland, at this time ; but, the context of his Acts seems to favour a different idea, and the Bollandist editor observes, that until Colgan could point out a Hibernia and an Artmacha outside of Hibernia itself, that opinion should be held.

<sup>48</sup> His Acts state, Cadroe or Beanus knew, that Plato the Pagan Philosopher, moved thereto by the fame of Jeremias, went to Egypt, and from a conference held with this prophet, he found out, what he did not previously know, the existence of one God over all things. Stephanus, with several other Doctors and Historians, held a like opinion.

<sup>49</sup> This refers, we presume, to the science of arithmetic and mensuration.

<sup>50</sup> This indicates his knowledge of natural philosophy.

<sup>51</sup> This seems referable to the theoretic knowledge of astronomy, taught then in Irish Schools. The Acts thus state, "ad ultimum astrorum occultos tractus et cursus radio doctius Egino, quo nescio an aliquis in cœli Hierarchia probator sit, designavit."

<sup>52</sup> The meaning of this sentence, in the original, is difficult to be understood. To us, it seems most probable, that the students who came from Scotland to Ireland mostly remained in the latter country. It cannot be supposed to mean, that no learned men had emigrated from Ireland, before that time ; for, such a conjecture must be in conflict, with the most notorious facts of European history.

one of those persons composing it presented a most reverential appearance, and said to Beanus, "It is now expedient to increase the army of the eternal king." Then, to the rest he spoke, "Do you inscribe the names of youths who shall run in the sight of this directing leader, who comes leaping in the mountains and passing over the hills. He tells us, to show this man beholding us, what they must pass over." Then, Beanus saw three caves, dug out of the earth; two of these were not of great extent, but the third cave was one of immense depth and width. Beyond it, however, seemed a region of splendour and agreeableness. The old man asked, what was meant by such a portent; and, he was told, that if his youth desired their leader's favour, they must pass over these caves. Beanus especially feared for Kaddroe, but he was told not to dread, because all should accomplish the feat, in a dissimilar way, and that his relative, for whom he had most fear, should be the first to cross in a successful manner. He was told, likewise, the meaning attached to those three caves. The first cave signified, a voluntary relinquishing of temporal possessions; the second, exile from one's country; and the third, the exercise of a monastic life. In fine, their opposite bank betokened the possession of eternal happiness. Then, the vision ceased, the old man arose from his bed, nor had many days elapsed, until the Lord said to Kaddroe, "Depart from thy country and kindred, and from the house of thy father, and go to the land, I shall show thee, and I shall make you the leader of my people, and I shall exalt you above the clouds, and I shall grant you the inheritance of Jacob, thy father." Awaking from sleep, Cadroe had a great desire to commence his pilgrimage, and to leave all things; but, rumours spread his intentions abroad, and rich and poor were alike grieved. As if this were a national calamity, people of every age and condition, in Scotia, sent their remonstrances and objections to him.<sup>53</sup> These caused him to reconsider his determination. We are told, that it was his custom, to seek in solitude a great tree, beside a river. Lest this should carry him off in its current, he held a rope attached to the tree; and, divesting himself of garments, during the coldest nights of the year, he plunged into the water, and remained there, until he recited from the one hundred and eighteenth to the one hundred and thirty-third psalm.<sup>54</sup> But, Cadroe's purpose began to revive, although winter had now come, and the sea was very rough. Not only the people of Scotia, but the king, who is called Constantine,<sup>55</sup> sought this time, to divert him from his intention. Especially, while he was praying in the church of St. Brigid,<sup>56</sup> both nobles and commonality flocked thither; but, that King Constantine, mentioned in the text; while, he thinks, the circumstances of time, place, affinity, dignity, &c., are favourable to such a supposition. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 650, 651, 762, 763. The Bollandists state, however, that the Constantine meant was not he, who, according to Major, took the monastic habit, A.D. 941, and who lived, in that state, for fifteen years; but, rather Malcolm then reigned, although the author of our saint's Acts was ignorant of this fact.

<sup>53</sup> The Bollandists remark, that at this time, Caddroe had already passed his fortieth year.

<sup>54</sup> Such austere practices of penance often are mentioned, in the Acts of our Celtic saints.

<sup>55</sup> Colgan will have it, as probable, that since Constantine O'Neill flourished in Ultonia, about A.D. 850—probably Conn, son of Donnchadh, heir apparent to the sovereignty, slain, A.D. 942, is here meant—and, as he was of royal stock, belonging to the Kinel-Eoghan, he deserved the title of king, over that province, following the Irish custom. According to race and prospects, he might have been regarded as the future king of Ireland. Again, we find Aedh, son of Conn, and royal heir of Oilcach, was slain, A.D. 1009 or 1010. Colgan knows of no other more likely than he, to have been

<sup>56</sup> Both in Ireland, and in Scotland, several different saints, named Brigid, are venerated. The Bollandists think, this one was St. Brigid, related to Granard, King of the Picts, and who lived about the end of the seventh century, she having been interred at Abernethy.

when they urged him, not to desert their country, Kaddroe answered, "I shall not leave you, since wherever I may be, I shall keep you in my memory." Where the church of St. Brigid was situated has been disputed. According to Colgan,<sup>57</sup> it lay within that district, now known as Kílbride parish, in the barony of Upper Antrim, and not many miles north-eastwards from the town of Antrim<sup>58</sup>—where yet are a remarkable Round Tower<sup>59</sup> and other antiquarian remains—in that county, bearing the like name. However, the Bollandists hold, that the site of this church must probably be sought for at Abernethy,<sup>60</sup> in Scotland, and about fifteen miles distant from St. Andrew's.<sup>61</sup> In a matter of such difficulty, we shall not undertake to offer an opinion; but, it is related, in his Acts, that St. Cadroe's reply did not satisfy those, who were assembled in St. Brigid's church. They insisted, <sup>57</sup> This is rather inferred, from the theory he advances, that probably St. Cadroe drew his origin, from the territory of Hy-Tuirtre, and from the Dalfiatach family. Regarding the extent of Hy-Tuirtre, the reader is referred to its description, in the Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix, BB., pp. 292 to 297.

Round Tower of Antrim.

<sup>58</sup> The parish of Antrim is situated, within the baronies of Upper Antrim and Upper Toome. It is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 43, 44, 49, 50. The town itself is within the barony of Upper Antrim, and it is shown on Sheet 50. Ibid.

<sup>59</sup> A course drawing, and a notice of this object, appear in Dr. Adam Clarke's "Works," vol. xi., p. 80; as also, in the "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. ii., No. 55, pp. 17, 18. The notice in this latter case was written by S. M'Skimin. The doorway of this tower is beautifully represented and described, in Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," &c., part ii., sect. iii., subs. 3, pp. 403, 404. The engraving of the round tower, which is here introduced, was taken by Mrs. Millard, from a photograph, by Frederick H. Mares, 79 Grafton-street, Dublin. Near this, it is supposed, the original church of Antrim stood. Within the present century, vast quantities of human remains were cleared away from the adjoining space, and now only a smooth sward and trees surround it.

<sup>60</sup> There is a very interesting account of this place, a parish chiefly in Perthshire, and partly in Fifeshire, in Fullarton's "Imperial Gazetteer of Scotland," vol. i., pp. 22 to 24.

<sup>61</sup> This is where the king-monk Constantine lived.

that the relics of saints there venerated should be produced, and laid before him, to oblige his consent to their wishes. He replied : " If you bring the saints' relics, for the purpose of compelling me to renounce my will, ask their suffrages with me, that I may discover, whither the road of salvation leads, as Christ hath not taken into account your desires, when offering a reward to those, who leave father, mother, brothers and sisters. Again, when Abraham, in obedience to God, went out from his country, and from the house of his father, it was reputed to him as justification."<sup>62</sup> In vain, the king and people insisted on his compliance with their wishes ; his parents threatened to detain him by force, even by having him committed to prison. Cadroe only replied, " This you can do, but so long as I shall be kept in chains, I shall neither eat nor drink." Then came a wise abbot to the king, and he was called Mailedarius.<sup>63</sup> He said : " If we cannot turn this man from his purpose, we can at least help him on his way, and thus have a co-operation in his labours." Then, the people collected gold and silver, garments and horses, as an outfit, when having obtained the abbot's blessing, and escorted by the king himself,<sup>64</sup> Cadroe set out for the land of Cumbria.<sup>65</sup> A certain ruler, named Douenaldus,<sup>66</sup> who was related to our saint, then governed that district, and came out to meet him with great joy. Having remained for a time, Douenaldus brought him to a city, named Loida,<sup>67</sup> or Loidis, now Leeds, which lay on the borders, between the Normans<sup>68</sup> and the Cumbrians. There he was received, by a certain nobleman, named Gunderic, by whom he was brought to King Erichius,<sup>69</sup> in a city, called Euroacum.<sup>70</sup> The wife of this latter had been related to Kaddroe. Thence he departed for the city of Lungdina,<sup>71</sup> thought to be London, on the River Thames, and here he dwelt with an old man, named Hegfrid, by whom he had been received. This happened, towards the middle of the tenth century. While here, a great fire broke out one night, and the chief part of the city was consumed, when Hegfrid besought his guest to offer up prayers for the safety of what remained. Rushing between that part, which had been burned down, and that which stood, Caddroe

<sup>62</sup> Genesis xii., 1, 2, 3.

<sup>63</sup> According to the Irish Calendars, there is a St. Maelodhar of Bri-molt venerated, at the 16th of July, and a St. Maeldobhar, at the 25th of October ; but, Colgan does not affirm, that either is meant here, nor would the Bollandists admit the affirmative, even if asserted.

<sup>64</sup> This was probably some king of Scotland, living at that time.

<sup>65</sup> This is intended for Cambria, the ancient name of Wales.

<sup>66</sup> The Bollandists state, that this name is identical with Domnaldus or Domnalus, and that he was the same as Dummilus, King of Cumbria, who is mentioned by Matthew of Westminster in his " Flores Historiarum," at A.D. 946. See p. 366. King Edmund made over his country in that year to Malcolm I., King of the British Scots, and accordingly after the visit of St. Cadroe to him.

<sup>67</sup> The Bollandists are of opinion, that this place may have had its denomination from a great forest, which Camden states to have been on the borders of Northumbria, and beyond the Pictish wall. This was known as the forest of Lovves, which seems like the Latin, Loida. It was on the northern bank of the River Tripallus.

<sup>68</sup> According to Colgan, at that time Northumbria was subject to the Danes or Northmen, and thus is the name Normanns, as here written, to be understood.

<sup>69</sup> He is called Iricius, by William of Malsbury, in " De Gestis Anglorum," lib. ii., cap. vii. Hovendon states, that King Edmund having expelled two Northumbrian rulers, Analaf and Reginald, between A.D. 947 and 955, Erius reigned for some years subsequently, over the Kingdom of Northumbria. This Eric had been driven from Norway, by his brother Haco, and he had wandered for years an ocean pirate, until he landed in Northumbria, where he was immediately saluted as king. See Dr. Lingard's " History of England," vol. i., chap. iv., pp. 210, 211. In fine, Analaf, the fugitive prince, overcame him in battle, and Eric, sometimes called Eilric, perished A.D. 950, in the wilds of Stanemoor, through the treachery of Count Osulf, and the sword of Macco, the son of Analaf. See Matthew of Westminster, " Flores Historiarum," p. 369.

<sup>70</sup> For this, we should more correctly read, Eboracum, the present Archbishopal city of York.

<sup>71</sup> By the ancients, it is variedly called Lundinum, Londinum, Lugdina, Longdonia, and Lundoia.

turned his eyes and heart towards heaven, in prayer, and then raising his hand caused the flames to cease. Thus was the city saved from destruction, and the inhabitants, giving praise to God, did not fail to proclaim the merits of his great servant Cadroe. It would seem, that during this time, King Edmund reigned in England,<sup>72</sup> and his palace or fortress was in the city of Winde-castra,<sup>73</sup> now Winchester.<sup>74</sup> He greatly desired to see our saint, when the latter remained with and delighted him, for a time, by his agreeable society. The Bishop of Wilton,<sup>75</sup> St. Odo,<sup>76</sup> conducted Caddroe to a port, called Limen or Leman.<sup>77</sup> There embarking, with his companions, on some vessels, a storm arose, and they were driven back again to the shore. This caused great anxiety, for they were nearly shipwrecked; and, after a day of privation and exhaustion, Cadroe lay down on a bed, when he was advised, in a vision, to leave his nephew and some companions behind him, so that he might arrive prosperously at that place, for which they were bound. Wherefore, having related this admonition to his companions, Caddroe's nephew, having obtained a vehicle and some money to bear his travelling charges, was sent home. Then, the remaining missionaries embarked, and after a favourable passage, they reached the port of Boulogne. It has been stated, that Cadroe left, in company with Saints Maccallan,<sup>78</sup> Fingen,<sup>79</sup> Lasarus<sup>80</sup> and others, and about the year 946, or at least after 940.<sup>81</sup> After landing, they journeyed on to the Monastery of Perrone, where our saint asked St. Fursey<sup>82</sup> in prayer, to show where they were to serve God. Then, the Blessed Fursey appeared, in a nightly vision, and declared to our saint, that he should change his place. Herswindis, a noble, devout, and wealthy matron lived near, and the thirteen pilgrims, who had arrived, were invited to her house. They thought to elect St. Cadroe, as their superior, but he declined that office; when, they agreed, that St. Maccallan<sup>83</sup> should be their abbot over a Monastery, known as St. Michael, in the wood of Therasche, where they lived by the labour of their hands, and aided by the munificence of Herswindis, and of her husband, Count Eilbert. But, Cadroe sought the monastic habit, at Floriacum, or Fleury, under a holy superior, who is called Erchenald or Erkembald.<sup>84</sup> This happened on the Feast of St. Paul's conversion.<sup>85</sup> In like manner, St. Maccallan desired to live as a simple monk, under Agnoald, Abbot over Gorzé, in Lorraine. Through the earnest solicitations of Herswindes, both were brought back to St. Michael's Monastery,

<sup>72</sup> From A.D. 941 to 946.

<sup>73</sup> The Latin name for it is Wintonia.

<sup>74</sup> Bishop Milner has written a very interesting and learned "History of Winchester."

<sup>75</sup> This town is of great antiquity, and derives its name from the River Wily. It is supposed, by Baxter, to have been formerly the Caer-Guilo, or capital of the British Prince Caroilus, and subsequently a seat of the West Saxon kings. In 905, it was erected into an episcopal see, for the district of Wiltshire. About the beginning of King Athelstan's reign, dating from A.D. 925 to 941, St. Odo became its bishop, and in 942, he was translated to be Archbishop of Canterbury. Wilton is 85 miles W.S.W. from London.

<sup>76</sup> His feast is kept on the 4th of July, and he died at a great age, A.D. 961. He appears to have been Archbishop of Canterbury, when he first knew St. Cadroe.

<sup>77</sup> Ptolomy calls it Almyr. Camden tells us, it was thirty miles from London, but only eight from Dover or Canterbury. It was called Westhyt, and later still Hyth, a town most convenient for a passage over to Gallic Belgium, but latterly much choked, at the port, with drifting sea-sand.

<sup>78</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of January.

<sup>79</sup> See his Life, at the 5th of February.

<sup>80</sup> His identity has not been discovered.

<sup>81</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xxiii., sect. ii., and n. 4, pp. 396, 398.

<sup>82</sup> See his Life, at the 16th of January.

<sup>83</sup> By Flodoard, he is called Maccalinus.

<sup>84</sup> According to Claude Robart, in the "Gallia Christiana," he immediately succeeded St. Odo, of Cluny, who died on the 18th of November, and according to Flodoard, A.D. 943. See the catalogue of the Abbots of Fleury. He is said, by Butler, to have become a monk at St. Bennet's on the Loire.

<sup>85</sup> On the 25th of January.

at Thierasche. Again, the Abbey of Wasor,<sup>86</sup> called in Latin Valcidorus, or Vallis decora, was situated in the diocese and province of Namur, in Belgium. It was founded, A.D. 944, by Count Eilbert and his wife Heresinde, under the invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and it became a celebrated Benedictine institute.<sup>87</sup> It was situated on the Meuse. This foundation was afterwards united to the congregation of Bursfeld.<sup>88</sup> St. Malcallan was called upon to preside over both of these foundations; but, finding that he could not conveniently govern both houses, he wished to resign Wasor to Cadroe's care. Several joined their entreaties to Malcallan's, and notwithstanding Cadroe's reluctance, his humility and desire to avoid scandal compelled him to consent, especially as King Otho I., then king, and afterwards German Emperor, compelled him. Early distinguished for zeal and piety, it has been stated, that Cadroe lived under the rule of a venerated master, Forannan,<sup>89</sup> in the Monastery of Wasor, until the death of the latter, at that place. This, however, is a statement, by no means warranted, from the Acts of our saint as published; and, in point of fact, the best informed writers assert, that St. Forannan succeeded him as superior over this establishment. While, in all his actions, Cadroe kept the example of his great predecessor and master in view; his devotions and religious austerities were remarkable, and his great celebrity brought numbers to embrace a religious life, subject to his rule. Among these was a nobleman, named Gircrus,<sup>90</sup> who having received a wound from a knife, while engaged in the kitchen, he was miraculously healed by the holy abbot. Herswindes had founded another religious establishment, about two miles from St. Michael's Monastery, and there she had a number of nuns to serve the Lord, at a place called Buccelum.<sup>91</sup> Here, one of the nuns, supposed to be possessed by an evil spirit, received relief, through the ministry of St. Cadroe. Then, his fame had culminated, and Adalberus, the noble and pious Bishop of Metz, called to his councils two venerable men, named Agenaldus<sup>92</sup> and Ansteus,<sup>93</sup> from whom he enquired about Cadroe, and obtained the most favourable report. The latter came to celebrate the festival of the holy martyr Gorgonius,<sup>94</sup> and a great multitude of persons happened to be present on this occasion. Here, influence was brought to bear on Cadroe, so that he might leave Wasor, and take upon himself the government of a place, not far from Metz, where the bodies and relics of many saints had been long preserved, but which was then in a sadly neglected condition. Having consented to assume the charge of souls, Cadroe selected some of his religious, at Wasor, to aid his future labours. Dr. Lanigan says, that Cadroe left an abbot there, in 954 or 955, when he removed to Metz.<sup>95</sup> But, the Acts of our saint have it, that the religious, who remained, selected one of their own choice;<sup>96</sup> yet, it was not a fortunate

<sup>86</sup> It was also called Waulsor, Walcourt, and Vallencourt.

<sup>87</sup> Otho I., King and afterwards Emperor of Germany, confirmed this foundation, A.D. 946. See "Gallia Christiana," toms iii., col. 570.

<sup>88</sup> No less than fifty-two abbots of this house are commemorated. See L'Abbé Migne's "Dictionnaire des Abbayes et Monastères, on Histoire des Etablissements Religieux érigés en tout Temps et en tous Lieux," &c., col. 827.

<sup>89</sup> See his Life, at the 30th of April.

<sup>90</sup> Nothing further is known regarding him.

<sup>91</sup> This was situated on the northern bank of a stream, which flowed into the River

Æsia, between Veruinum and Capella.

<sup>92</sup> He died A.D. 962, or the year immediately preceding it.

<sup>93</sup> He was a monk of Gorze, and he was created Abbot of St. Arnulph, A.D. 944. He died, A.D. 960.

<sup>94</sup> His feast occurs on the 9th of September. He suffered at Rome, with St. Dorotheus. St. Chrodegangus, Bishop of Metz, transferred his body to Gorze, A.D. 765, according to Bishop Milo, in his Treatise, "De Passione, Translatione, et Miraculis S. Gorgonii," which was inscribed to Immon, Abbot of Gorze.

<sup>95</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xxiii., sect. 4, p. 404.

<sup>96</sup> After Immonus, it is related, in the selection, nor did he note the words of the Prophet Ezechiel: "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman to the House of Israel; and thou shalt hear the word out of my mouth, and shalt tell it them from me. But, if thou give warning to the wicked, and he be not converted from his wickedness, and from his evil way; he indeed shall die in his iniquity, but thou hast delivered thy soul."<sup>97</sup> Having taken charge of the place, near Metz, Cadroe began to set about its restoration. Men and women flocked thither from the city each day, while clerics, monks and nuns were desirous of receiving counsel from him, and every manner of comfort in their spiritual necessities. He was loved and venerated for his disinterestedness: he felt solicitude for the souls of all: he had compassion for the sinner, and he rejoiced with those, who received joy and blessings. On account of such great virtues, holy conversation, and prudent moderation, he was named abbot of the house, by the Bishop of Metz, and with the unanimous approval of his religious brethren. This elevation took place in 980, according to the "Chronicon Valciodorensis;" but, this is manifestly an error, founded on the supposition, that he succeeded Forannan as Abbot of Wasor.<sup>98</sup> A very serious mistake has been made, by the Sanmarthann, brothers,<sup>99</sup> when stating, that St. Cadroe or Cadroetus, a Scot, had been called from Luxeu, A.D. 929,<sup>100</sup> and that he lived there with his companions, Otbert and Maximinus. At this early period, our saint is stated to have presided over the Monastery of St. Felix and of St. Clement, at Metz.<sup>101</sup> St. Cadroe paid a visit to Wasor, when the Feast of Blessed Gorgonius again came round; for, he desired to meet Wltmarus or Womarus,<sup>102</sup> Abbot at Ghent, and Aledrandus,<sup>103</sup> Abbot of Gemblours Monastery.<sup>104</sup> Cadroe had already passed the fort of Brieu, and his companions urged him to take some refreshment, at an hour earlier than usual, because they had arrived at an agreeable spot, where a spring of water was to be found. Cadroe turned to them and spoke in the words of holy writ: "Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and when thy princes eat in the morning."<sup>106</sup> Then he told them, that there and everywhere else, God could produce water. His companions assented, and remained fasting, until they had entered a meadow; when Cadroe said: "Behold, brethren, a "Chronicon Walciodorensis," that Godefridus, from the church of Rheims, was elected abbot, but we are not told for what length of time he presided. However, owing to his insolent behaviour, the monks expelled him. The Bollandists rather favour the conjecture, that he immediately succeeded St. Cadroe, as this passage in his Acts seems to indicate.

<sup>97</sup> Ezechiel iii., 17, 19.

<sup>98</sup> Relying on the authority of the Bollandists, Dr. Lanigan makes Cadroe successor to Macallin, whom he considers first Abbot of Wasor. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xxiii., sect. 4, p. 404.

<sup>99</sup> See "Gallia Christiana," tomus iv., p. 267.

<sup>100</sup> At this period, he had not even landed in France.

<sup>101</sup> They profess to give a list of the abbots of this establishment, compiled from documents, furnished by Peter de Crochets, Prior of St. Arnulph. But, the Bollandists, who took care to examine the original documents, could find in them nothing to warrant such statements, nor could confirmation of these be obtained from any other source.

<sup>102</sup> In the Chronicle of St. Bavo, a manuscript relating to the Abbots of Ghent, we find this name written Womarus. He is said to have succeeded the Abbot Hugo, A.D. 955, and to have died on the sixth Kalends of September, A.D. 982.

<sup>103</sup> Colgan thinks he was the same as Erluinus, Abbot of Gemblours, deprived of sight, A.D. 958, and who died A.D. 987. Therefore, he considers the event, related in the text, to have occurred before the former year, as it was not likely a blind man would have made this journey on foot. But, Aledandrus was substituted for Erluinus, as abbot, and during the lifetime of the latter, he died A.D. 986.

<sup>104</sup> It is called Gemmelaus, in a charter of Otho, given A.D. 946. See Miræus' "In Notitia Ecclesiarum Belgii," cap. 56.

<sup>105</sup> Colgan thinks this was the Castrum Barris, or Barrense, built A.D. 951, by Frederick, son of Richimet, Duke of Lotharinga, and brother to Aberon, Bishop of Metz, according to Frodoard.

<sup>106</sup> Ecclesiastes x., 16.

place suitable for our purpose." When they complained, that no water was there fit for use, Cadroe replied: "Despair not, for the hand of God can give water to his servants, since he ordered water to issue from the dry rock for his people who were murmuring." There was a reedy turf in the place, and raising a sod, abundant water issued from the earth. Then turning to his companions, Cadroe said, "The clemency of the Almighty hath sent this water to reward your charity, that you may learn how Christian charity is always rich." Then, having partaken of their meal, their journey was resumed; and, the fountain remaining, at the time when St. Cadroe's Acts were written, was a standing testimony of his merits before God. The interests of the religious house, consigned to his care, required that he should go to Count Frederick,<sup>107</sup> called the Duke, and by him our saint was kindly and courteously received. Running forward to receive him, Cadroe placed the staff he bore behind him, thinking one of his companions had been there to receive it; when the Acts state, that a ray of sun-beam shot from the window, and on it the staff remained suspended.<sup>108</sup> On returning from Wasor<sup>109</sup> to Metz,<sup>110</sup> he ordered a young ward to accompany him, and by making the sign of the cross over his eyes, these were healed of a grievous infirmity, which seized on them during that journey.<sup>111</sup> Again, he miraculously healed a young man, who was wasting away with fever, nearly a whole year. Another Scottish monk, called Lazarus,<sup>112</sup> lived with him in the monastery. He was reduced to the last extremity, by a fever, and the man of God happened to come, when that monk lay on the ground, and, as was thought, at the very point of death. Cadroe, taking his hands and making a sign of the cross, ordered him to lie on the bed for a while. To the great admiration of all, the sick monk recovered, and was soon able to use his feet. According to the Psalmist, the Lord "will do the will of them that fear him, and he will hear their prayer, and save them."<sup>113</sup> So were his mercies manifested through St. Cadroe. The humility of this holy man was very remarkable; his abstinence and frugality were admirable; his patience was almost superhuman; but, his charity was above all praise. At one time, John,<sup>114</sup> Abbot of Gorze, who was a pillar in the temple of God, had been obliged to lie down on his bed, owing to weakness, brought on through his excessive fasts. Knowing this, Cadroe visited Gorze, and ordered certain nutritious food to be prepared, for their joint refecton. This John refused to touch, at first, but, being commanded by Cadroe, who set the example, the abbot's pious scruples were removed. This obedience was the cause of returning health. Near Metz was a large convent of St. Peter,<sup>115</sup> and there the incomparable Abbess Helvidis<sup>116</sup> presided over a large community of nuns. One

<sup>107</sup> Colgan supposes, that from being Count of Barrense, he became Duke of Lotharingia. Yet, by Lotharingia must not be understood the whole province, but only that part of it, on the Moselle, of which he was made first Duke or beneficiary, as Rosiers, Miræus, and other writers, state. However, the Bollandists correct Colgan's conclusions, by observing, that the fort Barrense had its name, from being commenced about the year 970, as a "barra, seu repagulum contra Francos."

<sup>108</sup> Legends similar to this often occur in the Acts of Celtic saints.

<sup>109</sup> The Bollandists observe, that it would appear, St. Cadroe did not wholly resign his care of Wasor, until the arrival of Forannan, even while some irregularities prevailed there, shortly before the latter assumed charge.

<sup>110</sup> This celebrated city of Lorraine is situated on the Moselle River.

<sup>111</sup> Colgan remarks, that when the author of our saint's Acts wrote, there was living a witness of this great miracle.

<sup>112</sup> Colgan does not think the present monk's name is to be found in our Irish Calendars, although the etymon was common enough in Ireland.

<sup>113</sup> Psalms cxliv., 19.

<sup>114</sup> His feast occurs at the 27th of February.

<sup>115</sup> This was founded in the seventh century, by St. Baldric, whose sister St. Bova first ruled over it, and then their relative St. Doda, venerated at the 24th of April. The

of these was thought to have been possessed; and, as Cadroe knew this sort of demon was not to be cast out, save by prayer and fasting, being invited to the place, and thus fortified against him, the holy man cast out the evil spirit. When Adelbero, Bishop of Metz, had finished his thirty-five years of administration,<sup>117</sup> Theodoric,<sup>118</sup> belonging to the Imperial family,<sup>119</sup> and a man of singular ability, was called to succeed him by universal acclaim.<sup>120</sup> The rank of his family obliged him to engage much in temporal affairs; however, this did not prevent him from building and repairing churches. He desired, likewise, to collect memorials, relics and bodies of the saints, from every quarter, and to translate them into his diocese. He also loved the society of holy men, and especially was there a mutual affection, between himself and Blessed Cadroe; while, through his influence, our holy abbot and his religious had their house suitably endowed, while he desired the counsel and care of his devoted friend.<sup>121</sup> The Emperor Otho granted certain possessions and immunities to the Abbey of St. Felix<sup>122</sup> and of St. Clement,<sup>123</sup> in Metz, during the time Cadroe governed it, while he undertook to be its special protector.<sup>124</sup> It would seem, that our saint, in 960, reformed this house,<sup>125</sup> and ruled, likewise, over the Monastery of St. Symphorianus, while he lived there.<sup>126</sup> A history of the original foundation is given, and an account of the various restorations, by the brothers Sanmarthann.<sup>127</sup> Our saint visited Helvidis, who was stopping at a place, called Corruptala; but, she complained that a sufficiency of meat was not to be had, for the purpose of entertaining himself and his companions. However, he declared to her, that the Lord should miraculously supply this want; when a deer, chased by dogs, fell over an adjoining precipice, and broke his limbs, so that, the flesh of this animal was served up for refection of the guests. Being now famed for his miracles and virtues, the Blessed Cadroe desired to be dissolved, and to be with Christ. The Empress Dowager Adeleide,<sup>128</sup> the mother of the invincible Sanmarthann state, that Adalberon, Bishop of Metz, had it restored under the rule of St. Benedict.

<sup>116</sup> The Sanmarthann place Helvidis Abbe's the thirteenth in order, and state that she died on the 17th of January, A.D. 1160; but, the Bollandists observe, that the order and date must be changed, if the present holy woman be intended, as they seem to suspect.

<sup>117</sup> He died, A.D. 964, according to Claude Robert, in the "Gallia Christiana." The greater part of St. Cadroe's Acts appertain to his pontificate.

<sup>118</sup> He was the son of Duke Frederic, by Beatrice, the sister of Hugh Capet, according to Claude Robert.

<sup>119</sup> He was a cousin-german to the Emperor Otho, the Great, as Siebert states in his "Chronicle," at A.D. 964.

<sup>120</sup> He sat for twenty years, and died A.D. 984. Siebert of Gemblours wrote his Life.

<sup>121</sup> Siebert relates, that an angel had given St. Clement the first letters, according to name, of the Bishops of Metz: here some names were inscribed in gold, and some in other baser metals, according to their relative degrees of merit. Theodoric's initial letter was wrought in silver, but he said he should do so much for the bishopric, that it ought to be inscribed in gold.

<sup>122</sup> This was the name it received at first, from St. Felix, the third Bishop of Metz. It was near the gate of St. Theobald, and on the declivity of a hill, near the small stream, called Sallia. His feast occurs on the 21st of February.

<sup>123</sup> This holy man was first Bishop of Metz, and his place was known as Ad-basilicas, where he lived as a recluse. The feast of St. Clement was held on the Sixth Nones of May, according to the Kalendars.

<sup>124</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus iii., lib. lxx., sect. xxiii., p. 500. Also, tomus iv., lib. l., sect. lxi., p. 74.

<sup>125</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 294.

<sup>126</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus iii., lib. xlvii., sect. xxiv., p. 594. Colgan arrives at the conclusion, that this was a different one from the monastery of St. Felix and of St. Clement, although likewise outside the walls of Metz. The Emperor Otho III. granted a charter A.D. 992, in favour of Fingen, an Irishman, whom Colgan thinks to have been its first abbot.

<sup>127</sup> See "Gallia Christiana," tomus iv., p. 267.

<sup>128</sup> Relying on the ambiguous authority of William of Malmsbury, lib. ii., cap. v., Colgan makes her daughter to Edward, King of England, sister to Athelstan and Edmund,

Emperor Otho, had a great affection towards Cadroe and his religious. On her way to Italy, she arrived at a place, called Neheristeim,<sup>129</sup> on the banks of the River Rhine. Thence she sent a message to Metz, with an entreaty, that Cadroe should come to visit her. Although he knew, that his days were fast drawing to a close; yet, being pressed by the messengers, and by the prelate Deodericus,<sup>130</sup> Cadroe charitably yielded to her request, and patiently set about the completion of his journey. On the way, he informed some of his attendant brothers, that death was fast impending, and a great grief oppressed them. To console them, he said, "The Angel of good counsel shall not desert you, my brethren, unless you first leave him. Receive the Lord's commands, with great eagerness, fulfil his work, and he shall direct you in the way of eternal life. But, this miserable body, if my prayers have weight with you, bear to the monastery, and there inter it. If the Empress endeavour to detain me for a little time, do not oppose her wishes; for, should I die while there, let your charity bear with the privation of my interment in the monastery. As to the rest, after my death, you have wise men among you, whose advice you should take, and do not fail to remember me to the Abbess Heluidis—a better woman than her I have never found, according to my humble judgment. In Christ's name, give my farewell to the Lord Bishop, and to my other friends, while you pray them to ask God for mercy on my poor soul." In the meantime, Cadroe hastened to meet the Empress, who received him with great joy, and with every demonstration of respect. He accosted her with these words, "Know you, sovereign lady, why I came hither?" She replied, "Father, thy abounding charity hath brought thee." Then the man of God, with his sweet and radiant look, said, "Indeed, while charity compelled me to come, necessity urged, also, that coming I might ask a license."<sup>131</sup> The meaning of this he knew, although the Empress did not. When his visit had been prolonged for four days or more, the pious lady yet urged his stay, and engaged the bishops present to request it. Then Cadroe, turning to his monks, said, "Alas! brothers, you must hasten to leave, for my death is fast approaching, and yield not to those petitions, if you desire to bear my body to your monastery." Still the Empress entreated him to stop for two days longer, and with great reluctance, he consented. This was a subject of joy to his royal hostess, but when the dinner hour came, she sat down to table, with her noble company. Suddenly they were alarmed by a great fire breaking out, and a man, falling from a great height, and having his legs broken, was brought to Cadroe, who miraculously restored him to health. All the chiefs congratulated him on his merits, but this hurt his humility, and he besought them to speak no more on such a topic. The two days having elapsed, and the Empress still deferring her permission for his departure, a fever seized him, and soon his strength was completely exhausted. Calling his monks around him, he recommended them

King of England, wife to Otho I. and mother to Otho II. This account, we have incorrectly followed, also, in our notices of St. Fingen, at the 5th of February, n. 18. But, by Colgan, the Ethilda, mentioned by William of Malmesbury, is thought to have been identical with Adeleide. Yet, the Bollandists show, that the latter was daughter to Rudolph, King of the Burgundians, and of his queen Bertha, daughter to Burchard, Duke of the Alemanni. Adeleide married King Hugo, at first, and after his death, Otho became her husband. She was a person of rare virtue and accomplishments. She had the following sons by Otho: her first-born was Henry, her second was Bruno, and the third was Otho; she had a daughter, called Edidis, probably Edith.

<sup>129</sup> Or Neristen, where the Emperor Otho had an Imperial residence. See Mabillon's "Annals Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus iv., lib. I., sect. lxi., p. 74.

<sup>130</sup> He was probably living in or near the city of Metz.

<sup>131</sup> The succeeding narrative helps us little, in divining the meaning of these words, which are very obscurely expressed.

to hasten his journey, so that, if possible, he might reach his monastery alive. But, the final moment had arrived, and after the thirtieth year of his pilgrimage, and in the seventieth year of his age, Cadroe was called away to his everlasting reward in the kingdom of heaven. According to custom, the body was placed in a coffin, but, owing to some accident, the corpse was turned on one side. The saint appeared in a vision to one of the monks, and, as he was the cause of thus placing the remains, this neglect was soon set to rights. In great grief for his loss, the citizens of Metz went forth to meet his funeral, and they were joined by the inhabitants of all the surrounding districts. The memories of his goodness caused abundant tears to be shed, and while Cadroe's coffin was borne along the way, a man, who had long suffered from a fever, was immediately healed when he touched it. A grand funeral procession of the clergy, monks, nuns and people of Metz conducted the remains to that place, where he had served the Lord so faithfully during his life. An altar to his memory was constructed, in the Church of St. Felix, where his remains were deposited. He was succeeded by Fingen,<sup>132</sup> a Scottish monk, from Hibernia, and who ruled as abbot over the Monastery of St. Felix and of St. Clement. The death of St. Cadroe may probably be assigned to the 6th day of March, since all authorities seem to agree, that this was the date for his feast.<sup>133</sup> His death happened, in the year 975, according to Colgan,<sup>134</sup> and the Bollandists.<sup>135</sup> This likewise is the computation of Mabillon,<sup>136</sup> while it has been followed, by Dr. Lanigan,<sup>137</sup> and by other judicious writers. His demise is therefore very incorrectly placed, at the year 998, according to the "Chronicon Valciodorensis." A yearly commemoration was instituted in his honour, to mark the many benefits and miracles obtained, in favour of different persons, through his intercession. The many miracles wrought by him were to be found in a book of his Life, long preserved in the monasteries, where he presided with edification and profit to his religious subjects.

ARTICLE VI.—THE HOLY DAUGHTERS OF LEININ, SAINTS DRUGENIA, LUIGENIA, LUICELLA, MACHA AND RIOMTHACH, AT THE CHURCH OF KILLNA-NINGEAN, NOW SUPPOSED TO BE KILLININY, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [Sixth or Seventh Century.] In the last chapter of the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," these sisters are said to have been the daughters of Leninus, son to Garrchon, son to Donacius, the son of Conamalius, son to Colgan, son to Cronmael, son to Altius, son to Ængus, the son of Nuadatus, &c.<sup>1</sup> In the Martyrology of Tallagh, these sisters are not named, at the 6th of March; but, there they are called, Ingena Lenini, or the "daughters of Leninus."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>132</sup> See an account of him, at the 5th of February.

<sup>133</sup> Dempster, who calls him Hadrous, states, that although ignorant regarding his place of living, and sepulture, as also of his writings, yet, that he flourished as an abbot in Belgium, A.D. DCCCXXII., and the day of his death was held to be uncertain. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. viii., num. 638, pp. 339, 340.

<sup>134</sup> Or, as he states, at farthest, the year 976 was not completed, at the time, as he endeavours to show from various data.

<sup>135</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De S. Cadroe Abbate Metis in Lotharingia. Commentarius prævius, sect. ii., pp. 470, 471.

<sup>136</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Be- nediti," sæc. v. Previous observations to St. Cadroe's Acts.

<sup>137</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xxiii., sect. iii., p. 401, and n. 18, p. 402.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Thus is the pedigree traced, in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga;" but, in his "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," the names read somewhat differently, thus: The Virgin Brigid is called the daughter of Lenen, son to Ganncon, son of Donald, son to Conamla, son of Colgus, son to Cronnmal, son of Altus, son to Ængus, &c. See xvi. Januarii. Appendix ad Inventionem S. Foillani, cap. ii., p. 104. No doubt, we must make some allowance for typographical errors.

Marianus O'Gorman, Charles Maguire and the Martyrology of Donegal place the festival of these holy ladies, at the 6th of March.<sup>3</sup> The site for their church is determined, by Dr. O'Donovan,<sup>4</sup> to have been comprised, within the greater part of the barony of Rathdown, in the present county of Dublin, or in some northern part of Wicklow County. There the sept of Ui-Briuin-Cualann was located.<sup>5</sup> According to William M. Hennessy, the place where these pious ladies lived was in the southern part of the county of Killiney Church, County of Dublin.

Dublin.<sup>6</sup> It is now said to be known as Killininy,<sup>7</sup> or Kilnanaughnin, near Fir House Convent, Bohernabreena.<sup>8</sup> There is an old ruined church at Killiney,<sup>9</sup> on the sea-shore of Dublin County, and near the beautiful bay, to which the church gives name. An original sketch, engraving and description of this ruin, written by John S. Sloane, C.E.,<sup>10</sup> will convey a perfect representation and information regarding it, both to the eye and mind of an anti-

<sup>2</sup> See Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Calendar of Irish Saints," p. xvii.

<sup>3</sup> See, Colgan's "Trias. Thaumaturga," Appendix Quarta ad Acta S. Brigidæ," cap. i., p. 612.

<sup>4</sup> See "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 738, when the chieftain of Ui-Briuin-Cualann, called Dubhdothra, or "the Black Man of the Dodder," was killed. See vol. i., pp. 340, 341.

<sup>5</sup> See ibid., nn. (m, n). In it, also, Dr. O'Donovan states, that the churches of Cill-Inghine-Leinin, now Killiney, Tigh-Chon-aill, now Staggonnell, and Dunmore, are set down in O'Clerys' Calendar, as being in this territory.

<sup>6</sup> William M. Hennessy appends the following note, in his copy of the Martyrology of Donegal:—

"Cill na ningen, or Killininy, in the Parish of Tallaght, and Barony of Upper-cross. In addition I find, 'Co. Antrim (sic). Cal. Oct. 14, B. 8.'"

<sup>7</sup> It is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 22.

<sup>8</sup> This extensive townland, in the parish of Tallagh, and barony of Upper-cross, is defined on Sheets 21, 22, 24, 25 ibid. It lies along the upper Dodder, the course of which is described in D'Alton's "History of the County of Dublin," pp. 846 to 849.

<sup>9</sup> The townland and parish of Killiney are situated in the barony of Rathdown, and they are found described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin." Sheets 23, 26.

<sup>10</sup> See Antiquarian Rambles, in the County of Dublin. "Irish Literary Gazette," vol. i., No. xi., p. 169.

quarian investigator. The accompanying illustration will also present its appearance, from a different point of view, as drawn by William F. Wakeman, many years ago,<sup>11</sup> and when this building was much more perfect, than it is at present. In another admirable work,<sup>12</sup> by the same writer the chief features have been described, and engravings of some details<sup>13</sup> serve to illustrate his description. Of old date, and originally consisting of a simple nave and choir,<sup>14</sup> this primitive church is tolerably entire, excepting its roof. On its northern side, an aisle was subsequently added, perhaps about the close of the twelfth century. In the northern side of this addition, there is a pointed doorway.<sup>15</sup> In the primitive church, there is a Cyclopean doorway,<sup>16</sup> in the centre of the west gable, with the figure of a Roman cross, under the lintel.<sup>17</sup> There are gaps cut into the original northern wall, to give access to the side aisle. The pointed or so-called "Gothic" doorway leads from the exterior into the aisle, and it is chamfered upon the outside. The graveyard around is shaded with trees, and the old church walls with ivy.<sup>18</sup> Whether it was at Killininy, or at Killiney, the pious daughters of Lenin lived, seems an uncertain matter; but, it is probable enough, that while their sister Bright remained at the latter place, the following five occupied the former as a residence. Thus, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>19</sup> enters the daughters of Leinin,<sup>20</sup> as Druigen, Luigen, Luicell, Macha and Riomhtach. These are said to be sisters of Bright, daughter of Leinin.<sup>21</sup> Their place is called Cill-inghen-Leinin, in Ui-Briuin Cualann, in Leinster. All of those pious ladies, here venerated,<sup>22</sup> were sisters to St. Colman,<sup>23</sup> the Bishop and Patron of Cloyne Diocese;<sup>24</sup> and, accordingly, they seem to have lived, towards the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. BRIGHT, SUPPOSED TO BE OF KILLINEY, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [Sixth or Seventh Century.] As we have already seen, in the foregoing article, several holy sisters seem to have lived, and after death were venerated, at the church of Kill-naningean, Anglicised, "the church of the daughters," in Huibh-Briuin Chualann territory,<sup>1</sup> otherwise called Chrioch-

<sup>11</sup> By the same eminent Irish antiquary and artist, it has been transferred to the wood, and it has been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>12</sup> See "Archæologia Hibernica: a Handbook of Irish Antiquities, Pagan and Christian," part ii., chap. ii., pp. 65 to 68.

<sup>13</sup> These are, the square-headed doorway, the choir-arch, and the pointed doorway.

<sup>14</sup> These are connected by a choir-arch, measuring in breadth, where the arch begins to spring, four feet seven inches, and at the base four feet ten inches and a half; its height is only six feet and a half. The chancel windows have inclined sides, but they are dilapidated. The eastern window is square-headed, both within and without, and it exhibits the usual splay.

<sup>15</sup> The foregoing remarks were kindly communicated to the writer, by Mr. Wakeman, in a letter, headed, Enniskillen, January 16th, 1878.

<sup>16</sup> It measures, in height, six feet and one inch; in breadth at the top, two feet, and at the bottom, two feet four inches.

<sup>17</sup> The extreme dimensions of its interior are thirty-five feet: the nave measures but twelve feet and eight inches, while the chancel is nine feet and six inches, in breadth.

<sup>18</sup> Mr. Sloane, on searching among the ivy on the primitive church here, found that there were evidences of its having had a stone roof.

<sup>19</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

<sup>20</sup> He is called, son of Gannchu, by the O'Clerys.

<sup>21</sup> The O'Clerys add, "as shall be said presently," as if they were about to make a distinction between their place, and that of Bright, for all their festivals are entered, at the 6th of March.

<sup>22</sup> The Bollandists insert the festival, "Filiæ Lenini de Cella Filiarum Lenini," at the 6th of March, in their "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., among the pretermitted saints.

<sup>23</sup> His death is assigned to A.D. 600, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 224, 225. Other accounts have a somewhat later date.

<sup>24</sup> See his Life, at the 24th of November. ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sancto-

Chualan, within the province of Leinster. From what Archdall states,<sup>2</sup> this church would appear to have been situated, within the present county of Wicklow, although its site, at present, is considered to be unknown. This writer maintains, that St. Brigid was abbess, over a nunnery, at this place.<sup>3</sup> I am inclined to believe, that Archdall can have only meant Kilbride, where a church may be seen in ruins, within a graveyard, near Kilbride house, in a townland and parish of the same name, one English mile N.W. of Arklow, and not far from the Earl of Wicklow's house and demense, known as Kilbride Church, County of Wicklow.

Shelton Abbey.<sup>4</sup> At present, the ruins measure 30 feet in length, by 17 in width, and most of the west-end gable and walls remain.<sup>5</sup> The masonry is thickly garnished with ivy, while many trees and bushes are within the ancient cemetery, which is surrounded by a modern stone wall.<sup>6</sup> The south side-wall foundations are barely visible, while the north side-wall is quite obliterated. This graveyard is a favourite place for interment, and it bears all the visible signs of a very remote antiquity. The present holy woman was of the family, already alluded to, and a sister to the daughters of Leinin. According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> on this day was venerated, Bright, daughter of Leinin, at Cill-ingen-Leinin, in Ui Briuin Cualann. This place is now known as Kilnanaighnin, near Tallaght, county of Dublin,<sup>8</sup> rum Hiberniæ," xvi. Januarii. De Inventionē S. Foillani Ep. et M. Appendix, cap. ii., p. 104.

<sup>2</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 777. In a note, Archdall says: "This territory comprehended the north of the barony of Arklow, and the south of Newcastle, it was seated on both sides of the River Dea, now called Leitrim, and was the country of a branch of the O'Kellys.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., p. 777.

<sup>4</sup> See, "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow, Sheet 40.

<sup>5</sup> The accompanying illustration was sketched on the spot, by the writer, in July or August, 1873. This sketch has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it has been engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>6</sup> A very prominent object in the cemetery is the pyramidal family vault of the Earls of Wicklow, and underneath it is their mausoleum, where repose the remains of their deceased ancestors.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp 68, 69.

according to the conjecture of William M. Hennessy. However, we have ventured to think, the present holy sister may have lived somewhat apart, and at the present Killiney, near the town and bay so called, in the same county. She sprang from the race of Aenghus, son of Mogh Nuadhat, as the O'Clerys state. In the Leabhar Breac,<sup>9</sup> and when treating on Brigid, Tulach na ness scoip in Ui Briuin Cualand is mentioned.<sup>10</sup> This is now a place, in the county of Dublin, and known as Tullow, near Kiltiernan.<sup>11</sup> There is an old burial-ground, at the spot. This St. Brigid belonged to the sixth or seventh century.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. MAELRUAIN, OF DRUIM-RAITHE. The name of Maolruain, connected with a place, called Droma Ratha, appears, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 6th of March. Drum rath is rendered the "church of the fort" by Dr. O'Donovan,<sup>2</sup> who quotes Colgan, to show there was a church, bearing this name, at Leyny, in the province of Connaught.<sup>3</sup> But, again, it may be possible, his place was the present Drumrath, now Drumrany, in the county of Westmeath.<sup>4</sup> In Fermanagh, there are four townlands thus called, Drumrainy;<sup>5</sup> and one place in Donegal.<sup>6</sup> There is a Drumrainy in Londonderry;<sup>7</sup> there are two Drumraines in Sligo County,<sup>8</sup> and a Drumraine Glebe in Leitrim County.<sup>9</sup> There are three Irish townlands, called Drumrane: one in Leitrim,<sup>10</sup> one in Cavan,<sup>11</sup> and one in Londonderry.<sup>12</sup> There is a Drumrawn, also, in the parish of Longfield East, and barony of Omagh West, county of Tyrone.<sup>13</sup> However, it seems difficult to determine this saint's locality. He is noted by Marianus O'Gorman, and he is called Molmanus de Drium Ratha, by the Bollandists,<sup>14</sup> at this particular date. We read on this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>15</sup> that Maclruain of Druim raithe was venerated.

<sup>8</sup> See previous notices of the Daughters of Leinin, at this date.

<sup>9</sup> At b. 31.

<sup>10</sup> A MS. note of William M. Hennessy.

<sup>11</sup> The parish of Kiltiernan, in the barony of Rathdown, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheets 25, 26, 27. The townland proper is on Sheets 25, 26.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See his "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (a), p. 395.

<sup>3</sup> See Index Topographicus to the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," p. 876.

<sup>4</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., pp. 558, 559.

<sup>5</sup> One of these is in the parish of Cleenish, and barony of Clanawley (Sheet 26); another is in the parish of Clones (Sheet 40), and barony of Clankelly; one is in the parish of Derrybrusk (Sheet 27), and one in Maghcrecross (Sheet 16), barony of Tirkenedy. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Fermanagh."

<sup>6</sup> In the parish of Inver, and barony of Banagh. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheet 92.

<sup>7</sup> In the parish of Magherafelt, barony of Loughinsholin. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheets 41, 42.

<sup>8</sup> One in the parish of Cloonoghil (Sheets 32, 33), barony of Corran, and the other in the parish of Kilmacallan (Sheet 34), barony of Tirerrill. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo."

<sup>9</sup> In the parish of Oughteragh, barony of Carrigallen. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Leitrim," Sheet 25.

<sup>10</sup> In the parish of Killanummery, barony of Drumahaire. See ibid., Sheet 14.

<sup>11</sup> In the parish of Drung, barony of Tullygarvey. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cavan," Sheets 16, 21.

<sup>12</sup> In the parish of Tamlaght Finlagan, and barony of Keenaght. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheets 9, 16.

<sup>13</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 33, 34.

<sup>14</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 420.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> The following Irish stanza, from the "Feilire" of St. Aengus, "Leabhar Breac" copy, with the English

ARTICLE IX.—FEAST OF VICTORINUS AND COMPANIONS, MARTYRS. In the ancient Irish Church, at the 6th day of March, the festival of St. Victorinus, and of several martyrs, is commemorated.<sup>1</sup> Probably this refers to the martyrdom of St. Victorinus, St. Victor, St. Claudianus, or Claudius, and his wife, St. Bassa, of whom notices will be found, in the Bollandist collection, at this day.<sup>2</sup> They suffered in Bithynia.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE X.—ST. SENANUS, OR SERANUS, CONFESSOR. At the 6th of March, in the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, a St. Senanus is entered. Yet, it seems probable, this saint must be identified with a Saranus, Confessor, noted at the very same day, by Henry Fitzsimon,<sup>1</sup> on the authority of the Carthusian Martyrology.<sup>2</sup> Elsewhere, I do not find corroboration for the present entry.

ARTICLE XI.—ST. ODHRAN, ODRAN, OR ODRANUS. The name Odran S. occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 6th of March. The letter S. may be intended for the Irish word Soggart, Anglice, "priest." On this day, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> is set down Odranus or Odhran. In the table, appended to this latter work, the commentator remarks, that he was Abbot of Ia—which is incorrect—and of Conall Gulban's race, according to the Hagiogenesis.<sup>3</sup> The Odhran, mentioned in the genealogical table of the early Abbots of Hy,<sup>4</sup> was a cousin to St. Columkille,<sup>5</sup> but only a simple monk.<sup>6</sup> The Bollandists<sup>7</sup> have a note of Odranus, yet nothing more seems to be known regarding him.

ARTICLE XII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. ADRIAN AND COMPANIONS, MARTYRS. [Ninth Century.] In Bishop Forbes' work, the account of St. Adrian and of his companions, martyrs,<sup>1</sup> is set down: their festival falling on the 4th of March,<sup>2</sup> with the remark of a St. Odran, occurring in the Irish Martyrology of Donegal, at the 6th of this month, as if his name might be identical with Adrian.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. MAELDUBH, SON OF BERRAN. He is entered in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 6th of March, as Moeldub mac Berani.

translation, has been obligingly furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

b. ii. ii. Rōn̄n̄ar̄oet̄ iap̄ l̄ep̄ ōo fl̄aich̄ oē p̄op̄ ōip̄ge s̄l̄oḡ op̄ta cōn̄an̄j h̄i p̄eil̄ t̄ic̄t̄op̄m̄.

May they conduct us in chastity,
 To the kingdom of God directly,
 The host who were slaughtered in innocence,
 On the feast of Victorinus.

<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De Sanctis Martyribus Victore, Victorino, Claudiano sive Claudio, et Bassa uxore, Nicomedie et Apamie, in Bithynia, p. 423.

<sup>2</sup> They are noted in the old Martyrology, attributed to St. Jerome.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See "Catalogus Aliquorum Sanctorum Ibernie."

<sup>2</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historie Catholice Ibernie Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 56.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

<sup>3</sup> See, ibid., pp. 458, 459.

<sup>4</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes N, p. 342.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>6</sup> His feast, however, has been assigned to the 27th of October.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 420.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See what has been already stated, at the notices given of Saints Mannan and Tiaan, at the 23rd of February, Vol. ii. of this work, Art. iv.; and also at Vol. iii., Art. ii., relating to St. Adrian and his companions, martyrs.

The Bollandists notice him, in like manner, but without stating further particulars of him.<sup>2</sup> Maeldubh, son of Berran, had a festival celebrated on this day, according to the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Donegal.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE XIV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. CARTHACH, OF CILL-CARTHAIGHE, SUPPOSED TO BE KILCARR, COUNTY OF DONEGAL. [Sixth Century.] Under the head of Cill Carthaighe—said to be the present Kilcarr,<sup>1</sup> in Donegal County—Duald Mac Firis writes, that in Tir Boghuine,<sup>2</sup> at the 6th March, a Carthach, Bishop, was venerated. He is said to have been the son of Aongus, son to Nathfraech, King of the Eoghanacht of Cashel.<sup>3</sup> If so, he does not appear to have been different from the St. Carthach, or Carthage, of Sier-Kieran, and of other places. His Acts, so far as known, have been given, at the previous day, and to these the reader is referred. By a local writer, we are told, that St. Carthaigh is thought to have died, on the 6th day of March, in the year 540.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE XV.—ST. BALDRED OR BALTHERUS, HERMIT, AND MISSIONARY, IN SCOTLAND, AND ST. BILFRID, OR BILFRED, A HERMIT, AT LINDISFARNE, IN ENGLAND. [Probably in the Seventh or Eighth Century.] It does not appear to be determined, whether Ireland or Scotland gave birth to these holy men. The Acts of St. Balther, a Priest, and a hermit, have been joined with these of Bilfrid, another hermit, and a worker in gold, according to the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> at the 6th of March. Those Acts are given in a historic commentary of four sections, containing eighteen paragraphs. The Bollandists state, that as St. Baldred and Bilfrid lived in the same age, and in the same country, so after death, their relics were presented for veneration to the faithful, in the same church. Those holy men are commemorated, likewise, by Bishop Challoner,<sup>2</sup> and by Rev. S. Baring-Gould;<sup>3</sup> while the Rev. Alban Butler<sup>4</sup> only notices St. Baldrede, at this day. The Scottish<sup>5</sup> and English historians<sup>6</sup> have references to them. It is barely possible, that one or both of those may have been of Irish origin, nothing having been recorded, regarding their natal places. The Breviary of Aberdeen<sup>7</sup> contains an account of St. Baldred—who is also called Baltherus<sup>8</sup>—and a remarkable Celtic saint, venerated in Scotland.<sup>9</sup> A summary of his actions will be found, in

<sup>2</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 266 to 268.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 420.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> Such is the identification in William M. Hennessy's note.

<sup>2</sup> This is said to have been identical with the present barony of Banagh, in the county of Donegal.

<sup>3</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 94, 95.

<sup>4</sup> See Thomas Lalor Cooke's "Early History of the Town of Birr," chap. x., pp. 169, 170.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De Sanctis Anachoretis Balthero Presbytero et Bilfrido Auri-fabro, in Scotia et Anglia, pp. 448 to 452.

<sup>2</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., March vi., p. 159.

<sup>3</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., pp. 94, 95.

<sup>4</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other Principal Saints," vol. iii., March vi.

<sup>5</sup> Such as Boetius, Major, Lesley, Forbes, &c.

<sup>6</sup> Such as Turgot, and Simeon of Durham, Matthew of Westminster, Selden, &c.

<sup>7</sup> Pars Hyemalis, fol. lxiii., lxiiii.

<sup>8</sup> In a Fragmentum Historiæ de Pontificibus Eboracensibus. See Mabillon's "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," pars. ii., p. 508.

<sup>9</sup> The Bollandists consider, that the Calendarists and some of the Scottish historians may have confounded St. Baldred with St. Baithen, the immediate successor of St. Co-

Bishop Forbes' work.<sup>10</sup> There we learn, that this saint became a hermit, in remote desert places, and in islands of the sea. One of these is known as the Bass Rock,<sup>11</sup> where the existence of a ruin<sup>12</sup> testifies to the former habitation of an island saint,<sup>13</sup> known as Baldred or Baltherus. He is stated, to have been the suffragan<sup>14</sup> of St. Kentigern,<sup>15</sup> and when the latter died,<sup>16</sup> here his disciple often meditated on the bitter passion of Christ, in fasting and weeping, while he recalled the memories of his great Master. He taught the faith in three parochial churches, viz., Aldhame,<sup>17</sup> Tynyngame<sup>18</sup> and Prestoune,<sup>19</sup> which had been subjected to him by St. Mungo. It is traditionally held, that a rock, impeding the navigation, and afterwards called the Tumba or Scapha of St. Baldred, moved beneath him to the shore. He also performed other miracles, and became celebrated throughout Laudonia. He is said, to have walked on the water, like St. Peter, and to have obtained pardon for the soul of a deacon, who before his death had fallen into a carnal sin. Worn out by extreme old age, he died in the house of the parish priest, at Aldhame. His three churches put in a claim for his body, and therefore the people were requested to pray God, that he might give a sign. On the next morning, three bodies were laid out, each with the same exequial pomp, when each congregation carried off one assumed body to their own church,<sup>20</sup> where it was kept in honourable veneration. The date for his death is A.D. 606, according to Dempster, or A.D. 608, according to Bishop Forbes; but, Simeon of Durham and Hovenden<sup>21</sup> have it, at A.D. 756. By Dempster, he is called, Bishop of Glasgow, and he is said to have written a book, "De Scoticæ Ecclesiæ Statu."<sup>22</sup> John Lesley<sup>23</sup> makes our saint a missionary among the Picts, and a contemporary with St. Columba,<sup>24</sup> and Aidan, the forty-ninth Scottish king. Turgot states,<sup>25</sup> that Presbyter Baltherus died, in the seventeenth year of Cynouulf's pontificate,<sup>26</sup> over the see of Lindisfarne, Iumba, over the monastery at Iona. Again, it would seem, that St. Baldred has been incorrectly called a bishop, and that the Breviary of Aberdeen has falsely assigned him to the age, when St. Kentigern lived, while Baldred flourished a century later. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vi. De Sanctis Anachoretis Balthero Presbytero et Bilfrido Aurifabro in Scotia et Anglia, sect. ii., pp. 448 to 450.

<sup>10</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 273, 274.

<sup>11</sup> This was almost an impregnable citadel, in the old province of Laudonia, about two miles out from the coast line, and surrounded on every side by the sea.

<sup>12</sup> An interesting work, the joint production of five Edinburgh literati, has been published: "The Bass Rock, its Civil and Ecclesiastical History, Geology, Martyrology, Zoology, and Botany."

<sup>13</sup> Mr. James Millar published a Poem, in 1825, intitled "St. Baldred of the Bass."

<sup>14</sup> According to Bower and other writers.

<sup>15</sup> See notices of him at the 13th of January, and at the 13th of November.

<sup>16</sup> This is said to have happened, about A.D. 530, when he was one hundred and eighty-three years old.

<sup>17</sup> His cave is shown on the coast near Aldhame.

<sup>18</sup> The church of St. Baldred, here, had the right of Sanctuary, in the charter of Malcolm the Maiden. See Robertson's "Statuta Ecclesiastica Scotiæ," vol. ii., p. 261. This monastery was richly endowed with lands.

<sup>19</sup> At Preston Kirk some places near the church still bear his name: thus, St. Baldred's well, and Baldred's whill, a pool or eddy in the river. See the "Old Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. xi., p. 87. Also "New Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. vi. Haddington, pp. 21, 58.

<sup>20</sup> Similar accounts are frequent, in the Acts of Celtic saints, especially in reference to popular disputes to acquire relics. Hector Boece has the foregoing account in his "Historia Scotiæ," lib. ix., fol. 171.

<sup>21</sup> In his "Annales."

<sup>22</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. ii., num. 122, p. 65. For what he asserts, Dempster cites John Lesley's "Historia Scotiæ," lib. iv., p. clii., and John Fordun's Manuscript "Historia Scotorum," lib. vii., preserved in St. Benedict's College, Cambridge.

<sup>23</sup> See "De Origine, Moribus et Rebus Gestis Scotorum," lib. iii., p. 152. Romæ MDLXXXVIII. 4to.

<sup>24</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>25</sup> In "Historia Dunelmensis," lib. ii., cap. ii.

<sup>26</sup> This began in 740.

<sup>27</sup> He ruled over the kingdom of Northumbria, during a disturbed period, for and in the twentieth year of King Eadbert's reign,<sup>27</sup> and on the day before the Nones of March. According to the data here given, the Bollandists will have it, that his death occurred, A.D. 756, or at least in the year 757. The next holy man, whose name is associated with Balthar, and at the same date, does not appear to have had special relations with him during life. About St. Bilfrid or Bilfred, we have little information. We do not even know that exact place, with which he was connected, but this appears to be somewhere in the diocese of Lindisfarne. During this retirement, he practised the art of the goldsmith, and a specimen of his taste, as an artist, yet exists in the Cottonian library, in the British Museum, London. It is a Book of Gospels,<sup>28</sup> ornamented with gems and gold,<sup>29</sup> which was long preserved at Durham.<sup>30</sup> As Bishop Eadfrid succeeded Eadbert<sup>31</sup> over Lindisfarne see, where he sat from A.D. 698 to A.D. 720,<sup>32</sup> and as Bilfrid seems to have been his contemporary, or to have flourished soon after his time, it may not be amiss to ascribe his period to the seventh or eighth century. The day and year for his death have not been discovered. We read, that Anlaf, the Dane, burned the church and monastery of Tynningham, A.D. 941,<sup>33</sup> or 951.<sup>34</sup> Immediately afterwards, he was struck with a sudden illness and died. About two centuries later, a priest, named Elfrid, or Elfred,<sup>35</sup> recovered the relics of St. Bilfrid, by a revelation; and, with these, he also recovered the remains of St. Acca,<sup>36</sup> St. Alkmund,<sup>37</sup> the Bishop, King Oswin,<sup>38</sup> and the Abbesses, Ebba<sup>39</sup> and Ethelgitha, being directed to them, by visions. The bones of St. Balthar and of St. Bilfrid were put together, with the body of St. Cuthbert,<sup>40</sup> in his shrine, at Durham. But in 1104, they were removed from this shrine,<sup>41</sup> and were placed in the shrine of Venerable Bede.<sup>42</sup> The various relics were assigned special places of honour in the great Cathedral of Durham.<sup>43</sup> The Bollandists have no doubt, that the lives and miracles of the holy men, who twenty-one years. See Dr. Lingard's "History of England," vol. i., chap. iii., p. 110.

<sup>28</sup> This highly ornate Manuscript has the Prefaces and Canons of Eusebius and of St. Jerome in the beginning, while it has a Saxon version of Aldred Presbyter inserted between the lines. This is the Book of St. Cuthbert, alluded to by Turgot, and by Simeon of Durham, according to Selden.

<sup>29</sup> A curious story is told, by Turgot, in his "Historia Dunelmensis," lib. ii., cap. xi., xii., that to save it from Danish ravages, this book was brought to Ireland, in a ship, that it fell overboard, and was again miraculously recovered, that its folios did not seem in the least stained, by the action of the waves, which was attributed to the merits of St. Cuthbert, and that, in fine, about 1100, it was preserved in the church of Durham.

<sup>30</sup> "On the cover is ✠ Eadfrid, Oetilwald, Billfrith, Aldred hoc Evangelium Deo et Cuthberto construxerunt et ornauerunt; above this in Saxon characters, and in a Northumbrian dialect, 'And Billfrith, the anchorite he fabricated the curious works that are on the outside, and it adorned with gold and with gems, also with silver overgilded, a priceless treasure.' Billfrith is supposed to be a local form of Bilfred."—Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., p. 95.

<sup>31</sup> His feast occurs, on the 6th of May.

<sup>32</sup> At this period, Bishop Ethelwold succeeded, and died on the 12th of February, A.D. 740. This prelate engaged Bilfrid to labour, at the work of ornamenting the Book of Gospels, according to Turgot, in his "Historia Dunelmensis," lib. ii., cap. xi.

<sup>33</sup> See Matthew of Westminster's "Flores Historiarum," A.D. DCCCXLI., p. 365.

<sup>34</sup> Baronius, in his "Annales Ecclesiastici," thus corrects the chronotaxis of Mathæus Westmonasteriensis.

<sup>35</sup> He is called the son of Weston, in Turgot's "Historia Dunelmensis," lib. iii., cap. vii.

<sup>36</sup> His feast is usually assigned to the 20th of October, the day of his death. His Life occurs, at the same date, in our collection, as classed among the Irish Saints.

<sup>37</sup> His festival belongs to the 9th of September.

<sup>38</sup> His feast occurs on the 20th of August.

<sup>39</sup> Her festivals are on the 2nd of April, and 25th of August.

<sup>40</sup> See his Life, at the 20th of March.

<sup>41</sup> The head of St. Oswald was alone left with St. Cuthbert's remains. The Life of St. Oswald is given, at the 5th of August.

<sup>42</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March vi., p. 95.

<sup>43</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sancto-

are here commemorated, had been formerly written. While some writers have placed their festivals, at the 29th of March, and others, at the 27th of November, most Calendarists prefer the present date. The Scottish Kalendars have St. Baldred, Bishop and Confessor. Thus, the Kalendar of Aberdeen notes him Pridie Nonas Martii.<sup>44</sup> Likewise, in Adam King's Kalendar, we read: "S. Baldrede bishop of Glascow success. to S. Mūgo and cōfess. vnder King Aidanus. S. Fredoline cōf. Scotismō vnder Anastasi," at the 6th of March. In Dempster's "Menologium Scoticum," we find the following notices, at the same date, about Baldred, Bishop of Preston, whose body<sup>45</sup> was found by Divine power to appease dissensions among the faithful.<sup>46</sup> St. Balther was venerated with an office, containing nine Lessons.

ARTICLE XVI.—REPUTED FEAST OF ST. DUTHAC OR DUBTHAC, BISHOP OF ROSS, SCOTLAND. [Eleventh Century.] St. Duthac, the Bishop, is commemorated in the Kalendar "De Nova Farina,"<sup>1</sup> at the ii. Nones, or 6th of March. His life is more properly referable, to the 8th of this month.

Seventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCELLOC, HERMIT.

[FOURTH AND FIFTH CENTURIES.]

MOST men are willing to look back occasionally into bygone ages, if they find, that their mental eye can be taught to pierce the cloud which overhangs the past.<sup>1</sup> Yet, with much uncertainty, Colgan<sup>2</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>3</sup> treat about those statements, which after them we feel here compelled to submit. This saint, originally called Celloc—or perhaps Cellan<sup>4</sup>—had the endearing appellation, mo, prefixed to his name, according to a custom of our ancestors, when they wished to express great veneration for a person.<sup>5</sup> He was one of the first converts to our holy faith in Ireland, having flourished before St. Patrick's<sup>6</sup> time, according to our ancient records. It is said, our saint was baptized, so early as A.D. 347. That he must have been born, about the middle, or in the earlier part, of the fourth century, would appear, if we credit Ussher's statement, that about A.D. 364,<sup>7</sup> this saint, in rum," tomus i., Martii vi. De Sanctis Anachoretis Balthero Presbytero et Bilfrido Aurifabro, sect. iv., pp. 450, 451.

<sup>44</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries," vol. ii., p. 262.

<sup>45</sup> It is added "triplicatum."

<sup>46</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 113, 146, 194.

ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 69.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>2</sup> See "The Dublin Literary Gazette, and National Magazine," vol. i., No. ii. Art. On the Ancient History and the Antiquities of Ireland, by the Rev. Edward Johnston, &c., p. 161.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii vii. De S. Mocolloco Eremita, pp. 511, 512 (recte). By a misprint—a frequent blot in Colgan's valuable works—they are made pp. 601, 602.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 628.

<sup>4</sup> At the end of Irish names, oc and an are commutative, in giving them a distinctive qualification.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's note I, to this saint's Acts, p. 112 (recte).

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>7</sup> At the year 364, Ussher writes: "SS. Mochellocus, Beanus, Colmanus, Lachninus, Mobus, Findlugus, et Caminanus, apud Desienses in Campo scuti non procul a Lismoria septem claras cellas construxerunt."—"Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates." Index Chronologicus, pp. 511, 512.

common with six other holy men, constructed separate cells in a place, called Magh-Scethe,<sup>8</sup> which signifies, "the Plain of the Buckler," near the present site of Lismore. Mocolloc lived as a hermit, in his cell or oratory, according to tradition, many years before the Gospel had been preached in these parts, by Saints Declan,<sup>9</sup> Ailbe<sup>10</sup> and Kieran.<sup>11</sup> In common with other religious eremites of the place, Mocolloc is said to have had a vision, on the night of St. Declan's birth, and that, in consequence, he predicted this infant's future greatness, by declaring that the country and people around should one day be subject to his spiritual rule. After this prediction, the Acts of St. Declan state, that seven just men were baptized, in the name of the most Holy Trinity; and, afterwards, having constructed cells, they lived there in a religious manner. From whom they received baptism, or at what exact time, we are not informed.<sup>12</sup> On St. Declan's return from Rome,<sup>13</sup> these seven eremites—among whom our saint was included—waited on him, and placed their cells, with their own persons, under his rule and direction. St. Declan's habitation was at Ardmore,<sup>14</sup> at present, the head of a parish, in the barony of Decies within Drum, in the county of Waterford. Here, indeed, are some interesting ruins of St. Declan's oratory, of the mediæval monastery, of the Cathedral and of the Round Tower. With a description of this latter structure, we must rest satisfied, in this connexion. The Cloigtheach,<sup>15</sup> of Ardmore, owing to its beauty and fine preservation, is one of the best known structures of its kind in Ireland.<sup>16</sup> Its materials consist of a hard sandstone, chiselled to the curve, and brought from the mountains of Slievegrian, about four miles distant. This tower is about 15 feet in diameter, at the base, whence it gradually tapers to the apex, about 97 feet above the surface of the ground. It terminates in a conical roof, which had been half thrown over by injuries from lightning. Four string-courses divide the exterior into five stories.<sup>17</sup> The entrance is in the east side, at the distance of thirteen feet, from the ground. This is circular-headed, and it tapers from 1 foot 11 inches, at springing of the arch, to 2 feet 7 inches, at the base. The full height of this fine doorway is 5 feet 9 inches. Around the outer edges is boldly cut a Norman's head; and, on the inside are bar-holes, two at each side of the entrance, for securing the door.<sup>18</sup> The lower stories are lighted, by splaying spike-holes; some of these having square, and some circular, heads. As the visitor ascends, he meets grotesque corbels at intervals and staring at him from the concave walls. The highest story has four tapered windows, facing the cardinal points. Each of these presents on the exterior

<sup>8</sup> This denomination now appears to be obsolete.

<sup>9</sup> See the Acts of this saint, at the 24th of July.

<sup>10</sup> The Life of this saint will be seen, at the 12th of September.

<sup>11</sup> The Acts of St. Kieran will be found, at the 5th of March.

<sup>12</sup> The Bollandists regard the notices of this saint, by Colgan, as eminently unsatisfactory.

<sup>13</sup> By some writers, this is thought to have been so early as A.D. 402, by others, it is placed, at a much later date.

<sup>14</sup> Its extensive bounds are defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Waterford," Sheets 30, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40. The town and ecclesiastical remains there are noted on Sheet 40.

<sup>15</sup> Anglicised, "Bell-house."

<sup>16</sup> Lately the Irish Ecclesiastical Commissioners undertook the work of restoring the ancient remains at Ardmore. In August, 1877, the writer had an opportunity of ascending interiorly to the very topmost story, by means of floors and ladders, which now afford a ready means for ascent. The conical cap has been quite repaired, as presented in our present engraving, and in order to preserve the structure, about ten or twelve feet of the topmost original masonry had to be removed; but, as understood, the style, site, and almost identical stones, were replaced, with the exception of some unavoidable re-vamping. It is curious to observe within, and immediately under the arched conical top, two opposite and considerable indentations, in the side walls, as if to allow full play for the swing of a large bell.

<sup>17</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn

a triangular arch, and on the interior a trefoil head. In height, they are respectively 3 feet 9 inches. The stone lintels remain over the opes, where the beam for a bell rested. Tradition says, it was of so deep and powerful a tone, that it was heard at Gleanmhor, or "the great glen," about 8 miles distant. The apex of the roof was once surmounted, by a cross of stone; but, this was some years since shot down, by a person firing at birds.<sup>19</sup> A distinguished local antiquary,<sup>20</sup> on whose authority we rely for the foregoing

The Round Tower and Ecclesiastical Remains, at Ardmore, County of Waterford.

details, has no hesitation in assigning this noble structure, to the ninth or tenth century. For, the mouldings of the doorway, the grotesque corbel heads in the interior, and the square trefoil heads of the windows, in the upper story, are thought to belong to that period. He adds, that perhaps we may find a reason for the erection of this Cloig-theach, at such a time, in the unsettled state of the country, owing to the predatory landings of the Dubh-galls, Fionn-galls and other sea-rovers.<sup>21</sup> To conclude this account, by William F. Wakeman, has been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>18</sup> Access to the interior had been rendered easy by means of a ladder and floors, provided by Mr. Odell, the lord of the soil.

<sup>19</sup> Excavations were made, in the year 1841, within the base of this tower, under the superintendence of Messrs. Odell, Windle, Hackett and Abell. Those explorations led to the discovery of two imperfect human skeletons, at a considerable depth of earth. This circumstance induced some to think, that those interments took place, at a period, subsequent to the erection of the tower, and it was advanced as an argument for the Pagan origin of the Round Towers. But, there was no little misconception here; for, instead of having been interred with care, and within the basement of the tower, those human remains had been interred with at the time of its erection. A foundation-stone occupies the place of one of the crania, while the skeleton, it is said, evidently had been decapitated and otherwise injured, by those workmen, who cut the circular trench, for the foundations of the tower.

<sup>20</sup> The Rev. Samuel Hayman, B.A.

<sup>21</sup> See the Rev. Samuel Hayman's "New Hand-Book for Youghall: containing Notes

the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>22</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman and of Cathal Maguire, at this date, have inserted the festival of Mocelloc.<sup>23</sup> Besides, on this day was venerated Mocheallog, as we read in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>24</sup> From what has been already said, we may infer, that he died in the fifth century, but the true year of his death is not known. It is pleasing to find, in the case of this proto-Irish Christian, that he found perfect harmony between his just train of reasoning and Christianity. As compared with previous Pagan errors, he knew the Church and her teaching challenged his respect and should claim his allegiance. Combining the purest doctrines, with the purest morality, this saint escaped from the grovelling proclivities of human ignorance to the lights of religious knowledge and of holiness, which blessed his future life.

ARTICLE II.—ST. CARITAN OR CARIOTAN, OF DRUIM-LARA. At the 7th of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> we find a St. Caritan, of Dromalara, entered. In like manner, Marianus O'Gorman, has noticed Caritan of Druim-lara. But, the exact identity of this saint, and of his place, appears to be unknown. It is conjectured, by Colgan—who has Acts based on the supposition at this date<sup>2</sup>—that owing to some mistake of copyists, the present holy man may be the same as a distinguished priest, called Cruthnechan,<sup>3</sup> who baptized St. Columba,<sup>4</sup> who had charge of his infantile years, and who was remarkable for his piety.<sup>5</sup> Without attaching weight to it, the Bollandists<sup>6</sup> merely allude to his statement. We cannot see, how it can be well established. Again, Cariotan, of Druim-lara, is registered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> as having been venerated on this day.

ARTICLE III.—FESTIVAL OF ST. FELICITAS AND OF ST. PERPETUA, MARTYRS, AT CARTHAGE. [Second and Third Centuries.] The early Irish Church held in veneration these glorious martyrs, and they have been celebrated on this day, in the metrical “Feilire” of St. Ængus.<sup>1</sup> The Acts of those holy women, taken from very ancient sources, will be found fully recorded, in the great Bollandist collection.<sup>2</sup> With some other companions in and Records of the Ancient Religious Foundations and the Historical Annals of the Town.” Fourth Series. Introductory, p. xiii. Youghal, 1858, 8vo.

<sup>22</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>23</sup> Colgan remarks, that our Martyrologists record a festival, at the 1st of February, either to the present holy man, or to a homonymous saint. See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii vii. De S. Mocel-loco Eremita, nn. 7, 8, p. 512 (recte).

<sup>24</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii vii. De B. Cruthnechano sive Caritano Presbytero, pp. 510, 511 (recte).

<sup>3</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves’ Adamnan’s “Life of St. Columba,” lib. iii., cap. 2, p. 191.

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>5</sup> He is mentioned, also, in Prince O'Donnell's or Quinta Vita S. Columbæ, lib. i., cap. xxv. to xxxiv. See Colgan's “Trias Thaumaturga,” pp. 393, 394.

<sup>6</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i.,

Martii vii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 629.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> The following Irish stanza, with its English translation, has been furnished, from the “Leabhar Breac” copy, to the writer, by Professor O'Looney :—

C. non. inman oe ching veosa na olis iar nouain oighne felicitar noemroa perpetua pumroa.

Beloved the two holy champions,
Whom we shall not dispraise in our poem,
Felicitas the saintly,
Perpetua the primitive.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus i., Martii vii. De Sanctis Martyribus Afris Perpetua, Felicitate, Saturo, Saturnino, Revocato, Secundolo, Carthagine aut Tuburbi. A previous commentary, in eight paragraphs, precedes an ancient Life, taken suffering, at Carthage, they gained a victorious crown, on the 7th day of March, A.D. 302. Their bodies were preserved, in the great Church of Carthage, during the fifth century.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE IV.—FEAST OF ST. COLMAN, BISHOP OF LINDISFARNE, ENGLAND. [Seventh Century.] According to Camerarius, this saint, regarded as an Apostle in Northumbria and in the Hebride Islands, had a festival, on the 7th of March. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> and Bishop Forbes<sup>2</sup> have notices of him; but, his feast seems more properly referable to the 8th of August, where we have entered the particulars of his life.

ARTICLE V.—ST. METAN OR MEATTAN, VIRGIN, OF TUAIM-ATHA. The entry, Metan o Thuaim athi, appears in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 7th of March. Marianus O'Gorman has a like notice, while the Bollandists allude to the circumstance, that her place and history are unknown.<sup>2</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>3</sup> mentions, likewise, Meattan, Virgin of Tuaim-atha, as having a festival on this day. The word, Tuaim, usually Anglicised, Toom, enters into the composition of many local denominations, in Ireland.

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. WILLEIC, AT KAISERWERT, ON THE RHINE. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] In the Martyrology of Usuard, edited by Hermann Greuen, and in the ancient Martyrology of Cologne, there is an entry, on this day, of St. Willeicus, Confessor and Priest of St. Suitbert, the Bishop.<sup>1</sup> Already have we given his Acts, at the 2nd of this month.

ARTICLE VII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. SENAN OF INSE CATHAIGH, OR INNISCATTERY, COUNTY OF CLARE. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] Veneration was given to Senan Inse Cathaigh, at the 7th of March, as we read in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>1</sup> This, however, must be regarded as the vigil of his principal feast, at the day succeeding; if the present entry be not the mistake of a transcriber, as indeed it appears to have been, for we do not meet the name of this very celebrated saint, at the 8th of March in the published work. At this date, the Bollandists only notice this entry.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. NEASTOR. The festival, in honour of Neastor, is entered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> on this day.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. BEOAEDH, BISHOP OF AIRDCARNE, COUNTY OF ROSCOMMON. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] At the 7th of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> mentions, that veneration was given to Beoaedh, of from a Monte Casino MS., by Lucas Holstenius, with a Sermon of St. Augustine, found by the same, among the Vatican Manuscripts, pp. 630 to 638. Notes are also appended.

<sup>3</sup> Such is the statement of Victor of Utica.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vii. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 629, 630.

<sup>2</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 302, 303.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i.,

Martii vii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 629.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 629.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii vii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 629.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

Airdcarne. As, in the former case, this must be considered only, as the vigil of his Natalis, observed at the day succeeding. But, we rather suspect, as no corresponding entry regarding him is there found, that the present registration must have been ante-dated, by one day, and through some oversight, on the part of a transcriber. For further notices, the reader is referred to the next day.

Eighth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SENAN, OR SENANUS, BISHOP AND ABBOT OF INISCATTERY, COUNTY OF CLARE.

[FIFTH AND SIXTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—MANUSCRIPT AND PUBLISHED AUTHORITIES FOR ST. SENAN'S ACTS—
HIS BIRTH AND FUTURE GREATNESS, FORETOLD BY ST. PATRICK—HIS PARENTAGE AND NATIVITY—ANECDOTES OF HIS YOUTH—VOCATION FOR THE RELIGIOUS STATE
—HE STUDIES UNDER THE ABBOT CASSIDUS OR CASSIDANUS.

ALTHOUGH the Gospel of Christ has been proclaimed for many centuries, the world is still, in a large proportion, heathen. Christianity is, indeed, still making advances, and still spreading, among benighted idolaters; but, mainly by the spread and migration of those races, whose conversion was completed, in the early centuries of the Church. Converts are made here and there, in our own time; and, occasionally, whole tribes and communities of heathens, are brought over to the true faith, by apostolic men. Yet, nowhere, perhaps, do we find such wonderful and great results effected, in this providential way, as had been, through the zealous labours of our ancient Irish saints.

The sources, from which we purpose giving the Acts of the present holy man, are derived from a variety of Manuscripts, copies of which are yet extant, and some of these have been published. Thus, Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have issued two of the chief Acts, which are intermingled with much legendary matter. Besides, there are special biographical accounts of this illustrious abbot: thus, Albert le Grand,<sup>3</sup> Bishop Challenor,<sup>4</sup> Rev. Alban

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. Vita S. Senani Episcopi et Confessoris. Ex Vetusto Codice Kilkenniensi collato cum alio Salmaticensi, pp. 512 to 525 (recte), with notes. Secunda Vita, sive Supplementum Vitæ S. Senani. Ex Hibernico transumptum, pp. 526 to 537 (recte), with notes. Then follows an Appendix ad Vitam S. Senani, in six chapters, pp. 537 to 540 (recte).

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. De Sancto Senano Episcopo et Abbate in Hibernia. A previous commentary, in ten paragraphs, is prefixed to the same Acts, which Colgan had already published; special notes are added to their text; while, an Appendix, in Latin, gives the extracts, from Albert le Grand's notices of St. Senan, pp. 760 to 779.

<sup>4</sup> See "Les Vies des Saints de la Bretagne Armorique, avec un ample Catalogue des Evesques d'icelle." By this writer, St. Senan is called St. Sane, in French; he being considered one, among the chief patrons of St. Pol de Leon diocese. This Life was chiefly compiled, from the nine Lessons of the Leon Breviary, and from monuments or acts of Iniscathy Church, in Ireland, which, we are told, had been dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. St. Sane is called the Patron of Plausensis and of Guic-Sanensis churches, in this work, and, he is said to have died, about the year 480. But, Colgan remarks, that as he had not seen the

Butler,<sup>5</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould<sup>6</sup> have their respective accounts of him. There is an English translation, by John Lloyd, of an Irish Life of St. Senan of Scattery Island, with poems on his miracles, conversations and prophecies, in the Royal Irish Academy collection.<sup>7</sup> The Metrical Life of St. Senan,<sup>8</sup> together with the second prose Life,<sup>9</sup> called a supplement to the former, by Colgan, are the most accessible authorities we are able to find. These are further illustrated, by the judicious remarks of more recent Irish historians, and writers. The Metrical Life of St. Senan was taken<sup>10</sup> from an old parchment Manuscript, called the Codex Kilkenniensis; having been collated with a Salamancan copy. In this latter were wanting stanzas, from the sixth chapter or series of verses, to the twentieth.<sup>11</sup> Even, in the Codex Kilkenniensis, after the thirteenth chapter or series, Colgan is of opinion, that a leaf at least is wanting; and, as a matter of course, a lacuna occurs, in the Metrical Life, as published.<sup>12</sup> Its author is praised, however, for his exactitude.<sup>13</sup> Besides the Metrical Life, Colgan had in his possession another biography of our saint, and written in Irish.<sup>14</sup> It belonged to a Leinster gentleman, called William Deorodan, or Derodan.<sup>15</sup> This manuscript was more lengthy and copious than the other; but, it appears to have been interpolated, by some lessons of this Leon Breviary, nor learned what these churches of Armoric Britain observed, regarding their patron, he could not decide whether their St. Sane was identical with St. Senan of Iniscathy, more especially, as there were many other saints, bearing this latter name, in Ireland, differing in point of time and dignity, from the subject of our memoir. In any case, if St. Sane be not different from St. Senan of Iniscathy, he must have lived to a period, much later than A.D. 480. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, n. i, p. 228, recte 524.

<sup>4</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 163 to 166.

<sup>5</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March viii.

<sup>6</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., pp. 159 to 163.

<sup>7</sup> Among the Messrs. Hodges and Smith MSS. No. 9. A small 4to paper MS. It likewise has poems on other saints.

<sup>8</sup> Although occasionally a defective measure may be found, in some lines, yet this occurs very rarely; while the Latin is evidently formed on classic models, and the phraseology by no means assumes a rude cast.

<sup>9</sup> As published by Colgan and the Bollandists. The former we shall have frequent occasion to quote as the First or Metrical Life, and the latter as the Second or Prose Life. The paging, as corrected from the printer's mistakes, has reference—unless otherwise expressed—to Colgan's work.

<sup>10</sup> By Colgan.

<sup>11</sup> To me, the author appears to have been conversant with local features of the country around Iniscathy; and, it might not be improbable, that he was a monk belonging to the monastery there established. That he lived many centuries ago appears from this fact, of Iniscathy Church, in his day, not having lost its episcopal character.

<sup>12</sup> He refers to notes 10 and 16, for proof of this assertion; but these, no doubt, are errors of the press, as in neither of the published Lives do we find corresponding notes, referring to his present statement. The notes, which he really seems to have referred to, are numbered 20 and 21, in the Metrical Life.

<sup>13</sup> St. Colman, son of Lenin, also wrote our saint's Acts, in verse; and, reference is made to one of his narratives, in the Supplemental or Second Life, which Colgan has published.

<sup>14</sup> The Manuscript, sometimes called Codex Kilkenniensis, belonging to Marsh's Library, Dublin, has a Vita S. Senani, fol. 77 to 80.

<sup>15</sup> Probably, it was the copy of a small translated pamphlet, intitled, "The Life, Miracles, and Prophetical Predictions of the Blessed St. Senan, Bishop of Inniscathy, first written by Odranus, successor to St. Senan in the Bishoprick, and now faithfully translated out of the original Irish into English, by M. G., 1689." The edition, which I have seen, purports to be issued at Limerick; George M. Goggin, Printer, 34 George's-street, A.D. 1848. It has 36 pages closely printed in 18mo. This little chap-book is divided into six chapters. The narratives contained in it, although agreeing in various particulars, with those published by Colgan, yet, in other respects, materially differ. The last chapter professes to treat on the last Will and Testament of this saint. As a conclusion, we find some dog-grel English metrical lines, which contain certain predictions, began with a colloquy between St. Senan and St. Comgallus of Banagher, and in shape of a Dialogue. Then follows a colloquy, between St. Senan and St. Brandon of Birr, in the same style.

ignorant transcriber, who undertook the insertion of a few particulars, shadowing forth his own erroneous impressions, or inventions.<sup>16</sup> On this account, and for the sake of brevity, Colgan would not translate this entire Life into Latin, especially as he had not a correct copy of it.<sup>17</sup> But, as several chapters were to be found in this Irish MS., and as the latter threw additional light on many circumstances, more obscurely related in the former, besides serving to illustrate the antiquities of the country, he deemed it right to present that portion, which he has published.<sup>18</sup> In addition to the foregoing, to which he refers, in different notes subjoined, Colgan gives an Appendix to St. Senan's Life; in which he treats, regarding various writers of his Acts, and of those who refer to him, in their works. The learned Irish hagiologist tells us, that, in addition to St. Senan's Irish Life, he found some verses, in a manuscript, belonging to Iniscathy; but, which he did not consider worth the trouble of translating, because these were the production of a modern pen. Besides, they abounded in fables, and were even badly written.<sup>19</sup>

Among the O'Longan Manuscripts,<sup>20</sup> preserved in the Royal Irish Academy's collection, Dublin, are various copies of St. Senan's Life. One of these begins, with the words, "Mirabilis Deus in Sanctis," &c., which shows, it must have been distinct from his published Acts.<sup>21</sup> This, it is supposed,<sup>22</sup> had been transcribed from the Book of Lismore.<sup>23</sup> Again, the folio

These supposed predictions are evidently clumsy and comparatively modern fabrications.

<sup>16</sup> Among these interpolations is to be found one, referring to a friendship, said to have existed, between our saint and the Blessed Martin of Tours, with assistance, which this latter is said to have rendered St. Senan, during his last agony. But, the falsity of this supposition is apparent. St. Martin died in the year 367, according to St. Gregory of Tours; or, in the year 402, according to Sulpicius Severus. See the latter data, agreed to by Baronius, in his notes on the Roman Martyrology, at the 11th of November. St. Senan was not born for many years subsequent to 432, when St. Patrick first came to Ireland; for, after this period, our Irish Apostle had predicted this saint's future birth. This should also appear, from the names of those Irish saints, who are said in his Life to have been contemporaneous with him, such as, Kieran of Clonmacnoise, Brendan of Birr, Deirmit of Inis Clothran, &c. Hence, our saint must have flourished in the sixth century.

<sup>17</sup> See the Metrical Life, n. 21, p. 525 (recte).

<sup>18</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, p. 611 (recte 525). Vita Metrica S. Senani, n. 21, and Secunda Vita S. Senani, n. 1, p. 539 (recte 535). Henceforth, it must be understood, while referring to the Lives of St. Senan, that in citing Colgan's pages, the numbers have been corrected. Unfortunately, not only in this portion of his work, but almost, if not altogether, throughout the remainder of his volume, the paging is erroneous. Yet, to correct these errors, in other places, might entirely mislead the reader, by giving more particular references.

<sup>19</sup> Our Irish hagiologist adds a note, for the instances which he furnishes, in support of this position. Thus, it is absurdly stated, that St. Senan had no less than fifty-six brothers, all of whom were saints: his mother is sometimes called Finnmathia, the daughter of Beodan, and sometimes she is called Cumaina, the daughter of Dalbriónus: among her holy sons are named Molassius, Carthage or Mochudda, Grellan, Ruan, Cronan, Mochiamoc, Mochua, Camin, Caingin, Colman Macduach, Uasuanach, Luctigern, Maccrétius, Maichin of Limerick, and many others, if not belonging to a different father, at least respectively removed by race and period. Colgan shows, that not only do such statements conflict, with the most genuine Acts of St. Senan; but, they are even repugnant to other accounts, histories and saints' Acts, as also to reason itself. He then refers more in detail to those saints enumerated, and to their paternal and maternal parentage, according to their respective Lives, and Angus's tract, lib. iv. See note 37, postfixed to the Second Life, p. 537.

<sup>20</sup> See vol. viii. of this collection, pp. 123 to 149.

<sup>21</sup> Neither the Metrical, nor the Prose, Life commences with the foregoing words.

<sup>22</sup> By Professor Eugene O'Curry, in his Manuscript Catalogue.

<sup>23</sup> It is described, by the copyist, as an old vellum book, written as was thought 800 years, before his time. In it are the Lives of Patrick, of Colum Cille, of Bridget of Kildare, of Ciarán of Clonmacnois, of Fionnchu of Brigbhoun, of Finen of Clonard, of paper MS. in the R.I.A., No. 39, b., contains an Irish Life of St. Senan, of Scatterry Island. The Bodleian Library, at Oxford, has the Acts of this saint,<sup>24</sup> and they are found also in Irish, among the Stowe Manuscripts.<sup>25</sup> There is a Vita S. Senani, Inis-catha, among the Manuscripts,<sup>26</sup> now preserved in the Franciscan Convent, Dublin. Among the Irish MSS. of Michael O'Clery, preserved in the Burgundian Library, at Bruxelles, is a fragment of St. Senan's Life, while there are Poems of Dellanus, upon this saint.<sup>27</sup> Besides, other copies of Senan's Acts are in the Burgundian Library, at Bruxelles.<sup>28</sup>

In our saint's second Life, we are told, when St. Patrick<sup>29</sup> came to preach the Faith of Christ, in that part of the country, called Hy-Fidhgente,<sup>30</sup> he predicted the future birth and greatness of St. Senan. This territory was inhabited by a tribe, from which its name had been derived. The Shannon is said to have been its northern boundary, and Sliabh Luachra confined it, on the south; eastward, the River Maigue and the Morning Star River ran, and on the west, the County of Kerry formed its boundary.<sup>31</sup> While St. Patrick brought over many from the errors of idolatry, in this part of the country,<sup>32</sup> a report of his extraordinary success and great virtues circulated amongst the people of Corcobaschind,<sup>33</sup> in Clare County, on the northern bank of the Shannon. The people of this territory,<sup>34</sup> with their prince, felt a most earnest Brenuinn, son of Finlough, of Mochua, &c. See p. 149.

<sup>24</sup> Thus described:—Vita S. Senani Insy Gathi MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 505, pp. 223, 231, vell. fol. xiv. Cent. A similar Life is found in MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 485, f. 249, vell. 4to. xiv. cent. There is also a Life of St. Senan, a MS., belonging to the Duke of Devonshire. It is a paper transcript, 8vo., xix. Cent. It is in MS. Phillips, 10294. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 125, 126.

<sup>25</sup> It is thus described:—Vita S. Senani, transcribed by Donall O'Duinin, MS. Stowe 36, s. 244 to 287, 4to paper. See "Stowe Catalogue," p. 162.

<sup>26</sup> In the large folio paper MS. intituled, "Vitæ Sanctorum," ex Codice Inisensi, pp. 244 to 250.

<sup>27</sup> A folio MS. Collectanea, classed Vol. viii., No. 3201, contains a Life of St. Senan, taken from the Irish Manuscript of the Jesuit Salamancan College, and collated with a MS. belonging to R. P. Ward; while, there is also a long Poem, and a Hymn to this saint. In Vol. xxii., containing Nos. 7672, 7673, 7674, there is a Vita S. Senani, fol. 186.

<sup>28</sup> In a MS. Vol. iv. part ii. there is an Irish Life of St. Senan, p. 118; an account of the miracles wrought after death through St. Senan, p. 233; and different poems attributed to St. Senan, St. Brendan and others in Irish, p. 142. These were transcribed, by Michael O'Clery, from older MSS.

<sup>29</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>30</sup> The country of the Hy-Figeinte embraced the greater and better part of the county of Limerick; it extended from the Shannon to the middle of Slieve Loughra, and from Kerry to Limerick, according to John O'Donovan. Thus, Bruree parish is situated, partly in Coshma barony, and partly in that of Upper Connello, in the county of Limerick; and, its name was derived from a Fort, in which the King of Hy-Figeinte resided, and near which the original parish church of Bruree had been placed. Hence, then, its name is not ecclesiastical in origin; but, it is called Brugh-righ, which signifies, "the fort of the king," or Burgum regis, in Latin. In all the ancient Irish histories, it is celebrated, as a chief seat of the senior representatives of Fiacha Figeinte, who assumed the surname, O'Donovan, after the reign of Brian Boru.

<sup>31</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. v., n. 6, p. 1580. The editor adds: "When Brian Borumha was King of Munster, Donovan, the ancestor of the O'Donovan family, was chief of all this territory, but his descendants were driven from it shortly after the English invasion."

<sup>32</sup> Colgan makes Hy-Fidhgente a part of Kerry County, and he refers to the Life of St. Molua, who belonged to the country, inhabited by "nepotes Fidhgente." It is said to have been situated, "in media planitie Mummonia, usque ad medium montis Luachrae in Occidente ad Australem plagam fluminis Sinna."—"Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," viii. Martii, n. 3, p. 535.

<sup>33</sup> It is divided into two districts, East and West. Every Irish authority places Corcobaiscinn in the west of Thomond, and its exact extent is given in a description of the county of Clare, preserved in a manuscript, belonging to Trinity College, Dublin, classed E. 2, 14; namely, from Inishmore in the mouth of the River Feargus, to Loophead, and from the Shannon, to the boundary of Hy-Brickan.

<sup>34</sup> It was formerly conterminous with the desire to welcome the messenger of Heaven, and their hearts were already prepared to receive Gospel truths. Having provided a great number of boats, they passed over the Shannon, at a place, called Donoghmore, a parish church, in Limerick diocese.<sup>35</sup> At this time, the shades of evening had set in, and the saint felt fatigued with instructions he had already given, and baptisms he had performed, for his neophytes. The people of Corcobaschind<sup>36</sup> presented themselves to him, and earnestly besought him to visit their part of the country, that they might be directed in the way of life, and instructed in Catholic doctrine.<sup>37</sup> St. Patrick told them, that on the following morning, he would give an answer to their petition. Alleging the defenceless state, in which their ships and territory had been left, they most earnestly urged him, not to delay, in complying with their request. The saint assented. Having expounded the dogmas of faith to them, at some length, and finding corresponding dispositions in their souls, he baptized them in the name of the Most Holy Trinity, and in waters of the adjoining river. Having made them living members of Christ's mystical body, he imparted his benediction to them, likewise, while invoking prosperity and fertility on their country. But, the Corcobaschind people, not satisfied with receiving Christian baptism themselves, requested the saint, that he would come as soon as possible to their country, so that their wives, children and servants might enjoy a like inestimable privilege. The saint excused himself this time, alleging as a reason for not complying with their request, the number of clerics and people, who were in his train, and who usually followed him to receive instruction, on points of doctrine, and relative to their spiritual advancement. He promised, however, to avail himself of a more favourable opportunity, for satisfying their desires. To these objections, they answered, that means, for conveying himself and all his companions across that part of the Shannon, had present baronies of Ibrickan, Moyarta and Clonderalaw. The original extent of the country of Corca-Bhaiscinn is still preserved in the Ecclesiastical division, which is the best guide to follow, in ascertaining the original limits of this great tribal district, which was circumscribed, from time to time, by the encroachment of the O'Briens, and of their correlatives. The "Liber Regalis Visitationis" places the following parishes in the deanery of Corca-Vaskin, Barony of Islands: 1. Clonedagad, Barony of Clonderalaw. 2. Kilchrist. 3. Disert Murhurly [Kildysart]. 4. Kilfeddan. 5. Killafin. 6. Kilmurry and Clonderclagh, Barony of Ibrickan. 7. Killarda [Killard], Barony of Clonderalaw. 8. Killimure [Killimer]. 9. Kilmichill, Barony of Moyarta. 10. Kilmacduane. 11. Kilrush. 12. Kilferigh. 13. Kilballihone, Barony of Ibrickan. 14. Kilmurry. 15. Kilfarboy, Barony of Moyarta. 16. Moifartach. There can be no doubt, that the original country of Corca-Bhaiscinn comprised these sixteen parishes; and, this fact being discovered, the extent of the territory adjoining it, to the east, becomes as clear as daylight. See Mr. O'Donovan's "Ancient Territories in Thomond," Signed "J. O'D." February 13th, 1841. "Letters and Extracts, relative to Ancient Territories in Thomond, 1841," pp. 25 to 44.

<sup>35</sup> There is a parish, named Donoghmore, about two miles south-east of Limerick city. It contains a church in ruins, near the modern Catholic chapel.

<sup>36</sup> All the Irish genealogists and historians agree, that the country of Corco Bhaiscinn, in the west of Thomond, derived its appellation from the descendants of Cairbre Bascain, son of Conary the Great (the 122nd Monarch of Ireland) and brother of Cairbre Riada, the ancestor of the Dalriads of Scotland; for Corc, when thus prefixed to the name or cognomen of an ancestor, always signifies, progeny, race or offspring, and it is nearly synonymous with clann, cinel, or sliocht. The descendants of this Carbry Bascain inhabited this district, and were its chiefs, until the 11th century, when the descendants of Mahon O'Brien conquered them. See "Letters and Extracts relative to Ancient Territories in Thomond, 1841." Ordnance Survey, sects. iv. and v. Corca Bhaiscin, East and West, p. 25. Written by John O'Donovan, in 1841.

<sup>37</sup> According to Mr. O'Donovan's ancient map of the county of Clare, preserved among the Ordnance Survey Records, Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, we find, that the territories of East and West Corcobaschind comprised the south-western portion of that county. This map is now bound up in the volume "Letters and Extracts relative to Ancient Territories in Thomond, 1841."

<sup>38</sup> The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick

been provided. At last, St. Patrick relieved himself from their importunities, by saying, that he could not go with them, until he had more fully instructed those people of the country, where he then preached, in the mysteries of faith, and until he had built churches, and provided good pastors for them. He enquired, however, if there was any elevated place near him, from which he could obtain a view of their country.<sup>38</sup> When conducted to a mountain, called Findinne,<sup>39</sup> which he ascended, he obtained a view of the boundaries of Corcobaschind, towards the North and East. He then predicted, that in course of time, their bounds should be enlarged, on the East, as far as the mountain Echtge,<sup>40</sup> and on the North, to another, which he pointed out in Corcomroe. After this, seeing in the future, their state and their patron, St. Patrick said to those, who were present, and to the inhabitants of that country, showing in the distance: "There is no reason why I should visit your territory in person, since God hath provided an illustrious and a beloved patron, who will be born among you. For, a being, loved by God and man, shall spring from your race, while from his infancy, he shall be enriched with Divine graces. His name shall be Senan. As to a protector and patron, you shall not alone look upon him, but the people of Hy-Fidhgente shall also regard him."<sup>41</sup> When, with due honour and reverence, you invoke him, all things shall succeed prosperously with you. However, should you fail in this respect, your prosperity must end, and your lands shall cease to be fertile; famine will come upon you, and your children shall bear a foreign yoke. He shall extirpate the huge monster, so hostile to you, which exists on the island opposite, and lying between yourselves and the people of Hy-Fidhgente. This island shall afterwards be inhabited, by Senan and by his monks. But, until this son of light begin to shine among you, with the brightness of his sanctity and doctrine, I will send some of my disciples, who shall wash the remainder of your people in the waters of regeneration, and who shall not fail to instruct you, in the doctrines of Faith."<sup>42</sup> Then the saint sent his two disciples, named Maculatus, a Priest, and Latius, a Deacon<sup>43</sup>—who were states, that St. Patrick, when he came to the district of Tuamonia, from the top of a mountain, called Fintine, near Domnachmor, predicted "S. Senanum Gerrchinnio Dubticii filio natum, post annos aliquot nascentum," &c.—Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xlv., p. 158. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>39</sup> The name now seems to be obsolete, in that part of the country.

<sup>40</sup> This mountain was situated in the north-eastern part of Clare, and on the borders of Galway County. It is now called Slieve Aughee. The ancient territory of Tuath Echtge comprised the greater part of this mountain, from which it was named. Dr. O'Donovan states, "this territory is mentioned in Mac Namara's rent-roll published by Mr. Hardiman, but in no other authority is it mentioned as a distinct territory. It comprised the entire of the large parish of Feakle, but we do not find that it formed the estate of any petty chief, at any period of our history. Before the year 1318, it was a part of the country of the Hy-Bloid, and is still placed in the deanery of Hy-m-bloid, or as it is Anglicised O'Mulled. It is my opinion, that it originally formed part of O'Shanahan's country."—Letters and Extracts relative to Ancient Territories in Thomond, 1841," Signed "J. O'D., February 13th, 1841," p. 71.

<sup>41</sup> The following is a partial translation of St. Patrick's prophecy:—

"To you an infant shall be born,
A future minister of God;
His name Senanus, shall adorn
This place of my abode.
And by the grace of God will be Succeeding bishop after me."

See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., note, p. 185.

<sup>42</sup> In Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Vita Quarta S. Patricii, cap. lxxix., St. Patrick is stated, to have predicted, that St. Senanus should be born forty years—as we may suppose—after this prophecy, p. 45, and n. 55, p. 50.

<sup>43</sup> Colgan says, he could not find any saints, in ancient historical writings, bearing these names, among St. Patrick's disciples. Jocelyn speaks of a St. Malachias. The Tripartite Life also mentions him, and a St. Lucius or Lugus; but, Colgan felt unable to determine whether the above-named saints were identical with those here mentioned.

Romans by birth—for the conversion and instruction of the people in Corcobaschind. These erected a church, on the northern banks of the Shannon. Here, they were afterwards buried.<sup>44</sup> All those foregoing incidents are related more circumstantially, in St. Senan's second published Life, than in the first or Metrical Life.<sup>45</sup> In this latter, St. Patrick is said to have predicted, that our saint should succeed him in the episcopacy. Some have been led to believe, from such a statement, that St. Senan of Iniscatthy must have presided as Archbishop over Armagh.

Very differently the pedigrees of this holy man have been set forth. According to the Prose Life of St. Senan, his father was named Ergind,<sup>46</sup> son to Cobthac, son of Bolgius, son to Decius, son of Imchad, son to Corbius, son of Roding, son to Lugad, son of Oilid, son to Eochad, son of Ængus, son to Fiachrius, son of Corbre Baschaoin, descended from Connor,<sup>47</sup> first of this name, who was Monarch of Ireland.<sup>48</sup> In the "Leabhar Breac,"<sup>49</sup> and in the "Book of Leinster,"<sup>50</sup> the statements about his paternal line greatly vary.<sup>51</sup> The mother of our saint was Comgella, daughter to Ernach, son to Gulban. She was a native of that part in Munster, which was called Altraighe.<sup>52</sup> The names of all those saints, descended from the mother of St. Senan, are recorded.<sup>53</sup> It would seem, that not only were St. Senan's parents of noble birth, but they also professed the Christian Faith.<sup>54</sup> Although they were thus distinguished, it appears, however, from what is afterwards related, that his father was a man of no very exalted station in life. For, after the prophecy of St. Patrick, we are told, when the chiefs and people of a country to the north of Inis-Catthy were assembled together, at a conven-

See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Secunda Vita S. Senani, n. 5, p. 535.

<sup>44</sup> This place of burial, and site of a church, was either on, or near, the Island of Iniscatthy, "e regione Inis-Cathaigh." We do not find their names, in the Litany, attributed to St. Ængus, as published in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., pp. 390 to 397, and 468 to 477.

<sup>45</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. i., ii., p. 512, and Secunda Vita S. Senani, cap. ii., iii., iv., p. 526.

<sup>46</sup> The name of St. Senan's father was Ercan, according to the first stanza, of the Metrical Life, which runs as follows:—

"Senanus ex nobilibus
Procreatur parentibus,
Et ab ipsis cunabulis,
Fidelibus Christicolis.
Qui magna Dei gratia
Habebantur in Scotia
Quorum hæc sunt vocabula, Ercanus et Coemgella."

—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. i., p. 512.

<sup>47</sup> In the "Book of Leinster," and in the "Leabhar Breac," our saint is styled, one of the three luminaries of the race of Conaire, according to the Poem, "On the Nine Saints of the Race of Conaire."

<sup>48</sup> In a beautifully-written article, The Legend of Iniscatthy, contributed to Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," the writer says: "Senan's father, like the other leading persons, who then inhabited that district, belonged to the distinguished race of Conary the Second, Monarch of Ireland in the second century," vol. i., No. i., p. 37.

<sup>49</sup> Thus, at p. 19, col. i, line 14 of this Manuscript, we find the genealogy of St. Senan of Inis Cathaigh, as being the Son of Gerreend,

Son of Dubthach,
Son of Decce,
Son of Imchad,
Son of Corp [recte Corb],
Son of Lugaid (or Lughaidh),
Son of Oilill,
Son of Oengus,
Son of Coirpre,
Son of Conaire,
Son of Mogh Lamha.

<sup>50</sup> Thus, at p. 351, col. 2, of this Manuscript, we have the genealogy of St. Senan of Iniscathaigh, that he was the Son of Eirggend,

Son of Dubthach,
Son of Decce,
Son of Imchad,
Son of Corb.

<sup>51</sup> To Mr. Joseph O'Longan, the writer is indebted for the extracts, in preceding notes.

<sup>52</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. Appendix ad Acta S. Senani, cap. ii., p. 537.

<sup>53</sup> See among the Hodges and Smith collection, in the Royal Irish Academy, the 4to paper MS., No. 144.

<sup>54</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. i., p. 526.

tion, to decide on matters of public importance; Ergind was also present, with his wife, who was then pregnant. A Druid showed reverence to the couple, on their approach, and resigned his own place, to accommodate them. His action being noticed, by some of those present, this Druid was asked, why he gave precedence to Ergind, a man of more humble rank than himself.<sup>55</sup> He answered, that in thus acting, he had not regarded the persons of Ergind or of his wife; but rather, the holiness of an infant, then borne by Congella, whose offspring would hereafter be adopted, and venerated, by the people of that country, as their patron and protector.<sup>56</sup> Immediately before giving birth to our saint, Congella chanced to be sojourning at a place, called Magh-lacha,<sup>57</sup> during the autumnal season. Having gone out to enjoy the benefit of a refreshing atmosphere, and while walking through an orchard, she was unexpectedly seized, with the pains of child-birth. But, in her extremity, an Angel of God appeared, and she was released from these pains, by giving birth to a son, whom this Angel blessed.<sup>58</sup> According to Dr. Lanigan, the birth and greatness of Senan, having been foretold by St. Patrick, when he had visited the present county of Limerick, about A.D. 448:<sup>59</sup> a period of forty years is supposed to have elapsed, between that prophecy, and the birth of our saint. This position he endeavours to establish, from a Life of St. Patrick, as published by Colgan. However, in a note to the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, Colgan observes,<sup>60</sup> that one MS. has 26 years; thus furnishing the discrepancy of a different reading, to the afore-said forty-sixth chapter. Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, that the forty years, mentioned in St. Patrick's fourth Life, come nearer to the truth; and hence, he supposes St. Senan to have been born, about the year 488, a date which will be found to agree, with the real series of his biographical transactions, although not reconcilable with some unchronological fables concerning him. Magh-lacha, the place of our saint's birth, was most probably situated in the present Clonderlach, or Clonderalaw barony, which lies to the east of Moyarta, according to Dr. Lanigan. This writer thinks, there is an affinity between the names Magh-lacha and Clonderlach.<sup>61</sup> St. Senan was thus a native of Corco-baschind, a district in the western part of Thomond.<sup>62</sup> It would <sup>55</sup> The author of the Second Life adds, "Druidæ enim in magna erant veneratione apud hanc nationem." This shows, that the number of those, who had here embraced the Christian faith, could not have been in a majority; or, that many, who had been baptized by St. Patrick, were not then living, had emigrated, or, perhaps, in various instances, had already lapsed into Paganism.

<sup>56</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. v., p. 526.

<sup>57</sup> We are told, by a distinguished Clareman, that Magh-lacha is "the name of a townland, in which are a lake and an old church, both called after St. Senan. It lies four miles N.E. of Kilrush, county Clare." This note is written, before the initials of his name, by Eugene Curry, in the "Meath Extracts," vol. ii., p. 153.

<sup>58</sup> A miraculous event is said to have accompanied the birth of St. Senan; as according to both Lives of our saint, some dry wood, on which Congella placed her hand, was afterwards known to bloom, and to send forth leaves. The author of the Prose Life states, after relating this legend, that the very tree alluded to was to be seen, in his day. See the Metrical Life, chap. iii., and the Prose Life, chap. vi.

<sup>59</sup> See his calculations in the "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. iv., p. 445.

<sup>60</sup> He tells us, that in one Irish Manuscript, St. Senan was to be born after pe píceab, or 120 years, and in another, after pe 'r píceab, or 26 years, which must be his meaning. According to Colgan's calculation, he thinks, that the birth of St. Senan should be referred to 26 years, or at least, not after 40 years, from the time St. Patrick uttered the prediction. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xlvii., p. 158, and n. 78, p. 185.

<sup>61</sup> Dr. Lanigan is wrong in this conjecture, for according to Mr. O'Donovan's Ancient Map of Clare, preserved among the Records of the Irish Ordnance Survey Office, in the Royal Irish Academy, Magh-lacha was situated, not in the barony of Clonderalaw, but within the parish of Kilrush, in the barony of Moyarta. It however appear, from the Metrical Life of our saint, that a church had been built in the neighbourhood, at the time of his birth. To this church he was brought, and here he was washed in the waters of regeneration, from the stain of original sin, having been baptized, in the name of the Most Holy Trinity.<sup>63</sup>

As our saint advanced in years, he grew in grace and faith; and, his knowledge appeared to partake somewhat of Divine inspiration. His abstinence was of a remarkable character, even in his youth; and, the Giver of all good lavished on him those happy dispositions of soul, which led him to the perfect practice of all virtues. One day, whilst accompanying his mother on a journey, he observed her gathering some berries from the bushes. These she was about to taste, when he gently reproved her, with an admonition, that refection had its own place and time.<sup>64</sup> The parents of our saint had two different houses, and not far distant, at a place, called Tracht-termuinn. At one time, the family of Senan, having resolved on moving from one of those residences to the other, they required our holy youth, to prepare the house, in which they were about to live, by placing its furniture and utensils, in their exact places. But, the boy neglected those injunctions, while engaged in a work of charity, towards one who lived near; and, for this neglect, Senan was reproved by his mother. However, he told her to have trust in the Lord; promising that his negligence, in a short time, should be repaired, through Divine grace. No sooner had he spoken, than the household utensils and other requisites were borne to their places, in a miraculous manner, and were there deposited. On seeing this, his mother, and some persons, who were present, began to feel admiration and reverence towards a child, so highly favoured by Heaven.<sup>65</sup> We are told, when our saint, at another time, accompanied his mother and family to a certain village, in which they wished to remain; the inhabitants of this place drove them out, with injuries and insults, which proved a cause of great grief to Senan's mother. The boy endeavoured to afford her consolation, by saying, that God was the avenger of all wrongs, causelessly inflicted on those, who were His servants. His observations appear to have been remarkably verified, in the present instance; for, a visitation of Divine vengeance was afterwards poured down upon that place. A great plague carried off, not only the cattle of its inhabitants, but even the owners of this stock. All other possessions, in their village, likewise disappeared, and without leaving behind a single trace. It is related, that the village had been swallowed up,<sup>66</sup> with all its in-bordered closely on the western limits of Clonderalaw.

<sup>63</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. iv., and nn. 56, 61, pp. 445, 448, 449. Mr. O'Donovan says, "It appears from the Life of St. Senanus, the territory of Corca-Bhaiscinn originally comprised the barony of Ibrickan, as well as those of Moyarta and Clonderalaw."—"Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (g), p. 48.

<sup>64</sup> The Metrical Life thus expresses it, cap. iii. :—

"Baptismi tinctus flumine (flumine)
Originali crimine
Et (si esset) actuali
Potuisset expiari."

This verse affords an ancient doctrinal exposition of baptismal effects, as understood by our Irish ancestors, and according exactly with correct theological teaching.

<sup>64</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," viii. Martii, p. 527. Secunda Vita S. Senani, cap. vi. These particulars are more diffusely related, in Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. iii., p. 513. As, however, there is an omission of notation, from cap. iii. to cap. vi., it is more than probable, these accounts belong to one, or both, of the intermediate numbers.

<sup>65</sup> See the Prose Life of St. Senan, chap. vii. The circumstances of this miracle are differently related, in St. Senan's Metrical Life. See chap. iii.

<sup>66</sup> It is a remarkable fact, that on the extreme end of Loop Head, a high rocky islet stands a little distance out in the Atlantic Ocean, but completely disrupted and inaccessible from the main shore. In 1866, the writer, in company with the Rev. Sylvester Malone, author of the learned and valuable "Church History of Ireland" visited this romantic spot. From the mainland, we habitants, and their valuables, as Core, Dathan and Abiron were buried alive, in the desert, during the time of Moyses and Aaron,<sup>67</sup> or as, at Jerico, in the time of Joshua, when the walls fell down by God's power,<sup>68</sup> and without the violence of man being required, for their destruction.<sup>69</sup> In the meantime, accompanied by his mother and family, Senan went to the sea-shore, expecting to find a vessel, which might convey them to the opposite coast. Not finding one, the youth offered up his prayers to God, that some means of passage should be afforded them. The Almighty heard the prayers of his servant, and together with the members of his family, who were present, Senan found himself safely conveyed to the opposite shore.<sup>70</sup>

Abbey of Corcomroe, County of Clare.

His religious vocation seems to have been early determined, as this following anecdote, recorded in his Life, will sufficiently show. Not only was he careful to avoid all occasions of sin, in the whole course of his actions; but, he felt a marked reluctance to be made the instrument of injustice, even when he was not morally accountable. Being a young man, he was bound by an oath of fealty, to serve the Dynast of that territory, in which he lived. The following occasion called him forth, unwillingly to bear arms, in a military foray. His chief of Corcobaschind, having collected an army of retainers, marched against the people of Corcomroe.<sup>71</sup> In this ancient territory are still to be found many interesting vestiges of antiquity; and, espewere enabled to trace with the eye very distinctly, what appeared to both to have been remains of ancient buildings and artificial earthworks, covering the surface of this inaccessible island, the sides of which are composed of almost perpendicular cliffs, and having not even a landing-place. The local inhabitants have a tradition, that here was once an ancient city, and that the waves tore away the intermediate rocks, which once joined it to the shore, near Loop Head lighthouse.

<sup>67</sup> See Numbers xvi.

<sup>68</sup> See Josue vi.

<sup>69</sup> See the Metrical Life of St. Senan, chap. iii.

<sup>70</sup> See the Metrical Life of St. Senan, cap. vi.

<sup>71</sup> John O'Donovan gives an interesting description of the territory of Corcomroe, East and West, in elucidation of his Ancient Map of the County of Clare, preserved among the records of the Irish Ordnance Survey Office. He says, that Corcomroe East, or Burren, in Irish, Boireann, has the name and extent of the ancient territory precially a fine old Abbey,<sup>72</sup> which was founded by Donnell O'Brien, King of Thomond, in 1194.<sup>73</sup> It is in the early pointed style.<sup>74</sup> St. Senan was obliged to bear part in an expedition, which was unjustly undertaken, and which proved an unsuccessful one, for the invading force. A battle having been fought, between those hostile clans, the Corcobaschind bands were put to flight, and pursued by their enemies, with great slaughter. Senan got separated from the rest of his companions, during their confused retreat. He fled for safety, to a place, where he hoped to find refuge, from the infuriated pursuers. Having concealed himself near a stack of wheat, he was discovered in this place, by some of the enemy, returning from the pursuit. Suddenly, the spot, where our saint lay, seemed to be surrounded with bright flames; but, wonderful to relate! although they played around a very combustible material, the wheaten straw was not consumed. When the men of Corcomroe<sup>75</sup> approached nearer, they discovered Senan seated in the midst of the flames. On his coming out, they asked who he was, and why he had been found in this position. The holy youth, who would not tell a falsehood, even to save his life, declared, that he belonged to the routed host, and that, through fear of the victors, he had there sought a place of refuge and concealment. The men of Corcomroe, seeing the young man's face bright as that of an Angel, recognised the power of God, by this miraculous preservation, in the midst of flames. They at once spared Senan's life, and gave him liberty to depart, whithersoever he pleased.<sup>76</sup> On leaving them, the servant of God felt greatly the pressure of hunger and thirst. Being totally destitute, he made application for relief, at the house of a chieftain, who was then absent. Notwithstanding his humble request, and his forlorn condition, the servants of this chieftain refused hospitality. They even drove him away, thus adding injury to insult. The saint, however, bore these reproaches meekly; but, towards evening, the owner of this castle returned. Supper had been prepared, in the meantime, and tables were loaded with all the requisites for a luxurious banquet. But, the heartless servants found not a sufficiency of food, for their own wants; for, what had been set before them, in a great measure, disappeared. However, all of those, who had eaten, began to exhibit symptoms of insanity. Whereupon, by some heaven-inspired instinct, the chieftain made inquiry, if during his absence, his servants had served in those of the modern barony. It is so called, owing to its rocky surface. The present barony of Corcomroe formed the western division. Both baronies, as constituting the ancient territory, were co-extensive with the Diocese of Kilfenora. The territory was named from the descendants of Modh Ruadh, the third son of Fearghus, dethroned King of Ulster, by Meadhbh or Maud, Queen of Connaught, in the first century. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart," or, Book of Rights, n. (2), pp. 65, 66.

<sup>72</sup> It is situated in the parish of Abbey, and barony of Burren. See, for the parish bounds, the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 3, 5, 6. The Abbey church was built, in a beautiful style, and it is still in a good state of preservation. Mr. O'Donovan has given a very complete account of the parish of Abbey, in the "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Clare, collected during the pro- gress of the Ordnance Survey in 1829," vol. i., pp. 15 to 35. Letter, dated Inistymon, Oct. 21st, 1839."

<sup>73</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. v., n. (a), pp. 1330, 1331.

<sup>74</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the spot by William F. Wakeman, and by him transferred to the wood, has been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>75</sup> After the establishment of surnames, the two chiefs and rival families of Modh Ruadh's race took surnames. In course of time, the territory was divided between them. The senior took the name of O'Conchobhair or O'Conor, and he was chieftain over the western or southern division, Corcomroe proper; while, the eastern or northern portion, Burren, was ruled by O'Lochlainn or O'Loughlin.

<sup>76</sup> See the Metrical Life of St. Senan, chap. vii. The circumstances of this narrative are almost identical, in the Second or Prose Life of St. Senan, chap. viii. See, injured any wanderer, or had denied hospitality to any poor person. At once, they recollected their uncharitable behaviour, towards that destitute young man, whom they had driven away with blows. They related these circumstances to their master. The compassionate chieftain then desired them to go forth, to seek this young man, and to bring him back when found, whether he felt willing or not to come, that thus he might partake of food with them, and pardon the rude treatment, he had already received, at their hands. These orders were obeyed. The young man was found, and brought back to the chieftain, who treated him with marked respect. Senan readily forgave the insolent servants; and, having poured forth his prayers, an abundance of food appeared on the table. Of this, all partook; and, thus finding the miraculous powers, possessed by this young man, the chieftain offered him perpetual possession of a farm, attached to his mansion.<sup>77</sup> At the time, when the author of St. Senan's Metrical Life lived, this very farm was regarded as a possession, belonging to Iniscatthy See.<sup>78</sup>

At one time, while Senan was conducting a herd of cattle, belonging to his parents, from a place, called Irros, lying towards the west, to Magh-lacha,<sup>79</sup> bearing eastward from it; the ocean tide flowed into an estuary, which separated both places. Evening coming on, at the same time, he found himself unable to pass over that night. Hence, he was compelled to return to a neighbouring castle, at a place called Dun-mechair,<sup>80</sup> to require shelter until the following day. The owner of this castle, who was called Macharius, being absent at the time, his servants refused the belated wanderer's application. The latter, having no other place of refuge near him, went back to the sea-shore, to wait the ebbing tide. To his surprise, the shore was perfectly dry, and with his oxen preceding him, Senan passed over to the opposite bank. When he reached it, on looking back, he found the waves rising to their former level, until they had come up to high water mark. Then our holy youth, admiring God's wonderful goodness towards him, resolved, as he had formerly borne arms under a temporal chief, that for the future, he would become a soldier of Christ. Presently, having struck a spear, which he then carried, in the ground, he fashioned it, so as to represent a cross. He made three several genuflexions before it, and a vow, offering himself and all he possessed to God, whom he resolved on serving for the future. After this had occurred, the enemies of Macharius beset his castle also, "The Legend of Iniscatthy," in Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 37.

<sup>77</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. viii., p. 515. The circumstances of this miracle are differently, and more succinctly, related, in St. Senan's Second Life, chap. ix., p. 527.

<sup>78</sup> From what is mentioned, of this farm having been a possession belonging to Iniscatthy See, Colgan infers, that the writer of St. Senan's Metrical Life must have lived, before that see had lost its episcopal title, and dignity. This, however, will not prove the writer to have lived, at a very remote period. Although, in the "Annals of the Four Masters," we find, that Aedhan, who died A.D. 861, is called simply Abbot, and not Bishop, of Iniscatthy, and although the decease of many successors is likewise noticed; yet, we find from this same authority, that Ædus O'Beachain, Bishop of Iniscatthy, died, A.D. 1188. Besides this, it must be known, that the offices of bishop and abbot, are very frequently found united in the same ruler, over a particular church and monastery. These offices, again, are oftentimes found, to have been held at the same time, but by distinct persons. See, ibid., n. 6, pp. 524, 525.

<sup>79</sup> This Magh-lacha was perhaps identical with the magh-lacha, marked on Mr. O'Donovan's Ancient Map of Clare County, now preserved, with the Records of the Irish Ordnance Survey Office in the Royal Irish Academy. This district is located, in the western part of the present Kilrush parish, in Moyarta barony, and county of Clare. But, no place, lying west of it, is marked Irros.

<sup>80</sup> The name of this place now appears to be obsolete.

<sup>81</sup> In "The Legend of Iniscatthy," it is said, our saint "saw in the distance, an enemy approaching the inhospitable dwelling of Dun-maghair, where he had asked in vain and took possession of it.<sup>81</sup> Having killed his son, and taken his wife away, as a captive, they plundered it, and seized all the valuables it contained.<sup>82</sup>

Distinguished by the performance of such miracles, while retaining the habit of a secular, and finding himself thus wondrously moved by God's grace, Senan resolved on entering a religious enclosure, where he might avoid all intercourse with the world. Having taken leave of his parents and friends, he placed himself under the direction of a holy man, named Cassidus or Cassidanus.<sup>83</sup> Senan desired to assume the religious habit, that thus he might resign himself wholly to God's work. Finding, in this young postulant, all the marks of a divine vocation, the saintly abbot<sup>84</sup> at once invested Senan, with the distinctive badges of a religious life. Having retained him under his own rule, the mind of this young religious was imbued, with a knowledge of letters, and he was trained to monastic discipline. So great were the natural talents of Senan, that, in a short time, he made vast proficiency in liberal sciences, and in ecclesiastical learning, necessary either for an accomplished laic, or for a doctor of the Church. Like an industrious bee, our saint stored within his mind those sweet treasures, which were afterwards to be expended, in furnishing mental entertainment and instruction, for the benefit of others. But, Senan was careful to practise humility and charity, in such a high degree, that his learning might not degenerate into that vain and ostentatious pedantry, which too often accompanies its profession. Whatever he heard or read was converted into a treasure, from which he drew forth virtues, that sanctified his state. When using his natural and acquired gifts, by conveying words of heavenly wisdom to others, he laboured at all times to put in practice those devout exercises, which were calculated to ensure his own sanctification.<sup>85</sup>

CHAPTER II.

ST. SENAN STUDIES AT KIL-NA-MANAGH, IN OSSORY—MIRACULOUS GIFTS WHILE THERE—HE REMOVES TO INISCONIRTHE, OR INISCOIRTHE, NOW ENNISCORTHY, ON THE RIVER SLANEY—IT IS SAID, HE AFTERWARDS WENT TO ROME, GAUL, AND BRITAIN—SENAN RETURNS TO IRELAND, AND LANDS AT ARDMENEDH ISLAND—HE GOES TO THE ISLAND OF INISCARA—HE REMOVES FROM IT TO INIS-LUINGE, AND THERE HE BUILDS A CHURCH—HE FOUNDS ANOTHER AT INIS-TUAISCHERT—HE VISITS INISMORE, AND THERE FOUNDS A MONASTERY—HE BUILDS AN ORATORY ON INIS-CAORACH—AGAIN, ON INIS-CUNLA HE CONSTRUCTS A CELL FOR HIS DISCIPLES, FINAN AND FINNIAN.

THE Abbot Cassidus had a vision, in which he received a Divine mandate, to send his novice Senan to a holy man named Natalus, or Nattal,<sup>1</sup> who was for lodging, and despoil it before his eyes."—Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 37.

<sup>82</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. x., p. 527. After this account, the writer adds, that the place remained without an inhabitant, in his day, and, it was thought, must so remain for ever.

<sup>83</sup> He is called indifferently, Cassidus and Cassidius, in the Metrical Life, and in the Prose Life, he is named Cassidanus. In this latter Life, he is said to have been "Abbatem qui oriundus erat de regione Kierraighe Chuirke et tunc habitabat in regione Irras." This saint is thought to have been a native of Kerry-cuirke, the present barony of Kerricurichy, between the mouth of Cork harbour and Kinsale. See, Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 37.

<sup>84</sup> Amongst Irish saints, Colgan was unable to discover, in our domestic Martyrologies, the festival of any saint, named Cassidus or Cassidanus, but many who were called Cassan. Marianus O'Gorman and the Martyrology of Tallagh mention saints, bearing this latter name, at the 28th of March, at the 4th and 20th of June, and at the 3rd of December. At the 4th of June, Colgan promised to say more, regarding this Saint Cassidus, or Cassidanus, now under consideration. See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, n. 7, p. 525.

then Abbot of Kilmanagh,<sup>2</sup> or Kil-na-managh, in Ossory; that, under his rule, our saint might be more fully prepared and instructed, in monastic discipline. Senan felt grieved at being obliged to leave his first master, and that place he had chosen as a retreat. Recollecting, however, that obedience is better than sacrifice, and that he must in all things obey the Divine will, he set out for his new habitation, where he was honourably received by Nattal, among his religious band. Under this new director, Senan was distinguished for his obedience, his devout exercises, and his many exalted virtues. According to the instructions of Natalis, while Senan was one day tending a herd, belonging to his master, he endeavoured to prevent the calves from approaching their dams, that thus milk might be preserved, for use of the monastic brethren. But, after many vain efforts, to effect a separation between those cows and calves, which were impatient of restraint, the saint placed his staff in an upright position between them. Afterwards, he returned to finish his prayers, which had been interrupted. The animals found themselves unable to meet, or to pass a boundary thus marked out; so that, on future occasions, when our saint wished to devote himself to prayer or reading, he adopted the same expedient, and, with like success.<sup>3</sup> Having often reflected on those words of the Saviour, "He that is greatest among you shall be your servant;"<sup>4</sup> Senan desired always to obtain, and to be employed in, the most humble offices. Hence, he assumed the care of grinding corn, at a mill, belonging to the monastery. Some robbers, in this neighbourhood, noticing that Senan was often alone, and engaged during night, tending the mill, formed a design of entering it, to take away corn, belonging to the monks. Before putting their intentions into execution, they approached the door, and looking through an opening, they discovered two young men—one was engaged at reading, while the other tended the mill. The robbers doubted if they should enter, as there were two persons within; but, one of the band gave it as his opinion, that they must wait for some time, as those two young men could not be members of the same family, or employed at the same duties. One was supposed to be the miller, and the other, a person who had brought corn to be ground, which, when ready, he would take away. It was proposed, by the robbers, to await the presumed egress of this latter person, whom they intended to deprive of the corn, and whatever else he might possess. Having accomplished these objects, they were afterwards to attack that man, who remained alone in the mill, and thus take all they might be able there to procure. This counsel was generally approved, by the others; but, whilst expecting the egress of one or other of those young men, they waited in vain, and for a long time. They observed, likewise, that neither of them slept until morning, when Senan came forth, with an intention of returning to the monastery. On opening the mill-door, those robbers rushed forward and entered it. They asked, at the same time, where and who was that other young man, who assisted in working the mill, during night. Senan replied, "What if it were he, of whom it is said, he sleeps not, nor shall he sleep, who watches over Israel?"<sup>5</sup> They insisted on finding out, where his companion should be found, when the saint replied:

See, also, Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., March viii., pp. 163, 164.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. viii., ix., pp. 515, 516, and Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xi., p. 527.

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 31st of July.

This parish is in the barony of Cranagh, and it is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 18, 22. The town and townland proper are on Sheet 18.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. x., p. 516, and Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xii., pp. 527, 528.

<sup>4</sup> Matt. xxiii., 11.

<sup>5</sup> See Psalms cxx., 4.

<sup>6</sup> See "The Legend of Iniscathy," in

"He is near to all who invoke him." At these words, the robbers were touched with sorrow, and bursting into tears, they promised to repent and to amend their lives. At the same time, they asked to be received among the brethren. Full of joy, our saint promised that their request should be attended to, and he led them to St. Natalis.<sup>6</sup> Having received the monastic habit, they continued with him, in a holy course of living, to the end of their mortal pilgrimage.<sup>7</sup> At another time, St. Senan asked the monastic cook for some candles, which should be necessary for him, while prosecuting his labours at the mill.<sup>8</sup> The cook answered, in a short time, he expected to have some ready, but he had none, at that present moment. Senan went to the mill, at the same instant, and he did not return for a week, to repeat his demand, on the cook. Wondering how Senan had obtained light, to prosecute his labours, during this lengthened period, the cook resolved to see, if he had been engaged at work, during all this time, or how he had procured light. At nightfall, going to the mill, and on looking through a crevice in the door, he saw a candle placed in a candlestick, while Senan was engaged reading; and, the millstones continued grinding without cessation, no person being required to supply the grain, nor to furnish any human assistance. Astonished at such a wonderful spectacle, the cook returned to his cell; and, on a second and third visit, he witnessed a repetition of what had at first occurred: moreover, he observed, that it was the same candle, which he had given many days before, and which yet remained miraculously unconsumed. The cook related this whole affair to St. Natalis, who extolled the virtues of our saint. At the same time, he predicted, that God would afterwards work many and great miracles through him.<sup>9</sup>

After relating an occurrence, which will be found in the Acts of St. Natalis,<sup>10</sup> and referring to a miracle wrought at a place called Killmor-aradh-thire<sup>11</sup>—the Metrical Life of our Saint is defective; but, it is to be presumed, that this deficiency, in a great measure, is supplied by the Second Life. After stating the circumstances of the miracle alluded to, it proceeds with a narrative of events, in the following order. We are told, that this wonder and other miracles, wrought by St. Senan, spread the fame of his sanctity, far and wide, through all the adjoining regions. Numbers of people resorted to him—some, that they might be relieved from pains and infirmity—others, that they might be instructed by him, in the practice of a spiritual life—many, to ask Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 37.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xiii., p. 528. The author of this Life adds, regarding those converts, "et ipsi sunt qui de se hanc historiam narraverunt." The foregoing circumstances are almost similarly related, in the Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xii., pp. 517, 518; but, in the latter, we are told, the number and names of those robbers, as follows:—

"Per idem tempus Conmacus, Cyrillus et Hilarius,
Tres fratres pares opere,
Prædas solebant agere,
Et sub noctis silentio
Intrare latrocinio."

Colgan gives a note, on this passage, in which he confesses himself at a loss to find, who were those brothers, who from having been robbers became holy monks. Having discovered some names, in the Irish Calendars, which seem to correspond with those of Conmacus, Cyrillus and Hilarius, and whose festivals are assigned to different days of the year; he would not undertake to assert, nevertheless, that these were to be confounded with the monks, who lived under St. Natalis' rule. See, ibid., n. 9, p. 525.

<sup>8</sup> Another story is to the effect, that he read at night, using the fingers of his left hand as candles. See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March viii., p. 160.

<sup>9</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xiv., p. 528. The circumstances of this miracle are related differently, and much more extravagantly, in Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xi., pp. 516, 517.

<sup>10</sup> At the 31st of July.

<sup>11</sup> The situation of this place is not known, at present.

the benefit of his prayers—some, with donations and offerings made to him for religious purposes, and others again, to put themselves under his direction, as their spiritual adviser and father. Seeing and hearing miracles wrought by our saint, through the grace of God, and learning his fame for sanctity, diffused among the people, the holy Abbot Natalis at once came to the conclusion, that his disciple was more worthy to rule over others, than to continue longer the subject of any religious superior. Hereupon, he commanded Senan's retirement to another place, where, with more advantage, he might betake himself to the instruction of others. He was recommended to undertake the direction of a monastic institute, where he might train religious men, in the virtues of their state. With great reluctance, on his part, and after remonstrance with the abbot; at length, our saint humbly acquiesced in his superior's views, and asked advice, as to the place he should select, for this new establishment. Natalis answered, that such direction should be asked, and expected from him, by whom he had been called to a high office. Wherefore, obeying the orders of his abbot, Senan took leave of him, and the rest of his brethren. Having received his superior's blessing, our saint directed his course towards eastern Leinster. Being admonished by an angel, he came to an island, lying in the River Slaney, called Inis-conirthe,<sup>12</sup> in the territory of Hy-Kinsellagh. It is probable, that this place, so written, in St. Senan's Second Life, was identical with the present Enniscorthy,<sup>13</sup> a market town situated on the River Slaney, in the barony of Scarawalshe, in Wexford County. This town was formerly called Inis-Corthadh,<sup>14</sup> and even to this day, the inhabitants of Kilkenny County call it Inis-Cortha.<sup>15</sup> While Senan remained in this place, it is said, he contracted a friendship and familiarity with Blessed Maidoc,<sup>16</sup> Archbishop of Ferns.<sup>17</sup> Dr. Lanigan however maintains, that St. Maidoc was not born at this time; but, he allows, that at a subsequent period, when young, he might have formed an acquaintance with St. Senan.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Dr. O'Donovan states, that this is a misprint for inis Córthe.

<sup>13</sup> The town and townland of Enniscorthy, in the parishes of St. Mary's, Enniscorthy, and Templeshannon, are in the baronies of Scarawalshe and Ballaghkeen, and are shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheets 20, 26.

<sup>14</sup> In Irish, inis Córtharo, is also the name given for it in the "Annals of the Four Masters," at the year 1460.

<sup>15</sup> Speaking of this town, Enniscorthy, Mr. John O'Donovan, in the Antiquarian Letters of the Irish Ordnance Survey for Wexford, says: "Gough, in his foolish additions to Camden, supposes this town to have been the capital of the Coriondi of Ptolemy; and the Chevalier de Montmorency, in his communications to Mr. Brewer, observes, that the name may be also derived from Enis-scor-teach, the stud house pastureage." Mr. O'Donovan adds, that the gentlemen just mentioned are no authorities, and their conclusions are merely unlearned conjectures. There is no evidence whatever, to show that Enniscorthy was a town, a village, or even a rath, before the arrival of the English, nor anything but a green island, formed by the River Slaney, near which there was a primitive little church, built by St. Senan, and this shows, that it could not have been the capital of the Coriondi. As to the Chevalier de Montmorency's conjecture, that the name is compounded of Enis-scor-teach, "the stud house pastureage," it is false; for, it appears from the Irish authorities, that it is not the original form of the name. The name is really compounded of inis, "an island," and Corthadh, a man's name. Mr. O'Donovan then refers, in proof, to his observations, on the name of Enniskillen, in the county of Fermanagh. See "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Wexford, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey," vol. ii., pp. 228, 229. These notices are signed "J. O'D." They appear to have been written, in the summer of 1840. Notices regarding this place, taken from the "Annals of the Four Masters," Colgan, Gough's Camden, Archdall, Mason, Brewer, follow the foregoing account.

<sup>16</sup> See his Life, at the 31st of January.

<sup>17</sup> The parish, bearing this name, is in the baronies of Gorey and Scarawalshe, and is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheets 10, 11, 15, 16, 20. The town itself is on Sheet 15.

<sup>18</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., n. 5, p. 4.

<sup>19</sup> The Second Life of St. Senan has it,

After some time, our saint had a desire of visiting Rome, on a pilgrimage to the Apostolic shrines. It was said, having satisfied his devotions in that city, he returned through Gaul, and visited the city of Tours,<sup>19</sup> where he remained for some time. Before he set out for Ireland, he went to Britain, and lived some time with St. David,<sup>20</sup> Archbishop of Menevia, according to the Second Life. But, it is an opinion, that St. Senan's visit to David must have occurred, before the latter became Bishop over Menevia; for, his accession to that see was not prior to the year 540, in all probability, and at this time, Senan was established at Iniscathay. While, however, Dr. Lanigan allows, that a friendship had subsisted between David and Senan; yet, he thinks it probable, that St. Senan never left Ireland, as nothing is found in his Metrical Life, regarding a visit to St. David in Britain. Besides, no mention is made of Senan, in the Life of St. David, published by Colgan and others; although, certain Irish saints are spoken of, as having formed a personal acquaintance and friendship, with the Bishop of Menevia. However, it has been supposed, that an intimacy and correspondence might have existed between Saints David and Senan, even without their having seen each other.<sup>21</sup> It must be observed, besides positive evidence we possess from tradition and writing, that Senan visited St. David, and remained with him; the probability is, that this presumed intimacy, between both saints, was the result of a personal familiarity, established between them. The fact, that no mention has been made of Senan, in St. David's Life, should not prevent us from supposing it possible, that our saint visited the holy Bishop of Menevia; for, it would appear, from our saint's Second Life, that little worthy of especial notice occurred, at that time, more than Senan's interview and departure. We must not too hastily conclude, from the circumstance of nothing having been mentioned, in St. Senan's Metrical Life, regarding his having left Ireland, and his visit to St. David, that neither of these events took place. On the contrary, when giving an account of our saint's death, his Metrical Life remarks, that Senan had been allied in friendship with St. David, during the lifetime of this latter holy man; and, it alludes to a previous account, confirmatory of such statement. It would appear, that both saints had mutually expressed a wish, to be removed from this life, and at the same time, one being unwilling to survive the other; while, we are told, that their wishes were granted, in a miraculous manner.<sup>22</sup> From this account alone, it is quite evident, a friendship and conversation between both saints must have been previously related, in that part of the Metrical Life, which is now left defective; and, this omission most probably occurred, through some negligence of a transcriber.<sup>23</sup> Hence, all indications left us warrant the supposition, that a personal interview took place between both saints. As in the Life of St. David, we do not read that he ever visited Ireland, another infer-

"Visit et S. Martinum Turonensem;" yet, this only means, that he visited the church and relics of St. Martin, who died, not only before St. Senan's birth, but even before the preaching of St. Patrick, in Ireland. His death is usually referred, to the close of the fourth century; while, his chief festival is held, on the 11th of November.

<sup>19</sup> See his Life, at the 1st of March.

<sup>21</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., n. 6, p. 4.

<sup>22</sup> St. Senan's departure is thus alluded to, in his Metrical Life :-

Obiisse David inclytum
Menevensen Episcopum,
Cui vivent, ut diximus
Suus adhæsit spiritus.
Res autem mira contigit,
Ut hoc Senanus comperit;
Nam ut sibi condixerant
Dum simul ambo vixerant,
Nolebant ultra vivere
Collega non superstiti,
Sed mox carne exiit,
Sicut qui somno solvitur."

"In eodem ergo loco Recognovit ab Angelo

<sup>23</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xxv., p. 523, and n. 20, p. 525.

ence to be drawn is, that Senan must have been with him in Wales, or perhaps in some more distant country.<sup>24</sup> In St. Senan's Second Life, we are told, that on taking leave of St. David, this latter holy man presented him with the staff used by himself, as a token of his friendship.<sup>25</sup> This gift was brought to Ireland, by our saint. Having received the kiss of peace from St. David, Senan sailed over to his own country, with favouring winds. He landed on Ardmenedh Island,<sup>26</sup> which lay off that part of the Munster coast,<sup>27</sup> which is called Iliatham;<sup>28</sup> and, here he remained, during forty days, to recover from the fatigues of his voyage. An angel was sent to warn him, that this was not the place, designed by the Almighty, for his rest and sepulture, but another which was more distant. It was intimated to him, likewise, that before he could occupy that spot, ultimately designed for him by Providence, he should first build many cells and churches to God's greater glory, and to promote the increase of monastic discipline in Ireland.<sup>29</sup>

Having left some disciples, in the place already mentioned, St. Senan went to an island, called Inniscarra,<sup>30</sup> where he erected a church. While dwelling in this place, a ship touched at the island, having fifty monks, who were foreigners, carried on board. These religious were Romans by birth,<sup>31</sup> or persons subject to Roman laws. They desired to perfect themselves in Scriptural knowledge, or to lead lives of more strict observance; for these objects, at that time, Ireland furnished ample opportunities.<sup>32</sup> They had <sup>24</sup> The Bollandists remark, that before A.D. 519, it is not pretended that St. David was Archbishop, and St. Senan's Acts seem to indicate, that when he visited the former, such a dignity had been obtained. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii viii. Secunda Vita S. Senani, n. (d), p. 773.

<sup>25</sup> This, in all probability, was not a staff, which the Patriarch of Jerusalem is said to have bestowed on St. David, and which was regarded in Wales as a valuable relic; but, probably, it was a different one, which the holy Bishop of Menevia used on ordinary occasions.

<sup>26</sup> This island is said to have been situated, on the coast of Waterford County, south of Ardmore; and to have formed part of the ancient diocese of Lismore. In the Book of Litanies of Tamlacht, the author invokes the prayers of 150 saints, who were patrons over this island, and who were there buried. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, n. 9, p. 525.

<sup>27</sup> In "The Legend of Iniscathy," Ardne-meth—as it is written—has been identified as, "now the Great Island, near Cork." See Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. I, No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>28</sup> By this we are probably to understand Ui-Liathain, who as a tribe derived name and origin from Eochaidh Liathanach, the son of Daire Cearba. When surnames were established, the chief families of this tribe were O'h-Anmchadhan and O'Liathain. They were located on the west side of the Blackwater River. After the English invasion, Henry II. granted Ui-Liathain, called Olethan, with Muscherie-Dunegan and Killede, to Robert Fitzstephen, who passed this grant to Philip de Barry; and, it was confirmed to William, son and heir of this latter, in the eighth year of King John's reign. The three cantreds, already named, are included in the baronies of Barrymore, Kinatalloon, and Imokilly, in the county of Cork, and of Coshmore and Coshbride, in the county of Waterford. These three cantreds were to the east of the city of Cork. From Irish history, we know, likewise, that the present village of Castle-Lyons, or Caislean Ui Liathain, and the island, called Oilean Mor Arda Neimhidh, now the Great Island, near Cork, were in Ui Liathain. This gives us a good idea of its position, and even of its extent. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Geart, or Book of Rights," n. (s), pp. 72, 73.

<sup>29</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xviii., xix., pp. 528, 529.

<sup>30</sup> This island is about five miles distant from Cork, near the River Lee, and in Barret's barony. Its site is indicated, in the Life of St. Senan, as being "juxta Lua." See, likewise, "The Legend of Iniscathy," in Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. I., No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>31</sup> Colgan calls our attention to this circumstance, as illustrating the reputation enjoyed by our island for learning and sanctity, among the Romans, and other nations of Europe. During the age, in which St. Senan lived, and subsequent to it, Ireland is compared to another Thebais, and to a literary gymnasium, to preserve ecclesiastical studies, for the benefit of various nations in Europe, which sent students over to it, in great numbers.

<sup>32</sup> In another account, it is said, these previously learned the fame of certain holy fathers, in our island, under whom they might find themselves exercised in rigorous discipline, and in practices of most exalted sanctity. These religious strangers, we are told, were divided into five bands, each one of which comprised ten persons. Of these bands, one was destined for the magistracy of St. Finnian;<sup>33</sup> another for that of St. Brendan; a third for St. Barreus; a fourth for St. Kieran; while, the fifth, was a band of persons, who intended to place themselves under the training of St. Senan. During their voyage, it would appear, they had agreed among themselves, that each band should assume in turn the direction of their vessel. During that time, the ship was placed under the protection of its working crew's special patron. It happened one day; while St. Senan's band had the direction, a violent head-wind arose, against which their bark laboured with such difficulty, that the destruction of those on board seemed imminent. The pilot warned them, that they must have recourse to prayer. Then, a certain holy bishop, named Mola,<sup>34</sup> who was found among the passengers, arose from a table, at which he had been seated, as it was about the time for dining. Having invoked St. Senan's intercession, he made a sign of the cross, towards the opposing winds. Immediately, this great tempest ceased, and the winds, which had been adverse, changed their direction. Favourable breezes bore their vessel safely to Cork. Here, ten disciples remained, who placed themselves under the direction of St. Barreus: the remaining forty sailed to Iniscarra, where St. Senan hospitably received them, and retained with himself, the bishops, John<sup>35</sup> and Mota,<sup>36</sup> with eight other companions. St. Senan then sent those disciples, who had chosen Finnian, Brendan, and Kieran, as their masters, to the respective homes assigned them, and to the directors of their choice. Afterwards, Lugadius, son to Kicheth, who was King of Rathlendra territory, in which this monastery of Iniscarra had been located, sent messengers to St. Senan, demanding tribute from the abbot, as a mark of subjection to his dynastic power. The saint refused, saying he would not recognise any secular master, to whom he owed fealty or tribute. Then, this king ordered one of his best horses to be brought to the monastery, where it was to be Romans landed at Iniscattery or Cathay. See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., p. 185.

<sup>33</sup> In the Life of our saint, this name is by mistake first set down as Tinnians, but the correction is supplied subsequently, and in a note, where we are referred to St. Barreus' Acts, at the 25th of September, to those of Finnen, at the 23rd of February; to those of Brendan, at the 16th of May; and to those of St. Kieran, at the 9th of September. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Secunda Vita S. Senani, n. 11, p. 535.

<sup>34</sup> Colgan says, that he cannot find any name, thus written, among the saints of our country. He hazards a supposition, that the name might have been Molua; and, he refers us to Marianus, who mentions this name, at the 25th of June, at the 15th and 20th of October, and at the 21st of December. See ibid., n. 12, p. 535. However, it is a great mistake to suppose, that we must so constantly refer to the Calendars, for the identification of persons named in the Acts of our Irish Saints.

<sup>35</sup> The John here named is not known,

unless, as Colgan observes, he be Bishop of Kill-airthirensis, bearing that name. The Martyrology of Tallagh, Marianus and other writers, treat of him, at the 24th of October; or, perchance, he was John, Bishop of Lismore, who is named, in our Calendars, at the 13th of November. See ibid., n. 13, p. 535. It must be remarked, that those called bishops, at this time, might not have received episcopal consecration, until a subsequent period. A very general practice of ancient writers, in recording honours and titles conferred upon saints, often anticipated only the after course of their lives. It is probable, the bishop, who is called Mota, in the latter part of the chapter, was no other than he, who is named Mola, on that occasion, when he wrought a miracle, during the voyage. He might have been called Mola, or Mota; but, it seems likely, that the latter spelling is one of the numerous typographical errors, to be found in Colgan's works.

<sup>36</sup> The Bollandists call him Mola, and consider him to have been the spiritual father of St. Maidoc. See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii viii. "Secunda Vita S. Senani, cap. iii., num. 21, n. (i.), p. 773.

fed on corn, belonging to the monks. But, this horse, having been conducted thither, and washed in an adjoining river, was immediately suffocated in the water; and, after plunging about for some time, he disappeared beneath its surface.<sup>37</sup> When the dynast heard what had occurred, being moved with indignation, he went to St. Senan; and, after having loaded him with injuries, the chief threatened death. But, the servant of God, in turn, declared to Lugadius, that if he would not cease to persecute those, who had devoted themselves to a religious life, this prince should experience Divine displeasure, in being deprived of heavenly joys, and the possession of his temporal honours, so that after himself, none of his posterity should enjoy his principality. As members of his family, this dynast had two youths, named Aidus and Lugadius,<sup>38</sup> who were much loved by him; and, these young persons grieving for the treatment exhibited towards our saint, by their chieftain, endeavoured to persuade the latter, that he should abandon such course of conduct, lest he might draw down the vengeance of heaven on his family. They advised him to confess his faults, to repair the injuries he had so wantonly inflicted, and to endeavour, by such means, to effect a reconciliation with our saint. Their representations had due weight, on the chieftain's mind, for he changed that course of conduct. Lugadius and Aidus hastened to the abbot, whom they approached with great reverence and humility, as well to show their profound respect, as to obtain his pardon, for what already had occurred. They asked his blessing, and promised they would become his faithful and devoted clients. Senan gave them his benediction, predicting, at the same time, that the posterity of Lugadius should possess the principality of Rathlindia, and that the posterity of Aidus and Luogarius should succeed, and enjoy the territories of Ivechia.<sup>39</sup> Leaving eight of his disciples in this place,<sup>40</sup> among whom were St. Fechin,<sup>41</sup> son to the Dynast of Muschragia, and St. Chillin,<sup>42</sup> St. Senan went thence to another island, <sup>37</sup> It seems the island there had previously been called Tuam-nava; but, after this occurrence, it was denominated Inis-cara; which means in Latin, insula armi, as cara in Irish bears the signification of armus. In O'Reilly's "Irish-English Dictionary," the word cara has the meaning of "a leg," or "haunch."

<sup>38</sup> It would seem, that the youth here called Lugadius, is called Luogarius a little lower down, in St. Senan's Prose Life. In one instance or other, there is probably a typographical error; but, without access to MSS., it would not be an easy matter to determine the correct reading.

<sup>39</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Secunda Vita S. Senani, cap. xxii., p. 529. The author of St. Senan's Prose Life adds to this account: "uti in sua de his historia conscripta Sanctus Colmanus filius Lenine testatur." From these words, Colgan appears to have come to the conclusion, that St. Colman wrote a Life of our saint. But, unless he derived his knowledge from other sources, it will not follow from this passage, that Colman composed a Life of St. Senan. Without doing so, and whilst treating on a subject, having reference to the circumstances related, the narrative might have been introduced. Dr. Lanigan, when treating on this part of St. Senan's Life, and after mentioning, Aidus and Luga-dus, tells us, that their history was written in verse by Colman, son of Lenine, who died in the year 601. Aidus, it is said, was father to Cathald, King of Munster, who died in 625. "Hence, we may suppose, that Senan was at Inniscarra, about A.D. 532; whereas, Aidus was young at that time." "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., n. 10, p. 5.

<sup>40</sup> Colgan says, this island, called Inniscarra, there is reason to suppose, was the same as that denominated Cuil-ochtair, which means, the "Cell of the eight brethren;" and which is mentioned in the book of St. Ængus' Litanies, and more especially, as the brethren there are said to have been strangers.

<sup>41</sup> Colgan states, that although the names, St. Fechin and St. Chillin, are Irish, the denomination of the island may have been assumed, from this fact, that the greater part of those living there had been foreigners. This St. Fechin named, he thinks, must have been either, Fechin, son to Vacaieche, whose feast is kept on the 16th of February, at Lemmaigh; or, perhaps, Fechin Valughba, who is venerated on the 28th of December, according to Marianus and others.

<sup>42</sup> The St. Chillin here mentioned, in the opinion of Colgan, seems to have been Killen, son to Tolodran, whose feast is kept on the 26th of March, in the Decies Country, or Killin Brehghda, whose feast is kept, ac-which was called Inis-luinge,<sup>43</sup> where he built a church.<sup>44</sup> While dwelling at this place,<sup>45</sup> the daughters of Brendad, Dynast of Y-figinte, came to him, and having consecrated themselves to God, by religious vows, they lived under the direction of St. Senan. These holy virgins became the first fruits of Eoganacht Gabhra region, and were consecrated to God, through the ministry of his favoured servant. After our saint had veiled them, in this place,<sup>46</sup> and had instructed them in the principles of a spiritual life, and in monastic discipline; he set out for a certain island, which was called Inismore,<sup>47</sup> and which was situated in a region, called Irros-deschert. But, contrary to his intention, through the dispositions of Divine Providence, he was driven by contrary winds, to another island, called Inis-tuaischert,<sup>48</sup> and here he began to build a church. Leaving some of his disciples there, when it had been completed, Senan resumed his journey. He came to Inismore, where he founded a monastery, and dwelt there for some time, with his disciples. Having left some of these latter, in this place, among whom are specially named, St. Liberius,<sup>49</sup> with three bishops, named Dalan, Sedonius, and Erc, our saint betook himself to another island, called Iniscaorach;<sup>50</sup> where, having built an oratory,<sup>51</sup> he left there, in like manner, some of his cording to Marianus, on the 29th of December. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," n. 14, p. 535.

<sup>43</sup> We are told, that this was either an island in the Shannon, or a place near that river, along which lies the country, anciently called Hyfiginte. In the Second Life of St. Senan, chap. 43, is mentioned Inisluidhe, now Inisula, where it appears there was some religious establishment. It is one of the islands of the Shannon, between Limerick and Iniscatthy.

<sup>44</sup> "Whether Inisluinge and Inisluidhe were the same place or not, I will not stop to enquire."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., n. 12, p. 5.

<sup>45</sup> Following the authority of O'Halloran, Archdall says (at Inisula), that Senan founded a monastery there, before St. Patrick's arrival in Munster. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 48.

<sup>46</sup> Harris assigns the foundation of Inislua, an island in the Shannon, among the Irish monasteries under Clare county, to the fifth century. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 267. It was founded, however, in the sixth century; since this was the period, when the missionary career of St. Senan was in course of prosecution.

<sup>47</sup> In "The Legend of Iniscatthy," we read the following identification: "supposed by some to be Deer Island, at the mouth of the Fergus." See Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>48</sup> Dr. Lanigan puts a query, "Could this be Inistuskaran Island off the coast of Kerry, barony of Corcaguinny?"—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., n. 13, p. 5.

<sup>49</sup> He is supposed to have been venerated on the 1st of August, being called, with his brothers Failbhe and Oilbhe, the sons of Luissen.

<sup>50</sup> Or Inis-keeragh. This was one of the Enniskerry Islands, in the barony of Ibrickan, and on the coast of Clare County. The denomination has been vulgarized by receiving a different name. It is now called Mutton Island, according to Mr. Dutton. See his "Statistical Survey of the County of Clare," p. 329.

<sup>51</sup> "Belonging to this parish (Kilmurry, barony of Ibrickan, and county of Clare), and lying in the Atlantic opposite the townland of Tromra, is the island of Inis Caerach, or Mutton Island, on which the great St. Senanus founded an oratory, as Colgan gathers from the Lives of that saint. The site of St. Senan's Church, on this island, is still pointed out, but, no part of it remains. * * *

The following passage in the 'Annals of the Four Masters,' at the year 799, is believed to have reference to this island and two others in its vicinity. * * *
'A.D. 799. A great storm of wind, thunder and lightning happened the day before St. Patrick's festival this year, and it killed ten and one thousand persons, in the territory of Corca-Baskin, and the sea divided the island of Inis Fithæ into three parts.' The more intelligent of the natives are acquainted with this passage, and believe, that it could have reference to no other place than Mutton Island. If I am not mistaken, Connell Mageoghegan, in his translation of the 'Annals of Clonmacnoise,' points out the very situation of this island, which was divided into three parts by an earthquake. I hope Mr. Smyth of College-green, who has a copy of Mageoghegan's translation of the 'Annals of Clonmacnoise,' will send me this passage." Thus writes John O'Donovan from Kildysart, on the 8th of November, 1839. This is to be found among the Antiquarian Letters, relating to the County Clare, vol. i., pp. 348, 349.

disciples. After this, our saint went to another island,<sup>52</sup> named Inis-cunla,<sup>53</sup> situated in Y-Sedna district. On this, he also constructed a cell,<sup>54</sup> which he designed for the habitation of his disciples,<sup>55</sup> Finan and the Bishop Finnian.<sup>56</sup> It will be observed, in the foregoing and succeeding accounts, as found in St. Senan's Acts, that his love of retirement, in selecting sites for all his religious establishments, led him to choose those positions, where he could be most perfectly insulated, or removed from all commerce with men of the world.

CHAPTER III.

ST. SENAN IS MIRACULOUSLY SHOWN BY AN ANGEL THE PLACE FOR HIS FUTURE HABITATION—HE EXPELS THE MONSTER CATHACH—DESCRIPTION OF AND ANTIQUITIES ON SCATTERY ISLAND—MACTAIL'S OPPOSITION TO ST. SENAN, AND HIS SUDDEN DEATH—THE DRUID'S DISCOMFITURE—TWO BOYS, WHO WERE DROWNED RESTORED TO LIFE—ST. SENAN IS VISITED BY SAINTS KIERAN AND BRENDAN—THE MIRACULOUS BELL SENT TO ST. SENAN—THE HOLY ABBOT PRODUCES THE WELL, AFTERWARDS KNOWN AS TOBER SHEANAIN.

AT length, having built so many cells and monasteries, after having instructed so many disciples—having allowed them to exercise those virtues they had acquired, in different institutions—after having done so much for religion, in his own, and in distant lands, St. Senan was warned by an angel, that the time had now arrived, according to the designs of Providence, when he should seek a place of retreat, where he must rest from his labours, and find a tomb. The Angel of God then led him to the summit of a mountain, called Tese. Thence, an island was seen lying on the bosom of the Shannon, within that expanse of its waters, where they are discharged into the Western Ocean.<sup>1</sup> This he said, should be the place of St. Senan's sepulture and resurrection, and also that of many other saints; while no homicide or nefarious crime had yet been committed there; for, as the local tradition holds, it remained in possession of a horrible monster,<sup>2</sup> which was inimical to man and beast. Through the assistance of God, it was said, that Senan should expel this monster, which had hitherto precluded the approach of any colonists. Afterwards, a promise was given, that he and his monks should peacefully possess this island, together with a succession of other holy men. Being then borne, by the ministering aid of this angel, from the mountain top, our saint was brought to another elevated spot, which was situated in an island. This was afterwards called, Ard-na-naingel, which means, "the hill of the Angels." Then the servant of God, relying on the power of his great <sup>52</sup> This island is said by Colgan, to have been situated in that part of Thomond, called Hy-Breain, or Ibrickan. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, n. 20, p. 536.

<sup>53</sup> "Iniscunla, in the Fergus," as "The Legend of Iniscathy" has it. See Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>54</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks it "probable that some of these religious houses and churches were of later institution, and branches from the great monastery of Iniscathy."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., n. 16, p. 6.

<sup>55</sup> "Traces of those old foundations are to be found, in most of these places." See "The Legend of Iniscathy," in Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>56</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Secunda Vita S. Senani, cap. xxiii., xxiv., xxvii., pp. 529, 530. Also, the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii viii. Second Life, chap. iv., pp. 773, 774, with notes.

CHAPTER III.—It lay within "view of his own native Mullagha." See "The Legend of Iniscathy," in Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>2</sup> "Possibly one of the great antedeluvian reptiles, as has been suggested, in relation to these traditional monsters of Irish story." Ibid. The period of St. Senan was compa-

Creator, went to that island, where the monster was to be found; and, on his approach, this beast assumed a fearful appearance, his eyes and breath emitting flame, his mouth exuding poison, while his terrible jaws extending threatened death to our saint. But, being under Divine protection, and like a true soldier of Christ, being armed with a breastplate of faith and a shield of hope, St. Senan advanced undismayed towards the monster. He formed the sign of the cross against him, when instantly the beast was rendered motionless. Then God's holy servant, by the power of Him, who bruised the first dragon's head, and in the name of the Most Holy Trinity, ordered this fierce monster to depart from the island,<sup>3</sup> and never to harm any person there, or elsewhere, for the future. In obedience to this mandate of our saint, and by virtue of that Superior Power, whose will effects all things, the monster was transferred from that island, into a certain deep lake,<sup>4</sup> presenting a gloomy appearance,<sup>5</sup> near Collain,<sup>6</sup> a mountain of Thomond. It was never known to have inflicted future injury.<sup>7</sup>

The island of Inis-Cathaigh, now generally called Scattery Island,<sup>8</sup> is situated, on the River Shannon, about two miles the south of Kilrush quay. Originally, eleven churches are said to have been on this island;<sup>9</sup> but, it has not apparently much more than half that number in ruins at present. Here do we find the following group of most interesting antiquities. The Round Tower,<sup>10</sup> which has been called in Irish, Clogas Inse Cathaigh.<sup>11</sup> It stands,<sup>12</sup> ratively modern, however, as relating to the time before the deluge. Perhaps, it might be a safer conjecture, that whales, or other great monsters of the deep, were frequently seen about Iniscattery, in the earlier times, and that they disappeared after St. Senan's settlement there.

<sup>3</sup> Alluding to the omission of this account from the Metrical Life, Colgan says, that it must have been excluded, not through any mistake of the author, but through one of a transcriber; he therefore restores it from the Irish Life. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii., n. 11, p. 522.

<sup>4</sup> In the parish of Kilmurry, Ibrickan barony and county of Clare, in a townland of the same name is this lough, still called Dubh-loch. Here, the monster banished by St. Senan lies buried, according to local tradition.

<sup>5</sup> See, a curious Breton legend of a serpent, told in a manner very similar, and referring to a spot called P'Abîme du serpent, on the coast of Cornouaille, in Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome ii., livre viii., chap. ii., p. 424.

<sup>6</sup> Perhaps Callan Mountain, lying east of Miltown Malbay, and rising high over the Atlantic Ocean.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xxviii., xxix., p. 530. The O'Clerys state, it was Senan, that blessed Inis-Cathaigh, and expelled from it a monster, from which the island was named, i.e., Cathach. This monster used to injure people and cattle, so that the island durst not be inhabited or occupied until Senan came. See "The Martyrology of Donegal," edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68, 69.

<sup>8</sup> Its superficial area is 179 acres 19

perches. It is surrounded with a shingle strand, and it has a singularly imposing appearance, as seen by the tourist, almost from any point of view.

<sup>9</sup> This we learn, from Michael O'Brannon's Irish poem, "On the Shannon," in which he recites traditions, relating to the tower of Scattery.

<sup>10</sup> Mr. John O'Donovan has given a detailed description and dimensions. It is 52 feet 4 inches in circumference, at the base, as measured on the outside. The wall is 4 feet 6 inches in thickness; its internal diameter is 7 feet 11 inches—and its entire diameter 16 feet 11 inches. Its doorway is placed on the east side, and it is now level with the surface of the field, which is not much raised, and facing the north-west corner of the Damh-liag. This doorway is not the original one, as it cannot rationally be supposed coeval with the opposite doorway of the Damhliag. It is very rudely constructed of small rough stones, and it inclines to a point. It measures, in height, 4 feet 8½ inches; and, in breadth, at top, 2 feet; at bottom, 2 feet 3 inches. Mr. O'Donovan could not believe, that this doorway is more than four or five centuries old, although, he saw no place, in the side of the tower, exhibiting any appearance of a more ancient one built up or destroyed.

<sup>11</sup> Thus run the lines in Michael O'Brannon's Irish Poem:—

1ᵀ 1omᵀa oileán fᵀarᵀmar, fᵀarᵀring,
A fᵀ-compár folurach a péime
O cᵀatᵀar lummige go Cean leime.
ᵀS o'á nuimᵀir oileán inre Cathaig
Aᵀr aᵀ'cᵀur an naom ba glóimᵀar beata
Seanán den cᵀean véas ve theamplurib aᵀ clogár alain, aᵀo 'na o-teanta.

at the distance of 71 feet 7 inches, to the west of the Damliag, with parts of which it seems coeval. The local tradition is,<sup>13</sup> that this clogas was built by St. Senan, the patron saint of the island.<sup>14</sup> Mr. O'Donovan is of opinion, that the greater part of the side of this tower was rebuilt, or, at least, that Round Tower and Ruins on Scatterly Island.

breaches made in it by lightning had been patched up.<sup>15</sup> The cap has suffered considerably, from the shock of elements, but enough of it remains for ascertaining the original height.<sup>16</sup> The Cathedral or Damliag<sup>17</sup> lies to the

The following is Mr. O'Donovan's English translation:—

“Many a grassy extensive island
In the bright compass of its course
From Limerick City to Leap (now Loop)
Head,
Of the number is the isle of Inis Cathy,
On which a saint of glorious life,
Senan, placed eleven churches
And a beautiful high Clogas beside them.”

<sup>12</sup> About six perches, to the west of the Clogas, there is a large square well, called Tobar Sheanain, or “The well of Senan,” and near it there is a stone, ornamented with a cross.

<sup>13</sup> It also existed, in the year 1794, when O’Brannon wrote his poem, and before any of the theories, about the Fire-worshippers and Budhists, were published.

<sup>14</sup> Though the Danes were in possession of the island, in the year 975, no one ever heard it was at any time a tradition, that the Clogas was built by them. According to a wild and unintelligible legend, about St.

Senan and a woman, the cap of this tower was never finished.

<sup>15</sup> At present, there is a large breach in the north side apparently made by lightning, and a rent extends from bottom to top. It is also split on the west side, from within a few feet of the bottom to the top-window. But, the original doorway could not have been placed, where the present breach is. This seems evident, from the position of the first window. The first story, over the original doorway, wherever placed, was lighted up by a small square window, in the north side; the second, by a rude little window, now much disfigured, placed on the south side; the third, by a small quadrangular window, on the east side, nearly over the present doorway; the fourth, by a similar one, but more ancient, on the west side; the fifth, by a similar one, on the north side; and these are four windows of good size, exactly facing the cardinal points, under the Ben-cover or conical cap.

<sup>16</sup> According to Archdall—who follows the authority of Smith, in his “Natural and Civil History of Kerry,” p. 227—this Round

east of the tower. In its present form, it is not divided into nave and choir ; but, by comparing it with other cathedrals of the primitive Irish Church, one may come to the conclusion, that it was originally so divided.<sup>18</sup> The ground is considerably raised, on the outside, so that its height there cannot be easily ascertained ; but, on the inside, its original height and characteristics appear. The south wall contains a pointed doorway, placed at the distance of over 12 feet, from the west gable ; but, it is so broken, that its dimensions cannot be accurately given.<sup>19</sup> The east gable was all rebuilt, except a few feet of the lower part, and it contains a high Gothic window.<sup>20</sup> The north wall of this church contains a modern pointed doorway, daubed with fresh-looking mortar, and constructed of small rude stones. It is placed opposite the doorway, in the south wall, already described, and, perhaps, it is about three centuries old.<sup>21</sup> The entire of the north wall, to the height of 10 feet 6 inches, is built of very large stones, not laid in regular courses, not hammered, nor even quarried, which is the surest criterion of the primitive style of masonry in Ireland.<sup>22</sup> The south wall is also of the primitive style, to the height of about 10 feet, excepting the breaches which were made in it, when the pointed windows were inserted. These breaches are built up with stones, which appear remarkably small, in comparison with those in the primitive part of the work outside them.<sup>23</sup> To the north of the Damliag, Tower is 120 feet, in height. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 51, 52.

<sup>17</sup> It measures, on the inside, 68 feet 4 inches, and, in breadth, 27 feet 7 inches. Its original doorway remains in the west gable ; and, it is a beautiful specimen of the semi-cyclopean style. It is 6 feet 6 inches, in height, and, in breadth, 2 feet 10 inches, at top ; while, it is 3 feet 1½ inch, at bottom. Its lintel is 5 feet 8 inches, in length, and 12 inches, in height ; it extends the entire thickness of the wall—that is 3 feet 5 inches. It projects, on the inside, 4 inches ; and, in this projecting part, there are 2 square mortices, one at each side of the doorway, to fasten the door ; and, a part of the iron gudgeon, on which the door hung, exists at the north side.

<sup>18</sup> The reader is referred to the Life of St. Cannara, at the 28th of January, for an engraving of the Round Tower and Damliag, on Scattery Island ; at another point of view, the annexed illustration, furnished from a photograph, taken by Frederick H. Mares, Dublin, is submitted. It has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wake-man, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>19</sup> It measures 3 feet 3 inches, in width, at the sping of the arch. This doorway was inserted, about five centuries since, when the primitive doorway, in the west gable, as usual, had been stopped up. At the distance of 12 feet 6 inches, from the east side of this doorway, there is a high narrow window ; and, 10 feet 10 inches further, to the east, there is another high narrow sham-rock-headed window ; and, 10 feet 1 inch east of this, there is a narrow curvilinearly pointed window—all modern and inserted into the original wall, as the character of the masonry immediately around will prove to a demonstration.

<sup>20</sup> It measures, on the outside, 3 feet 5 inches, in width ; and, about 12 feet in height. In the stone, which closes the top of this window, on the outside, is the head of a bishop, with his mitre, badly executed, but in very good preservation, yet not older, than the period of rebuilding this gable. This head is held in high estimation by the islanders, as being the supposed effigy or representation of the face of their great patron Senan.

<sup>21</sup> The stone wall has a square doorway, placed at the distance of 10 feet 5 inches, from the east gable. This doorway leads into an Iardom, or sacristy, which measures 26 feet 6 inches, from east to west, and 10 feet, from north to south. The north wall of this Iardom contains two modern windows, not worth description, and its east wall has a neat pointed window, measuring, on the outside, 7 feet 1 inch in height, and one foot in breadth. This Iardom is built up against the north wall of the Damliag, but its stones are not dove-tailed or inserted into it, which proves that it is an after erection.

<sup>22</sup> The west gable, to the height of 10 feet 6 inches, is exactly in the same style ; but, from that upwards, it is decidedly more modern, this part having been erected when the Gothic windows were inserted. The resemblance, which this west gable bears to that of the Cathedral of Glendalough, is striking, in the present instance, the gable having at each corner a rectangular pillar, projecting 2 feet, and measuring, in breadth, 3 feet 5 inches.

<sup>23</sup> This church affords a very satisfactory elucidation of the manner, in which the primitive Irish Damliags were remodelled, after the introduction of the pointed style by the Anglo-Normans, and it is therefore 4 feet 11 inches from its north wall, there is a remarkable little oratory, or ernaighie, of great antiquity, but obviously remodelled. It measures, in length, 23 feet 6 inches, and, in breadth, 12 feet 10 inches.<sup>24</sup> The foregoing three buildings are enclosed by a rude wall, built of large stones, and looking very ancient.

About twenty perches, to the north of the Round Tower, there is a small church, called Teampull Sheanain, i.e., "the church of St. Senan." In its present form, it does not look old, at first sight; but, on a close examination, it will be found to be an ancient church remodelled.<sup>25</sup> It consists of a nave and choir.<sup>26</sup> Immediately to the west of this, there is a small building,<sup>27</sup> built of thin slates of nearly equal size, and altogether looking very modern.<sup>28</sup> About forty perches, to the south-west of the Round Tower, and on the hill, called in the Life of St. Senan, Ard na n-aingéal, i.e., "the hill of the Angels," there is another church, in ruins. It is called after the hill, Teampull Cnuic na n-aingéal.<sup>29</sup> All its features are destroyed, and, the greater part of the fragments of the walls remaining are modern.<sup>30</sup> There is another building joined to the south-east side of this church.<sup>31</sup> About fifty perches to the south-east of the Damliag, there is a large church, now called Teampull na Marbh, in Latin, ecclesia mortuorum.<sup>32</sup> It is the only one, on the island, in which people bury the dead, as the name indicates;<sup>33</sup> although, in all probaworthy the attention of the architectural antiquarian.

<sup>24</sup> It had a small choir, now almost destroyed, measuring 8 feet 9 inches, from east to west, and 10 feet 4 inches, from north to south—thickness of its walls, 2 feet 3 inches—thickness of walls of nave, 2 feet 8 inches—height of walls of nave, 7 feet 9 inches. The doorway was placed in the south wall, but it is nearly destroyed. A quadrangular window, 2 feet 3 inches, by 11 inches, is in the west gable, placed a few feet from the ground, and all this gable, from that window upwards, is modern.

<sup>25</sup> John O'Donovan states, that it was patched up at various periods—Feib bhríte Sheam Scuirne.

<sup>26</sup> Its measurements are as follows:—length of the nave, 23 feet 10 inches; breadth, 16 feet 9 inches; length of choir, 10 feet 10 inches; breadth, 10 feet 9 inches; thickness of walls of nave, 2 feet 8 inches, and of choir, 2 feet 3 inches. The west gable is featureless, and it seems to have been all rebuilt. The south wall contains a pointed doorway, built of small stones, and evidently not of any great antiquity. A few feet to the east of it, there is a window, broad inside, and narrow outside, but so curtained with ivy on the outside, that it is difficult to obtain its dimension. All the choir arch is destroyed, except a small part of the north side, which looks very primitive. The south wall of the choir contains a small quadrangular window, but very modern, and not worth description. The only part, which looks ancient, is a small window, in the east gable, measuring 5 feet, in height, and 3 feet 8 inches, in width, on the inside, and, on the outside, 2 feet 11 inches, in height, and 8 inches, in width.

<sup>27</sup> It is 21 feet 8 inches, in length, and 11 feet 2 inches, in breadth. Its doorway was in the south wall, measuring 3 feet 3 inches, in breadth; but, its height cannot be ascertained, as it is broken.

<sup>28</sup> It contained two small windows, one in the east gable, and the other in the south wall, but both are now nearly destroyed.

<sup>29</sup> It measures 40 feet 6 inches, in length, and 16 feet 8 inches, in breadth.

<sup>30</sup> The south wall is 10 feet, in height; and, about 2 feet 7 inches, in thickness. The north wall is nearly all destroyed, as are also the two gables, except a small part of the west gable, which looks very ancient. The south wall contained a pointed doorway constructed of rude stones, and evidently modern. The south wall contained two windows, which are now mere breaches.

<sup>31</sup> It measures 35 feet 10 inches, from north to south; and, 15 feet, from east to west. A part of the west wall, 14 feet long, and 5 feet high, joined to the church, remains, and a small part of the middle of the east wall, 2 feet 9 inches in thickness. A legend, about the selection, by St. Senan, of this spot, for a church, is related.

<sup>32</sup> It is 67 feet 10 inches long, and 18 feet 6 inches broad, as measured on the inside.

<sup>33</sup> About 150 yards, to the north of this church, are the vaults of a castle. We learn the date for the erection of this castle, from an Inquisition, taken in the 18th year of the reign of Elizabeth, which states that the Converb (Coarb) "hath in his possession a new castle partly builded, a small stone house, and three cottages, annual value 10s. 8d." The same Inquisition finds, that "in the island are two chapels in ruins, the Abbey of St. Synan, with a small cemetery, annual value 2s., Irish, also a parish church." The two chapels here mentioned, are the churches, Teampull Sheanain, and bility, this was not the original denomination. Its west gable is featureless,<sup>34</sup> The southern point of this island is called Rinn Eanaigh.<sup>35</sup> The nearest point to Inisbeg or Hog Island<sup>36</sup> is called Pointe an mheill, and the north-west point is called Pointe an Chroisin.<sup>37</sup> Such is the modern topographical description, applying to the spot,<sup>38</sup> with which St. Senan resolved to connect the remaining days of his life.

Giving thanks to the great Author of all things, and being accompanied by the angel, who was his assistant, St. Senan began to take a circuit round this island, which he blessed. When, however, he beheld the swelling billows, dashing against its shores, he said to the angel: "This island seems exposed to many dangers, and not very suitable for a monastic establishment, on account of the rough tempests and waves, that break over its surrounding waters." The angel exhorted him to be of good cheer, promising in God's name, that none of his monks should be drowned, when, crossing the water, in obedience to commands of their superior; and, moreover, that no person, buried in this place, who had been penitent before death, should forfeit the rewards of eternal life.<sup>39</sup> After a report had been spread abroad, through the adjoining country, that the monster had been expelled, and that St. Senan had taken possession of the island, which was called Iniscathaigh, or Iniscathach, from the word Cathach, applied to this monster; Mactail, the ruler of Y-figinte district,<sup>40</sup> was moved with indignation against our saint, because he had dared to inhabit an island, then subject to his rule. Not having obtained permission from the lord of its soil, Mactail gave orders, that St. Senan should be immediately and ignominiously expelled, from that place. The execution of such mandate had been committed to Coelius and Lieth, Teampull Cnuic na n-aingéal, already described. The Abbey of St. Synan is the one, now called Teampull na-marbh, and the parish church is certainly the Damliag.

<sup>34</sup> The south wall contains a doorway, placed at the distance of 21 feet from the west gable, but now reduced to a formless breach. East of this, in the same wall, there are three windows, all decidedly modern, and not worth particular description. There is, in the east gable, a large pointed window, measuring on the inside, 8 feet 8 inches, in width, and 7 feet, in height. The lower part of it is built up, with modern mason work. The north wall, at the distance of 7 feet 8 inches in width from the west gable, has a round-headed but very modern doorway; and, 18 feet to the east of it, there is a ruder pointed arch, 9 feet 6 inches high, and 8 feet 4 inches wide; while, 3 feet 10 inches, to the east of it, another arch has similar characteristics and dimensions. At the distance of 5 feet 4 inches, to the east of this, there is a quadrangular doorway, 5 feet 4 inches high, and 2 feet 11 inches wide, at the lintel, and 3 feet 2 inches at the bottom. Its lintel is a thin flag, 4 feet 6 inches long, 1 foot 8 inches broad, and only 3 inches thick. Over this doorway, there is a small rectilinearly pointed window, which looks very like a primitive one, but this is hardly to be depended upon. There seem to have been lateral Iardoms, into which these arches and doorway led; but, they are all destroyed, with the exception of one fragment of a wall, projecting from the north-east corner. The walls of this church are 2 feet 6 inches thick, and the side walls are about 17 feet high.

<sup>35</sup> Outside Rinn Eanaigh point, there is a rock, called Carraig a Draoi, the remains of an island, called Dair-inis, which is mentioned in St. Senan's Life. A subsequent narrative explains the popular tradition regarding the name for Carraig a Draoi.

<sup>36</sup> There is a rock in the channel, between Scatterry Island and Hog Island, denominated Carraig Dhonain, and called after Donan, one of St. Senan's monks.

<sup>37</sup> On Henry Pelham's old Map of Clare County, Scatterry Island is represented, with its Round Tower, and churches. It is also called Innuskattre. The southern point is called Rinana and Shoal.

<sup>38</sup> See "Letters containing Information relating to the Antiquities of the County of Clare, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey, A.D. 1840," vol. ii. Mr. John O'Donovan's Letter, dated Kildysart, December 24th, 1840, pp. 13 to 30.

<sup>39</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xxx., p. 530.

<sup>40</sup> The people of this territory lived, in that portion of the county of Limerick, lying west of the River Maigh, or Maigne, and in the barony of Coshma, in Limerick County. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (g), p. 67.

brothers to St. Senan, and who served as soldiers under Mactail. Obeying those orders of their chieftain, they went with his mandate to their brother, who refused to comply with it. Then, moved by human rather than by Divine fear, his brothers endeavoured to put in execution the commands of their prince, by laying violent hands on the saint. They dragged him hurriedly by the arms, from the top of a certain eminence, and against his consent. But, Coelius, more hardened in evil, saw Lieth co-operating in this act, yet, in a remiss and half-willing manner, he began to reproach his brother and to say: "Is it better, that we should be expelled from our lands and possessions, than that Senan should be removed from a place not his own?" Being interiorly moved, Lieth declared, that he felt sorrow for his attempted violence, and would not longer persist in evil; and, that he should abandon all his possessions, and Ireland itself, rather than offer injury to his holy brother. Senan then said to him: "Thou shalt not leave Ireland, nor the land of thy patrimony, but thy children shall possess it after thee; yet, he who adheres with too great fondness to his land, neither he, nor any of his posterity, shall possess it." This prophecy was exactly fulfilled; for, the impious Coelius, returning towards his home after this act of violence, suddenly expired, before he had entered his own door. When Lieth petitioned, that the body might be interred with St. Senan, this latter refused his request, saying, it was not meet, that the body of a man should be honoured with ecclesiastical sepulture, whose soul was buried in hell. When the account of such a tragedy had been brought to Mactail, this prince, not instructed by the misfortune of his satellite, was kindled to wrath and frenzy. He began to meditate vengeance on our saint. Seeing him thus disturbed and anxious, a magus said: "Let not my lord be uneasy, for, I will certainly expel this imposter, from his territories." At these words, the prince felt somewhat appeased, and the magus, taking with him two of the dynast's chariot horses, went to the island. Here, he left the horses in the monastery pastures, and went to St. Senan, whom he commanded to leave the island instantly, or that otherwise, he should cause the holy man to depart with confusion, through his incantations and the power of his deities. Senan replied, he neither feared his power, nor that of his master, the Devil; and, that the assistance of the only true Divinity, the Saviour of the world, Jesus Christ, would not be wanting to him, in protecting and putting to flight the demon's illusions. Then, the magus, by his diabolic arts, caused such a darkness to surround those, who were present, that they could not recognise each other. Notwithstanding, this was dissipated by St. Senan, on invoking the true God. The magus afterwards produced thunder, lightening, and meteors; but, these were put an end to, in like manner. When the magus saw all his incantations and arts ineffectual, he meditated departure, for a time, warning Senan, that he might expect certain destruction, on his returning to the island. The saint asked him, whither he would go; but, the Druid answered, "Thou shalt not know whither I go, or when I shall return." "I well know, it shall not profit thee to go to thy destined place," said Senan, "and thence, thou shalt never return to this spot." The event proved the truth of his prophecy; for, the Druid, wishing to practise his magic arts, and to consult the demon, for a time, directed his course to a certain small and desert island, called Dairinis, not far from Iniscathay, and on the southern side of the Shannon. While here, a violent influx of the ocean came upon the island, and it drowned the magus, with his confederates. In memory of this miraculous event, the place was afterwards called, Carrac an Druadh, which signifies, "the rock of the Druid;" for, by this name was it known, at the time, when St. Senan's Prose Life had been written,<sup>41</sup> and the people, no doubt, regarded it, as a memorial of his punishment.

After these things occurred, returning from an assembly of the chieftains, which had been held in Corcomroe, Mactail learned the death of his magus. He hastened immediately to Iniscatthy, where, in a frenzy of rage and impatience, he said to Senan: "Art thou the man, who hath possessed my lands, I being opposed to thy desires? art thou the person, who caused the death of my magus and servant? Know for certain, that thou shalt die the same kind of death; for, a stone being tied to thy neck, in punishment for thy crimes, thou shalt be thrown into the sea." St. Senan replied, that the chief had not power to execute this threat; when, as if forgetful of himself, Mactail ordered the saint to feed and attend to the horses, committed to his charge. The saint returned for answer, that he was neither a stall-keeper nor a groom; but, Mactalius—as his name is Latinized—replied, that whether he would or not, he must take charge of the horses, until Mactail returned from a journey he was about to undertake. Senan said, "The power of God is able to prevent you from returning hither." While Mactalius and the saint were engaged in this controversy, and while the former urged Senan with threats and insults; those two horses, which had been the cause of litigation, by a decree of heaven, are said to have been swallowed up in the earth, at a place afterwards called, Fan-na-neach,<sup>42</sup> which signifies, "the trench of the horses." When word of this event had been brought by a messenger, the dynast felt more enraged, although his son endeavoured to appease him, and to advise, that he should act more respectfully towards God's holy servant, and, fear Divine punishment, by the example of those things, which he had hitherto seen. The inexorable and impious Mactalius replied, that he no more feared Senan and God, than he did a shorn sheep. "Then," said Senan, "through the disposition of the Almighty, in my regard, this inoffensive animal can be the cause and instrument of thy death."<sup>43</sup> After many insults, threats and blasphemies, the obstinate tyrant took his departure, full of pride and anger, resuming his journey. While near a certain wood, in Corcobaskind territory, he saw a shorn sheep running with great speed, until it rushed under the feet of the horses, yoked to his chariot. Being affrighted, these horses reared and broke their yokes, when the chariot was overturned. Mactalius fell headlong upon a rock, and was instantly killed, on the spot.<sup>44</sup> Thus, his wicked soul was sent unprepared and suddenly, to meet the judgment which awaited him.<sup>45</sup>

One day, St. Donnan,<sup>46</sup> the son of Lieth, and a disciple to St. Senan,<sup>47</sup>

<sup>42</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita S. Senani, cap. xxxi., xxxii., pp. 530, 531.

<sup>43</sup> The tradition of this place is still preserved, and it is shown in a diagram, prepared by Mr. O'Donovan, to illustrate his description. Fan-na-neach is shown, west of some effaced churches, on Scatter Island.

<sup>44</sup> See "The Legend of Iniscatthy" in Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 38.

<sup>45</sup> The foregoing account of Mactalius' punishment and tyranny is to be found, in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xiv., xv., pp. 519, 520. Some of those circumstances, as found in St. Senan's Prose Life, are not given in his Metrical Acts; and, in the latter, this chief's proper name is not noted. Also, through the carelessness of a transcriber, many particulars appear to have been omitted, which immediately preceded the present narrative.

<sup>46</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. v., num. 30 to 38, pp. 774, 775.

<sup>47</sup> Colgan supposes this saint to have been a nephew to Senan, and son to that compassionate brother, Lieth, already mentioned in our Saint's Acts. There are at least three saints, bearing this name, mentioned in the Irish Calendars; viz., St. Donnan, Martyr, whose feast is kept on the 17th of April; St. Donnan, Confessor, whose feast is assigned to the 11th of August; and St. Donnan, Priest, whose festival is held on the 26th of April. The saint, mentioned in the text, is supposed to have been either of the two latter. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, n. 23, p. 536.

<sup>48</sup> In the Metrical Life, St. Donnan seems to have been alluded to, as "Sancti Senani patruus," where the relation of an incident, being accompanied by two boys, who were engaged in study with him, went to a certain rock, which was out in the sea, and for the purpose of collecting shell-fish. Having left those boys there, he returned to the island; meantime, the ocean-tide had taken away an only boat, which remained to remove them. The boys were drowned, on the rising of the waves; but, their bodies, together with the boat, were afterwards washed ashore, on the island. When the parents and friends of those boys heard what had occurred, they ran to the spot. With tears and wailing, they demanded of the saint, that their lost children should be restored to them alive. Then St. Senan said to Donnan: "Command the deceased boys, in the name of the Saviour, that they may immediately come to me." When he had done, as directed, the boys were immediately restored to life and strength. Running towards St. Senan, and to the embrace of their parents, these they reproached, for having been the cause of their withdrawal from a happy state, in which lately they had been. Their mothers then said: "Had you rather live in these regions, than upon earth, with your friends and kindred?" To these queries, their children replied, that if they possessed the whole world, with all its pleasures and luxuries, they would only consider it as a prison, in which they were confined, while reflecting on the loss of those delights they had already experienced. Wherefore, they earnestly requested, that it might be permitted them, to repossess their former state of felicity. They promised their parents, likewise, that through God's goodness, these should sorrow no more, on their account. The parents, on their part, assenting to those wishes, in the name of the Lord, St. Senan ratified the promise of their children. Those were brought to his monastery, where they received Holy Communion. In a short time, afterwards, with acts of thanksgiving and of holy joy, those boys slept in the Lord, and their bodies were buried in the cemetery, near the monastery. They were the first deposed within that graveyard, and they were interred in a conspicuous place, before the entrance.<sup>48</sup>

Saints Kieran and Brendan,<sup>49</sup> being admonished by an angel, had also visited St. Senan, whom they chose as their spiritual director.<sup>50</sup> The abbot of Iniscathly received them with due honour; but, after they had been to given in the text, is almost similar.

<sup>48</sup> See ibid. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xxxv., p. 531, and Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xii., pp. 522, 523.

<sup>49</sup> These saints are supposed to have been St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise, whose feast is kept on the 9th of September, and St. Brendan of Birr, whose festival is observed on the 29th of November. However, Colgan thinks, that Brendan of Clonfert, whose feast is kept on the 16th of May, was the saint here mentioned, because of allusion to a custom, peculiar to saints of this age; each one of whom desired to select a certain spiritual director, and confessor, "a quo agnita culpa, et confessis suis excessibus, negligentis et peccatis recipiebat penitentiam: et hunc Scotice vocabunt anamchara, i.e., sinedrum, spiritualem amicum, seu Patrem." Ibid., viii. Martii, n. 12, p. 535.

<sup>50</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, that if the Brendan, who on another occasion waited, together with Kieran, on Senan, was Brendan of Clonfert, it should follow, that Senan was born prior to 484, being represented as older than Brendan of Birr; whereas, from the manner, in which Kieran and Brendan are spoken of, it would appear, that they were both abbots, and lived not very far from each other. This, he thinks, will not answer for Brendan of Clonfert, who was not abbot there, until after Kieran's death. Nor is there any account of his having been, prior to his settling at Clonfert, abbot anywhere else in Ireland, at least in those parts, which were not far distant from Kieran's establishments of Inisaingin and Clonmacnois. Brendan of Clonfert was probably in Brittany, at the time of this visit to Senan. Now, every circumstance accords with the supposition, that Brendan of Birr was the person, who then accompanied Kieran. He was, in all probability, an abbot before Kieran died. Birr is within a few miles from Clonmacnois, and if we should suppose that Kieran was still abbot of Inisaingin, when he set out for Iniscathly, Birr lies not much out of the road, by which he must have passed, so that he and Brendan might, with little inconvenience, have met for the purpose of travelling together. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., n. 28, pp. 91, 92.

<sup>51</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiber.

confession with him, the monastic steward came to announce, that no provisions were to be found in the cellar, for the refreshment of their guests and brethren. Senan replied, that nothing should be wanting, for those who feared God. He exhorted the holy strangers to hope in the Lord, and to be of good cheer, since, provisions should be procured for them and for his brethren, through the bounty of Providence. It chanced, that Nectan Kernnfhoda, Prince of Y-finginte, miraculously admonished of this exigency, ordered his steward to bestow on Senan and the other servants of God, in Iniscathay, stores of food and drink, which had been prepared for his own table. The steward executed these commands, and the prince himself proceeded to the island port, in a boat, which contained his offerings. The saintly abbot and his guests went out to meet him, while the former returned most grateful thanks, for this gift. The chieftain placed himself under the prayers and protection of those holy men, asking their benediction for himself and on his posterity. Filled with the spirit of prophecy, St. Senan predicted, that to him and to his seed, the Almighty had decreed the government of a province. He also dismissed this prince with his blessing. St. Senan and his guests then sat down to dinner. During the time of this meal, a bell miraculously descended from heaven. It was the subject of great astonishment, to all who were present; and, the disciples of those three saints, Senan, Kieran, and Brendan, raised a question among themselves, as to which of their masters that gift belonged. Each of the disciples supposed this bell had been intended for his own superior. To end this doubt, St. Senan said to his guests: "Let us arise and depart, and let the bell belong to whomsoever its sound shall follow." They obeyed, when the sound of this bell was found only to follow St. Senan, to whom it was then adjudged, as the proper owner. Those three saints then embraced each other, Kieran and Brendan having formed a firm alliance of friendship with St. Senan. His guests then took leave of him, much edified with what they had seen and heard.<sup>51</sup>

At one time, Iniscathay Island and the adjoining country suffered much, owing to a want of fresh water; and this complaint was one of daily occurrence to the saint, on the part of his monks. The angel of the Lord appeared to our abbot, during sleep, and directed, that he should go to a certain place, in that neighbourhood, where God's bounty would furnish a well of pure water. Our holy abbot obeyed, and according to the angel's mandate, he rooted up the earth there, with the end of his staff. Immediately, a stream of limpid water began to flow.<sup>52</sup> The angel declared, moreover, that so long as they should persevere in penance and true compunction of heart, on Iniscathay Island, this fountain could not be exhausted. On its brink, St. Senan set down the staff, with which it had been dug. This staff afterwards grew into a hazel-tree, which was pointed out, at that time, when the author of St. Senan's Prose Life wrote his account of the transaction.<sup>53</sup> nixæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xxxvi., pp. 531, 532, and Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xvii., p. 520. Both accounts are essentially the same, as to the former part of those various incidents related. The name of Prince Nectan Kenn-fhoda is alone mentioned, in the Prose Life. The miracle, referring to the bell, however, is only to be found, in St. Senan's Metrical Life.

<sup>52</sup> It must have been intended, by this account, to designate the well on Iniscathay Island, called "Tober Sheanain," which is yet to be seen there. Among the sketches of Antiquities, illustrating the county of Clare, by W. F. Wakeman, and now preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, the following five subjects refer to Iniscathay. 1. The Round Tower of Scatterry Island. 2. The large church of Scatterry. 3. St. Cinan's Church, Scatterry. 4. The doorway of the Round Tower of Scatterry. 5. The door-way of the great church on Scatterry Island. These sketches, like all others by the same artist, are exceeding beautiful; but, nevertheless, the present ones, although very carefully outlined, are not highly finished.

<sup>53</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiber-

CHAPTER IV.

THE QUESTION OF ST. SENAN'S EPISCOPACY, AND HIS OFFICE OF ABBOT, AT INISCATTERY—ENQUIRY AS TO WHETHER HE HAD BEEN ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH—HIS STRICT MONASTIC DISCIPLINE—HIS MIRACULOUS POWERS—ANTIQUITIES ON BISHOP'S ISLAND.

IT is supposed, by Dr. Lanigan, that Senan became a bishop, when his establishment was founded at Iniscatthy; and, most probably, even some time before it, owing to the circumstance of his having previously given the veil to the dynast Brendan's daughters, while he was living at Inisluinge. We are not informed, regarding the time when, or the bishop by whom, he had been consecrated.<sup>1</sup> According to some historians,<sup>2</sup> St. Senan founded Iniscatthy monastery, before St. Patrick's arrival in Munster; but, it is easy to discover, how incorrect such a conclusion must be. The opinion of Dr. Lanigan is, that Senan had been rather advanced in life, when he settled on Iniscatthy; a supposition even is entertained of his being not less than fifty years of age, at that time.<sup>3</sup>

After dwelling on circumstances, connected with the baptism of the Thomond people by St. Patrick, and on his prediction regarding a successor, it is clear, in certain passages of St. Senan's Acts,<sup>4</sup> no more is meant, than that instead of St. Patrick, who acted then as universal bishop over all Ireland, and accordingly over Thomond, this district should have, after some years, a bishop of its own, and who might very justly be styled a successor to the Irish Apostle.<sup>5</sup> Yet, it has been understood, by some writers,<sup>6</sup> as if Senan had succeeded St. Patrick, at Armagh. While he rejected this fable, Ussher fell into a mistake, almost equally unfounded. He supposed, that Senan having been spoken of as a successor to St. Patrick, the latter had been at Iniscatthy, and must have acted there as bishop, for a considerable time.<sup>7</sup> Yet, from the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick,<sup>8</sup> and from the Second Life of St. Senan, it is evident, that St. Patrick did not visit the country about Iniscatthy, although he took care to supply the inhabitants with religious teachers.<sup>9</sup>

Certain writers conform to an opinion, that St. Patrick predicted Senan should succeed him in the episcopacy,<sup>10</sup> and that his prophecy was accordingly fulfilled.<sup>11</sup> Among these are Richard Whitford,<sup>12</sup> the Carthusian Martyrology of Newport, in England, and Albert le Grand.<sup>13</sup> Moreover, it is thought to nixæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xxxvii., p. 532, and Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xxv., p. 523.

CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., pp. 3, 4, and n. 20, p. 7.

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. Sylvester O'Halloran's "History of Ireland," vol. iii., book vii., chap. vi., p. 44.

<sup>3</sup> In the Life of Kieran of Clonmacnois, Senan is spoken of as old as the time of his receiving a visit, when he supplied Kieran with a cloak. It could not have taken place later than the early part of 549, the year in which Kieran died. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., n. 28, p. 91.

<sup>4</sup> See especially the Prose Life, chapters iii., iv.

<sup>5</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, in connexion with this enquiry, that episcopal unity is well expressed by St. Cyprian: "Episcopatus unus est, enjus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur;" and, according to this, a bishop could be said to succeed other bishops, although not attached to the same See.

<sup>6</sup> See "De Primordiis Ecclesiarum Britannicarum," cap. xvii., p. 873.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii., p. 542.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xlvii., p. 158.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. viii., sect. i., p. 374, and chap. ix., sect. iv., n. 57, pp. 448, 449.

<sup>10</sup> Colgan has a chapter of his Appendix to St. Senan's Life, devoted to an enquiry whether or not our saint had been Archbishop of Armagh.

<sup>11</sup> St. Senan is called Archipontifex, in his Metrical Life, chapter xxiii.

<sup>12</sup> In the "Martyrology of Salisbury," at the 8th of March.

<sup>13</sup> See "Les Vies des Saints de la Bretagne Armorique," &c. In the account of St.

have been our saint, who is found in a list of the Armagh Archbishops, under these names, Senchonan,<sup>14</sup> Senior,<sup>15</sup> or Senach. These three names have a similar meaning, and they denote seniority. They have a like derivation and significancy, also, with the name Senan, which bears the Latin interpretation, "Seniculus." However, in two lists of Armagh Archbishops, which Colgan had seen, he found nothing of Senchonan, Senior, or Senan; unless it be, that Senior or Senan must be regarded as the same Senach, who stood there fifteenth in order.<sup>16</sup> Granting that Senchonanus and Senior were incorrectly omitted, and that they should have been included, in this list of bishops; yet, neither of them can be confounded with our saint, if what is already written regarding both be true.<sup>17</sup> Senchonan is said to have succeeded St. Secundin.<sup>18</sup> Whether it be the Senan, who is called Senach, in those lists already named, was a matter of doubt to Colgan; since he read an account of him, contained in the "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 609.<sup>19</sup> An event in his life, of so very important a character, as having been over the church of Armagh, could not have been omitted by his biographers; yet, they are quite silent, on such a subject. There can be no doubt whatever, that Senan was the first founder of Iniscatthy Monastery; and, Dr. Lanigan's opinion is, that Senan's establishment there cannot be placed earlier, than about A.D. 534.<sup>20</sup>

By one of the rules of St. Senan's monastic institute, females were excluded, not only from its enclosure, but even from landing on the island. St. Senan's monks were so chaste, that they never looked at a woman.<sup>21</sup> This regulation was observed, even with regard to the most holy virgins; as we are given to understand, in the case of St. Cannera,<sup>22</sup> who died, soon after she landed on the island, and she was buried in the "Lady's Grave."<sup>23</sup>

Senan, it is here remarked, in the fourth chapter, that he was unanimously elected a bishop, and the successor of St. Patrick.

<sup>14</sup> St. Senchonan is numbered amongst the Armagh Archbishops, in a Life of St. Benignus, chap. viii., in these words, "Sanctus autem Sechnaldus, sive Secundinus, immediatus S. Patricii successor, sedit in Pontificatu et Hiberniæ primatu annis sedecim: et post Secundinum, S. Senchonanus annis decim, et post hunc, S. Benignus aliis decim."

<sup>15</sup> At the 11th of April, Marianus mentions, "Senior filius Maldaluaini Primas Ardmachanus." The Martyrology of Donegal commemorates him, also, on the same day. Still, our St. Senan was not the son of Maldaluan, but son to Ercan or Erchin, according to the account, contained in his Acts.

<sup>16</sup> On a list of Armagh Archbishops, in the Calendar of Cashel.

<sup>17</sup> The time, in which our St. Senan lived, distinguishes him from the first; while, the name of his parent, precludes him from being the second.

<sup>18</sup> According to Jocelyn, he died, during St. Patrick's lifetime. According to the Four Masters, in their Annals, the Annals of Clonmacnoise and of Senatenses, he died A.D. 447. St. Senan of Iniscatthy could not have been born, at this time; since, according to the Salisbury Martyrology, St. Patrick predicted, that he should be born 120 years after the time of his prophecy, or according to an anonymous author of St. Patrick's Life, after a term of 40 years. Wherefore, he who is there named Senchonan seems to have been the person, called by others, Senpatruic, or Patrick Senior, for these reasons, that what is already said of Senchonan immediately succeeding St. Secundin, and preceding St. Benignus, is written regarding St. Patrick Senior, in the two lists already referred to; and because, this appellation of Senior, prefixed to either name, seems to insinuate as much. Senchonan is the same as Conan Senior, and Senpatruic means Patrick Senior.

<sup>19</sup> His death is there recorded, as having been Abbot of Ardmacha, and as being of Cluain-Ua-nGrici. Dr. O'Donovan does not know, where the latter place had been situated. See vol. i., pp. 234, 235, and n. (n), ibid.

<sup>20</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. iv., p. 446.

<sup>21</sup> See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., p. 185.

<sup>22</sup> Her Life, containing a well-known incident, will be found at the 28th of January.

<sup>23</sup> It is yet shown, on the south strand of the island.

"Nec mora, reddit spiritum
Diemque clausit ultimum.

It is greatly to be lamented, that tourists should have their prejudices and ignorance, regarding the religion and history of Ireland, unremoved, if not strengthened by the statements of a widely-circulated Guide-book.<sup>24</sup> In reference to Scattery Island, and to St. Senan, it is most incorrectly stated, that he built a church there, and established a religious retreat, long previous to the mission of St. Patrick.

The Iniscattery establishment must have existed about the year 540, and most certainly before that time, at which Kieran of Clonmacnoise is said to have visited Senan, to engage him as a spiritual director.<sup>25</sup> But, it can hardly be allowed a much earlier date. The learned Sir James Ware is even mistaken, in assigning the foundation of this abbey, to the end of the fifth century.<sup>26</sup> Again, Ussher most certainly was quite astray, when he supposed, that St. Patrick must have spent some time on Iniscatthy Island, as bishop, and predecessor of St. Senan, over that see. He would seem to have fallen into such an error, so that he might account for our saint being considered Patrick's successor in the episcopacy. However, the opinion, that our saint was Archbishop of Armagh, is a supposition which Ussher rejects.<sup>27</sup>

To resume the narrative of our Saint's Acts, we are told, that being one day on a journey to our saint, Kieran met a mendicant on the way, who was ragged and almost naked, and who was very importunate for alms. Having nothing else to give, Kieran took off a cloak or monastic habit he wore, and thus deprived of covering he proceeded to the island. In spirit, knowing what had occurred, St. Senan ordered his monks to take a boat, which was broken, and out of repair,<sup>28</sup> yet the only one moored on their island, so that they might bring over St. Kieran, who stood on the opposite shore. When they had obeyed his order, Senan himself, bearing a cloak, ran to meet his holy visitor. On being covered, the charitable Kieran was joyfully conducted to the monastery.<sup>29</sup>

By their many magical incantations, the Druids had wished to pervert God's servant, from the true faith; but, he overcame all their efforts, through the assistance of heaven. Having disturbed the air, through means of the powers of darkness, these magi caused rain to follow; and, then they challenged our saint to prevent this shower, if he were able, through his

A fratribus insolite
Celebrantur exequiæ."

On the west side of Rinn Eanaigh point, there is a flag, said to cover the body of the lady, who desired to obtain admission to the island, but, who was repulsed by St. Senan. See "Antiquarian Letters relating to the County of Clare." Irish Ordnance Survey, vol. ii., pp. 13 to 30. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated Kildysart, December 24th, 1840.

<sup>24</sup> See "The Tourists' Illustrated Handbook for Ireland," p. 134. It also tells them, with a characteristic elegance of expression: "It was here that Senan, a woman-hating hunk of the St. Kevin (Wicklow) genus" lived. It is deplorable, that the use and possession of flippant and ill-compiled books, like this, circulate in thousands; and, still worse, that implicit reliance is too often placed on their statements, by visitors. Yet, how untrue is the history and the character given, regarding the venerable Senan, who cultivated simply the practice of holy purity, in his life and institute, by the careful exclusion of females; and, how injurious to historical accuracy, when a glaring anachronism is thus palmed off, on the unsuspecting traveller.

<sup>25</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. i., p. 3, and sect. xi., n. 175, pp. 56, 57.

<sup>26</sup> See "De Hibernia et Antiquitatibus ejus," cap. xxvi.

<sup>27</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 454.

<sup>28</sup> In St. Senan's Metrical Life, this boat is described, as being woven together with oziers. Probably, it was covered with skins.

"Cui nullam esse aliam
Navem, nisi vimineam
Scapham, nec aptam usibus," &c.

<sup>29</sup> This circumstance is related, almost in a similar manner, in the Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xxi., p. 522. Also, see Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xxxviii., p. 532.

faith in Christ. Betaking himself to prayer, for a short time, Senan repressed the rain caused by those Druids; and, it was followed by rain, procured from heaven, through his prayers. Still, relying on their evil arts, the magi dared to enter upon another trial, with God's holy servant; and, through unworthy means, they caused snow to descend, and to cover the earth. Confident in the protection and power of Almighty God, our holy bishop caused this snow to disappear; and, afterwards, he procured another fall of snow, through his prayers and merits. Seeing themselves vanquished, in this contest, by the power of God; the magi would not presume to contend further, but, betook themselves to flight; however, whilst sailing from his island, they were drowned in the river. Thus, as in the case of many vain attempts, made by the magicians of Egypt, to rival the miracles of Moses and of Aaron, death followed, as a consequence of their impious proceedings.<sup>30</sup> And, as Simon Magus, in the reign of Nero, was overcome by the Apostles, being taken away from this world in an untimely manner; so did these magicians find an unprovided death, while the servant of God was preparing to enjoy the rewards of the saints.<sup>31</sup>

The author of St. Senan's Prose Life tells us, that he has only related a few of many actions, relating to the illustrious subject of his memoir; and, that a large book could not contain a full serial narrative of his acts and virtues, which were of an exalted character. St. Senan was constant in prayer—assiduous in fasting—unworn in performing works of charity—frequently absorbed in heavenly contemplation—vigilant in exercising the care of a director. No one was superior to him, in the love of holy things, nor was he inferior to any, in his desire for heavenly enjoyments. He was rather to be admired than imitated, in his exercises of penance. In the opinion of all others, he had attained the highest degree of excellence in merits and in virtue, whilst in his own estimation, he was the most lowly and humble of mankind.<sup>32</sup>

A barren and precipitous rock, environed with perpendicular or overhanging cliffs, about 250 feet over the sea-level, contains about three-quarters of an acre on the surface. Access to it is most difficult, and only to be effected, by a skilful climber, after a long continuance of fair weather. On the top of this ocean rock, known as Bishop's Island,<sup>33</sup> near Kilkee,<sup>34</sup> off the coast of Clare, is a curious bee-hive house,<sup>35</sup> with the oratory of St. Senan adjoining—the erection of which is traditionally ascribed to himself.<sup>36</sup> It measures 18 feet by 12; the walls are 2 feet 7 inches in thickness.<sup>37</sup> The clear wood-cut<sup>38</sup> represents it, as of a very antique type, stone-roofed, with a doorway,<sup>39</sup> in the south side, and immediately adjoining the west-end wall.<sup>40</sup>

<sup>30</sup> Exodus, chap. vii., viii., ix., x., xi., xii.

<sup>31</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xxiv., xxv., p. 523.

<sup>32</sup> See ibid. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xli., p. 532.

<sup>33</sup> In Irish, it is styled, Oileán-an-Easpoig-gortaigh, or "the island of the starving bishop."

<sup>34</sup> Both of these townland denominations are to be found in the parish of Kilfearagh, barony of Moyarta, defined on the "Ordnance Survey Maps for the County of Clare." Sheets 46, 55, 56, 57, 66. Bishop's Island is shown on Sheet 55, and Kilkee on Sheet 56.

<sup>35</sup> It measures in circumference 115 feet. The exterior face of the wall, at four different heights, recedes to the depth of about one foot, a peculiarity not found in any other structure of the kind, and which was probably introduced with a view of lessening the weight of the dome-shaped roof. This was formed, not on the principal of the arch, but, as usual, by the gradual approximation of the stones, as the wall ascended.

<sup>36</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of the Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 516.

<sup>37</sup> See William F. Wakeman's "Archæologia Hibernica," part ii., chap. i., pp. 59, 60.

<sup>38</sup> Engraved by George A. Hanlon, and drawn on the spot by Mr. Wakeman, for his interesting work.

<sup>39</sup> It is six feet in height, one foot ten inches wide, at the top, and two feet four inches, at the bottom.

<sup>40</sup> Several large monumental pillar-stones

The east window splays externally, and in this respect, it is probably unique in Ireland. This interesting group of ruins presents an exceedingly antique appearance, and its insulated position renders it a lonely and deserted spot.

CHAPTER V.

ST. SENAN'S GIFTS OF PROPHECY—HIS LATEST RECORDED ACTIONS—HIS DORMITION AND SUBSEQUENT RESTORATION TO LIFE—DATE FOR HIS DEPARTURE—HIS OBSEQUIES—HIS BURIAL IN INISCATTERY.

THE gifts of prophecy have been assigned to St. Senan.<sup>1</sup> Cuimin of Coindeire states, that a Senan loved to have sickness upon him, so that there were no less than thirty different diseases, infecting his body.<sup>2</sup> But, it is not certain, what Senan he means, from among the two-and-twenty,<sup>3</sup> who have festivals,<sup>4</sup> and who are found recorded in our Calendars. Perceiving that his end was approaching, in order to leave this earth of exile with even more perfect dispositions, the holy Senan proposed to visit the cell of his first teacher and master, St. Cassidian, who, in all probability, was not then living. But, it was only natural, that Senan should wish to see once more the loved retreat, in which he had first learned the practices of a spiritual life. He also desired, to visit the cell of his paternal aunt, St. Scota,<sup>5</sup> daughter to Cobh-tach, that he might devote himself to absorbing prayer, and to prepare more fully for the expected hour of his departure. On the way, he turned from his course, to see the daughters of Næreus, virgins, whom he had veiled, and installed, at the church of Killeochaille;<sup>6</sup> and, by these ladies was he most kindly received.<sup>7</sup> They requested him to procure for them the relics of some holy monk, who might become titular patron of their church. Aware of his own approaching dissolution, and through Divine inspiration, the servant of God replied, that a Patron's and a Protector's relics should not be wanting to them. His words were verified, for his dormition took place a few days subsequently to this announcement. After he had taken leave of them, he proceeded towards the church of St. Cassidan. Having satisfied his devotions there, he returned through a certain plain, near Killeochaille.<sup>8</sup> Here, he heard a voice from on high saying: "O Senan, servant of God, thou art called to Heaven!" On receiving this announcement, the holy man thitherstand at a short distance from the church, in an easterly direction, but they bear no inscriptions or symbols.

CHAPTER V.—<sup>1</sup> The vi. vol. of O'Longan MSS., in the R.I.A., contains a quatrain, on the prophecies of Saints Sedna and Senan, p. 189.

<sup>2</sup> This, however, is what Cuimin says:—

"Senan noble invalid loved,
Good was every answer of his answers;
To have thirty diseases in his body,
Which was enough of evil to this sage."

<sup>3</sup> In a note Dr. Todd here says:—"Colgan enumerates two-and-twenty saints of this name, with their festivals Actt. SS. Append. ad Vitam S. Senani, chap. i., p. 537."

<sup>4</sup> See "The Martyrology of Donegal," edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68 to 71, and n. 1.

<sup>5</sup> See notices of her, at the 16th of July,

where she is noticed as St. Scoth. There is also a holy virgin, bearing the same name, in our Calendars, at the 18th of January.

<sup>6</sup> "Colgan thought that Killeochaille might have been the same as Kill-mac-caillech, 'cell of the nuns,' in the county of Clare, not far from Iniscattery; and, that the daughters of Næreus were perhaps those of Nateus, mentioned by Aengus Kelideus. These conjectures, particularly the former, are very probable; but, Archdall had no right (at Kilnagallegh) to change them into positive facts."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., n. 31, p. 92.

<sup>7</sup> In the "Legend of Iniscattery," it is said, the church of Killeochaille has not been identified. See Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., No. 1, p. 39.

<sup>8</sup> The ancient name of Youghal, in the county of Cork, was Eochaille, i.e., "the Yew Wood." It might have had Kill, i.e., a church, formerly in conjunction, as a local wards elevated his hands and eyes. With expressions of thanksgiving to God, his disciples were told, that the hour for his rest was at hand, that on this same day, he should die, and that on the following, they should bear his body to the monastery. Wherefore, with his mind fixed on that heavenly habitation, so long desired by him, the holy Senan restored his spirit into the hands of his Creator.

This dormition of St. Senan took place, on the 1st day of March, and about the twelfth hour of the day.<sup>9</sup> The year in which he died is unknown; but, it must have been later than 544—a date, assigned by some writers,<sup>10</sup> for that event,<sup>11</sup> in consequence of calculations and coincidences, which are thought to accord. The year mentioned, is thought by Archbishop Ussher to have been that when St. David of Wales died. Yet, he seems to have lived for many years after that date. Dr. Lanigan was inclined to think, that Senan died some years earlier than David, nor did he find any reason for what is said about their having died in the same year, except that they both happened to die on a first of March. Hence, it was supposed, that they died on the same day; and, instead of being understood relatively to corresponding days of different years, this diurnal coincidence was easily mistaken for one day of one and the same year.<sup>12</sup>

It is probable, in Dr. Lanigan's opinion, that Senan died about the year 560; whereas, we do not find, that he is said to have lived to a very great age, and it is stated, that he was of a sickly constitution.<sup>13</sup> Nor is he mentioned, as having had transactions with any of the eminent saints, who flourished in the south of Ireland, after or about that time, except Brendan of Birr, who died in 571, and whose visit to Senan could not have been later than 549. On the other hand, it is difficult to suppose, that he died much sooner than 560. From the respectability, to which he raised the monastery of Iniscatthy, it is fair to conclude, that he governed it, at least, for about twenty years after its foundation, about or somewhat prior to A.D. 540.<sup>14</sup> Upon the same principle, which urged Ussher to his conclusion, Colgan maintains, that Senan must have lived to, at least, the year 580,<sup>15</sup> whereas David did not die, it has been assumed, until about that date. If it were true, that Senan had been for some time with St. Maidoc of Ferns, as stated in the Second Life,<sup>16</sup> he should have lived until the latter end of the sixth century. But, in this, there is a huge anachronism; since, his being with Maidoc<sup>17</sup> is placed long before the foundation of Iniscatthy, at which time the latter was not yet born.

The body of St. Senan was conveyed to the nunnery of the holy virgins, designation. Although not far from St. Cassidian's native place, we cannot even safely conjecture, that Killeochaille may be identical with the present Youghal.

<sup>9</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xlii., p. 533.

<sup>10</sup> Among these are Ussher, Harris and Archdall.

<sup>11</sup> Having read in the Metrical Life of St. Senan, that he died on the same day that David did, Ussher very naturally placed his death in 544. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 454, 488, and Index Chronologicus, at A.D. DXLIV., p. 530.

<sup>12</sup> The Life, in which alone this identity of day is mentioned, has a story about David's death having been revealed to Senan, at the very moment it happened, and his then lying down to die, where as they had agreed not to survive each other. This is a strange and an incredible story, as if indeed it depended upon them to leave this world whenever they pleased; nor, is there a word about it, in the Second Life, or in the accounts of Senan, given in the Calendars.

<sup>13</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. Appendix ad Acta S. Senani, cap. vi., pp. 543, 544.

<sup>14</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., n. 34, pp. 93, 94.

<sup>15</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii., n. 19, p. 525.

<sup>16</sup> Chapter xviii.

<sup>17</sup> See his Life, at the 31st of January.

already mentioned. Here it remained, until the following day. The monks of Iniscathay, being informed of their beloved abbot's death, set out for that place, where his body lay; and, among those, who proceeded thither, Odran,<sup>18</sup> Macinnil, the Bishops Erc and Mola,<sup>19</sup> with Segarius, son to Blathius,<sup>20</sup> are named.<sup>21</sup> While they were about to bear their abbot's corpse towards his monastery, they placed it in a coffin. Meantime, it is related, that they beheld the thumb of Senan's right hand lying on the ground. All who were present agreed, that this separation of the joint must have been miraculous. Yet, a still greater wonder appeared, for they found that the saint's hands were entire, wanting neither of the thumbs, nor any of the fingers. With joy of heart and signal encomiums, they celebrated this miracle. A promise and prophecy of the saint, made to the holy virgins who resided there, were in their recollections. These virgins had desired the relics of some saint, belonging to Iniscathay, to be given them, as a precious treasure. St. Senan declared, that their request should be complied with, in a short time, through the mercy of God. Thus, his promise had been miraculously fulfilled. Hence, the thumb was preserved with much veneration, in their nunnery. It was retained, as one of the most esteemed relics, in possession of its religious.<sup>22</sup> Afterwards, the body of St. Senan having been brought to Iniscathay monastery, it was unanimously resolved, that it should not be committed to the earth, until the clergy of Limerick,<sup>23</sup> the prelates of the neighbouring churches, and the chiefs of all that surrounding country, had assembled, for the obsequies of this holy man. While waiting, until these preparations should have been completed, the days and nights were spent, in chanting sacred canticles, and in the performance of holy rites. The heavens themselves were seen to glow with meteoric coruscations, exhibiting remarkable brightness, and angelic apparitions were frequently observed, from the 1st to the 8th of March—this whole interval appearing like one uninterrupted day.<sup>24</sup> We are then told, in the Second Life of our saint, that the clergy of Limerick, Deron, the Bishop,<sup>25</sup> Móronoc,<sup>26</sup> penitentiary of Inis-Luaidhe,<sup>27</sup> Cuta or Ceta, a Priest,<sup>28</sup> Molocus, surnamed the Devout, of Inis-tiprad,<sup>29</sup> with many <sup>18</sup> After saying, that Odran cannot have been St. Patrick's disciple, who died before his master, nor Odran of Letter Odhrain, who died about the year 548, then Colgan adds, that he may have been a saint, so called, mentioned by Marianus O'Gorman, at the 16th of May, or one noticed at the 19th of February, or 6th of March, by the Martyrology of Tallagh, by the Commentator on Ængus, and by Marianus himself.

<sup>19</sup> The reader is referred to what has been said of Mota or Mola, in a preceding chapter.

<sup>20</sup> St. Ængus states, that a certain Blatius had several sons, in a Tract, lib. iii., cap. iii. Whether Segarius was one of these or not, has yet to be determined.

<sup>21</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, n. 29, p. 536.

<sup>22</sup> See ibid. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xlii., p. 533.

<sup>23</sup> It is doubtful, however, if Limerick could have had this early origin.

<sup>24</sup> A like miracle is recorded of St. Patrick, by Jocelyn, in his Life of that saint, chapter 193, as also in the Tripartite Life, part iii., chapters 104, 105, 106. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxciil., p. 108, and Septima Vita S. Patricii, cap. civ., cv., cvi., p. 168.

<sup>25</sup> See notices of a St. Diuren, at the 6th of October.

<sup>26</sup> At the 27th of July, see some notices of a saint so called.

<sup>27</sup> In his account of Kildysart parish, Clonderalaw barony, county of Clare, Mr. O'Donovan says, "To the east of Canon Island, at no great distance is Inis-luaidhe (Inishloe), which is mentioned in St. Senan's Life as containing a church. But there is no ruin on it at present, nor even a graveyard, nor anything but an old tree, which is believed to have been blessed by St. Senan. To this parish also belongs Inis-tubrid, which is mentioned in St. Senan's Life, but there is no ruin on it at present." See County of Clare Antiquarian Letters of the Irish Ordnance Survey, vol. ii., p. 59. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated Kildysart, 9th November, 1839.

<sup>28</sup> Colgan could find nothing regarding this priest, unless he was Cetheus, denominated the Traveller, Bishop and Martyr in the city of Aternensis, in the time of Pope Gregory, and who is set down, in the Carother holy men, assembled to assist at the burial of St. Senan.<sup>30</sup> Those, who were present, complained much of the loss religion had sustained, owing to our saint's death; and, the more so, as he had not designated his successor, nor signified his dying wishes, regarding the affairs of his church nor the state of his monastery.<sup>31</sup> Nor did he make any will, whereby all things might have been arranged, with satisfaction and permanency. While these remarks were circulating, to the great surprise of all, St. Senan arose in his coffin, as if awaking from a profound sleep. He saluted all those, who were standing around, and he requested them to lay aside their pious solicitude; saying, that whilst in the Kingdom of Heaven, through Divine clemency, he should not have less care and protection for his church, than if he were yet living among men. He then told his monks to elect Odran, as their abbot; and, afterwards, to choose his successors, according to their exalted virtues and merits, and not on account of race or family, nor through considerations of flesh or blood. He recommended his successors, to be mild towards their subjects, to be hospitable to strangers and to poor persons; to their subjects he recommended obedience, and the austerities of exact observance; whilst he exhorted both to shun faults, and to practise charity, piety and all other virtues. After a long discourse to multitudes there assembled, who were transported beyond themselves, with what they had heard and seen, and who were giving vent to their admiration by proclaiming the Divine praises, the period for his true release from earthly bonds had come, and, in fine, St. Senan reposed in the Lord. His body was buried in the church, with great honour; and, to the time when the author of his Prose Life wrote, frequent miracles were wrought, through this holy patron's merits and intercession.<sup>32</sup>

CHAPTER VI.

POSTHUMOUS RENOWN OF ST. SENAN—MONUMENTS AND MEMORIALS RECORDING HIM—MIRACLES OCCURRING AFTER HIS DEATH, AND ATTRIBUTED TO HIS INFLUENCE—LOCAL AND CALENDAR COMMEMORATIONS—CONCLUSION.

WHEN the Almighty had summoned his great servant, to everlasting rest, fame spread abroad his wonderful miracles and virtues. Especially in the thusian Martyrology, at the 13th of June. His era, about the year 600, favours this supposition. He might be called the Traveller, in all probability, because he left his own country. Colgan thinks it still more probable, he was identical with St. Caiteus, in whose name the Church of Kill-chaide in the adjoining diocese of Tuam had been dedicated.

<sup>29</sup> Colgan thinks his festival may be assigned, either to the 20th of January or to the 13th of August.

<sup>30</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii, nn. 31, 32, 33, 34, p. 536.

<sup>31</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, regarding Deron, Bishop of Limerick, who is named in the foregoing account, that neither was there a bishop nor a city of Limerick, in those days. As to the city, Ferrar could not find any thing authentic concerning it, until the middle of the 9th century. See his "History of Limerick," part i., chap. i., p. 3. Neither Ware nor Harris were able to discover any undoubted bishop in its see, before Gillebert, who lived in the eleventh century; as to St. Munchin or Manchan—whose Life is at the 2nd of January—Dr. Lanigan thinks it is more probable, that he was not Bishop of Limerick. Even if he were, as some say, its first bishop, it is argued, that see was not yet formed in Senan's time, whereas Munchin lived in the seventh century. It is to be observed, that the author of the Second Life lived at a very late period, and after the arrival of the English in Ireland, when Limerick had become a respectable city. In the First or Metrical Life, which is more ancient, the names of the bishops and abbots, who were at Senan's funeral, are not given. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., n. 33, pp. 92, 93.

<sup>32</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xliii., p. 533, and Vita Metrica S. Senani, cap. xxv., xxvi., pp. 523, 524.

south-western parts of Ireland, his memory was held in the highest respect. Thus, St. Senan and St. Ita<sup>1</sup> were popularly assumed, as the great saints of Hy-Connail-Gaura—represented by the baronies of Upper and Lower Conniloe. From such circumstance, it has been inferred, that Senan's jurisdiction, besides including some parts on the northern bank of the Shannon, comprised districts lying to the south, and to the south-east side of that river.<sup>2</sup> He was regarded, as particular patron of the ancient territory of Thomond. This is said, to have been originally set apart for the Firbolgs, and for other races, conquered by the Milesians. It is embraced, south and east, by the River Shannon; its westerly bound extends a long distance, by the sea, into the bay of Galway.<sup>3</sup>

St. Senan died, in all probability, either about, or shortly after, the middle of the sixth century. Most likely, his remains were enshrined on Scatterry Island; but, the Danish incursions of after times caused his monastery there to be profaned and despoiled.<sup>4</sup> Although, it had been formerly defaced,<sup>5</sup> by those barbarians, the monument of holy Senan is said to have been seen, on Iniscathy Island, towards the close of last century. The saint's head, covered with a mitre, according to a local tradition, had been fixed in a stone, that closed the top of an altar window, in the great church. This image was boldly executed, and, in the last century, but very little defaced. Several cells were to be seen.<sup>6</sup> On certain festivals, likewise, numerous pilgrims repaired to this island.<sup>7</sup> A learned writer remarks,<sup>8</sup> that notwithstanding the great fame of St. Senan, and the many monuments still recording his name and transactions, in connection with Iniscathy Island, a modern pseudo-antiquary has had the effrontery to write, that he was no other than the River Shannon personified.<sup>9</sup> By Ptolemy this river is called Senus,<sup>10</sup> and by Irish writers, it is designated Sionna,<sup>11</sup> or Seinnon, and Latinized, Sinnanus, or Sinennus.<sup>12</sup> It is not necessary, of course, to notice seriously such an extravagant conjecture; but, an allusion to it, in the subjoined note,<sup>13</sup> will give the reader of our saint's Life some idea of the manner, in which the Rev. Dr. Ledwich deals with Irish history and antiquities, in his pedantic, prejudiced, and very worthless compilation. We can scarcely wonder, that the learned Dr. Lanigan should give vent to his honest indignation, by indulging in remarks, manifesting an acerbity of tone and feeling, towards this ignorant writer; and, that he should sometimes employ expressions, beneath historic

CHAPTER VI.—<sup>1</sup> See her Life, at the 15th of January.

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., p. 90, and nn. 26, 27, 28, pp. 11, 12.

<sup>3</sup> See that most readable and thoughtful work, which does equal justice to the scholarship and learning of the distinguished American writer, Thomas C. Amory, "Transfer of Erin; or the Acquisition of Ireland by England," chap. xiii., p. 62.

<sup>4</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 49 to 52.

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. Sylvester O'Halloran's "History of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 236.

<sup>6</sup> See Charles Smith's "Ancient and Present State of the County of Kerry," chap. viii., p. 227.

<sup>7</sup> See Ferrar's "History of Limerick." Appendix, No. xv., p. 378.

<sup>8</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., p. 91.

<sup>9</sup> See Rev. Dr. Ledwich's "Antiquities of Ireland," p. 32.

<sup>10</sup> Thus it is marked, on his ancient Map of Ireland.

<sup>11</sup> See the Vita S. Fintani, Cluain Ednach, cap. iii.

<sup>12</sup> So is it written, in the Life of St. Senan himself, in which he is constantly called Senanus.

<sup>13</sup> Dr. Lanigan pertinently remarks, in this connexion, and in reference to Ledwich: "Does he mean to drive out of existence hundreds of Irish families, that bear the name of Shannon? According to his mode of treating antiquities, many persons should be changed into rivers. The celebrated St. Nilus, with whom Senan was nearly contemporary, would have been a phantom, and nothing more than the River Nile personified."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. iv., n. 38, p. 99.

<sup>14</sup> In justice to Dr. Lanigan, it must be dignity, when referring to such absurd statements.<sup>14</sup> By all Irish historical writers and students, the character of Ledwich's so-called "Antiquities of Ireland" is now understood. The work itself has long since fallen into deserved contempt and neglect. In addition to what has been already stated, it must be observed, that the gift of poesy, as of prophecy, was attributed to the holy Patron of Iniscathay.<sup>15</sup>

The author of St. Senan's Prose Life gives us an account, regarding some of those miracles, said to have been wrought through his merits, and, which took place, previous to that time when he wrote. An account of these may prove interesting to the reader, and may furnish a clue to the comparatively recent period of the composition. On the authority of this biography, many statements, contained in preceding chapters, rest. During a time, that Theodoric,<sup>16</sup> son to Thadeus O'Brien,<sup>17</sup> ruled over the principality of Thomond,<sup>18</sup> a certain man, subject to his rule, being accused of having committed homicide in a brawl, fled to the monastery of St. Senan. Its church had always been considered, a place of refuge and a safe asylum, in these parts. The chieftain's satellites were sent, to apprehend the author of this crime; but, when they had discovered his place of retreat, not daring to violate a recognised sanctuary, they returned to Theodoric, with an account of what had occurred; and, stating their own scruples, in prosecuting further proceedings. On hearing this, the chief was excited to anger. Accompanied by a great band of soldiers, he proceeded to St. Senan's Monastery. Here, he quartered himself and his troops, for that night, to the great inconvenience of the monks, belonging to this house, who, as being subject to his rule, were also subjected to his exactions. On the following night, he stopped at the church of Kill-mic an dubhain<sup>19</sup>—now called Kilmacduane<sup>20</sup>—which was an appendage to the Monastery of Iniscathay. While Theodoric remained there, St. Senan appeared to the Prior of Iniscathay Monastery, as if preparing for a journey. Being asked who he was, or whether he was bound, the apparition answered, he was Senan, and that he wished to proceed to inflict punish-remarked, that these expressions are not found in the body of his history, but, rather, in its notes.

<sup>15</sup> In a MS. Codex, classed Vol. iv., Part ii., there is an Irish Life of St. Senan, at p. 118; an account of the miracles, wrought after death, through St. Senan, at p. 233; and different Poems attributed to St. Senan, to St. Brendan and to others, in Irish, at p. 142. These were transcribed, by Michael O'Clery, from older MSS., and they are now preserved in the Burgundian Library, at Bruxelles. It is to be regretted, that some efforts have not been made, to procure copies of those valuable Codices.

<sup>16</sup> This was not the celebrated King of Munster, Toirdhealbhach O'Brian, who afterwards became Monarch over all Ireland, and who died at Kincoradh, A.D. 1086, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 926, 927.

<sup>17</sup> Said to have been son to Donat Carbrech, by some authorities, or rather, perhaps, as Colgan seems to think, grandson of the same, by his son Cornelius, according to the opinion of certain historians. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii., n. 35, p. 536.

<sup>18</sup> "The principality of Thomond, generally called the country of the Dal-Cais, comprised the entire of the present county of Clare; the parishes of Iniscaltra and Clonrush, in the county of Galway; the entire of Ely O'Carroll; the baronies of Ikerrin, Upper and Lower Ormond, Ownney and Arra, and somewhat more than the western half of the barony of Clanwilliam, in the county of Tipperary; the baronies of Ownneybeg, Coonagh and Clanwilliam, and the eastern halves of the baronies of Small and Coshlea, in the county of Limerick."—County of Clare Antiquarian Letters of the Irish Ordnance Survey. Mr. O'Donovan's Ancient Territories in Thomond, as compiled or signed, by "J. O'D., February 13th, 1841," p. 9.

<sup>19</sup> This is now a parish church, in the ancient territory of Corcobaschin, near Iniscathay, and belonging to the diocese of Killaloe.

<sup>20</sup> This parish, situated in the baronies of Ibrickan and Moyarta, is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 38, 39, 47, 48, 57, 58. The Townland proper, divided into East and West, is in the barony of Moyarta alone, and shown on Sheets 47, 48, 57, 58.

ment on the chief, for his temerity. A short time afterwards, and, on the same night, he appeared to Theodoric, whom he transfixes with the end of his staff. This stroke inflicted a wound, in the leg, which caused the chief-tain much torture. While this latter asked, why he had become thus wounded; the saint answered, that it was on account of violence and injury inflicted on his church, and on his subjects. Saying these words, the apparition instantly vanished. On awaking, Theodoric found himself in a state, from which he could obtain no relief, through his medical attendants, until he died, after having suffered most extreme torture.<sup>21</sup>

At another time, a certain insolent noble, named Murchad O'Brien, who was accompanied by a band, subject to him, came to Iniscatthy. They wished to take from it, by violence, a vessel, the property of its monks. The prior and clergy, belonging to the monastery, met them, and earnestly besought the troop, not to act sacrilegiously upon a spot, always regarded as a place of asylum. But, this rapacious band still persisting in such purpose, some members of the congregation, belonging to the monastery, hastened to assist the monks. At length, this affair proceeded to blows, and the impiety of Murchad went so far, as to cause his striking one of the clergy present, with his hand, and, in such a manner, as to cause a severe wound. Afterwards, the chief and his band fled from that place; but, God's judgments followed him, in punishment for his sacrilegious conduct. On that very night, while he was asleep, St. Senan appeared to him, and threatened punishment for his crimes. When the culprit learned this, he endeavoured to obtain the saint's pardon by prayers, and by any satisfaction he might impose—but, in vain; for, presently, he felt a great pain, in the left side, and he then awoke, crying out, that it had been transfixed by God's holy servant. While his wife and family ask the cause for his outcries and pain, the chief said, that on account of injuries inflicted on the clergy, their Patron, St. Senan, had given a wound, which must shortly result in his death. Immediately afterwards, he expressed a desire to make his will, that thus his affairs might be arranged, previous to his departure.<sup>22</sup> At another time, having violently invaded Corcobaschind territory, Richard de Clare<sup>23</sup> devastated every place with fire and sword, making no distinction between lay and ecclesiastical property. Among his other acts of rapine, he spoiled St. Senan's church; when the clergy and people of the territory, moved by this sacrilegious act, poured forth a petition to their patron, that he would procure the infliction of merited punishment, on this impious invader. Their prayers were heard, and on the night after, Senan appeared to the monastery sacristan, who was told, that in consequence of petitions, offered to the patron, he would inflict chastisement on Richard de Clare, for the rapine and outrages visited on the saint's church and territory. Immediately afterwards, the saint appeared in person, to this chief, whom he struck with his staff; and, in consequence thereof, De Clare became imbecile and his head was rendered delirious. Three days after, this offender fell, by the hands of his enemies, in a hostile encounter.<sup>24</sup>

Among the many churches, dedicated to St. Senan, was one named Kill-challige.<sup>25</sup> It was revered by the people, and with a veneration, second

<sup>21</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xlv., p. 533.

<sup>22</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. vii., num. 53, pp. 777, 778.

<sup>23</sup> On the authority of Camden, the Bollandists place his death, at A.D. 1262. See ibid., num. 54, note (i).

<sup>24</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xlv., p. 534.

<sup>25</sup> This church was situated within the present parish of Kilfearagh, barony of Moyarta, and county of Clare. There was a burying-ground, called Cill-na-g-Caileach, i.e., "the Church of the Nuns." It lies in the townland, to which it has given name.

only to that entertained for Iniscatthy. By degrees, however, respect for it began to languish, until, in course of time, this edifice was converted into a barn. Such an irreverent use of the building was thought to have called forth our saint's displeasure, and, through a very humble instrument; for, a sparrow having taken a burning brand, from some neighbouring fire, communicated it to heaps of straw, which, with the house, perished, in a conflagration, that immediately followed. The people, however, prepared materials to restore this building. Whilst in need of lime and mortar, for such a purpose, St. Senan appeared to a villager, named Senanin O'Hettromain,<sup>26</sup> telling him, that he must dig to some depth, near the house of a daughter of Y-bhmachain, where he should find so much lime, as ought to suffice, for rebuilding the church. These orders were obeyed, and, according to the promise given, so much lime was found, as served their purpose; while the heap did not seem at all diminished in the trench, during the progress of this building.<sup>27</sup> What is further remarkable, in connexion with this lime, there was a curative property, it was popularly supposed to possess, in reference both to men and cattle.<sup>28</sup> Donatus, son to Donald, who ruled over Corcobaschind territory, had violated the churches of St. Senan, through Satan's instigation; and, he had even violently driven away herds, belonging to the neighbouring tenants. Having plundered the churches<sup>29</sup> of Kill-nacallige,<sup>30</sup> Kill-charitain, and Ros-anaircheil, the Vicar of St. Senan, the vicars of other churches, with the clergy of this region, arranged themselves in a solemn procession. Bringing forth the various relics in their custody, they proceeded to Donatus, and on representing the immunity due to property, belonging to their respective churches, they asked him to restore what he had taken. They threatened those unjust invaders with the malediction of God, of St. Senan, and of other saints, connected with those churches, rendered holy by being their burial places, and by the possession of their relics. The heart of Donatus, however, proving obdurate, he disregarded these warnings. Wherefore, the clergy had recourse to the spiritual arms of the Church; and, they fulminated a sentence of excommunication against him, with the sounding of bells. Although, at first, disposed to show some signs of penitence, yet, the unjust invader relapsed again into a state of more obstinate impiety. This chief, having supported a large band of soldiers, was obliged at great expense to procure them sustenance and largesses, for half of the year. At the end of this time, when he led them to the field, Donatus, his brothers, and his paid satellites, who were accomplices in the sacrilege perpetuated on the churches of God and of St. Senan, all miserably perished. His brother,

Part of the church walls were standing here, within the recollection of Eugene O'Curry, but now there is not a vestige visible. See County of Clare Antiquarian Letters of the Irish Ordnance Survey, vol. i., p. 356. Mr. Eugene Curry's Letter, dated Kildisert, 8th November, 1839. In his identification of this place with Kill-Challige, Mr. O'Curry refers to the present and to a subsequent passage, taken from the Life of St. Senan, cap. xlvii., xlviii.

<sup>26</sup> "The O'Hedromans are still numerous, in the parish of Moyarta adjoining, and are traditionally remembered as the ferrymen and fishermen of St. Senan, who, it is said, left them the privilege that none of the name should ever be drowned between Inis Cathaigh and Kilcardain; nor was any of them remembered to have been drowned within that limit, though they were almost all boatmen."—Ibid., p. 357.

<sup>27</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xlvii., p. 534.

<sup>28</sup> See ibid., cap. xlviii.

<sup>29</sup> These were situated, not far from Scattery Island, in the territory of Corcobaschinn, and in the diocese of Killaloe, as Colgan states, in n. 37, p. 536.

<sup>30</sup> This church has been identified, in a note to the foregoing paragraph. But, I am unable to identify the other two places, after a careful examination of the MS. Index to the Townland and Parishes of Clare County, as preserved in the Irish Ordnance Survey Office, Phoenix Park. Hence, I suppose, the names have become obsolete, in that part of the country.

Bernard, who, in no manner had been connected with those outrages, alone escaped.<sup>31</sup>

Another time, Mathgamanius, or Matthew, son to Domnald, son to Murchertach, wished to take away by violence certain herds, which were kept in a place of refuge, sacred to St. Senan. When his vicar, and the people of this place, wished to prevent that violence, Matthew shot two arrows at the vicar, intending to deprive him of life; however, these arrows did not even penetrate his garments, against which they lightly glanced. On seeing this, the chief was enraged, and leaping in among the cattle, he killed an ox; but, before himself or his companions could remove the quarters, Matthew was seized with a sudden illness, and he immediately expired.<sup>32</sup> On a certain occasion, some wicked depredators, entering the lands dedicated to St. Senan, took away a cow, from the herd of a venerable priest, named O'Regan. This animal was butchered at a pond, some distance from that place, where the theft had been committed; and, afterwards, a calf belonging to this cow, was covered with its hide, and sunk in the bottom of a pit near the pool. A public search was instituted, for recovery of the missing cow; during which, it was believed, that the authors of this robbery must incur St. Senan's displeasure. After a month had elapsed, the robbers returned to the pit, whence they drew forth the skin-covered calf; when, to their surprise, this animal was alive, and signified the fact, by bleating aloud three different times. Being seized with astonishment, at what they looked upon as a miraculous occurrence, those thieves returned to the priest. To him they confessed, what had taken place; whilst, at the same time, they promised him restitution for the injustice committed. They likewise engaged the future amendment of their lives.<sup>33</sup>

A clerical Synod being at one time convened, in St. Senan's church; amongst other decrees, one was passed, for the erection of a chapel, in honour of the Blessed Virgin. But, a difficulty was presented, in the way of obtaining stones, which could easily be dressed, or which might serve for the purpose of being converted into lime. While in such state of perplexity, the clergy retired on this day; but, on the following, when going out, one of these clerics found near the church the very stones required, and, sufficient in quantity, to build the whole sacred edifice.<sup>34</sup>

Iniscattery was the see of a bishop, before the English invasion, and until united with Limerick, about the beginning of the twelfth century.<sup>35</sup> Long after the death of St. Senan, the O'Brians held Iniscathay, to repel the Danish invaders of their territories. It was long an object for contention, between both parties, and our Annals<sup>36</sup> abound with notices of their quarrels. This island contains nearly 180 acres; and about 20 of these were under wood, previous to the dissolution of monasteries,<sup>37</sup> but, not a shrub now remains.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>31</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. xlix., p. 534.

<sup>32</sup> See ibid., cap. i., p. 534.

<sup>33</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. vii., num. 59, p. 778. Albert le Grand relates this incident, in a different manner. See n. (k), p. 779.

<sup>34</sup> After relating this incident, the author of the Prose Life adds: "Hoc ex multis pauca per S. Senanum post mortem patrata miracula sufficient."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita Secunda S. Senani, cap. lii, p. 534.

<sup>35</sup> See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., pp. 185, 186.

<sup>36</sup> See Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., n. i., p. 39. At the conclusion, in the admirable article, "The Legend of Iniscathy," will be found the Annals of this island, with a correct topographical description of the place, and of its venerable group of ecclesiastical ruins.

<sup>37</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 51.

<sup>38</sup> See Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland: its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. iii., p. 434.

<sup>39</sup> See an Article, in the "Gentleman's

On this island, Mr. Hills only found the remains of six churches, and probably of a seventh;<sup>39</sup> although, as we have stated, at no very remote period, the ruins of eleven old buildings had been shown. The people, about here, have a great devotion towards their patron saint, and they believe that any irreverence or acts of irreligious Vandalism, committed on the Island of Iniscattery, will meet with condign punishment. Various exemplary instances are popularly remembered.<sup>40</sup>

In addition to the foregoing instances, it is stated by Albert le Grand, that during the reign of Queen Elizabeth,<sup>41</sup> daughter to King Henry VIII.,<sup>42</sup> one Bernardulus<sup>43</sup> was destined for the Bishopric of Limerick, when it had been resolved to effect the overthrow of the Catholic Church, in Ireland. During his visitation of this diocese, Bernardulus<sup>44</sup> had heard of the judgments, visited on those, who dared to violate the possessions of St. Senan, on Scattery Island; but, in order to carry out a decree, which obliged Catholics to forswear the Pope's primacy, and to affirm the Queen's supremacy, even in matters ecclesiastical, he had despatched two of his ministers, with a company of soldiers, to proclaim, that the inhabitants should assemble in St. Mary's Church, to hear the royal commands. All were most reluctantly obliged to attend there; but, meantime, their secret prayers were fervently offered to the Immaculate Mother of God, and to their holy Patron, St. Senan. The chief minister having retired to rest, on that night, fell asleep; yet, soon he awoke the guard with outcries, stating, that he had seen St. Senan, and that he had felt blows on his body, from the saint's pastoral staff, which left him so disabled, that for a day he could not rise from bed. However, this did not alter his purpose, nor did the prayers or warnings of the islanders move him; Magazine," Vol. i., A.D. 1864. "Notes on the Architecture of Ireland," v., pp. 549, 550.

<sup>40</sup> Even a local paper, the "Clare Advertiser," of July 4th, 1857, relates an anecdote, regarding a melancholy accident, which happened to the chief Engineer of her Majesty's ship, Hawke, in the old church ruins of Iniscattery, on Saturday, the 27th of June, 1857. Having landed there, with some friends, to spend a festive day, after dinner, the engineer and his friends walked over the "sainted isle of old." They viewed the fine old tower, and holy well, and the chapel of St. Sinan, in which there was an alder tree, older than the oldest inhabitant on the island. Visitors at all times have held the antiquities of the island, in respect, if not in veneration. The engineer was desirous to possess some curiosity from the island, so remarkable in Irish history; he used a little chopper, on the tree, when a poor man present requested him to desist, saying such things were never done by visitors. This warning had not the desired effect. Not finding the branch to yield, the engineer handed the little hatchet to his companion, while he made an effort to swing out of the tree, in order to break it, where it was notched. Then the branch gave way, almost without a pull. The engineer fell with a terrible scream—the alder branch fell on him—the tree broke, not at the place where it was notched, but much higher up, and where it was not expected to break. There he lay, in great pain. His wife, with tears, regretted that the poor man's advice had not been taken. The sailors were called, and a litter was prepared. Gently as the men could carry him, they conveyed him to the boat, and thence to his ship, where he suffered the greatest agony.

<sup>41</sup> This reign is calculated, from November the 17th, A.D. 1558, to her death, which occurred, March 24th, 1603.

<sup>42</sup> He ascended the throne, April 22nd, A.D. 1509, and died on the 28th of January, A.D. 1547. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," pp. 333, 344, 338, 339.

<sup>43</sup> So called, because he was remarkably diminutive in stature.

<sup>44</sup> This must have been Bernard Adams, who succeeded John Thornburgh, who was appointed Protestant Bishop of Limerick, by Queen Elizabeth, towards the close of A.D. 1593, and who is said to have resigned this see July 4th, A.D. 1603, having then been translated to the Bishopric of Bristol, whence he was translated to the see of Worcester, on the 17th of February, A.D. 1616. According to Harris' Ware, Bernard Adams had been appointed by King James I. to succeed John Thornburgh, and he was consecrated in April, A.D. 1604. From A.D. 1606 to A.D. 1617, together with the see of Limerick, he held that of Kilfenora. He died in Limerick, on the 22nd of March, A.D. 1625, English style, and he was buried in St. Mary's Cathedral. See Vol. i., "Bishops of Limerick," pp. 511 to 513.

for, he swore, that neither the saint, nor any other person, should prevent him from executing the queen's wishes, and from driving the abominations of Roman idolatry out of the island. The night following, this minister and his assistant lay, in the same chamber, but in two different beds; when, once more, during the night, St. Senan appeared, in pontifical garments, and surrounded with a great light, while carrying an episcopal crozier in his hand. Drawing the bed-curtain aside, the apparition again struck the sleeping minister, until blood flowed from his wounds. His cries were ineffectual, to bring the servants in the house to his aid, for the chamber door had been firmly fastened; while, his room-mate looked on with terror, and fearing a like chastisement for himself. The avenging spirit departed, and opening the door, the servants found access to their suffering master, who desired, at once, to be conveyed with his companions, on board a ship, which sailed from Iniscattery to Limerick. Four days after his arrival here, the miserable man died impenitent; while, those who accompanied him to the island were so much afraid of future disagreeable consequences, that they refused to have anything more to do, in molesting the islanders on Iniscathay.<sup>45</sup>

In the county of Wexford, the old parish of Templeshannon bears our saint's name, even at the present day.<sup>46</sup> It contains that portion of Enniscorthy town, eastwards from the River Slaney. An ancient church is here to be seen. It is on the outskirts of the town, and it consisted of a nave<sup>47</sup> and choir.<sup>48</sup> A choir-arch, much disfigured, connects them; while, the middle gable rises a little above the side walls, the upper part being removed. The choir-arch appears to have been pointed, and its gable is covered with ivy. Although burials are still continued, in the graveyard, attached to that church, no patron saint or day is now remembered by the people.<sup>49</sup> It is said, a parish and church of Kilshenane,<sup>50</sup> in the barony of Clanmaurice, and diocese of Ardfer, has St. Senan as the patron.<sup>51</sup>

There are two chief festivals, occurring in the Irish Calendars, in honour of this great saint. One of these takes place, on the 1st day of March, as we have already noticed it. Thus, too, Ussher remarks,<sup>52</sup> that in the Killenensen Martyrology, at the Kalends, or 1st of March, he found the festival of St.

<sup>45</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. De Sancto Senano. Appendix ex Alberto le Grand de SS. Armoris, num. 63, 64, 65, p. 779.

<sup>46</sup> It is compounded of Teampull, "a church," and Seanain, the genetive form of Seanán—the name of the famous Irish saint, whose principal establishment was on Scattery Island, in the Shannon. Thus, Teampull Seanain is Latinized "ecclesia Senani." See County of Wexford Antiquarian Letters of the Irish Ordnance Survey, vol. ii., p. 251, Signed, "J. O'D.," the initials of Mr. O'Donovan's name. The foregoing remarks are without date; but, probably, they were written in the summer of 1840.

<sup>47</sup> The nave is about 30 feet, in length, by 19½ feet, in breadth. The side walls, which appear to retain the original height, and extend the entire length of this portion of the church, are about 18 feet high. Only the northern portion of the gable remains; and, at the southern extremity of the part remaining, there is a large stone, which seems to have been the lower stone of a doorway.

The walls of the nave are about 3 feet thick, and they are covered with ivy. See ibid., pp. 252, 253.

<sup>48</sup> The choir was about 12½ paces long, and it appears to have been of the same breadth with the nave; but, as its side walls are now level with the ground, it is impossible to measure the breadth with accuracy. The east gable is almost perfect, being slightly injured, however, at the top. On this gable, there is a square window, formed of granite, on the outside, where it is about 3 feet high, by 2½ feet—it widens considerably on the inside. This gable is built of small and very thin stones, and it is about 2½ feet in thickness. The nave is built of large and small stones. See ibid.

<sup>49</sup> See ibid.

<sup>50</sup> See it described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kerry," Sheets 10, 16, 17, 22, 23, 30, 31. The townland proper is on Sheet 16.

<sup>51</sup> See the Bollandists' previous commentary to his Life, num. 10, p. 761.

<sup>52</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 454.

Senan, Confessor, in Hibernia, noted. As also noticed, at the previous day, March the 7th is marked for St. Senan's festival. The 8th of March, however, is the feast, which was most solemnly commemorated. At this date, St. Senan has been entered, in the "Feilire" of St. Ænguss.<sup>53</sup> The Calendar of Cashel, Cathal Maguire, and the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>54</sup> have their respective accounts of him, on this day.<sup>55</sup> Likewise, the Martyrology of Salisbury,<sup>56</sup> and the English Carthusian Martyrology of Newport, record his feast, substituting, however, "Fenani" for "Senani," at this date.<sup>57</sup> Besides, the Kalendar of Drummond states, at the viii. Idus: In Ireland, the Holy Confessors Senan, Aed, and Conna, on this day, went to Christ.<sup>58</sup> The mediæval Antiphonaries<sup>59</sup> of our Irish Churches furnish conclusive proof, that formerly the Office of St. Senan, Bishop and Confessor, contained nine lessons, as recited by the clergy, in different dioceses.

The people of Thomond and of Munster hold the well of St. Senan, on Scatterry Island, in the greatest veneration. In former times, the sailors on merchant vessels, sailing from Limerick out to the Atlantic, if detained by contrary winds, at the mouth of the Shannon, usually went, in a religious manner, and drew water from it, invoking the patron's intercession. This supply was brought on board their ships, and within twenty-four hours, their expectation of favouring winds was never known to be disappointed. From the sepulchre of St. Senan, also, the people were accustomed to take small olive-coloured stones, which were regarded as relics. These, when put into what they drank, were supposed to effect a cure, or a prevention from plague, or from any kind of contagious disease. The seamen were in the habit of wearing them as amulets, about their persons, when out at sea, and believed that so they should not be drowned, while devoutly invoking the holy name of Senan. On one occasion, a shipwrecked merchant, thus furnished, and praying to the patron, found when his vessel disappeared, that some invisible force impelled him safely towards the shore. The brother of this merchant, being furnished, likewise, with similar relics, survived, and escaped from this accident; while, it was remarked, that nine other mariners, not having them, perished in the raging sea.<sup>60</sup> Besides, the celebrated well, on Scatterry Island, in Killshinane parish, county of Kerry, there is a well, also dedicated to St. Senan. A patron is held there annually, on the 8th day of March. Again, there is a remarkable well of a St. Senan at Dumass, on the western bank of the Shannon, and in the county of Clare.<sup>61</sup> In addition to the foregoing, there is an object, marked as St. Senan's altar, on Henry Pelham's old

<sup>53</sup> The following Irish stanza, and its English translation, have been furnished by Professor O'Looney, from the "Leabhar Breac":—

O. 1111. 10. Senan iníre cathaig
Cpochair ecpait napach
Conanuil clíi buaoach
Eppuc beoaeo bagach.

Senan of Innis Catha
Who strangled the hideous
Narach
Conandil the triumphant hero
The bishop Beoaeo the warlike.

<sup>54</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 68 to 71.

<sup>55</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. De Sancto

Senano. Previous Commentary, num. 9, p. 761.

<sup>56</sup> Edited by Richard Whitford, A.D. 1526.

<sup>57</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," Martii viii. Appendix ad Vitam S. Senani, cap. vi., p. 539.

<sup>58</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 7.

<sup>59</sup> Thus, in these Manuscripts, belonging to the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, and classed B. 1. 3., and B. 3. 12., at the 8th of March, the respective Calendars note ix. lect.

<sup>60</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. De Sancto Senano. The foregoing account will be found in Appendix ex Alberto le Grand de SS. Armoriciis, num. 61, 62, p. 779.

<sup>61</sup> See "The Illustrated Dublin Journal," vol. i., No. 4, p. 52.

Map of the County Clare. It is within the bounds of Killard parish,<sup>62</sup> in the barony of Ibrickan. During the last century, the Bell of St. Senan was religiously preserved, by the people, living near Scatterry Island; and, it was used by them, for the purpose of giving evidence. Many believed, that to swear falsely on it was to ensure immediately the taking of convulsions, to be followed by a speedy death.<sup>63</sup>

The hermit and the cœnobite of our early Irish and Christian Church were moulded on the same framework of society, as fashions the religious of this nineteenth century.<sup>64</sup> Still must it be regretted, that the history of the Irish cœnobic life and Monastic Orders is as yet comparatively unwritten; no man of this generation has dared to grapple with this vast subject, the materials for elucidating which are not yet stored up fully in printed books. They lie scattered, through the public libraries and record rooms, not alone of Ireland, but of half the cities of Europe; they are locked up in the charter chests of great landowners, or in the still less accessible bookcases of wealthy and ignorant collectors. It is true, that even in a divisional sense, the task must prove a life-long labour, and much reading, during the most active period of life, must be directed to kindred subjects; but, had such a work come to partial perfection, until of late years, it should have been written, on the authority of printed documents only, for facilities were but grudgingly afforded, by public authorities, for researchful acquaintance with muniments under their custody. Private and unaided effort could therefore have given but a very imperfect outline of the subject. Let us hope, however, that the glimpses, so imperfectly revealed in sacred biography, may urge others to deal more completely with a grand historical picture.

ARTICLE II.—ST. LIBER, OR LIBERIUS, ABBOT OF AGHABOE, QUEEN'S COUNTY. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] Some doubtful notices of this holy man are to be found in Colgan,<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> place him, among their pretermitted saints, at this date. Little is known regarding him; but, it is stated, this saint was the son of a nobleman, called Aradius. It has been inferred, that Liber must have been born, about, or after, the middle of the sixth century, and that he flourished, towards the year 580. Then, it is said, that in his youth, the name he bore indicated his morals, until converted by a miracle of St. Canice,<sup>3</sup> to a life of grace. He then became a model of virtue, and he is conjecturally thought, to have placed himself, as a disciple, under such holy guidance, as his great spiritual director afforded. Simply the name of Liber, with the letter S. appended, is seen in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> at the 8th of March. This saint is regarded, as the immediate successor of the founder of Aghaboe,<sup>5</sup> Blessed Canice. This place is situated in the southern part of the Queen's County. In treating of Aghaboe and about its former history, the Rev. Edward Ledwich undertakes to give an exact description of the old ruins,<sup>6</sup> near which he lived as a rector, for over twenty years.<sup>7</sup> His antiquarian knowledge, however, is

<sup>62</sup> It is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 38, 46, 47, 56, 57.

<sup>63</sup> See Dr. Sylvester O'Halloran's "General History of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 188.

<sup>64</sup> See "Monastic Legends." A paper, read by Edward George Kirwan Browne, before the Academia, at Hackney, p. 7. London, 8vo.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita S. Liberi or Liberii, p. 566.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii viii., p. 749.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 11th of October.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>5</sup> It is now a parish, within the baronies of Clandonagh, and of Clarmallagh, and it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 21, 22, 23, 28, 29, 34. The townland proper is on Sheet 22.

<sup>6</sup> From a sketch, taken by Daniel Grose in 1792, a copperplate engraving has been singularly at fault, in reference to various places and particulars. He has also contributed the historical article, on this place, published by Archdall.<sup>8</sup> A much more complete account he has given, in the work or collection of William Shaw Mason.<sup>9</sup> This is accompanied by a map of the parish,<sup>10</sup> together with some interesting engravings of Antiquities.<sup>11</sup> The old Cathedral here stood, on the site of the modern Protestant church, and some vestiges of the more ancient building are traceable, in the walls and about the foundations. A much frequented graveyard surrounds it, and cut-stone pieces, rudely torn from the mullions and carvings of the ruined Dominican Abbey, which is near, now are to be found, at the heads of humble graves. A predecessor of the Rev. Edward Ledwich in the living is charged by him, with having demolished most of the venerable pile, to inclose a demesne.<sup>12</sup> The Abbey is said, in one account, to have been built, A.D. 1052, in another, A.D. 1250, and, again, A.D. 1382, by the Fitzpatricks. St. Canice having died, A.D. 598, or 599, it is thought, St. Liberius immediately succeeded him, as Abbot of Aghaboe. Here, he probably lived, for the rest of his life; and, he died, in the year 618, according to the Annals of Ulster, and of the Four Masters; but, in 619, according to those of Clonmacnois.<sup>13</sup> Marianus, his Scholiast, introduced into Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland," vol. ii., pp. 39, 40.

The Dominican Abbey Church, Aghaboe, Queen's County.

<sup>7</sup> The house in which Rev. Edward Ledwich lived, and the glebe lands, have been sold to the tenant, Jeremiah Dunne, Esq., who had been in possession, and who purchased them, under provisions of the late Irish Church Disestablishment Act.

<sup>8</sup> See his "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 588 to 590.

<sup>9</sup> See "A Statistical Account, or Parochial Survey of Ireland, drawn up from the Communications of the Clergy," vol. i., No. ii. Parish of Aghaboe, Queen's County and diocese of Ossory. By the Rev. Edward Ledwich, LL.D., Member of many learned Societies, author of the Antiquities of Ireland, and editor of Grose, on the same subject, pp. 13 to 78.

<sup>10</sup> Copied from the Down Survey.

<sup>11</sup> These are, exterior views of the Abbey and Church of Aghaboe, as also a view and ground plan of the Mote of Monacoghlan.

<sup>12</sup> The accompanying interior view of the ruins was sketched by the writer, in the summer of 1856. It has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

Maguire, and the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>14</sup> register Liber, as having had a festival, on this day, and they assert, that he was Abbot of Achadh-bo-Cain-nigh; for, such was the denomination, bestowed on this place, ever held sacred to the memory of the glorious Patron.

ARTICLE III.—ST. DUTHAC OR DUBTHAC, PATRON AND BISHOP OF ROSS, SCOTLAND. [Eleventh Century.] Despising alike the applause of princes and of people, this holy man avoided company, banqueting, and all worldly comforts. Yet, by this course of life, he acquired a just meed of fame, among the people of Britain and Ireland, where his travels produced grace.<sup>1</sup> A Life of St. Duthac was written by Father Patrick Anderson,<sup>2</sup> a Scotch Jesuit, who compiled Lives of the Scottish Saints, which manuscript had been preserved, in the Scotch College, at Paris. He flourished, in the beginning of the seventeenth century.<sup>3</sup> The Rt. Rev. Bishop Challenor,<sup>4</sup> the "Memorial of British Piety,"<sup>5</sup> Rev. Alban Butler<sup>6</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould<sup>7</sup> have their respective notices of Duthac. Also, the Bollandists,<sup>8</sup> and Bishop Forbes,<sup>9</sup> who give an account of this saint, tell us, that he sprung from no ignoble family of the Scoti, and that his wise instructors early imbued him with a knowledge of the Christian Faith. While engaged at his youthful studies, it pleased God to perform a wonderful miracle. His preceptor having sent him for fire to a workshop, snatching up with a tongs some burning thorns, the workman there cast them into the youth's bosom. His clothes even remained unsinged and unscathed, while Duthac carried the burning thorns safely to his master. By Divine direction, it is stated, that Dubthac crossed over to Hibernia.<sup>10</sup> There, he applied to study the precepts and laws of the Old and New Testament, and on his return to Scotland, he taught these publicly with all gentleness. Shortly after, he was consecrated by his co-bishops, as universal and chief pastor.<sup>11</sup> He was remarkable, for his gift of miracles. One of these throws a picturesque light, on the manners of his time. Duthac had been invited to a feast, where one of the company, after drinking, had a sick headache. He had sent a portion of swine's flesh, with a gold ring, by one of Duthac's disciples; but, the latter, on passing a cemetery, laid down the flesh and ring there, desiring to offer prayers, for the souls departed. Meantime, a hungry kite snatched them up and flew away across a river, towards a dense wood. Fearing the anger, both of the donor and of his master, the disciple straightway returned, with an account of what had happened. Whereupon, St. Duthac retired for a few minutes, and he prayed;

<sup>13</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 240 to 243, and n. (q). Ibid.

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See the "Martyrology for the use of the Church of Aberdeen," in "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Sessions MDCCCLIV-V.—MDCCCLVI.—VII., p. 262.

<sup>2</sup> He was nephew to John Lesley, the pious Bishop of Ross, who died at Bruxelles, A.D. 1591, and who had an extraordinary devotion towards St. Duthac, as chief patron of his diocese.

<sup>3</sup> See Dr. Oliver's "Collections towards illustrating the Biography of the Scots, English, and Irish Members of the Society of Jesus," p. 17.

<sup>4</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 163.

<sup>5</sup> See p. 48.

<sup>6</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March viii.

<sup>7</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., pp. 164, 165.

<sup>8</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii viii. De S. Duthaco Episcopo Rossensi in Scotia. A previous Commentary, in three sections, to a Vitæ Compendium ex Breviario Aberdonensi, in six paragraphs, pp. 799, 800.

<sup>9</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 328, 329.

<sup>10</sup> Dempster writes thus: "Unum scio, in Hibernia diu illum versatum: vidi in Malisio episcopo Sanctandreo Catalogo de illa ecclesia."—"Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," toms i., lib. iv., num. 378, pp. 207, 208.

<sup>11</sup> The words in his Office are "universalis et praecepius pastor."

when the kite soon returned, and laid what he had taken, at the saint's feet. Blessed Duthac accepted the ring, but he restored the flesh to that kite, which anon flew away. Again, in the case of a cake, made with honey and butter, food was miraculously increased, and the remains worked cures. While celebrating the feast of St. Finbarr<sup>12</sup> of Cork, a canon of Dornoch Church caused a fat ox to be killed for the poor. Determining to carry a portion of it himself to St. Duthac, during a dark and stormy night; the spit, on which this food was carried, gave a light both coming and going. According to Dempster,<sup>13</sup> he wrote a Book, "Meditationes solitariae," a Book "De Vanitate Philosophorum," and a Book, "De Dei Nominibus ex S. Dionysio." While some state, he flourished A.D. 807, others have it at A.D. 1249. The Office and Lessons of St. Duthac or Dubthac occur in the Breviary of Aberdeen,<sup>14</sup> on the 8th of the March Ides, when his death occurred, and when his festival is celebrated. The date for his demise, given by Bishop Forbes, is A.D. 1068. If the supplement to Fordun may be trusted, St. Duthac had another tie to Scotland, in his disciple Malisius or Macliosa, who, he prophesied, should become Episcopus Scotorum.<sup>15</sup> The Annals of Ulster enter his decease, at A.D. 1065;<sup>16</sup> and, while calling him Albanach, the principal Confessor of Erin and Alban, they state, that he rested at Armagh. He was venerated in Ross, and indeed throughout all Scotland, by princes and people. He flourished during the time of Vilhelmus, or Gulielmus,<sup>17</sup> the ninety-third King of Scotland, according to Lesley.<sup>18</sup> This should bring him into the twelfth century. Again, Hector Boece states the report, that St. Duthac lived, during the reign of Alexander II., and, it is said, he was preceptor to Blessed Gilbert, Bishop of Cathanensis.<sup>19</sup> He is greatly honoured, in the Church of Tayne, in the diocese of Ross, and to this place, great numbers of pilgrims resorted.<sup>20</sup> Seven years after death, his body was found incorrupt, and his relics were translated to a grander shrine.<sup>21</sup> His shirt, his stock, and his bell, were preserved.<sup>22</sup> The following places in Scotland are named after him: Kilduich, at the head of Loch Duich;<sup>23</sup> Kilduthie, near the Loch of Leys; Arduthie close to Stonehaven, and the Chapel of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of St. Dupthac, at Arbroath.<sup>24</sup> He is reputed to have foretold an invasion of the Danes, which happened A.D. 1263, when they were defeated by Alexander Stuart, the great grandfather to King Robert.<sup>25</sup> In the Kalendar of Hyrdmanstoun, at the viii. Ides, or 8th of March, is entered St. Duthac, Bishop and Confessor. The same entry occurs in the Kalendar of Arbuthnott, and in that of Aberdeen, his feast is similarly noted, with the remark, that he had

<sup>12</sup> His feast and his Acts are at the 25th of September.

<sup>13</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iv., num. 378, pp. 207, 208.

<sup>14</sup> Pars Hyemalis, fol. lxxv.

<sup>15</sup> Malisius is marked in the Catalogue as after Fothad and Kellach. It is true, that the Edinburgh College MS. and the Cupar MS. have not this entry. Fordun's "Scotichronicon," vi. 24. ed. Goodall, vol. i., p. 339. See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 328, 329.

<sup>16</sup> See Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv. "Annales Ultionenses," p. 342.

<sup>17</sup> According to George Buchanan, he reigned from A.D. 1165 to 1214.

<sup>18</sup> See "De Origine, Moribus, et Rebus Gestis Scotorum," lib. vi., p. 228.

<sup>19</sup> See Hector Boece's "Historie Scotorum," lib. xiii., p. cclxxxv.

<sup>20</sup> Thus King James IV. made a pilgrimage to St. Duthac's shrine, in 1497, 1504 and 1505. See Dr. John Stuart's "Records of the Priory of the Isle of May," Preface, pp. xlvii., lxxix.

<sup>21</sup> In the "Registrum Episcopatus Aberdonensis," vol. ii., p. 160-7. Also "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Ross, p. 468.

<sup>22</sup> See, regarding them, Mair, "De Gestis Scotorum," v. 12. Also "Origines Parochiales Scotiae," vol. ii., p. 433.

<sup>23</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiae," vol. ii., p. 391. Also "New Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. xiv., pp. 2, 181.

<sup>24</sup> See "Registrum Nigrum de Aberbrothoc," pp. 438, 442.

<sup>25</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the a Duplex Office, consisting of Nine Lessons. In Adam King's Kalendar, at the 8th of March, is entered S. Duthake bischope and cōfess. in scot. vnder King Alexander 2. Dempster states, that in the town of Thana, Duthac, Bishop of Ross, whose holiness was proved by frequent miracles, had been venerated, on the 8th of March. Also, David Camerarius, at the same date, has St. Duthac, Confessor and Bishop of Ross, renowned for his sanctity, in the provinces of Ross and Moray, in Scotland.<sup>26</sup> We also find this holy bishop noted, in the "Circle of the Seasons,"<sup>27</sup> and in the Martyrology of Cologne. The poet Wordsworth has expressed his strong faith in that moral temper, which would elevate the present, by doing reverence to the past, and Scottish researches have fostered much this taste and tendency.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. ALGNIED, OR ELGNIED, BISHOP OF ARDBRACCAN, COUNTY OF MEATH. [Eighth Century.] We find some brief notices of this holy Prelate, in Colgan<sup>1</sup> and in the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> Nothing is recorded, however, respecting this saint, but that he was distinguished, for his merits and virtues, having been appointed bishop over the ancient see of Ardbreacanensis,<sup>3</sup> or Ardraccan,<sup>4</sup> in Meath.<sup>5</sup> His memory is revered, on the 8th day of March, as we find, in the simple entry, Ailgniad, which appears in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>6</sup> Again, Marianus O'Gorman, and the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>7</sup> mention, that Elgniad, Saint, was venerated on this day. It was probably that of his decease; and, the year of his departure was 776, according to our chief Annalists, the Four Masters, or 781, according to a correction of Dr. O'Donovan.<sup>8</sup> Cultivating modesty and retirement, his life passed over; and, it has left us no memorials of any great consequence. Yet, like the fabled giant of old, often as he pressed the ground, Antæus received new strength from his mother earth;<sup>9</sup> thus, may we suppose, saints receive increase of spiritual vigour, from their lowliness, nor can they be crushed to death, by their enemy, so long as they are grounded in humility, and become not unduly elevated by pride or ambition.

Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March viii.

<sup>26</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 7, 38, 97, 113, 146, 194, 235.

<sup>27</sup> See p. 68.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. De S. Algniedo Episcopo Ardbreacanensi, p. 568.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>3</sup> See an interesting account, No. iv. Parish of Ardraccan, in the diocese and county of Meath, by the Rev. Richard Moore, Rector, and the Rev. Thomas Toomy, Curate, with a Map of the Parish from the Down Survey, in William Shaw Mason's "Statistical Account, or Parochial Survey of Ireland," vol. i., pp. 84 to 105. The parish is situated, in the barony of Lower Navan, and it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 24, 25, 30, 31. The townland proper is on Sheets 24, 25.

<sup>4</sup> The derivation of this name, Ardraccan, according to an eccentric writer, is as follows: "The place is this day called Ardraccan: the meaning of the word is 'the heap of the party-coloured,' because, there were laid beneath it men of all the nations of Eri."—O'Connor's "Chronicles of Eri," vol. ii., chap. xxiv., note (a), p. 337.

<sup>5</sup> "We have accounts of there being, within the limits of Meath alone, no less a number than seven bishoprics, viz. :—Clonard, Duleek, Kells, Trim, Ardraccan, Dunshaughlin, and Slane; all of which (except Kells and Duleek) were, in the year 1152, united by virtue of a Bull from Pope Eugenius III., and sent by Cardinal Paparo, who held his Synod in Kells."—Thompson's "Statistical Survey of the County of Meath." Introduction, pp. ix., x.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>8</sup> "The Age of Christ 776 [recte 781]. The eleventh year of Donnchadh. Ailgniadh, Bishop of Ard-Breacain [Ardraccan]; &c., died."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 380, 381.

<sup>9</sup> "Hoc quoque tam vastas cumulavit munere vires

Terra sui fetus, quod, cum tetigere parentem,

Jam defecta vigent renovato robore membra."—Lucanus, "Pharsalia," lib. iv., ll. 598-600.

ARTICLE V.—FESTIVAL OF A REPUTED ST. DUCATUS, OR DUCHATUS, BISHOP. In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, as published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 8th of March, we find Ducatus entered.<sup>1</sup> On the authority of Floratus, Henry Fitzsimons has placed Duchatus, Bishop, at the same date.<sup>2</sup> This is probably the Scottish Bishop of Ross, who went to Ireland, that he might receive instruction in learning and piety.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE VI.—ST. CIARAN, OF FOIGHDE. The name, Ciaran, without any further designation, occurs in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 8th of March. Colgan appears to think, that the present holy man may be identified with Kieranus Moel, who was visited by St. Berach,<sup>2</sup> Abbot, as related in the supplementary Life of the latter saint.<sup>3</sup> We find, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> also, that Ciaran, and he is said to have been of Foighde, was venerated, on this day. The Bollandists simply notice him.<sup>5</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—ST. NEMAN, OR NOEMAN, OF DAIRINIS, PROBABLY, IN THE COUNTY OF WEXFORD. [Supposed to be in the Seventh Century.] The name Neman, in Latin rendered Cælestinus, or Noemhan, rendered also Sanctivus, was most appropriately given to this pious servant of God. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> have their doubts concerning some conjectures, about his identity, which have been ventured upon by Colgan. The latter maintains, that this saint flourished, in the southern parts of Leinster, and about the middle of the seventh century. Some of his presumed Acts are noticed, at the 8th of March; yet, little of a reliable character seems to have been gleaned, regarding him.<sup>2</sup> It is thought, he had been that companion, mentioned in the Life of St. Fechin<sup>3</sup> of Fore. Elsewhere, Colgan assigns his feast, to the 13th of September, a contradiction not unfrequent in his works. The name of Neman of Duir inse is inserted in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> at the 8th of March. Archdall says, that Dairinis, here meant, was an island near the town of Wexford, where a monastery had been erected, probably by this saint. Here, we are informed, he was abbot.<sup>5</sup> According to the Bollandists, Marianus O'Gorman, or his Scholiast, notices this saint as of Dasinisensis, Episcopus; according to Colgan, as Nemanus Darinisensis Episcopus. Maguire has a notice of him, at the 8th of March. Besides, the festival of Neman, Bishop of Dairinis, was celebrated on this day, according to the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>6</sup>

ARTICLE VIII.—FEAST OF ST. CATHALDUS, BISHOP OF TARENTUM, ITALY. [Seventh Century.] The Acts of this illustrious bishop—taken from

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

<sup>2</sup> See "Catalogus Aliquorum Sanctorum Ibernæ." Ibid., cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>3</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 163.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 15th of February.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Februarii. Supplementum Vitæ S. Berachi, ex Codice MS. Hibernico Ecclesiæ ejusdem sancti, cap. viii., and n. 8, pp. 345, 348. There is a Genealogy of Ciaran, son of Brandub, in the "Leabhar Breac," page 23, col. 2, line 2; but, his identity I have not discovered.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 748.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. De S. Neman Episcopo Darinisensi, p. 568.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 20th of January.

various sources—are very fully inserted, by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> with interpretative notes, and an Appendix, at the 8th of March. Some authorities assign the Natalis of St. Cathaldus, to this day.<sup>2</sup> Among these may be enumerated, certain Tablets found at Tarentum, an Office of this saint, printed at Rome, A.D. 1607, Philip Ferrarius,<sup>3</sup> a Florarius Manuscript, Colgan<sup>4</sup> and Dempster. Some suppose this to be the date for his canonization.<sup>5</sup> The weight of testimony, however, is opposed to such opinion, as that it had been the day of his departure, which may be seen, by referring to the Life of this saint. It will be found, at the 10th of May.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. PSALMOD OR SAUMAY, ANCHORET, AT LIMOSIN, FRANCE. [Sixth Century.] At the 8th of March, in Rev. Alban Butler's work,<sup>1</sup> as also in the Circle of the Seasons,<sup>2</sup> we find mentioned, St. Psalmod, or Saumay. He was born in Ireland, and he lived as an anchorer at Limousin, after having emigrated to France. He flourished in the sixth century. This holy man had a great repute for sanctity and miracles. He died about 589,<sup>3</sup> but we are not able to find any particulars recorded at length, to satisfy a laudable curiosity regarding his actions.

ARTICLE X.—ST. LIBRAN. Colgan has strung together some inconclusive and merely conjectural remarks, when placing his name, under this same date.<sup>1</sup> According to his opinion, Libran might be identical with a certain Librarian—mentioned in the Acts of St. Sampson<sup>2</sup>—the name Librarian being substituted for Libranus, through mistake of a scribe. This emendation has not the authority of the Bollandists to lend it a sanction.<sup>3</sup> Librain S. is the simple record, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> at the 8th of March. Possibly, the letter S. may serve to designate him, as Sacerdos, or Priest. Besides, we find an entry of Libran, but without time, place or parents specified, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Maguire, for the 8th of March. There was a festival, dedicated to Liobran, on this day, as we find recorded, likewise, in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>5</sup> His Acts, if such existed, have not been preserved, to solve questions, connected with this saint.

ARTICLE XI.—ST. CONALLUS, BISHOP, AND CONFESSOR. On the authority of the Carthusian Martyrology, Henry Fitzsimons sets down St. Conallus, Bishop, at the 8th day of March, in his list.<sup>1</sup> At the same date, the name Conellus simply occurs, in the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, as pub-

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>5</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 735.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Vita S. Cataldi Episcopi et Confessoris, pp. 544 to 562.

<sup>2</sup> See the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, in his "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

<sup>3</sup> In "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum."

<sup>4</sup> He thinks, it may be the feast, either of his death, or of his burial.

<sup>5</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March viii.

<sup>2</sup> See, p. 68.

<sup>3</sup> According to the "Martyrology of Evreux."

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. De S. Librano, pp. 567, 568.

<sup>2</sup> See his Acts, at the 28th of July.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> "Catalogus Aliquorum Sanctorum Ibernæ."

<sup>2</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Com-

lished by O'Sullivan Beare.<sup>2</sup> None of our Irish Calendars notice him, at this date, as Colgan<sup>3</sup> has taken care to observe; although, indeed, from his own showing, Conallus is noted among other Irish Saints.

ARTICLE XII.—ST. CRONAN, OF AIRDNE. On the authority of our Martyrologies, Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have notices of this holy man, at the present date. The name of Cronan, Airdni, is entered in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> at the 8th of March. Colgan supposes his place, as Latinized, Ardnensis, to be identical with Araniensis, an island off the west coast of Connaught and Munster. But, the word Airdne is found in composition with the names of various places, in Ireland. Hence, it would not be easy to identify this saint's place. The Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire, of the Carthusians, and of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> register Cronan, of Airdne, as having veneration paid him, at this date. It may be asked, if the denomination, Airdne, can be identical with Urney, or Urny, meaning "an oratory." There is a parish so called in the barony of Raphoe,<sup>5</sup> and in the baronies of Omagh West and of Strabane Lower.<sup>6</sup> Besides the parish, in the county of Cavan, to which allusion has been made at the 11th of February,<sup>7</sup> there is a townland, so called, in the parish of Kilmore, and barony of Clanmahon, in the same county.<sup>8</sup> Again, there is an Urney, in the parish of Ballykean, barony of Upper Philipstown, and King's County.<sup>9</sup> Here, there is a graveyard, and probably, it was the site of some ancient oratory.<sup>10</sup> The Carthusian Martyrology styles this Cronan a bishop, and a confessor; while, our native Calendars do not notice his dignity, nor the time when he flourished. Assuming he had identified this saint with Aran Island, Colgan rather considers him, to have been an abbot there, and not a bishop. In the anonymous Catalogue of our national Saints, as published by O'Sullivan Beare, we find a St. Cronanus simply entered. We can hardly doubt, but this is the St. Cornanus—incorrectly spelled, however,—as found in the Carthusian Martyrology, and copied from it, by Henry Fitzsimons, in his list of Irish Saints. It is likely, too, that Floratius, through mistake, assigned his feast to the 8th of April.<sup>11</sup>

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. CONAN, OR CONNANUS, BISHOP, OF EAS-RUAIDH, OR ASSAROE, COUNTY OF DONEGAL. [Sixth Century.] Pure and fervent as were their souls, God's saints never allowed a day to pass, without performing some penitential acts, and in having contrition for sin. Colgan has some pendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. De S. Cronano Epis. et Confes., p. 564.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. De S. Cronano Epis. et Confes., p. 564.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>5</sup> This portion of it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 79, 88.

<sup>6</sup> This portion is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 4, 5, 9, 10, 15, 16, 23, 24.

The townland proper and glebe are on Sheets 4, 9, in Lower Strabane.

<sup>7</sup> At our account of St. Cognat, Virgin.

<sup>8</sup> It is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cavan," Sheets 25, 31.

<sup>9</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheet 26.

<sup>10</sup> It lies within the Mountmellick Poor Law Union, and in reference to it we find it proposed and seconded by the guardians, at a meeting of the board, "That James Cassidy be given charge of the Urney Graveyard, and that he be paid four shillings per year for taking care of it, with the positive instruction not to allow it to be grazed."—Leinster Independent, of December 18th, 1875.

<sup>11</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ

notices of this holy recluse, and bishop, on this day,<sup>1</sup> as also the Bollandists.* According to the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," this St. Conan, who was the son of Tighernach, son to Fergus, son to Ængus, son of Conall Gulban, had three other holy brothers,<sup>3</sup> named respectively Beg-bile,<sup>4</sup> Colman<sup>5</sup> and Cuan.<sup>6</sup> Thus, was he very closely related to the illustrious St. Columkille.<sup>7</sup> The first name of our saint was Conna, and being loved by his parents, as by God, for boyish amiability, when he grew in years and virtues, his mother called him Conna Dil, or "Conna the beloved."<sup>8</sup> This name continued for some time; until, at last, it passed into Conan or Connanus. He was born in the sixth century, and he flourished towards its close. When mature in age, Conan collected around him a community of monks, and over these he gently ruled, at a place known as Cnodain, near Eas-Ruaidh, and on the northern bank of the fish-abounding River Erne.<sup>9</sup> This office, he discharged in a most laudable manner, and he was afterwards appointed bishop.<sup>10</sup> Below the celebrated cataract of Ballyshannon stands Abbey Assaroe, now in ruins, and within a well-tenanted graveyard. Whether it was here or elsewhere, Conan exercised the episcopal function, does not appear.<sup>11</sup> An entry is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>12</sup> at the 8th of March, under the form, Conanla Easa Ruaidh.<sup>13</sup> In his "Festilogy," St. Ængus calls him, Conan Dil, a glorious athlete of Christ. Marianus O'Gorman notes him, as Conan Dil of Eas-Ruaidh; Maguire has, Conanus Dil near Eas-ruaidh, or at Eas-mac-neirc in Connaught, he lies, and it was his mother, who called him and added the cognomen, Conna Dil, i.e., Conna very dear to me; Philip Ferrarius<sup>14</sup> and the Carthusian Martyrology,<sup>15</sup> also recorded him, at this date. On this day, and at the aforesaid place, is entered, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>16</sup> as having a festival celebrated in his honour, Conán of Eas-Ruaidh. This is the present cataract on the River Erne, and in the county of Donegal. This is, probably, the Conanus, entered in the anonymous list of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare. In Henry Fitzsimons' Catalogue, he appears so named, likewise, and he is there styled a bishop,<sup>17</sup> on the authority of Bætius<sup>18</sup> and Floratius.<sup>19</sup> It is said, an old church, of which St. Columba was Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 53.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hibernæ," viii. Martii. De S. Conano sive Connano Epis., p. 563.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 480, and cap. x., p. 489.

<sup>4</sup> His feast occurs, on the 12th of October.

<sup>5</sup> He is venerated, on the 13th of January.

<sup>6</sup> His festival is on the 2nd of March.

<sup>7</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>8</sup> Cathal Maguire is the chief authority for this statement.

<sup>9</sup> Here, but more especially near the charming lough, the tourists will realize the following poetic conception, when "curious to discern,

All the charms of amber Erne,
Representing to the sight
Various objects of delight;
Fields, and flocks on mossy beds,
Forests with inverted heads;

Dales and hills untaught to rise
Pointing to the nether skies."

—Rev. Dr. William Dunkin's "Select Poetical Works," vol. ii. Lough Erne, p. 350.

<sup>10</sup> So states the Carthusian Martyrology.

<sup>11</sup> Such a statement is not in the early Irish Calendars.

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>13</sup> According to Colgan, however, the entry is "Conanus apud Eas-Ruaidh." Mart. Taml.

<sup>14</sup> In his "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum," at the 8th of March, Ferrarius notes: "Eodem die SS. Conani Episcopi et Cronan Monachi de quibus Hector Boetius in Hyst. Scot."

<sup>15</sup> It states: "In Hibernia Conani, Cronani, et Conalli, Episcoporum et Confessorum."

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>17</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>18</sup> See lib. ix.

<sup>19</sup> See sect. 176.

patron, occupied the site of the present ruined Abbey of Assaroe.<sup>20</sup> Only a few walls of this latter erection now remain. It is devoid of all decorative features, at present, but some carved stones of capital and column lie scattered about the spot.<sup>21</sup> It is associated with some of William Allingham's most musical lines.<sup>22</sup> If the Acts of the present holy man—as already stated, having been known to Irish and foreign writers—had been expressly written, they seem to have perished, through the vicissitude of time, or they have not as yet come to light ; so that, we are not able more fully to reveal his history, or reconcile some conflicting statements.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. MOCHONNA, OR DACHONNA, OF ASSYLYN, COUNTY OF ROSCOMMON. [Supposed to be of the Sixth Century.] From the confusion of statements, and the want of specific Acts to determine who this holy man really was, we can only venture to present the following unsatisfactory notices. Colgan relates some doubtful incidents, regarding the present saint, at the 8th day of March.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> cursorily allude to him, at the same date, and following in the same track. The original name of this holy man seems to have been Conna ; afterwards, transmuted to Mo-Chonna or Da-chonna, the mo, or do, being a prefix. Colgan mentions the fact of a Mochonna, living in the time of St. Kevin,<sup>3</sup> who presided over a monastery in Leinster ; but, he dismisses the idea, that he was identical with the present saint, who seems to have belonged to the western parts of Ireland. Conna is said to have been the son of Earc,<sup>4</sup> by our Irish genealogists. Yet, I find another pedigree made out for him.<sup>5</sup> It is said, that Mochonna had other brothers,<sup>6</sup> who were saints, and who have a festival assigned them, although their names are not recorded in our Calendars.<sup>7</sup> We are told, likewise, that the mother of Mochonna, the mother of St. Cronan,<sup>8</sup> and the mother of St. Mobai<sup>9</sup> were three germane sisters. Whether the Mochonna here referred to was the present, or a different saint, so called, seems undetermined. It is thought, however, that our Mochonna had been trained in the practices of

<sup>20</sup> It was erected late in the twelfth century, by Roderick le Canavan, Prince of Tyrconnell.

<sup>21</sup> See William F. Wakeman's "Lough Erne, Enniskillen, Belleek, Ballyshannon and Bundoran," Third Excursion, pp. 94, 95.

<sup>22</sup> "A little rocky rivulet runs murmuring to the tide,
Singing a song of ancient days, in sorrow, not in pride ;
The boor-tree and the lightsome ash across the portal grow,
And Heaven itself is now the roof of Abbey Assaroe."

—"The Winding Banks of Erne ; or, The Emigrant's Adieu to Ballyshannon."

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. De S. Mochona Abbate, p. 565.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 748.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 3rd of June.

<sup>4</sup> According to the Martyrologies of Maguire and of the O'Clerys.

<sup>5</sup> Thus, the Rev. John Francis Shearman has Dacon or Mochonna, of Ess-mac-Eirc, near Boyle, the son of Eochaidh, son to Illann, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, in Part x. of "Loca Patriciana."

<sup>6</sup> It is thought, by Colgan, that St. Mochonna and his brothers lived at Eas-mac-Neirc, which got its name, "the Cataract of the sons of Erc," from them. Yet, too, it is considered doubtful, if Erc was the father, and not the remote ancestor of those brothers ; since, St. Patrick came to the lands of the sons of Erc, in Connaught, and this Erc is represented to have been the son of Brian, the son of Eochaid Moimedoin. See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. xxxvii., lv. Now as the posterity of this Erc might have been called Mic-Eirc, or "the sons of Erc ;" St. Mochonna possibly obtained a like appellation from them, and the place where he dwelt, also, could have been so denominated, as pertaining to that noble family. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii viii. De S. Mochonna Abbate, n. 2, p. 565.

<sup>7</sup> Thus, at the 19th of April, the Martyrologies of Tallagh and of Marianus O'Gorman have a feast for The Sons of Erc of Dermaigh.

<sup>8</sup> Probably, Abbot of Roscrea, whose feast occurs on the 28th of April.

<sup>9</sup> Probably, St. Mobi Clarinech, whose feast is held on the 12th of October, virtue and in monastic discipline, and that he was a disciple to the illustrious Columkille,<sup>10</sup> who is said to have founded a monastery, at Eas-ua-flionn, a spot on the River Boyle, and about one mile west of the present town, so called.<sup>11</sup> The place was anciently denominated Eas mac-n-Eirc.<sup>12</sup> This establishment of a religious community happened, before the Apostle of Caledonia went over to Britain. To rule over that establishment, Columkille selected one of his disciples, named Dachonna. A modern writer supposes the place to be identical with Inchmacnerin, an island in Lough Key.<sup>13</sup> A special allusion is made, in two different passages of Adamnan, to St. Columkille's residence in this beautiful locality.<sup>14</sup> Whether any Acts of St. Mochonna had been written, or not, seems to be a matter unknown; however, he is celebrated in different Irish Martyrologies. Thus, on the 8th of March, an entry appears in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>15</sup> about Moconna Essa-mac-Neirc. Marianus O'Gorman, also, enters Mochonna, son of Erc, while Maguire repeats the words, found in the Tallagh Martyrology, at this particular date. Again, this holy man has been entered, in the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>16</sup> as having a festival assigned to him, on this day. It may be questioned, if he, or the other saint, similarly named, and whose festival comes to be noticed, next in order, be different from the St. Conan, or Connanus, Bishop, about whom we have treated, in a preceding Article.

ARTICLE XV.—ST. MOCHONNA, OR DACHONNA, OF DAIRE, OR DERRY. According to Marianus O'Gorman, two saints—Conna denominated—were venerated on this day. The foregoing, son of Erc, he distinguishes from Mochonna, of Doria, or Derry. The time and place of this latter saint are involved in very great obscurity. This uncertainty, Colgan,<sup>1</sup> who has given some notices of this saint, at the present day, acknowledges. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> do not undertake to remove the doubts raised regarding him. There is a notice of a certain Conedus, a Bishop, by Jocelyn;<sup>3</sup> but, it seems difficult to identify him, with any of the saints, noted in our Calendars; and, probably, he was distinct from the present Conna or Mochonn. We learn, that in Scotia, Conan, a bishop, and Chronan, a monk, were venerated, according to Dempster's "Menologium Scoticum," at the 8th of March.<sup>4</sup> Now, Colgan thinks, the present holy man, whom he calls Mochonn and Dachonna, to have been Bishop of Derry, a well-known city in the north of Ireland, and the See of a bishop, from a remote period. Here, it is supposed, he assisted, at that Synod,<sup>5</sup> convoked by St. Flann,<sup>6</sup> the Primate of Ireland, and by St. Adamnan,<sup>7</sup> who is called Archimandrite. Colgan possessed the Acts of this Synod. But, the learned compilers of the "Memoir of the City and North-Western

<sup>10</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>11</sup> The parish of Boyle, which also gives name to a barony so called is on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 1, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10. The town itself is on Sheet 6.

<sup>12</sup> St. Patrick is said to have predicted the establishment of this foundation by St. Columba. See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. ci.

<sup>13</sup> See, Isaac Weld's "Statistical Survey of the County Roscommon," pp. 237, 238.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba." Appendix. Additional notes, G. 16, pp. 281, 282.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," viii. Martii. De S. Mochonn, qui et Dachonna Antistite Dorensi, pp. 565, 566.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 749.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xci., and n. 102, p. 113.

<sup>4</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>5</sup> Convoked A.D. 695.

<sup>6</sup> He was called, also, Flann-Febla, and he presided as Archbishop of Armagh for twenty-seven years, having died April 24th, A.D. 715. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 40.

Liberties of Londonderry"<sup>8</sup> do not consider the very distinguished man, Mochonna or Dachonna, Abbot of Derry, who subscribed to the Acts of that Synod, held by Flann, Archbishop of Armagh, and by St. Adamnan, to have been connected with the modern Londonderry.<sup>9</sup> He was rather abbot, and he is said to have been founder of a house, called after him.<sup>10</sup> In the genealogies of the Irish Saints, found in the Book of Lecan, he is styled Patron of Derry—which appellation is only applied to the builder of a religious house. Yet, it is certain, he was not founder of the monastery, at Derry-Columkille, which was also called Derry-Calgach, for some centuries after the time, in which St. Mochonna flourished. The Annals of Ulster, and of the Four Masters, at the years 704 and 705, record the death of this Mochonna, or Dachonna, Abbot of Derry.<sup>11</sup> We find the name, Moconna Daire, entered, at the 8th of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>12</sup> Marianus O'Gorman and Maguire have similar notices, at the same date, as also at the 13th of May; Colgan intimating, that this festival may not have reference to a different saint. Again, on this day, was venerated Mochonna, of Daire, as we read in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>13</sup> There are various places in Ireland compounded with the word Daire, meaning "an oak wood," so that we are left, at a loss, in not being able to discover this saint's locality.

ARTICLE XVI.—ST. DERCHAIRTHINN, PERHAPS OF OUGHTERARD, COUNTY OF KILDARE. When this holy woman flourished has not transpired; Round Tower and Church of Oughterard, County of Kildare.

but, we read this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> regarding Derchairthinn, of Uachtar-aird, as having a festival celebrated in her honour. She <sup>7</sup> See his Life, at the 23rd of September.

<sup>8</sup> See Part ii., sect. 2, p. 27.

<sup>9</sup> Colgan, Dr. O'Connor, Dr. Lanigan, with other eminent ecclesiastical antiquaries, were led to the erroneous conclusion, that Mochonna was Abbot of Derry-Columkille. See Ibid.

<sup>10</sup> It was known as Doirne moconna or "Derry of Mochonna," as also, Doirne

Doirne Daconna, or "Derry-disirt of Dachonna."

<sup>11</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 306, 307, and n. (z).

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves; pp. 70, 71.

descended from the race of Colla Uais, who was Monarch of Erin. The ancient name of her place has been Anglicized, into Oughterdard. There is a hill, bearing such a name, in the barony of South Salt, in the county of Kildare. A parish is called from the height.<sup>2</sup> On its summit are the ruins of a Round Tower, and of an ancient church.<sup>3</sup> The doorway is formed by a circular arch, 10 feet from the ground; and, 10 feet higher, on the south side, is a window of the same shape and dimensions.<sup>4</sup> Here, too, are the ruins of a small church, rebuilt, in 1609, on the site of a very ancient chantry.<sup>5</sup> Under the west end is an old crypt.<sup>6</sup> Besides this, there is a celebrated place, called Oughterdard,<sup>7</sup> in the county of Galway, and said to have been famous in ancient times. Many antiquities are there shown;<sup>8</sup> but, it is not deemed to have been that place, connected with the present saint.

ARTICLE XVII.—ST. SIADHAL UA COMMALIN, ABBOT OF KINLOUGH, COUNTY OF LEITRIM. [Eighth Century.] Notices of this holy man will be found, as given by Colgan<sup>1</sup> and by the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> He seems to have been born early in the eighth century. On the 8th of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>3</sup> mentions the name of Siadail, Chinnlocha. The Anglicised form of this name is Kinlough, which means "Head of the Lake," and it is common enough in Ireland. Siadhal, of Ceann-lacha, is recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> as having been venerated, at this date. In the table appended, a commentator adds, that in his opinion, this saint was Siadhul, son of Tinne, and of whom an account is contained, probably, in the Penitentiary of Melruain.<sup>5</sup> At the entry of this saint's death, in the "Annals of the Four Masters,"<sup>6</sup> at A.D. 974, he is called St. Sidhal Ua Commalin, and he is designated Abbot of Ceann-lacha, or Kinlough. This is considered, by Dr. O'Donovan,<sup>7</sup> as possibly identifiable with Kinlough,<sup>8</sup> at the north-western extremity of Lough Melvin, in the parish of Rossinver, in ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>2</sup> It is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheets 14, 15, 19, 20. The townland proper is on Sheet 15.

<sup>3</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (o), p. 946.

<sup>4</sup> The accompanying illustration is from a sketch of William F. Wakeman, drawn on the spot, and transferred to the wood. The engraving is by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>5</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. ii., pp. 451, 452.

<sup>6</sup> In it, the Ponsonbys of Bishop's Court are interred.

<sup>7</sup> In the parish of Kilcummin, and barony of Moycullen. It is defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheet 54. Kilcummin is one of the largest parishes in Ireland, to be found, with its islands and detached portions, on Sheets 27, 38, 39, 40, 41, 52, 53, 54, 55, 65, 66, 67, 68, 77, 78, 79, 89, 90, 91.

<sup>8</sup> See a description in Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland: Its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. iii., pp. 466, 467.

ARTICLE XVII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii. Februarii. De S. Sedulio

Episcopo Dubliniensi, p. 315, and n. 5. Ibid.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>5</sup> Commenting on this passage, Dr. Reeves says: "The word pennatorum is an Irish form of penitorium, for the Latin, penitentiarius; and the letters mp. R. in the copy should probably be ml. R., a contraction of the proper name mael-Ruain. Colgan, in one of his notes on St. Sedulius of Dublin, seems to refer to the name in question, when he says:—"In penitentiario S. Malruani fit mentio S. Sedulii filii Thesdæ [Thennæ?] de Lismoria in Momonia."—Actt. SS., p. 315 b, n. 8. See, ibid., pp. 468, 469, n. 2.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 402, 403.

<sup>7</sup> See n. (a). Ibid.

<sup>8</sup> This town and townland will be found on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Leitrim," Sheet 2.

<sup>9</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheets 122, 123.

the barony of Rosclogher, and county of Leitrim. There is another Kinlough,<sup>9</sup> in the parish of Shrule, in the barony of Kilmaine, and county of Mayo.

ARTICLE XVIII.—ST. BEOADH, OR BEATUS, BISHOP OF ARDCARNE, COUNTY OF ROSCOMMON. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] It has been thought, by Colgan, who inserts an account of him, at the 8th of March,<sup>1</sup> that the Acts of this saint were extant in the seventeenth century. The Bollandists only supply a passing notice of him.<sup>2</sup> The father of this holy man was Olcan, the son of Coman, son to Tren, son of Mathenn, son to Eochad, son of Conall, son to Tren, son of Duach, son to Macneid, son of Macon, i.e., Lugad, son to Macneid.<sup>3</sup> Thus, was he descended from the noble race of Lughaidh, son of Ith, through a long line of ancestors. Our saint was born in the fifth century, and his first name is said to have been Aedh or Aidus, to which the prefix Bo was added, on account of the greatness of his virtues.<sup>4</sup> Hence, the name became resolved into Beoadh, which is found Latinized, Beoadus, or Beatus, but incorrectly Beda. He is thought to have flourished, towards the close of the fifth age.<sup>5</sup> In the Acts of St. Patrick,<sup>6</sup> there is a St. Bean classed among the disciples of Ireland's great Apostle.<sup>7</sup> A St. Beatus had been set as bishop over the church of Dun-crathen, by the Irish Apostle, when in the territory of Kiennact, in the north of Ireland; but, although there be an accordance of time, office, and name, he is not supposed to be identical with the present holy patron. Rather was our saint consecrated Bishop of Ard-Charna, in the plain of Mag-Luirc, and in the province of Connaught. The name of Ardcarne townland and parish,<sup>8</sup> situated in the barony of Boyle, and county of Roscommon, is derived from an ancient cairn, situated on a hill, near the church. Here once stood a considerable village, or town, vestiges of which are yet traceable, in a considerable extent of walls, now sodded over; a very ancient road marks one of its former approaches.<sup>9</sup> This place was formerly the seat of the rural Bishop of Ardcarne,<sup>10</sup> and some most lovely views are presented, especially along the banks of the River Boyle. Here St. Beoadh was distinguished for his virtues, during life, and for his miracles before and after death. Thence, too, the Ceolan-Beoaidh, or "Bell of St. Beoaidh," kept in a singularly beautiful cover of silver, and adorned with gems, passed to Baile na cclereach, in the territory of Breffny, where it was held in the greatest veneration, in Colgan's time; and, regarded as a relique, many miracles, wrought through it, were ascribed to the heavenly merits of St.

ARTICLE XVIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. De S. Beoado sive Beato Episcopo et Confessore, pp. 562, 563.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 748.

<sup>3</sup> Such is the pedigree, as given in the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. xxxviii., more exactly than it is found in the Calendar of Cashel. Lugad, surnamed Maccon, son to Macneid, and by some called Monarch over Ireland, was killed A.D. 225, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 110, 111.

<sup>4</sup> Thus Bo-Aedh is rendered "vivid" or "vigorous Aedh."

<sup>5</sup> Selbach treats about him in the attributed work "De Genealogia Sanctorum Hiberniæ," and in the Life of St. Callin—whose contemporary he was—a notice also occurs.

<sup>6</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, p. 156, and n. 62, p. 186.

<sup>7</sup> See ibid. Appendix Quinta ad Acta S. Patricii, p. 267.

<sup>8</sup> The parish is delineated on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 3, 4, 6, 7, 10. The townland proper is on Sheet 6.

<sup>9</sup> A very interesting account of this parish, with three exquisite engravings, including the church and Oak-port house, will be found in John D'Alton's "History of Ireland and Annals of Boyle," vol. i., pp. 93 to 116.

<sup>10</sup> Before the beginning of the present century, a great market for wool was held here. See ibid., p. 95.

Beoadh. In addition to the episcopal office, he is thought to have ruled over a monastery there, and he exercised generous hospitality towards all strangers and pilgrims. Cuimin, of Coindeire, in the poem which begins with, "Patrick of great Macha loved," states, that Beoadh was accustomed to give lodging<sup>11</sup> and gifts to every person. It is thus he says:—

"Beoadh, the affectionate loved,
Before all the saints of Erin,
House of guests and presents,
He gave to each person."<sup>12</sup>

In the "Chronicon Scotorum,"<sup>13</sup> the decease of Beoid, Bishop of Ardcarna, is entered at A.D. 518. Although, in the records of his own church, and in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>14</sup> the name of Beoadh, of Airdcarna, occurs at the 7th of March, as we have seen on the day previous, the entry, however, seems more properly referable to the present date, as all other authorities appear to state. The "Annals of the Four Masters"<sup>15</sup> place the death of this holy man, at the 8th of March, A.D. 523. St. Ængus, Marianus O'Gorman, with his Scholiast, Maguire, as also the Calendar of Cashel, and the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>16</sup> mention, that on this day was venerated, Beoadh, Bishop, of Ardcarna, in Connaught. Confirming the foregoing particulars, Duald Mac Firbis interprets his name, in Latin, as Aedus vivus.<sup>17</sup> Little more seems to be known regarding him, although he seems to have been very distinguished, at the time when he flourished.

ARTICLE XIX.—ST. CORCARIA, CORCAIR, CURCACH, OR CUCAGIA, OR QUORRAIR, SAID, TO BE OF CLUAIN-LOTHUIR, OR OF KILL-CORCAIGE. [Thought to have been of the Sixth Century.] The devout nun is toiling constantly with energy and with fruit, towards perpetuating in the Church, to which she is so closely bound, an abiding attachment to the memory and the virtues of those who have preceded her, in the luminous course through which she is bound to walk, on the road to salvation. Some difficulty exists, in determining the identity of this holy woman. Colgan has collected some unsatisfactory notices regarding her, at this date.<sup>1</sup> He supposes, that the sister, Quorair, of St. Frigidian,<sup>2</sup> Bishop of Lucca, who is thought, in mistake, to have been identical with St. Finnian, Abbot of Maghbile,<sup>3</sup> should more correctly be called Corcair or Curcach, or as Latinized, Corcaria or Cucagia. Yet, this theory is brought into doubt by the Bollandists, at this day.<sup>4</sup> Failing identification with the Quorair—thought to have been a transcriber's mistake for Corcair or Curcah—we can only pass over what Colgan has written, and note what is found in our Calendars. Now, Colgan supposes, in one place,<sup>5</sup> she <sup>12</sup> "Colgan understands this to signify, that he entertained all the saints of Ireland, with hospitality and gifts. But, the original does not bear this out." So Dr. O'Donovan asserts, in a note, which he has added to the published Martyrology.

<sup>11</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says at this word lodging, "Lit., 'Stranger's House.'"

<sup>13</sup> See William Maunsell Hennessy's Edition, pp. 40, 41, and nn. 2, 3, ibid.

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

<sup>15</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 170, 171.

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71. In the table, postfixed to this Martyrology, immediately after his name and place, appears the following comment, within brackets, and seemingly referring to him: "[Beatus; See Molanus 31 Oct. on the translation of Notburga to Mount St. Beatus, near Coblenz.]" Ibid, pp. 364, 365.

<sup>17</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy." Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 86, 87, and nn. 12, 13, 14.

ARTICLE XIX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. De S. Corcaria sive Cucagia, Virg., pp. 563, 564.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 18th of November.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 10th of September.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 748.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Februarii, n. 32, p. 339.

may have been the Corcaria<sup>6</sup> Caoin, who assisted at the great Council of Dromceat, A.D. 580; and, in another passage, that she may have flourished under the name of Crocha, in the time of St. Patrick.<sup>7</sup> These, however, are only very crude conjectures. In the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>8</sup> is entered a virgin, under the title of Corcach Cluana Lothair, at the 8th of March. Marianus O'Gorman, and Cathal Maguire have also their several notices of Corcagia. Marianus O'Gorman and the O'Clerys think, however, that a holy woman of this name, venerated at the 8th of August, was connected with Cluain Lothair. Colgan supposes this place to be identical with Doire Lothair,<sup>9</sup> which was in the territory of Lea,<sup>10</sup> in Ultonia—thought to be the country of this virgin. He also imagines, she had a double,<sup>11</sup> or even perchance, a third,<sup>12</sup> festival day. We are told, there was a Cluain Lothair, in Breifne O'Ruairc, of which a St. Curcach, Virgin, is Patroness. Again, he thinks, this present saint may be identical with the virgin Curcach, of Cill-Curcaghe. In the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>13</sup> Curcach<sup>14</sup> is mentioned, as having veneration paid to her, at this date. There is a Curcach, says the writer, and she was daughter to Enna, son to Corbmac, descended from the race of Colla-dá-chríoch. This, however, is only a passing and an inconclusive conjecture, concerning her pedigree. It may safely be asserted, that very little is known, with any degree of certainty, regarding this virgin.

ARTICLE XX.—ST. COLMANN CIRRH, OR KEARR. According to the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> who quote Colgan's statement, in an Index, the present holy man was a disciple of St. Endeus, although, the reference does not indicate how or where the fact may be capable of demonstration. Again, we find inserted, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> at the 8th of March, the name of Colman Cirrh.

ARTICLE XXI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A MAC COLAIM CHIRR. We read in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> that Mac Colaim chirr had veneration paid him, at the 8th of March. Elsewhere, we do not find any corroboration of this statement, and we suspect some error of insertion.

ARTICLE XXII.—ST. MOLAISSÉ, SON OF AEDH. We find Molasi mac Aedha set down, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 8th of March. And

<sup>6</sup> This being a supposed mistake for Corcagia.

<sup>7</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. lii., p. 136, and nn. 111, 112, p. 178.

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>9</sup> This place is noticed, at A.D. 557, as Moin-Doire-lothair, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 198, 199, and nn. (c, d, e). The Rev. Dr. Reeves thinks, that this site of the battle of Moin-Mor, as it is called in Adamnan, may be found in the town of Moneymore, and the parish in which it is situated Derryloran, county of Londonderry. See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix GG. n. (d), p. 339. This may admit of doubt, however, as the former is called in Irish Muine-mor, "the great hill," or "Shrubbery," and the latter Doire-Lorain, "Loran's oak wood."

<sup>10</sup> Said to have been that of Fir-Lii, or Magh-Lii, in the barony of Coleraine, county of Londonderry.

<sup>11</sup> That is, one on the 8th of March, and another on the 8th of August.

<sup>12</sup> At the 21st of July, when a St. Curcach, of Cill-Curcaghe, Virgin, is venerated.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>14</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd states, "The more recent hand adds, 'Cluana Lothair, M. Taml,' meaning that the Mart. Taml. says, that she was of Cluan Lothair."

ARTICLE XX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

ARTICLE XXI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

ARTICLE XXII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xvii.

again, Molaisse, son of Aedh, occurs in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> as having a festival at this date. The Bollandists merely notice him.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE XXIII.—ST. MOCHUA, SON OF NEMAIN. The Bollandists have a reference to this saint, and to his feast, at the present date.<sup>1</sup> According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> we find that Mochua, as simply so named, was venerated on this day. The name of his father is added in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> which registers the name, Mochua mac Nemain, at the 8th of March. More we cannot find concerning him.

Ninth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SEDNA, OF KILL-AINE.

[SIXTH OR SEVENTH CENTURY.]

AS the grandest and noblest scenes of nature are usually found, in the most remote and desert places; so, the most virtuous and revered men have generally chosen to dwell apart, in solitude. Their Acts have become obscure, while their virtues were acknowledged. In Colgan, we find some brief notices of this holy man,<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists note him, at the 9th of March.<sup>2</sup> St. Sedna, otherwise Sidonius, was son to Neman, son to Aidus, son to Lorn, son of Erc, son to Eochad Munremhuir, son of Ængus Fir, son to Fergus Vallaigh, son to Eochad Fortamhuil.<sup>3</sup> Lorn, who is mentioned in the foregoing pedigree, with his brother, Fergusius, went over to Britain, about the year 503.<sup>4</sup> Here, they established the Dalaradian Colony, in the Kingdom of Scotland. Little is recorded, regarding this saint, but the circumstance of his Natalis being observed, on the 9th day of March, at Kill-Aine, near Mount Breagh. By the Rev. Anthony Cogan,<sup>5</sup> it is identified with Killaine or Killany, in the county of Louth, and the same identification is given, in the Antiquarian Letters for the same county, as contained among the Irish Ordnance Survey Records.<sup>6</sup> Archdall incorrectly places this monastery, at Killeen,<sup>7</sup> in the county of Meath.<sup>8</sup> However, the Rev. Dr. Reeves will have it, that the place of this saint is now known as Killaney,<sup>9</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

ARTICLE XXIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Martii viii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 749.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 70, 71.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," ix. Martii. De S. Sedna sive Sedonio Abbate de Kill-Aine, p. 565.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Such is the pedigree, furnished by the

"Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. xviii. The O'Clerys, in their Calendar, remark, that he sprung from the race of Conaire, son of Moghlamha.

<sup>4</sup> See, O'Flaherty's "Ogygia." Scotiæ Regum Catalogus Chronologico-Genealogicus, p. 470.

<sup>5</sup> See "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiii., p. 548.

<sup>6</sup> In the Royal Irish Academy, vol. i., p. 252.

<sup>7</sup> See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 550.

<sup>8</sup> Here, too, he states, that a monastery had been erected by St. Endeus, in the sixth century.

<sup>9</sup> It is called in the Inquisitions, Killenny, alias Anaghalone, or Anaghdoloun. At the dissolution, the rectory, which extended and its ancient graveyard, enclosed by a ring fence, but without traces of any former building in it, lies in the southern extremity of the parish.<sup>10</sup> It is a little south-east of Lough Henny, locally called Loughinney. The insertion, Setna of Cille ane, of Sliabh Breagh, is entered in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>11</sup> in that of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Maguire, as also in the Calendar of Cashel, at the 9th of March. The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>12</sup> mentions, as having a festival, at this date, Sedna, of Cill-Aine, in Sliabh Breagh. The year of his death is not known, nor even the exact age in which he flourished; but as Loarn,<sup>13</sup> who died A.D. 513, according to O'Flaherty's computation,<sup>14</sup> was great grandfather to our saint, it might be a fair conjecture, that Sedna lived, towards the close of the sixth, and at the commencement of the seventh century.

ARTICLE II.—ST. SETNA, SIDONIUS, OR SEDNA, OF DRUIM-MAC-UBLA, COUNTY OF MEATH. [Fifth or Sixth Century.] In Colgan's<sup>1</sup> and in the Bollandists'<sup>2</sup> work, there is an account of St. Sedna or Sedonius, at the 9th of March. Sedna or Setna is the Irish form: Sedonius or Sidonius is the Latin for his name. Thus, Setna of Droma mic Blae, appears in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> at the 9th of March. He flourished, as early as the fifth century. His father was named Dullan, or Dallan.<sup>4</sup> Colgan ascribes his period subsequently to that time, when St. Patrick<sup>5</sup> had founded the Church of Armagh, supposed to have been 445, according to Ussher,<sup>6</sup> or 457, as stated in the "Annals of the Four Masters."<sup>7</sup> The place over which our saint exercised a pastoral charge was Druim Mac Ubla, and it was surrounded by a desert. It is said to have been situated, not far from Kill-aine, with which the former St. Sedna had been connected.<sup>8</sup> We find Sédna, of Druim-mac-Ublai, or Ua-Bla, entered in the Martyrologies of Cashel, of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire, and of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> as being venerated on this day. The present saint lived, in his earlier years, as we are told, on the confines of Meath and of Ulster, in the territory of Uí Creamhthainn, or Uí Criomhthainn. The church in which his memory was venerated must have been situated, within the baronies of Upper or Lower Slane,<sup>10</sup> in the northern part of Meath county; but, there is no church, bearing such a name, to be found, at present, within these baronies. However, a church here existed in 830, when our Annals relate, over seven townlands, became appropriate to the Abbey of Moville.

<sup>10</sup> See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix M., p. 217. See also Calendar LL., p. 377.

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>13</sup> For confirmation of the statement, relating to this family alliance, we are referred to the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. xviii., where there is an account of St. Sedna, with his brother, St. Berchan, and of his sisters, Saints Brigid, Gorba, Lassara, and Lemanía, and about sixteen other saints, his relations. The writer brings their pedigrees, link by link, to Erc, the son of Eochad, from whom the kings of Albanian Scotia are descended.

<sup>14</sup> See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia." Scotiæ Regum Catalogus Chronologo-Generalogicus, p. 470.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ix. De S. Sedna sive Sedonio Abbate de Druim-Mac-Vbla, p. 565.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Vita Tripartita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lxxxv., p. 165, and nn. 110, 111, p. 188.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>6</sup> See Index Chronologicus, "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 518.

<sup>7</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 142, 143.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii ix. De S. Sedna sive Sedonio Abbate de Kill-aine, p. 565.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73. In the table appended, his name Latinized, Sidonius. See ibid., pp. 468 469.

that Drui-mic-h-Ua-Blae, with other churches, had been burned by the foreigners.<sup>11</sup> Colgan has a romantic story, regarding this place, with mention of the present saint, at the 9th day of March. St. Sedna is said to have been abbot here, in 558.<sup>12</sup> To a saint of this name is ascribed the gift of prophecy.<sup>13</sup>

ARTICLE III.—ST. LUGHAIDH, OF CILL-CUILE, OR KILCOOLE, PROBABLY IN THE COUNTY OF WICKLOW. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> barely notice St. Lugidius or Lugadius of Kill-cuile, at the 9th of March, according to the Irish Calendars. There is a Latin "Vita S. Lugidi," among the Manuscripts of the Burgundian Library, Bruxelles;<sup>2</sup> but, without an opportunity for examination, we cannot pronounce it, as having reference to this holy man. The Martyrology of Tal-lagh<sup>3</sup> records an almost similar entry, at the same date. There is a place, Kilcoole Old Church, County of Wicklow.

mentioned in the Irish Annals, as Cill-Cuile-Dumha, i.e., the Church of the Angle of the Mound. In the opinion of that learned topographer, Dr. O'Donovan, this is probably the present Kilcoole,<sup>4</sup> near Newtown-Mount-kennedy,<sup>5</sup> in the barony of Newcastle, and county of Wicklow.<sup>6</sup> Here

<sup>10</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," p. 152, n. (f).

<sup>11</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 444, 445, and n. (f). Ibid.

<sup>12</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiii., p. 548.

<sup>13</sup> The xv. vol. of O'Longan MSS., in the R.L.A., contains St. Sedna's Prophecy, delivered to St. Columkille, 80 verses, p. 172.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>2</sup> It is classed, vol. xxii. At fol. 94.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>4</sup> This parish is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 8, 12, 13. The town and townland are on Sheet 13.

<sup>5</sup> This town and townland, in the parish of Upper Newcastle, and barony of Newcastle, is to be found also on Sheet 13.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (l), pp. 397, 398.

there is to be found an ancient church. It consists of a choir and nave: the former is 15 feet 9 inches in length, by 9 feet 3 inches in width, while the latter is 57 feet long, by 16 feet 10 inches wide.<sup>7</sup> A beautiful choir-arch unites them, and over that stood a belfry. A stone roof covered the choir. The interior of this building is enclosed, and it is kept for the interment of favoured families. The graveyard without is much used for burials. The ruined walls are covered with ivy. The church—at least in parts—is evidently an ancient structure. But, whether or not, it must be connected with the present saint and his locality, as recorded on this day, admits of question, and the writer will not undertake to determine.<sup>8</sup> It is recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> that on this day was celebrated a festival, to honour Lughaidh, of Cill-cuile.

ARTICLE IV.—FESTIVAL OF ST. MELLA, SAID TO HAVE BEEN ABBESS OF DOIRE MELLE. Some of our Martyrologies commemorate St. Mella, at the 9th of March. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> there is barely mention of her name, at this date, and the Bollandists also record her.<sup>2</sup> Notices regarding St. Mella will be seen, at the 31st of this month.

ARTICLE V.—ST. BRIGID, DAUGHTER OF DOMA, IN THE PLAIN OF THE LIFFY. The Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Donegal, as we are told, place the festival of a St. Brigid, daughter to Doma, in the plain of the Liffy, at this day. But Colgan, who seems to consider the present saint, as identical with St. Brigid, daughter to Doma, already mentioned at the 7th of February, says, that all other authorities place the Natalis of Brigid, daughter to Doma, at this latter date.<sup>2</sup> We do not find the name or place of this holy woman recorded, in the published Calendar of the O'Clerys. Her name, without further notice, is simply given, and that a festival, in honour of a Bright, was celebrated on this day, is all we read, in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists<sup>4</sup> notice Brigid, daughter of Doma, in the plain of the Liffy, at the 9th of March, following the authority of Colgan. By the latter, she is classed among the saints, veiled by St. Patrick;<sup>5</sup> however, this statement rests on no very substantial grounds. Colgan thinks her to be identical, with that St. Briga, who is mentioned in St. Ultan's Acts of the illustrious Abbess of Kildare.<sup>6</sup> This is also uncertain. Another conjecture of Colgan makes this saint, possibly identical with St. Brigid, daughter to Neman, son of Aid, son to Loarn, son of Erc, son to Eochad, surnamed Muinreamhuir, Prince of Dalaradia. It is thought, she <sup>7</sup> These measurements the writer had an opportunity for taking, in March, 1878; while, his sketch of the church here represented was drawn, on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>8</sup> A local resident told the writer, how he had heard from a gentleman—a very questionable authority, however—that the church had been built by St. Cool Kevin, brother to St. Kevin of Glendalough.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Rev. Dr. Kelly's edition, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> The "Martyrology of Tallagh" calls her, Brigit inghen Doma i Maighlipi. See Dr. Kelly's "Calendar of Irish Saints," at 9th of March, or vii. Ibid., p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> See, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Appendix Quarta ad Acta S. Brigidæ, cap. i., p. 612.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 270.

<sup>6</sup> See ibid. Tertia Vita S. Brigidæ, cap. xxx. and note 18, pp. 530, 543.

may have been venerated at Abernethy, in Scotland.<sup>7</sup> John Major probably confounded this latter St. Brigid, with the great Patroness of Ireland.<sup>8</sup> The reader is referred to certain remarks, already made, in reference to a St. Brigid, called daughter of Doma or Droma, as set down, at the 7th of February,<sup>9</sup> which is the day assigned for her festival, in some of our Irish Calendars. Besides, as Colgan has another conjecture, about the St. Briga, venerated on the 9th of March, having been a contemporary with the great St. Brigid, Abbess of Kildare, it may be as well to consult, what has been recorded, in the notices already written, referring to St. Briga, or Brigid, of Kilbride, in the diocese of Lismore, county of Waterford, and of Kilbride, or Brideschurch, county of Kildare.<sup>10</sup> Thus, it may be inferred, how uncertain is our information regarding her.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. BRIGID, OF MONA MILAIN. A saint, named Brigit, Mona Milain, occurs in the Martyrology of Tallagh, as distinguished from another St. Brigid, whose festival is set down, at the same day, the 9th of March.<sup>1</sup> We are informed, likewise, that the Martyrologies of Donegal and of Marianus O'Gorman make a like distinction, at this same day. They record, that our present saint was venerated, at a place called Moin Miolain. There seems to be little consistency, in Colgan's statements; when, in one place, he notes her, as the daughter of Neman, and at another, as mentioned by Keating, the Brigid, daughter to Aidus, son of Eochad, son to Colle, son to Cælbád, King of Ireland.<sup>2</sup> Colgan says, Moin-Miolain is to be found, in Dalaradia, where the posterity of Cælbadius, a supposed progenitor to this saint, had extensive sway.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists have notices of Brigida de Moimiolain, at the 9th of March.<sup>4</sup> The researchful Dr. Reeves seems to have forgotten this saint, when compiling his Calendar, appended to the "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." If Colgan's conjecture be correct, her place lay within that scope of territory, described in Dr. Reeves' learned work. Bright, of Moin Mioláin, is thus entered, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> as having veneration paid her, at this date. It has been conjectured, that the present saint may have been that holy virgin, called Brigh, and mother of the handmaids of Christ, mentioned in the Acts of her great namesake, St. Brigid of Kildare.<sup>6</sup> However, her history is involved, in great obscurity.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. COLMAN, OR COLMUS, OR COLMOC, BISHOP OF THE ORKNEY ISLANDS, SCOTLAND. According to Camerarius—who refers us to the Scottish Annals—a holy Bishop Colman<sup>1</sup> or Colmus was venerated, on the 9th of March. There is a St. Com, in the Litany of Dunkeld.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists have a passing allusion to this saint, at the present date;<sup>3</sup> how-

<sup>7</sup> See what has been already stated, in reference to this matter, in the Second Volume of the "Lives of the Irish Saints," when treating about St. Brigid, Virgin, First Abbess of Kildare, at the 1st of February, Article i., chap. ii., and n. 58.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's remarks, in his "Trias Thaumaturga." Appendix Quarta ad Acta S. Brigide, cap. iv., p. 617.

<sup>9</sup> See our "Lives of the Irish Saints," vol. ii., Seventh day of February, Article viii.

<sup>10</sup> See ibid., vol. i., Twenty-first day of January, Article ii.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See, Dr. Kelly's "Calendar of Irish Saints," p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> For this pedigree, he cites the "Meno-logic Genealogy," chap. xxiii.

<sup>3</sup> See, "Trias Thaumaturga." Appendix Quarta ad Acta S. Brigide, cap. i., pp. 611, 612, 613.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>6</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Tertia Vita S. Brigide, n. 18, p. 543.

ever, they preferred relegating his notices, to the 6th of June,<sup>4</sup> the day set apart, by Dempster, for his festival.<sup>5</sup> He is said to have flourished, A.D. 1010.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. MACCILDUS, BISHOP IN THE ISLE OF MAN. [Fifth Century.] The facts, relating to the life of St. Maccaldus, Bishop of Man, Colgan promised to produce in his Acts of that saint, with their accompanying notes, at the 9th of March. But, in turning to that day, in his “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” we do not find such a promise redeemed. Yet, elsewhere, in this same work, it is strange, after his distinction drawn between Macalleus and Maccaldus, in the “Trias Thaumaturga,” Colgan confounds both persons, when stating that the latter was commemorated by the Irish Martyrologists, on the 25th of April, where the Acts of St. Maccaldus are again promised.<sup>1</sup> We are told, that having returned to Ulster, St. Patrick<sup>2</sup> converted a wicked robber, named Machaldus.<sup>3</sup> He was bound in chains, and banished into the Isle of Man, that he might become a penitent, under the care of Romulus,<sup>4</sup> and of Conindrius or Conidrius,<sup>5</sup> disciples of St. Patrick. It is added, that these had been deputed to exercise the episcopacy, in Man, by St. Germanus;<sup>6</sup> and that, Maccaldus succeeded them, after a long course of penance, having performed many miracles there before his death. These matters are still more diffusely treated, by the very old writer of St. Patrick’s Tripartite Life.<sup>7</sup> We prefer treating more at length, regarding him, at the 25th of April.

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. CARECHA, DERGAMENSIS, OF CLONBURREN, PARISH OF MOORE, AND COUNTY OF ROSCOMMON. [Sixth Century.] This saint is said to have been daughter to Conall the Red, and a sister to St. Ændeus<sup>1</sup> of Aran, to St. Lochina,<sup>2</sup> to St. Darenia<sup>3</sup> and to St. Fanchea.<sup>4</sup> Her remains were deposited at Cloonburren, in the territory of Imania, near the Shannon’s banks. Such a statement is found in the Calendar of Cashel.<sup>5</sup> It is stated, that the Martyrologies of Tallagh, and of Marianus O’Gorman, as also St. Ængus’ Commentator, on this day, have her Natalis observed, at Cluain boiren church.<sup>6</sup> This, however, is one of Col-

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> He says, “de eo Consule Annales Scoticos,” p. 113.

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 305.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>4</sup> See, likewise, our notices, at the same day.

<sup>5</sup> See “Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum,” tomus i., lib. iii., num. 267, p. 159.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xiii. Januarii. De S. Connano Episcop. Manniæ, nn. 5, 7, p. 60.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan’s “Trias Thaumaturga,” Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clii., pp. 98, 99, and nn. 103, 156, pp. 113, 115.

<sup>4</sup> His festival is referred, to the 18th of November.

<sup>5</sup> His feast is placed, at the 17th of November. See ibid. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, nn. 63, 64.

<sup>6</sup> His feast was held, on the 3rd of July, or according to another account, on the 30th of the same month.

<sup>7</sup> See ibid. Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. lx., lxi., pp. 160, 161.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of March.

<sup>2</sup> She is venerated, at the 12th of June.

<sup>3</sup> Supposed to be venerated, as Moninna, at the 6th of July.

<sup>4</sup> See her Life, at the 1st of January.

<sup>5</sup> The Calendar of Cashel has these words: “Hac die S. Carecha Dergamensis filia Conalli Deirg filii Damenii, filii Carbrei Damhairgid, qui separavit lacum Erne a Connacia & Dubhthor a Lagenia, & expulit Ulidios (ultra?) Gleamaighe ad orientem. Et hæc sunt tria heroica ejus acta. Hujus ergo Conalli filia fuit S. Carecha Derganiensis & soror S. Endei Aranniensis, & ipsa quiescit in Cluainboireann in regione Imaniæ ad ripam fluminis Sinennii.”

<sup>6</sup> The reader is also referred to the Commentator on St. Ængus, at the 31st of July, and to St. Ængus the Culdee, in his treatise, gan's typographical errors; the 9th of March being set down, for the 9th of February, where notices of her are already given.

ARTICLE X.—ST. DIOMA, DIMA, OR DIMMA. The mere name, Dimmae, occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 9th of March. Marianus O'Gorman has Dima, at this date, as the Bollandists take care to observe.<sup>2</sup> In the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> at this day, we find simply recorded, Dioma. It is added, that there is a Dioma, a Bishop, and a son of Senach, descended from the race of Eochaidh Fionn-fuathairt, from which family Bright<sup>4</sup> derives her pedigree. He is said to have been venerated, either at this date, or at the 22nd of this same month.<sup>5</sup> Likewise, under the head of Teach-Dioma,<sup>6</sup> Duaid Mac Firis enters, Bishop Dioma, son of Senach, of the Fotharta, in Tech (or from Tech) Dioma.<sup>7</sup>

ARTICLE XI.—FESTIVAL OF THE FORTY MARTYRS OF SEBASTEN, LESSER ARMENIA. [Fourth Century.] At the 9th of March, as we learn from the "Feilire"<sup>1</sup> of St. Ængus, the Irish Church celebrated the festival of forty Martyrs. The Bollandists notice the festival of these Martyrs of Sebasten to have been so commemorated, until Pope Innocent X.<sup>2</sup> caused it to be transferred to the 10th of this month, in order to make way for the Officium Duplex of St. Francisca Romana, Widow, whose feast is now held, on the 9th of March.<sup>3</sup> A full account of those various Martyrs, with their names, and notices about the discovery of their relics, will be found, in their great work, on the day succeeding,<sup>4</sup> when they are commemorated, with an Office, in the Roman Breviary.<sup>5</sup>

ARTICLE XII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. SENANUS. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] The "Kalendarium Celticum," at the vii. Ides of March, corresponding with the 9th day, has F Seanain, or the Festival of Senanus.<sup>1</sup> He

"De Matribus Sanctorum Hiberniæ," n. 49. See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Januarii i., n. 7, p. 3.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>4</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says, at this proper name: "Meaning here Brigid of Kildare; who was of the race of Eochaidh Fionn-fuathairt."

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Appendix Quarta ad Acta S. Brigidæ, cap. iii., p. 613.

<sup>6</sup> This denomination appears, at present, to be obsolete.

<sup>7</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 128, 129.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> The following extract, from the Leabhar Breac copy, with its English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

e. iii. 10. bap. xl. mileo
Co mop plog ba p'pchu

Óia tuapcaib p'u hilechu
Srian illeac dub do'pcha.

Death of forty champions,
With a great host who had been righteous,
For whom a joyous sun had risen,
In a black dark place.

<sup>2</sup> He ruled from A.D. 1644 to 1655. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 210.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>4</sup> See ibid., Martii x., De Sanctis xl. Martyribus Sebastenis, &c. A previous commentary is given, in four sections; a compendium of their martyrdom, translated into Latin from the Armenian language; Acts in three chapters, other Acts in four chapters; the Oration of St. Basil, with an extract from Sozomen's History, pp. 12 to 29.

<sup>5</sup> See "Breviarium Romanum," Pars Verna. Die x. Martii. In Festo SS. Quadraginta Mart. Semiduplex.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes'

seems to have been no other, than St. Senan, Abbot of Scatterry Island, whose Life has been already recorded, at the previous day.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. TOSA, OR TOSSANUS, OF DROMA LAIDCINN, OR, OF DRUIM-LADHGEIN. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> record Tossanus de Druim-Ladhgein, at the 9th of March. It is possible, his place may be identified with Drumline, a parish in the barony of Lower Bunratty, county of Clare.<sup>2</sup> Or, it may have been Drumlayne, in the parish of Moybolgue, barony of Lower Kells, and county of Meath.<sup>3</sup> Again, there is a Drumlaydan in the parish of Templeport, barony of Tullyhaw, and county of Cavan.<sup>4</sup> According to the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>5</sup> veneration was given to Tosa, of Droma Laidcinn, at the 9th of March.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. COLMAN, OF CLUANA TIBRINN, OR CLONTIVRIN, COUNTY OF FERMANAGH. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> have a notice of Colmanus de Cluain Tibrinn, as recorded in the Irish Calendars, at this date. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> at the 9th of March, we find that a festival was celebrated, in honour of Colman, said to have been of Cluana Tibrinn. This place is now known as Clontivrin,<sup>3</sup> a townland in the parish of Clones, and in the barony of Clankelly, county of Fermanagh. It lies about one Irish mile west of Clones town.<sup>4</sup> The ruins of a church were to be seen here, until a little after the commencement of the present century, when they were removed by a farmer,<sup>5</sup> who tilled the spot. Unfortunately, he destroyed every material trace of the ancient edifice.<sup>6</sup>

ARTICLE XV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. KENNETH, KENZIE, OR CANICE. The Irish Canicus or Canice is a name that corresponds with the Scotch Kenneth or Kenzie. According to Dempster,<sup>1</sup> there was a holy Bishop Kenneth, venerated in Glentanir, at the 9th of March.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists<sup>3</sup> notice him, but state, that they attach no great degree of credit to Dempster's statements. In his History, we are unable to discover any special allusion to this Kenneth; although, others having the like name are there noticed.

ARTICLE XVI.—ST. SILLAN, SILLANUS, OR SYLVANUS. Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have allusion to a St. Sillenus, who is mentioned in an Irish Life

"Calendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 83, 444.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>2</sup> It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 51, 61. The townland proper is on Sheet 51.

<sup>3</sup> This place is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheet 5.

<sup>4</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cavan," Sheets 9, 13.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>3</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Fermanagh," Sheet 40.

<sup>4</sup> In the parish so called, barony of Dartry. It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Monaghan," Sheet 11.

<sup>5</sup> Named Stephenson.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (x), p. 342.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Menologium Scoticum."

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Calendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 194, 361.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Februarii. Supplementum

of St. Berach.<sup>3</sup> The former of those authorities supposes, that Sillenus must have been venerated, either at the present date, or on the 4th of May. He is thought, again, to have been identical with Sillanus or Sylvanus—called also Silnanus—a monk of Hy, and son of Neman.<sup>4</sup> A reference is made to him, in Adamnan's Life of St. Columba.<sup>5</sup> The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>6</sup> inserts the name Sillan, without any further epithet, at the 9th of March.

ARTICLE XVII.—ST. BOSA, BISHOP OF THE DEIRI, AT YORK, ENGLAND. [Seventh Century.] From the work of Venerable Bede,<sup>1</sup> we obtain the chief reliable accounts of this pious servant of God. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould<sup>3</sup> have given some notices of a distinguished and holy bishop, who is variously called, Bosa, Boza, Bossa or Bosco. It is very possible, he was an Irishman, by birth, although this is not found recorded; however, the received account, and circumstances of the time, render it not improbable. It is likely, he was born about or soon after the beginning of the seventh century. He may have received his early training, at Iona; or, perhaps, his early and later education was completed at Lindisfarne.<sup>4</sup> He, Eadhedus<sup>5</sup> and Eata<sup>6</sup> were ordained by Theodoric,<sup>7</sup> Archbishop of York.<sup>8</sup> It is said, Bosa had been a monk,<sup>9</sup> in the monastery of Streaneshælch.<sup>10</sup> He observed the rule of St. Columba,<sup>11</sup> and he seems to have acted as a priest, in connexion with the Convent of St. Hilda.<sup>12</sup> He lived there a contemporary, and he enjoyed the confidence and friendship of the renowned abbess. When Wilfrid,<sup>13</sup> Archbishop of York, had a difference with King Edfrid, and when he had been expelled from that See, A.D. 678,<sup>14</sup> two bishops were substituted for him, Eata to rule over the province of the Bernici, and Bosa to rule over that of the Deiri.<sup>15</sup> St. Bosa is enumerated as the fourth bishop of York,<sup>16</sup> and he is regarded, also, as the master of St. Acca,<sup>17</sup> Bishop of Hexham.<sup>18</sup> It is to be observed, while Thomas Stubbes, or Stobes, Brompton, Dicetus, Vitæ S. Berachi, ex Codice MS. Hibernico Ecclesiæ eiusdem Sancti, cap. vii., p. 345, and n. 6, p. 348.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 15th of February.

<sup>4</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 106, p. 492. Also, Quinta Appendix, cap. iii., sect. v., p. 502.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' edition, lib. i., cap. 41, p. 77, and lib. ii., cap. 4, p. 108.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

ARTICLE XVII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Monumenta Historica Britannica." Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum, lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 222, cap. xxiii., p. 235, lib. v., cap. iii., p. 250, cap. vi., n. (a), p. 253, cap. xx., p. 274, cap. xxiv., p. 285.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. De B. Bosa Episcopo Deirorum Eboraci in Anglia. In eight paragraphs, pp. 10 to 12.

<sup>3</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March ix., p. 175.

<sup>4</sup> Probably under St. Aidan, who died August 31st, A.D. 651.

<sup>5</sup> He is called "Hrypensis ecclesiæ præsul," by Venerable Bede, lib. iii., cap. xxviii. He, with other bishops of Lindisfarne, had a See in Sidnacestria, near Gainsborough. See, lib. iv., cap. xii., n. (d). "Monumenta Historica Britannica," pp. 206, 222.

<sup>6</sup> See notices of him, at the 26th of October.

<sup>7</sup> His feast occurs, at the 19th of September.

<sup>8</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," lib. iv., cap. xii.

<sup>9</sup> See Florence of Worcester's "Chronicon," in "Monumenta Historica Britannica," at A.D. 677, p. 535.

<sup>10</sup> According to a Manuscript Kalendar of Saints, belonging to the Benedictine Order. This places his festival, however, at the 13th of January.

<sup>11</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>12</sup> See her Life, at the 18th of November.

<sup>13</sup> His feast occurs, at the 12th of October.

<sup>14</sup> See "The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," p. 321, "Monumenta Historica Britannica."

<sup>15</sup> See Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. xii.

<sup>16</sup> See Arnold Wion's "Lignum Vitæ," lib. ii., cap. xxii.

<sup>17</sup> His feast occurs, at the 30th of November, and his death is recorded, under A.D. 740, in Simeon of Durham's "Historia de Gestis Regum Anglorum," p. 659, in "Monumenta Historica Britannica."

and other writers, treat of Bosa, as Archbishop, they do not rank him among the saints of York. Although the Manuscript Benedictine Martyrology has the feast of St. Bosa, at the 13th of January, Jerome Porter,<sup>20</sup> John Wilson<sup>21</sup> and Ferrarius<sup>22</sup> have it placed, at the 9th of March. The Bollandists infer, from Venerable Bede's statements, that St. Bosa died A.D. 686. Although this is the date given by Florence of Worcester; yet, Edward Maihew, following a mistake in William of Malmesbury's work,<sup>23</sup> supposes the date for his death to be about A.D. 704, while Menard, taking the latter for a guide, has about the year 705. Doubting if St. Bosa had a special office, recited in his honour, the Bollandists solely give him the title of Blessed.

Tenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. SILVESTER, OR SYLVESTRUS, BISHOP, AND EARLY APOSTLE OF IRELAND.

[FIFTH CENTURY.]

THE greater glory of Ireland's illustrious Apostle has diminished that of various holy labourers, in the same field of missionary enterprise. Yet, we are not to suppose, that even great men can effect great results, without the co-operation of subordinates. This is very clearly exemplified, in the case of St. Sylvester, who, as a companion of St. Palladius,<sup>1</sup> the Bishop, proceeded from Rome to Ireland, where Gospel pioneers had already preceded both, in propagating the Faith of Christ.<sup>2</sup> St. Sylvester is generally understood to have been a Roman, by birth, although his history is shrouded in obscurity. So far as they can be made out, Colgan has published his Acts, for the 10th day of March.<sup>3</sup> Again, at the same date, the Bollandists<sup>4</sup> have hesitatingly followed Colgan's arrangements, expressing a doubt, however, as to whether the Sylvester, Bishop, named at this date, in the Tallagh Martyrology, might be identified with the pre-Patrician missionary. It is stated, that Pope St. Celestine I.<sup>5</sup> had destined his Deacon, or Archdeacon, Palladius, and twelve other companions,<sup>6</sup> to open a mission among the Gentiles of our western <sup>18</sup> See Florence of Worcester's "Chronicle," at A.D. 709, in "Monumenta Historica Britannia," p. 540. However, in the Appendix to this Chronicle, Bosa is set down, as the third Bishop of York, at p. 625.

<sup>19</sup> He wrote in the fourteenth century a Chronicle, relating the Acts of the Archbishops of York.

<sup>20</sup> See "In Floribus Vitarum præcipuorum Sanctorum Angliæ, Scotiæ et Hiberniæ."

<sup>21</sup> See "Martyrologium Anglicanum."

<sup>22</sup> See "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum." He cites the Tablets of the Church of York, for this statement.

<sup>23</sup> See lib. iii., "De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum," where there is mention of an Epistle of Pope John to Ethelred, King of the Mercians, and to Alfrid, King of the Deiri and of the Bernici, touching the case of Bishop Wilfrid, which is thought to be an interpolation.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 6th of July.

<sup>2</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xv., and nn. 129, 130, 131, 132, pp. 33 to 37.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," x. Martii. De S. Sylvestro S. Paladii Socio et Hiberniæ Apostolo, pp. 570, 571.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>5</sup> His feast occurs, at the 6th of April.

<sup>6</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxiv., p. 13. Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. i., cap. xxxviii., p. 123.

land. Having received consecration as a bishop in Rome, and his Apostolic charge for Ireland, Palladius took with him some missionaries, and among them are mentioned the names of Sylvester, Solonius, Augustin and Benedict.<sup>7</sup> They landed on the east coast of Ireland, and on the territory, called Hygarcon,<sup>8</sup> in the present county of Wicklow. They arrived there, as generally thought, about the year 430,<sup>9</sup> or 431.<sup>10</sup> Sylvester and Solinus seem to have remained as missionaries, in that district, after Palladius had left it for another sphere of labour in Scotland. They are said to have jointly erected the church of Domnach Arda,<sup>11</sup> now thought to be Donard, represented by a parish, in the barony of Lower Talbotstown, in Wicklow County.<sup>12</sup> This was probably the place of their habitation in common, and the chief scene of their labours. Here, too, most probably, they died, and were buried. Therefore, they may be regarded, as chief patrons of that place, where they first spread the seeds of Christianity. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>13</sup> we find a festival, inserted at the 10th of March, in honour of Silvester. The Martyrology of Donegal is also of accord, according to Colgan, although we miss such an account, in the published version. After some time had elapsed, however, we are informed, that the relics of Sylvester and Solinus were removed—we know not for what reason—to the island of Boethan,<sup>14</sup> or Inis-Boethan, now called Ennisboheen, or Ennisboyne,<sup>15</sup> two or three miles south of Wicklow town. There they were kept with reverence, many ages subsequently to the happy departure of those holy missionaries. When or how the relics disappeared does not seem to have been recorded.

ARTICLE II.—ST. FERFUGIL, OR FEARFUGHUIL, BISHOP, OR ABBOT, OF CLONDALKIN, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [Eighth Century.] Little is recorded about this holy man, who is noticed in Colgan.<sup>1</sup> While the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> record Ferfugal, at the 10th of March, they express a desire to have clearer testimonies, for his ecclesiastical cultus, than Colgan has furnished. Regarding his birth and parentage, no account is obtainable. However, he was created Bishop of Clondalkin,<sup>3</sup> near Dublin. Here lies a scene, which a poet might revel in, and which a painter might vainly attempt to sketch. Far through bosky tintings on the right bank of the Liffy, the eye ranges across garden and lawn, beside which still and deep the broad stream rolls down, to be lost in Dublin City streets, amid the crowd of men, and the hurry of feverish life. Away beyond the river, on hills of the Phoenix Park, spread sombre but mellow shadowings of hawthorn-woods—thickly growing as an Australian scrub-forest, crowning the plateaus, and bounding our horizon. Groupings of white cottages and neat villas catch the glance, and peering out of hollows, from amid hollyhocks, laburnums, and drooping willows; others, again, look

<sup>7</sup> See ibid. Jocelyn's or Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxv., p. 70.

<sup>8</sup> The Second Life of St. Patrick says, "ubi Nathi filius Garrchon Comes erat," &c. See cap. xxiv., p. 13. Ibid.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 128, 129.

<sup>10</sup> See Rev. Michael J. O'Farrell's "Popular Life of St. Patrick," chap. ii., p. 29.

<sup>11</sup> It is called Domnach-Airte, or Domnach Ardech, but as Colgan says, more correctly "Dominica Arda."—See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 19, p. 49.

<sup>12</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 15, 16, 21. The town and townland of Upper Donard are to be seen on Sheets 15, 21.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>14</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxviii., p. 38.

<sup>15</sup> This townland is in the parish of Dunganstown, barony of Arklow, and it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheet 31.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See his "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," x. Martii. De S. Ferfullo Episcopo, p. 577.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii.,

down from wood-crowned eminences, that are interspersed throughout all this varied scene. To culminate the glories of nature, that surround our vision, the eye is uplifted to the Dublin Mountains, that raise their ranges into a blue sky, and link our looks with heaven. A thousand times, no doubt, this fairy scene, so near the Irish Metropolis, is thoughtlessly passed, by many a wayfarer and loiterer, hardly conscious of its beauties, both natural and artificial. When thicker woods waved around it, in the olden time, here

Clondalkin Old Church, County of Dublin.

St. Mochua<sup>4</sup> first established his monastery. A remarkable Round Tower<sup>5</sup> yet remains, to mark that site; and, on the opposite side of the present high road, are mere fragments of an old church, surrounded by a burial-ground.<sup>6</sup> Ivy thickly mantles the wasted gable of that ancient church. Besides filling the episcopal office, it seems not unlikely, that Ferfugil likewise enjoyed the dignity of Abbot, over the monastery here established. Moreover, he may have lived in this monastery, as he ruled over its church, with great prudence and sanctity. He departed to a better life, on the 10th day of March. It is said, that the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>7</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Donegal,<sup>8</sup> are authorities for this date.<sup>9</sup> The year 789 is set down as that of Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> The parish of Clondalkin, situated in the baronies of Newcastle and of Upper Cross, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheets 17, 18, 21, 22. The town and townland, on Sheets 17, 21, lie within the barony of Newcastle.

<sup>4</sup> See an account of him, at the 6th of August.

<sup>5</sup> A characteristic representation of it is given, in an elegant coloured lithograph, by Henry O'Neill, in the series of County Dublin Sketches, Plate 1, among his lately produced "Round Towers of Ireland." The doorway, drawn to scale, follows, in Plate 2.

<sup>6</sup> The accompanying illustration was sketched, by the writer, in July, 1855. It has since been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard, Harcourt-street, Dublin.

<sup>7</sup> In the edition, by Rev. Dr. Kelly, we have Ferfughill Eps. entered, at p. xviii.

<sup>8</sup> In the printed edition, by Drs. Todd and Reeves, however, there is an omission of his name, on this day.

his death, by Dr. O'Donovan, while the Annals of the Four Masters place it, so early as A.D. 784.<sup>10</sup>

ARTICLE III.—ST. KESSOG, MACKESSOG, OR MAKKESSAGUS, BISHOP, AND CONFESSOR, PATRON OF LENNOX, SCOTLAND. [Sixth Century.] This holy bishop is venerated, and not unmeritedly, in the church of Scud,<sup>1</sup> on his natal day,<sup>2</sup> as elsewhere in Scotland. There, while living on earth, he sought out the true way of living for ever in heaven.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists<sup>4</sup> have the Acts of St. Kessog, at the 10th of March. These consist of two preliminary sections, with the lection of his Life, as found in the Breviary of Aberdeen. From this we learn, that it had been compiled, from a special Life of St. Kessog.<sup>5</sup> Bishop Forbes<sup>6</sup> gives an interesting account of this Scottish bishop. The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has some notices about St. Kessog.<sup>7</sup> He was born, as we are told, in Cashel, the capital city of Munster, while his name and family were derived from the royal race of Irish Kings. From early youth, his virtues were remarkable, and he was distinguished for his miracles. His father was King of Cashel; and, in that station, he not only desired to cultivate the friendship of other Irish kings, but he hospitably invited them to banquets, and he even desired, that his noble guests should be accompanied by their sons. We learn, from the Aberdeen Breviary, that the King of Cashel was accustomed to receive his visitors, in great state, when trumpets and musical instruments<sup>8</sup> welcomed them to his royal city. On one of those occasions, while Kessog, still a child, played with two other handsome young princes, who were sons of a visitor, near a lake, or pond, all fell into it, and Kessog alone escaped with life. He told the tale in secret to his father. A certain Elinthus, a citizen of Cashel, feared that such intelligence should cause a great commotion among the kings; and, he endeavoured, as best he could, to relate all the circumstances of the sad accident, so as to excuse Kessog, who, in some manner, seems to have been blamed, in connexion with its occurrence. Filled with grief and indignation, the strange kings vowed they would burn the city of the King of Cashel, and that they should devastate all his province. But, after a night spent in prayer by Kessog, at the request of his affrighted father, the boy heard an angel of the Lord say to him, towards morning, "Kessog, rise at once from prayer, for the Lord hath heard you, since the kings' sons, for whom you prayed, have come to life and are restored." Soon were their parents satisfied on the matter, and their rejoicing was very great. Many other miracles were wrought by him, as related in his special Life.<sup>9</sup> According to their National Breviary, St. Makkessagus ruled over the Scots, as a bishop. His feast occurs, on the 10th of March, and he flourished, it is said, A.D. 520. According to Dempster's conjecture, he was elected from the Culdee order. His church was in Levinia, near the county of Menteth, and, it was called, "Templum Portus." Celebrated for its fair, <sup>9</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum-Hiberniæ," x. Martii, n. 3, p. 577.

<sup>10</sup> At this date, we read, "Fearfughuil, Bishop of Cluain-Dolcain [Clondalkin] died." See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 390, 391.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> Over this, he was the special Patron.

<sup>2</sup> The vi. of the March Ides, corresponding with the 10th day.

<sup>3</sup> Thus is it beautifully expressed, in the "Martyrology for the use of the Church of Aberdeen." See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 262.

<sup>4</sup> See the "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. De S. Kessogo Episcopo in Scotia, pp. 35, 36.

<sup>5</sup> This now seems to have been lost.

<sup>6</sup> See "Kalendars of the Scottish Saints," pp. 373, 374.

<sup>7</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March x., p. 208.

<sup>8</sup> Of these, we have several antique specimens, in the Royal Irish Academy's Museum, Dublin.

the place was much resorted to by crowds. He is stated to have written, "Manipulum Precum," lib. i., and "Catechesin ad Neophytos," lib. i.<sup>10</sup> He is thought to have lived, in the Island of Inchtavanach,<sup>11</sup> where he devoted himself to prayer and to evangelizing the neighbourhood. According to tradition, St. Kessog suffered martyrdom for the truth, at Bandry. There a cairn, and a large stone, on which an ecclesiastic's effigy is carved, were erected to his memory. Another account has it, that he was martyred in a foreign land, and that, embalmed in sweet herbs, his body was brought to the church of Luss, his native place. There he was buried, according to the Breviary of Aberdeen. These herbs, called Luss, in Gaelic, germinated, and gave name to the parish. At the place of his burial is Carn-ma-cheasaig.<sup>12</sup> Malcolm, Earl of Lennox, granted a charter<sup>13</sup> to John of Luss, "for the reverence and honour of our patron the most holy man, the blessed Kessog." In 1313, Robert Bruce granted a sanctuary-girth of three miles,<sup>14</sup> to the church of Luss, in a charter,<sup>15</sup> which is preserved at Buchanan. In the Lennox, a bell of St. Kessog was held in reverence, during the seventeenth century.<sup>16</sup> The church of Auchterarder<sup>17</sup> is dedicated to him,<sup>18</sup> and he was honoured at Callander. In this latter place was a curious conical hill, or mound, which seems to be artificial. It is called Tom-ma-chessaig,<sup>19</sup> and there an old church stood. In like manner, the fair of Fel-ma-chessaig is held, on the 21st of March, the 10th, old style.<sup>20</sup> There is a Kessog's fair, in Cumbrae, on the 3rd Wednesday in March,<sup>21</sup> and there is a Kessog Ferry, at Inverness.<sup>22</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd identifies this saint with Moshenoc, of Beitheach, at the 11th of March.<sup>23</sup> According to the Kalendar of Arbuthnott, we find, at the 10th of March, or vi. Ides, St. Kessog, Bishop, and Confessor; while, the same notice occurs, in the Kalendar of the Breviary of Aberdeen, having the addition, that his Office was celebrated with Nine Lessons. Adam King's Kalendar, at the 10th of this month, enters S. Makkessage bisch. and cōf. in Scotl. Dempster, in his "Menologium Scoticum," at this same date, has in Levinia, Makkessag, bishop, who is depicted in a military habit, and whose intercession is earnestly implored by soldiers. Also, in the Scottish entries, as found in the Kalendar of David Camerarius, we have, at the 10th of March, St. Makkessog, who is also called Kessog, Confessor and Bishop "in Boina Scotie provincia," celebrated for the lustre of his miracles.<sup>24</sup> The "Circle of the Seasons" has its note of St. Kessog, at this date.<sup>25</sup> In art, it is said,<sup>26</sup> he was represented as a soldier, with a stretched bow and arrows in his hand, and a quiver at his back.

<sup>9</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. De S. Kessogo Episcopo in Scotia. Vitæ Initium, ex Breviario Aberdonensi, p. 36.

<sup>10</sup> See Dempster's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 853, p. 454.

<sup>11</sup> Or Monk's Island, in Loch Lomond, near the village of Luss, in Luss parish, Dumbartonshire. See Fullarton's "Imperial Gazetteer of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 107.

<sup>12</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," part i., p. 30. Also "Old Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. xvii., p. 264.

<sup>13</sup> A.D. 1292-1333.

<sup>14</sup> It is expressed, "Deo et Beato Kessogo."

<sup>15</sup> This is engraved, together with the effigy of St. Kessog, now at Rossdhu, in that very interesting work, "The Chiefs of Colquhoun and their Country," vol. ii., pp. 54, 58.

<sup>16</sup> Retours, Perth, 708, 880.

<sup>17</sup> It was granted, A.D. 1200, by Gilbert, Earl of Strathearn, to the Abbey of Inchaffray.

<sup>18</sup> See "Liber Insul. Missarum," pp. viii., 4, 8, 18, 70.

<sup>19</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Perth, p. 356.

<sup>20</sup> See "Old Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. xi., pp. 597, 610.

<sup>21</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Bute, p. 161.

<sup>22</sup> See ibid. Inverness, vol. ii., p. 28, Ross, pp. 61, 229.

<sup>23</sup> See "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 74, 75, and n. 1.

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of

ARTICLE IV.—ST. SETNA OR SEDNA, BISHOP, AND CONFESSOR. [Supposed to have lived in the Sixth Century.] Nothing of a very definite nature seems to be known, regarding a St. Setna or Sedna, venerated on the 10th day of March, although Colgan records some conjectural particulars respecting him, at that date,<sup>1</sup> and we also find him called by the Latin form, Sidonius or Sedonius. The Bollandists have a passing notice of him.<sup>2</sup> The present holy man is thought to have been identical with that cowherd, who was mute from his birth, and who was met on the mountains of Slieve Bloom, by St. Columba<sup>3</sup> of Terryglass, and by St. Fintan<sup>4</sup> of Clonenagh. The former of these saints bestowed a blessing, when he recovered the use of speech. Two other holy men were present with them. Sedna was required, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to predict the places for their respective sepultures, and this he did most accurately, as succeeding events established.<sup>5</sup> It is probable, too, that on this occasion, he received the gift of prophesying. Among our Irish Manuscripts, there is extant a copy of St. Sedna's Prophecy, delivered to St. Columkille.<sup>6</sup> It contains 80 verses.<sup>7</sup> We may probably attribute it, to the present holy man; who, in other respects, too, was endowed with poetic powers and fancy. Poems of a prophetic character, ascribed to St. Sedna, are to be found in the Messrs. Hodges and Smith's collection of MSS., belonging to the Royal Irish Academy, Nos. 27,<sup>8</sup> 221,<sup>9</sup> and 223.<sup>10</sup> St. Sedna is thought to have become a bishop of Ossory,<sup>11</sup> and to have lived contemporaneously with St. Molua,<sup>12</sup> of Clonfert Molua. With him, the latter was intimate, and their places were not very far apart. St. Sedna is placed third in order, among the bishops of Seirkieran, by Colgan, and about A.D. 570.<sup>13</sup> However, when quoting this statement, Archdall had no warrant for referring his death to the 1st of March, in the same year.<sup>14</sup> The name, S. Setna, is the simple entry found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>15</sup> at the 10th of March. He is classed as a bishop, by the author of a Tract, on the Homonymous Saints of Ireland,<sup>16</sup> as also by Marianus O'Gorman. It is recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>17</sup> that Sedna, Bishop, had a festival on this day. Colgan is doubtful, however, regarding the application of this festival, to the present Sedna,<sup>18</sup> or to another, so called, who is mentioned in the Acts of St. Senan,<sup>19</sup> Abbot of Scatterry Island.

ARTICLE V.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. SEDONIUS, BISHOP, AND A DISCIPLE OF ST. SENAN, ABBOT OF SCATTERY ISLAND. [Probably in the Sixth Century.] Among the disciples of Blessed Senan,<sup>1</sup> Abbot of Scatterry

Scottish Saints," pp. 97, 113, 146, 194, 235.

<sup>25</sup> See p. 70.

<sup>26</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii. March x., p. 208.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," x. Martii. De S. Sedna sive Sedonio Episcopo et Confessore, p. 572.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms ii., Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> His feast occurs, at the 13th of December.

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of February.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Februarii. Vita S. Fintani Abbatis de Cluain-Ednech, cap. iii., iv., p. 350.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>7</sup> See the O'Longan MSS., R.I.A., vol. xv., p. 172. This vol. contains 200 pages, written by Michael, the son of Peter O'Longan, about the year 1760.

<sup>8</sup> A small 4to paper MS.

<sup>9</sup> A folio paper MS.

<sup>10</sup> A large 4to parchment MS.

<sup>11</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Februarii, n. 10, p. 354.

<sup>12</sup> See his Life, at the 4th of August.

<sup>13</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii v. Appendix ad Vitam S. Kieran, cap. v., p. 473.

<sup>14</sup> See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 404.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>16</sup> Lib. i., cap. iii., xlvii. This treatise has been attributed to St. Ængus the Culdee, by Colgan.

Island, was one Sedna or Sedonius, remarkable for his virtues and miracles, who dwelt with his master, and with a fellow-religious, called Libernus or Liberius,<sup>2</sup> on the Island, called Inismore. There the latter seems to have chiefly lived. Among St. Senan's disciples, at this place, were three holy bishops, Dalan,<sup>3</sup> Sedonius, and Erc,<sup>4</sup> whom he brought away to live on the island, called Inis-Caorach. But Colgan, who has a fuller notice, on the 10th of March,<sup>5</sup> remarks, that he does not suppose they were bishops, when living under St. Senan's rule; but, after they had parted from him, to assume whatever positions of responsibility had been assigned to each. The circumstances of country and of time render it probable, in Colgan's opinion, that this St. Sedna or Sedonius was the son of Eren or Erc, a nobleman, and his mother was Magna, sister of St. David,<sup>6</sup> of Kill-muine, following an account in the work of St. Ængus.<sup>7</sup> He is said, to have been born in Altraige Cliach,<sup>8</sup> in Munster. He had two holy brothers, likewise; one is called Mogaban or Goban,<sup>9</sup> and the other Melteoc or Eltin.<sup>10</sup> This Sedna, to whom we allude, presided over the Church of Cluain, between the Mountains of Crot<sup>11</sup> and Mirge. It was situated within Munster. He is buried in Kinn-sale,<sup>12</sup> a maritime town of southern Munster. What more confirms Colgan, in his attempted identification, is the account of that strict friendship and alliance, between St. Senan and St. David. No wonder, therefore, that the nephew of this latter should be ranked, among the favoured disciples of the great Abbot of Scattery Island. If all the foregoing speculations can be reconciled, we may justly infer, that St. Sedna lived about the middle of the sixth century.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. HYMELIN, OR HIMELINUS, CONFESSOR, OF VISSEN-AEKEN, BRABANT. [Eighth Century.] Among the many holy Irishmen, who made their way to foreign countries in past ages, Hymelin or Himelinus was distinguished, and we have his Acts recorded, at the 10th of March, in Colgan.<sup>1</sup> These are taken from an account of Father Heribert Rosweyde, and from a Life, founded on notices in the Martyrologies, and from popular

<sup>17</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>18</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii x. De S. Sedna sive Sedonio Episcopo et Confessore, p. 572, and n. 3.

<sup>19</sup> His Life is already given, at the 8th of March.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 8th of March.

<sup>2</sup> See an account of him, at the 1st of August.

<sup>3</sup> He was venerated, probably on the 14th of December, according to Colgan's conjecture.

<sup>4</sup> Colgan thinks, he had been venerated, either on the 13th of July, or on the 17th of October.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," viii. Martii. Secunda Vita S. Senani, n. 19, p. 540 (recte) 536. Also, x. Martii. De S. Sedonio Episcopo S. Senani Discipulo, pp. 572, 573.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, already given at the 1st of March.

<sup>7</sup> His "Opuscula," lib. iv., cap. 81, we find quoted.

<sup>8</sup> Very probably Ara-Cliach, in the county of Limerick.

<sup>9</sup> Colgan tells us, that the "Martyrology of Tallagh" treats of him, at the 11th of February, where he is called Mogoboc or Goban, of Rath Lampaighe, as we have noted already, at that day; or, according to Marianus and other authorities, he was the Goban, venerated on the 26th or 30th of March.

<sup>10</sup> His feast is referred, to the 11th of December.

<sup>11</sup> Crotta Cliach was the ancient name for the Galtee Mountains, in the county of Tipperary. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," n. 753, p. lxxxiii.

<sup>12</sup> The town of Kinsale, in the parishes of Kinsale and Ringcurran, in the barony of Kinsale, is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cork." (East Riding). Sheets 112, 125.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," x. Martii. Vita S. Hymelini Præsbyteri et Conf. authore Heriberto Roswedio. Also, Alia Vita ejusdem, &c., pp. 574 to 576.

traditions, by John Gillemann,<sup>2</sup> and written about 1480. The Belgian writers, Jean Ver Meulen, or John Molanus,<sup>3</sup> and Autbertus Miræus,<sup>4</sup> have recorded St. Hymelin. The Bollandists have inserted his Acts, at the same date, as found in Gillemann's work; and, these are preceded by two elucidatory paragraphs.<sup>5</sup> Saussay,<sup>6</sup> Willot,<sup>7</sup> and Ferrarius,<sup>8</sup> note him in their Calendars. Bishop Challenor<sup>9</sup> has an account, at the 10th of March. Again, the Rev. S. Baring-Gould has some observations concerning him, at this date.<sup>10</sup> It is related, that not only was Hymelin a Scot,<sup>11</sup> or an Irishman,<sup>12</sup> but that he was also related to the celebrated St. Rumold,<sup>13</sup> the Apostle of Belgium.<sup>14</sup> In like manner was he assimilated by virtues and merits. He appears to have been desirous of following Rumold, to the country of his adoption. Little regarding his early life is known. We are told, however, that he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome,<sup>15</sup> to visit the shrines of the holy Apostles, Peter and Paul. He returned, afterwards, through the province of Brabant, at a time, too, when Pepin<sup>16</sup> ruled over France.<sup>17</sup> Being greatly fatigued and very thirsty, he stopped on the way near Vissenacken. Here he was seized with a violent fever. He sank exhausted on a bank, and he seemed pale and worn to extremity, when a girl passed by, while bearing water in a pitcher from a neighbouring fountain. This she brought as a household supply for her master, who is called Deculus, a Priest, and who was curate of that place. As a plague was then raging, she had received strict orders from her master, to let no person touch the pitcher, for he feared infection. Hymelin asked for a drink of the water, as she passed, but the girl refused to give it, excusing herself, owing to the strict orders she received. Again, the sick traveller languidly repeated his request, when the girl answered, "My friend, I cannot at all give you water from the pitcher, because of the injunction I received from my master; yet, I beseech you to visit our house, and there you shall be refreshed, not only with drink, which you need sorely, but with abundance of food." This invitation Hymelin refused, but he said confidentially to the woman, "Daughter, have trust, and give what I ask for; the Almighty shall be satisfied with your action." She was moved to compassion, and he drank from the vessel. Then was the pilgrim able to continue his journey. The servant brought the water he had tasted to her master's house. Some of it was presented, for his use; but, on drinking, he found it had the taste of wine. Enquiring from the girl, she confessed what had occurred, and owned her <sup>2</sup> He was a Canon Regular of the Monastery of Rubea Vallis, in Soignes Wood, near Bruxelles, and with great industry, he compiled the Acts of several saints. In the second part of his Brabantine Hagiology, he gives the notice of St. Hymelin.

<sup>3</sup> In the "Natales Sanctorum Belgii," p. 49, he has a single paragraph devoted to St. Hymelinus, at the 10th of March.

<sup>4</sup> See "Fasti Belgici et Burgundici," x. Martii.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," De S. Hymelino Presbytero Fenaci in Brabantia, tomus ii., Martii x., pp. 46, 47.

<sup>6</sup> In his Supplement to the Gallic Martyrology.

<sup>7</sup> In a French Calendar.

<sup>8</sup> In "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum."

<sup>9</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 167.

<sup>10</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March x., pp. 210, 211.

<sup>11</sup> Mireus refers him to Scotia, in his work, "Fasti Belgici et Burgundici," at the 10th of March.

<sup>12</sup> Both editions of the English Martyrology say, that he was sprung "ex Hibernia."

<sup>13</sup> See his Life, at the 1st of July.

<sup>14</sup> Such is the account of Ferrarius, who does not allude to Hymelin having been in orders. In like manner, the "English Martyrology," at the 10th of March, only distinguishes him as a Confessor. Yet, in one account of this saint, he is styled a Priest.

<sup>15</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 167.

<sup>16</sup> His reign ended in 768. Yet, the Breviary of Aberdeen states the saint flourished under King Dungall A.D. 822.

<sup>17</sup> Molanus states, however, that he lived until the reign of Charlemagne. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. xiv., nn. 165, 166, pp. 194, 195, 197.

<sup>18</sup> In "Menologium Scoticum." See disobedience to the curate's orders. The priest was not displeased, however, but he instantly ran after the unknown holy pilgrim. The latter was overtaken, and conducted to the curate's home, where he received a hospitable welcome and refreshment. Yet, Hymelin refused the luxury of a comfortable bed, or any other comforts; but, he expressed a wish, to lie down on some straw in a barn. There he rested for three days. His hour for departing this world had now come; and, requesting the favour from the curate's hands, he received the last Sacraments of the Church. Lying all alone, his happy spirit passed away to the guardianship of his Creator. No sooner had he departed, than all the bells around began to toll of their own accord, and without a hand touching them. This was a subject of great astonishment for the people. The curate was the first to divine the cause, and he invited his parishioners to enter the barn, where Hymelin's corpse lay. There they saw his face and body, surrounded with a radiant light. Deeming him to be a true saint, they began to consider where his remains should be deposited. Going into the village church, they found a tomb, corresponding with the size of the pilgrim's body, and miraculously prepared for its reception. Citing the authority of John Molanus, we are told by Dempster,<sup>18</sup> that neither by the Roman Pontiff, nor by the bishop of the place, had Himelin been enrolled among the saints; and, yet, his miracles made him celebrated, and his dedicated temples were frequented, by the people. In Convæus' list of Irish Saints, for the 10th of March, he notices St. Himilius, a nobleman.<sup>19</sup> The name is written Himelinus, in the anonymous list, at the same day.<sup>20</sup> In Henry Fitzsimons' list—apparently through mistake—and on the authority of Molanus, his feast is set down, at the 20th of March.<sup>21</sup> The Manuscript Florarius, Canisius, and Molanus, in his edition of Usuard, have his feast, at the 10th. In Adam King's Kalendar,<sup>22</sup> at the same day in March, we have entered S. Hemelin, confess. scotisma vnder king dungallus. In like manner, Dempster<sup>23</sup> and Camerarius record Himelin, he having been revered as Confessor, in Vissenaken.<sup>24</sup> Thither were the sacred remains brought and honourably interred, in a crypt, under the campanile. In after time, several miracles were wrought, through the merits of Hymelin, who is regarded as the patron saint of Vissenaeken.<sup>25</sup> On the 10th of March—probably the date for his death—a great concourse of the parishioners and of pilgrims is annually attracted to his tomb. On the altar his image was visible. None but distinguished saints may go straightway to God, after death; every one of us, not being regarded as great saints, must be purified, "so as by fire." We shall have to tarry, to expiate, to suffer; yet, happy still, if our final rest be obtained.

---

ARTICLE VII.—ST. COLMAN, OF CLONTIBRIN, OR CLONTIVRIN, COUNTY OF FERMANAGH. The name, Colman, of Cluan Tibhrinn, appears in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> on this day. The place is now known as Clonti-

---

Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>19</sup> He adds: "Romuldi cognatus apud Thenas."

<sup>20</sup> See Hugo Menard's "Martyrologium Benedictinum," at this date.

<sup>21</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. x., p. 48, and cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 55.

<sup>22</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 147.

<sup>23</sup> See "Menologium Scoticum," p. 194. Ibid.

<sup>24</sup> Although they state, that he preached among the people of Brabant, there is no warrant for this in the popular legend.

<sup>25</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 167. Molanus states, that his death took place, at Fenac of St. Martin. See "Natales Sanctorum Belgii," p. 49.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

brin, or Clontivrin, in Clankelly barony, and in the county of Fermanagh.<sup>2</sup> I suspect this saint is not a different one from the Colman, recorded in the Martyrology of Tallagh, on the day previous.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. SARAN OR SERANUS. In Scotia, at the 10th of March, Dempster<sup>1</sup> has an entry of Saran, a Bishop, whose precious relics were buried in Tungland. The Bollandists declare,<sup>2</sup> while quoting this statement, at the same day, that they do not trust the quoted Breviary of this church, adduced by Dempster, as his warrant for the account. In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 10th of March, Seranus is entered.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. BOSA, ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, ENGLAND. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] The festival of St. Bosa, Archbishop of York, has been referred to the 10th of March, by Edward Mainew<sup>1</sup> and by Bucelin, who regard this holy man, as belonging to the Benedictine Order.<sup>2</sup> At this date, the Bollandists merely notice the foregoing statements.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE X.—ST. ÆMILIAN, OR ÆMILIANUS, ABBOT OF LAGNY, FRANCE. [Seventh Century.] As we have already remarked, in the Life of St. Fursey,<sup>1</sup> Abbot of Lagny, the fame of this holy man was reflected back upon his native country, Ireland, where many of his pious and devoted compatriots desired to emulate his labours and virtues, and to follow him abroad. Among these was the present Æmilian, who, towards the middle of the seventh century, went over to France, it being generally assumed, that he had made the acquaintance of St. Fursey, in Ireland, where, too, it is said, he had been a disciple of the celebrated missionary.<sup>2</sup> Æmilian was distinguished for his pious and simple character. He was accompanied by some religious Irishmen, and after they had landed in France, Æmilian directed his course to Lagny, where himself and his companions were joyfully received by the holy abbot, and trained in his monastic discipline. The virtues and sage character of our saint caused Fursey to notice his rare merits. Soon the abbot forecast his own death. From among all his religious children, Fursey chose Æmilian as his most worthy successor, commending to him the charge of his community, after God should have called himself to bliss. This proved a qualified source of consolation for his religious, who were left to mourn a great loss.<sup>3</sup> St. Æmilian thus became the second Abbot over Lagny.<sup>4</sup> How long he continued to rule there is not very well ascertained. His name is found written Emlinianus, Emmianus and Emianus, in the old Acts of St. Fursey. There, the little, that is told about St. Æmilian, has been collected, by Colgan, at the 10th of March.<sup>5</sup> The Bollandists<sup>6</sup> have nearly similar notices. Æmilian

<sup>1</sup> This is stated, from a MS. note, in William M. Hennessey's copy.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> In "Menologium Scotticum." See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Iberniæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "In Trophæis Congregationis Angliæ."

<sup>2</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii ix. De B. Bosa Episcopo Deirorum Eboraci in Anglia, num. 7, p. 12.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., x. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> His feast occurs, at the 16th of January, where in vol. i. of this work his Life may be examined. See chap. viii.

<sup>2</sup> According to Menard and other writers. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. x., n. 89, p. 462.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiber-

is praised, as being a man of singular virtue, void of all selfishness, and versed in all degrees of Christian philosophy.<sup>7</sup> According to Desmay,<sup>8</sup> the monks of Lagny, when informed about the death of their Abbot St. Fursey, elected St. Eloquius,<sup>9</sup> as his immediate successor. If such be the case, Æmilian must have resigned the administration.<sup>10</sup> However, Colgan is of opinion, that the latter was Fursey's immediate successor, and that Eloquius was only called upon to rule at Lagny, after the death of Æmilian.<sup>11</sup> This is said to have occurred, on the 10th day of March, when Saussay<sup>12</sup> alludes to him in the Calendar; while Menard<sup>13</sup> has marked him down, at the same day, and with similar commendation.

ARTICLE XI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. COMGELL, OR ST. CONGELL, ABBOT. It seems quite evident, that a great mistake has been committed by Arnold Wion,<sup>1</sup> who has noted a festival for St. Congell, or Comgell, said to have been a Synchronos with St. Brendan. Dempster<sup>2</sup> places a feast, at Bangor, for the Abbot Comgall, the founder, on the 10th of March.<sup>3</sup> Again, Philip Ferrarius<sup>4</sup> quotes Molanus,<sup>5</sup> for the festival of St. Congellus, Abbas, in Hibernia, at this day, as Colgan remarks.<sup>6</sup> He has been confounded, with the establisher of Bangor Monastery, whose real festival occurs on the 10th of May; while, it is stated,<sup>7</sup> also, that he lived in the time of St. Malachias,<sup>8</sup> the Bishop, whose Life St. Bernard<sup>9</sup> has written. Yet, an interval of five hundred years intervenes; and, hence, it may be seen, how apocryphal are those statements, referring to this supposed saint.

ARTICLE XII.—THE SONS OF TORMAN. On this day, we find mentioned, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> as having veneration paid them, the sons of Torman, son of Cruaidhen. The Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> intending to register a similar entry, has, we suspect, fallen into an error, when setting down, Torman and MacCruaden.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. FEIDHLIMID, OR FAILBHE II., ABBOT OF IONA. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] It seems probable, this holy man was born nixæ," xvi. Januarii. Vita S. Fursæi, lib. i., cap. xxxvii., xxxviii., p. 82. Also, ix. Februarii. Vita S. Fursæi, cap. xvii., pp. 295, 296.

<sup>4</sup> See, Menard's "Martyrologium Benedictinum," at the 10th of March.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," x. Martii. De S. Æmiliano Abbate Latinianensi. Ex Jacobo Desmayo et aliis, pp. 573, 574.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum." De S. Æmiliano Abbate Latiniani in Territorio Parisiensi, tomus ii., Martii x., pp. 45, 46.

<sup>7</sup> Such is the eulogy of Saussay.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," ix. Februarii. Vita S. Fursæi, cap. xviii., p. 296.

<sup>9</sup> See his Life, at the 3rd of December.

<sup>10</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvi., sect. x., n. 98, p. 464.

<sup>11</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," ix. Februarii, n. 28, p. 300.

<sup>12</sup> In the "Martyrologium Gallicanum."

<sup>13</sup> In his "Martyrologium Benedictinum."

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> In "Lignum Vitæ," lib. iii. Appendix.

<sup>2</sup> In "Menologium Scoticum." See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>3</sup> M. L. is quoted, for Dempster's statement, which means John Molanus.

<sup>4</sup> In "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum."

<sup>5</sup> Neither on this, nor on any other day, has he a notice of St. Congell, or St. Comgell, according to Colgan; but, the Bollandists observe, that he does not appear to have examined the additions of Molanus to Usuard. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ." De S. Congello Abbate, sed alio die colendo, p. 577.

<sup>7</sup> By Arnold Wion, who cites the Life of St. Malachias. There, however, allusion is only made to St. Comgall, who died several centuries, before St. Malachy was born.

<sup>8</sup> St. Malachy O'Morgair, whose Life is given, at the 3rd of November.

in Ireland, after the middle of the seventh century. The year for his birth has been assigned to 668. He seems to have been a monk, at Iona, after the beginning of the eighth century. Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have given some notices, concerning this St. Failbeus, the second Abbot of Iona, bearing the name,<sup>3</sup> at the 10th of March. In the year 722, the Annals of Iona record his being elected, as superior of the abbey; but, as Rev. Dr. Reeves<sup>4</sup> explains, only as a coadjutor abbot, under Faelcu,<sup>5</sup> son of Dorbene. Colgan will have it, that Failbe held such a position, for seven years; yet, most probably, only for two, as St. Cillene Fada was elected abbot, A.D. 724. On the 10th of March, the name of Failbe, bec, Abbot of Ia, is found set down in the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>6</sup> and of Marianus O'Gorman. Again we meet Failbhe, Abbot of Ia, mentioned in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> on this day. The epithet "small," attaching to his name, seems to imply, that he was a person of diminutive proportions. This saint died, A.D. 754, according to the Annals of the Four Masters,<sup>8</sup> after he had completed the eighty-seventh year of his age. He was also called Feidlimidh.

ARTICLE XIV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. BESSOGUS, A BISHOP. In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 10th of March, a St. Bessogus is commemorated. On the authority of Floratius, Father Henry Fitzsimon calls him a bishop, at the same date.<sup>1</sup> I feel satisfied, that here there must be a mistake of spelling for St. Kessogus, the bishop, whose festival is set down, for the present day.

ARTICLE XV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. LIVENUS. The name Livenus occurs, in the Catalogue of our national Saints, at the 10th of March, as we find in O'Sullivan Beare's history;<sup>1</sup> yet, elsewhere, I find nothing confirmatory of this authority.

ARTICLE XVI.—FESTIVAL OF ST. CONSTANTINE. At the 10th of March, in the ancient Irish Church, was observed the festival of a St. Constantine, as appears from an entry in the "Feilire."<sup>1</sup> Yet, in the Bollandist collection, there is no mention of a St. Constantine, at this date.

<sup>1</sup> The festival of St. Bernard is kept, on the 20th of August.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, p. 72, 73.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," x. Martii. De S. Failbeo sive Falveo Abbate Hiensi, p. 576.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 2.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., sect. v., p. 502.

<sup>4</sup> See Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba." Additional Notes, O. Chronicon Hyense, pp. 382, 385, 386.

<sup>5</sup> His feast occurs, it is supposed by Colgan, at the 3rd of April.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp.

72, 73.

<sup>8</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 356, 357.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 52.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> The following Irish stanza, from the "Leabhar Breac" copy, with its English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

†. iii. 10. Do rognao co hainliu
Constantin cam cionolech
Lar a fith eo anglech
Crano cnoiche in choimseo.

He was called to the angels Constantine, the chaste, the luminous,
By whom found the angelic
yew,
The tree of the Cross of the Lord.

ARTICLE XVII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. KENNOCHA, VIRGIN, COILA, SCOTLAND. [Tenth or Eleventh Century.] At the 10th of March, David Camerarius<sup>1</sup> has a notice of St. Kennocha, a Virgin, whose memory was celebrated in Coila, a province of Scotia.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists have a notice,<sup>3</sup> at this date, but they refer her festival, to the 13th of March, which is more in accord with the Scottish Kalendars.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE XVIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. ATTALA, ABBOT OF BOBBIO, ITALY. At Bobbio, for the 10th of March, Dempster<sup>1</sup> has a festival of the Abbot Attala, who succeeded St. Columbanus,<sup>2</sup> and who, he states, is thought to have been a Scot. However, Jonas, who has written the Life of both holy abbots, distinctly states, that Attala was a noble by birth, and belonging to the Kingdom of Burgundy; so that, neither Scotland nor Ireland have any right to claim him as a countryman. The Bollandists,<sup>3</sup> giving a previous commentary of their own,<sup>4</sup> insert his Acts,<sup>5</sup> by Jonas, in their great work, at this date.

Eleventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ÆNGUSIUS HAGIOGRAPHUS, OR ST. ÆNGUS THE CULDEE, BISHOP AND ABBOT AT CLONENAGH, AND ANCHORET, AT DYSARTENOS, OR AT DYSARTBEAGH, QUEEN'S COUNTY.

[EIGHTH AND NINTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—SOURCES OF BIOGRAPHY TO ILLUSTRATE THE ACTS OF ST. ÆNGUS—HIS PEDIGREE AND EARLY LIFE—HE STUDIES AT THE MONASTERY OF CLONENAGH—MONASTIC TRAINING AND LEARNING—ST. ÆNGUS RETIRES TO DYSARTBEAGH OR TO DYSART ENOS—HIS AUSTERITIES—HE VISITS THE CHURCH OF COOLBANAGHER—A VISION OF ANGELS—THE PURPOSE IT EVOKED.

THE value of a national literature, especially of the religious type, is the true and lasting power to suggest, to awaken, to touch the imagination, or the sympathies, to inform the minds, to link itself closely to the hearts of the people, who find lessons in the past, to guide their course for the present, and for a definite future. In our early monasteries, the cultivation of learning was ever based on the soundest of principles, for man's supernatural concerns were held to be paramount. We find, that the study of the Scriptures was universal, and their transcription was a passion. Manuscripts still remain, in sufficient numbers, to attest the taste and learning of those early monks.

ARTICLE XVII.—<sup>1</sup> In the Scottish entries of his Kalendar.

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 235.

<sup>3</sup> As they state, "memoratur in Gynecæo Arturi in Monasterio."

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

ARTICLE XVIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Menologium Scoticum." Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of November.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii x. De S. Attala Abbate Bobiensis in Italia Ordinis S. Columbanii, pp. 42 to 45.

<sup>4</sup> In five paragraphs.

<sup>5</sup> In two chapters and twelve paragraphs.

As pious and patriotic themes employed their thoughts and pens, a love for religion, for country, and for race, was perpetuated; while, our devotional and historic literature has been enriched with their contributions, and we are brought by links of fond sympathy, to commune intelligently with the spirit and society of ages, removed by over a thousand years, from that standpoint, which is occupied by the men of our time.

It seems not at all certain—indeed it is extremely doubtful—that the Feast and Acts of this very celebrated St. Ængusius Hagiographus, called also St. Ængus the Culdee, should be assigned to this day, and not rather to the 16th of February, where there is a St. Ænghas or Ængus, called Bishop of Rath-na n-Epscop, or perhaps to the 18th of February, where we have already set down notices of a St. Ængus, or St. Oengus, called Bishop of Drum-Rathe.<sup>1</sup> In the “Felire” of St. Ængus,<sup>2</sup> at this date, and by a fair inference, the entry occurring, which refers to Oengus, may throw his festival upon one or other of the saints’ days just noticed; since, both Ænguses are omitted there, in the metrical Calendar of the Hagiographer, thus leaving an open for the introduction of his own name, by later compilers. However, the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> of Marianus O’Gorman,<sup>4</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> record our Saint’s Feast, at this date, and so do most of the Hagiographical writers, who give his Life. Wherefore, we seem to have no other option, than accordance with so general an arrangement.

The Acts of this illustrious saint, known generally to Irish scholars, as Ængus the Hagiologist, have been published by Colgan, at the 11th of March.<sup>6</sup> The Bollandists,<sup>7</sup> Bishop Challenor,<sup>8</sup> the Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>9</sup> the Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>10</sup> have the Acts of St. Ængus, at the same date. Colgan doubted not, that the Life of Saint Ængus had been written, at full length, and that it had been accessible, at a more remote period; but, he complains, also, that this Life was not available, at the time he had been engaged, in publishing the Acts of our Irish Saints. However, the virtues of ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> The reader may revert, to what we have already written regarding both, at the respective dates specified.

<sup>2</sup> The following stanza, taken from the “Leabhar Breac” copy, has been translated also by Professor O’Looney:—

5. u. 10.    huc comitit ar piasat
                  Oengus ior flathuib
                  Liben, Senan iutham
                  Constantin ius Rathin.

They are companions of our Lord—
 Oengus amidst chieftains,
 Liben, and Senan, the everlasting,
 Constantine King of Rathin.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. The only entry regarding him found in the Martyrology of Tallagh, at the same date, is Ænghus, Eps. h Aibleni. This, of course, must have been an addition, or interpolation, to the original Calendar, said, at least in part, to have been composed by St. Ængus himself; and, the notice may have been inserted, long after his death.

<sup>4</sup> Marianus there calls our saint, the great Ængus, the descendant of Hoblen, Bishop.

Colgan adds: “In ipso etiam Ængussii Festilogio in quibusdam exemplaribus ponitur natalis hac die: sed illa insulsa additio est: quæ idcirco in vetustioribus exemplaribus non reperitur.”—“Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo Episcopo et Confessore, n. 15, p. 583. Perhaps, our suggestion is the better one, and it saves the authenticity of the “Felire,” in all its parts.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73. At the 11th of March, is there entered Ænghus Ua h Eblen, Bishop, who is called Ænghus Céle-dé. It was he, we are told, that composed the “Felire.”

<sup>6</sup> See Colgan’s “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo Episcopo et Confessore, pp. 579 to 583.

<sup>7</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii xi. De B. Ængussio Keledeo Abbate et Episcopo in Hibernia. A short prefatory notice, with Colgan’s account, is here given, pp. 85 to 88.

<sup>8</sup> See “Britannia Sancta,” part i., pp. 167 to 169.

<sup>9</sup> See “Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints,” vol. iii., March xi.

<sup>10</sup> See “Lives of the Saints,” vol. iii., pp. 217, 218.

Ængus have been specially recorded, by some old writer, who prefixes an argument or introduction to this saint's existing writings. Another Irish poet, likewise bearing the name of Ængus, has celebrated the Culdee's praises, in certain verses, sufficiently indicative of great antiquity. The author of this Metrical Life, in the penultimate verse of his panegyric on the saint, prays, that he may enjoy with his namesake the bliss of eternal life. He extols Ængus with surpassing encomium, stating that the saint was often engaged in colloquies with celestial spirits. He styles St. Ængus, the Sun of Western Europe. On account of those things related, which regard the studies of his youthful days, his daily and wonderful exercises, his rare humility and austerity, the day of his death, being feria sexta, the place of his burial, and such like notices, Colgan is under an impression, that the writer must have been a friend of St. Ængus, and that they must have lived contemporaneously. Wherefore, owing to the concurrences of time, of neighbourhood, and of great erudition, it is supposed, that the writer had been no other than Ængus, Abbot of Cluain-fearta-Molua, who died in the year 858.<sup>11</sup> From the metrical panegyric, and from that Scholiast, who wrote a preface to the Festilogium of Ængus, Colgan derived all his materials for the Life of this saint. A few particulars only are excepted, and these were drawn from other sources.<sup>12</sup>

Ængus the Culdee, sometimes named Ængusius Hagiographus, or Æneas, is said to have been descended from Coelbach, King of Ireland. A very ancient pedigree of this saint is still preserved, among our old Irish Manuscripts.<sup>13</sup> According to this, we are told, that St. Ængus was the son of Oengoba, son to Oblen, son of Fidru, son to Diarmuit, son of Ainmire, son to Cellar, son of Oengus, son to Natsluagh, son of Caelbad,<sup>14</sup> son to Crumbadrai, son of Eochaidh Cobai.<sup>15</sup> Such is St. Ængus' pedigree,<sup>16</sup> recorded in a preface to his "Felire," as contained in the Leabhar Breac, a Manuscript of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin. In Harris' Ware,<sup>17</sup> his father is called Oengobhan; and, we may also notice, that there is an account left us from an anonymous Scholiast, on the Festilogium of St. Ængus, as mentioned by Colgan, and who, in a somewhat different form, weaves this holy man's pedigree.<sup>18</sup> He quotes the "Sanctilogic Genealogy,"<sup>19</sup> as an authority. Thus, he sprung from the royal race of the Dalaradians in Ulster,<sup>20</sup> and he was born, about the middle of the eighth century. At Cluain-eidhneach, state the O'Clerys,<sup>21</sup> on the brink of the Eoir, in Laoighis, he was fostered; there he read his

<sup>11</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 492, 493.

<sup>12</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii, n. 5, p. 582.

<sup>13</sup> See Leabhar Breac, fol. 8, a col. 5, l. 30.—"Catalogue of Irish MSS. in the Royal Irish Academy," p. 598.

<sup>14</sup> He was of the Rudrician or Ultonian race, and he was monarch of Erin, having been slain, A.D. 357, by Eochaidh Muighmheadhoín. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 124, 125.

<sup>15</sup> See Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xvii., p. 363, and Appendix, No. cxi., p. 609.

<sup>16</sup> He belonged to the race of Irial, son of Connall Cearnach, according to the O'Clerys.

<sup>17</sup> See vol. ii. "The Writers of Ireland," book i., p. 51.

<sup>18</sup> It is given in these words: "S. Ængusius filius Ængavani, F. Hoblenii, F. Fidrai, F. Diermitii, F. Annmirechi, F. Cellarii, F. Ængussii, F. Natsluagii, F. Coelbadii, F. Crunnii Badhraí, F. Eochadii Cobhae, F. Lugadii, F. Rossii, F. Imchadii, F. Fethlenidii, F. Cassii, F. Fiach Aradii, a quo Dalaradiorum familia nominatur." See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii, nn. 1, 3, p. 582.

<sup>19</sup> Chapter xxiii.

<sup>20</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo Episcopo et Confessore, cap. i., p. 579.

<sup>21</sup> They superadd, as authority, "according to this verse, which is in a poem." It begins:—

"Delightful to sit here around him,
By the side of the cold clear Eoir," &c.
"It is at Cluain eidhneach he was nursed;
At Cluain-eidhneach he was buried;
At Cluain-eidhneach of many crosses,
He read his psalms first."

psalms first, and there he was afterwards buried. Thus, we may probably infer, that his birth took place, near the celebrated monastery, founded by St. Fintan.<sup>22</sup>

From the dawning perceptions of childhood, Ængus felt an earnest desire of devoting himself to a religious life. He practised mortification, to an extraordinary degree, even in his youth; and, he conceived most exalted ideas of Christian perfection, the attainment of which was an object, ever uppermost in his mind. Almost from infancy, he deserved the appellation Culdee,<sup>23</sup> or worshipper of God, which surname he afterwards bore. It has been stated,<sup>24</sup> that the surname Ceile De, given to Ængus, indicated an office, or a particular sort of profession, and that he was one of that clerical body, who had been afterwards called Culdees.<sup>25</sup> However, according to Rev. Dr. Lanigan, the title, Ceile De, as applied to Ængus, had nothing to do with them; and, he thinks, it is more than probable, about that time, there was not as yet any such institution as the Culdees, in their corporate capacity. Dr. Lanigan maintains, that the Culdees were the secular canons of cathedral or collegiate churches, such as those we call prebendaries. He thinks it a palpable mistake to suppose, that they were a monastic order.<sup>26</sup>

About this time, the great Monastery of Clonenagh—incorrectly said to have been in East Meath, by Bishop Challenor,<sup>27</sup> and by others to have been in Ossory, but rather it should be stated, in Leix—then under direction of the saintly Abbot Malathgenius,<sup>28</sup> enjoyed a high reputation, both for the number and sanctity of its inmates.<sup>29</sup> Ængus preferred his suit for admission within its enclosure, and his request was favourably received. But his early novitiate, in the exercise of all virtues, had preceded the care bestowed by that holy abbot, on his youthful disciple. His daily progress in the paths of Christian sanctity, and his advancement in sacred learning, were aided by application and capacity, to such an extraordinary degree, that in a short time, Ængus bore the reputation of being one among the most sanctified and erudite men, of whom Ireland could then boast. Our saint must have been his disciple before the year 767,<sup>30</sup> since this is the period, to which the demise of Maelathgen has been referred.<sup>31</sup>

<sup>22</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of February.

<sup>23</sup> The Keledei, Cele de, Cælicolæ, or Colidei, first appear as "Culdees," in the eighth century. They were the socii, mariti, or servi of God, which is the meaning of the word "Ceile."

<sup>24</sup> By Toland, in "Nazarenus," Letter ii., sect. 3.

<sup>25</sup> After citing various proofs and illustrations, William F. Skene arrives at the conclusion, "that the Culdees originally sprang from that ascetic order who adopted a solitary service of God in an isolated cell as the highest form of religious life, and who were termed Deicolæ; that they then became associated in communities of anchorites, or hermits; that they were clerics, and might be called monks, but only in the sense in which anchorites were monks; that they made their appearance in the eastern districts of Scotland at the same time as the secular clergy were introduced, and succeeded the Columban monks who had been driven across the great mountain range of Drumalban, the western frontier of the Pictish kingdom; and that they were finally brought under the canonical rule along with the secular clergy, retaining, however, to some extent the nomenclature of the monastery, until at length the name of Keledeus, or Culdee, became almost synonymous with that of secular canon."—"Celtic Scotland: a History of Ancient Alban," vol. ii., chap. vi., p. 277.

<sup>26</sup> Dr. Lanigan adds: "Ængus's surname was peculiar to himself, unless it should be supposed that all that is said of his having been a monk, etc., is false. Many Irish names began with Ceile, Cele, or with the corresponding word Gila, followed by that of our Saviour or some Saint."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. x., n. 96, p. 248.

<sup>27</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 167.

<sup>28</sup> The feast of St. Malathgenius is observed, on the 21st of October.

<sup>29</sup> See an excellent memoir, chiefly taken from Colgan, and published in Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Dissertations chiefly on Irish Church History." Edited by Rev. D. M'Carthy, D.D., pp. 209 to 219.

An ingenious and a distinguished French writer,<sup>32</sup> capable from his peculiar line of study to pronounce opinions on this subject, has ably vindicated the progress made in sacred learning and science, among the pupils of our early schools. When the Celt became a Christian and a monk, his love of numbers still remained, and his conceptions becoming spiritualized by aspirations after perfection, which he daily breathed heavenward, poetic inspiration was the happy result. Study with manual labour divided cloistral occupations, and through study, this inspiration became fruitful. The saints of Ireland, intent only on making their disciples spiritual men, one day found to their surprise they had created poets. The genius of these poets was varied, as the crowd of strangers that thronged the schools. Their compositions may be reduced, under the heads of didactic poetry, lyrical poetry, Amras or panegyrics, legends strictly so called, Felires or Festilogies, visions, and navigations or voyages. All these have their special features of interest and edification. However, owing to various causes, facts were now and then changed into fictions. But M. de la Villemarque is far from agreeing with those, who consider romances regarding the saints as worthless. According to him, the portraits of saints simply underwent the fate of all heroes belonging to early ages; and yet, between the sacred and profane legends, there exists a great difference. In what profane legend do we ever find an express caution to the reader, that, beside the literal and historical sense, there is also a spiritual meaning to be drawn from the narrative? <sup>33</sup> That delicate and sound morality, which marks the legends of the Breton and Irish Saints, has been specially dwelt on by a modern critic. For freshness, richness of invention, and national characteristics, no Church has aught to compare with them. And all Celtic scholars will acknowledge this high degree of praise to be fully deserved.

Accounts which are given, respecting the miracles and sanctity of Ængus, and the evidences of his learning that yet remain, are more than equalled by that profound humility, which led him to form a most abject opinion regarding his own deserts. The manner, in which he renounced this world and the applause of mankind, must deserve unbounded admiration, although it may fail to induce the imitation of all professing Christians. His mind was replenished with heavenly graces, and he was favoured with celestial visions. He combined the rare gifts of profound wisdom and of singular zeal, in all his actions and affections; while, it would be a difficult question to decide, whether his virtues were greater than his miracles, in sight both of God and of man. One thing, however, is certain, that the nobility of his descent was more than surpassed by the lustre of his virtues.

After spending a course of religious training, and of sacred study, at <sup>30</sup> The death of "Maelithgen, Abbot of Cluain-Eidhneach," occurred, in the year 767. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i, pp. 370, 371.

<sup>31</sup> That other Ængus, who wrote the eulogy of our saint in elegant metre, has told us, Ængus the Culdee studied from boyhood in the monastery of Clonenagh; and, afterwards, when he had been celebrated for his miracles, he lived in the monastery of Tallagh, before St. Melruan's death, A.D. 787. It is supposed, therefore, to follow, that he studied in the monastery of Clonenagh, under the aforesaid abbot. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo Episcopo et Confessore, n. 4, p. 582.

<sup>32</sup> M. de la Villemarque, of the French Institute, has published a most interesting article, on the Poetry of the Celtic Cloisters. It appeared, in the November number of Le Correspondant, for 1863.

<sup>33</sup> M. de la Villemarque shows, that Dante fully realized this double nature of the ancient legends.

"Ye of intellect,
Sound and entire, mark well the lore conceal'd
Under close texture of the mystic strain."

— Inferno, canto ix., 62.—Cary's Translation.

<sup>34</sup> The old church in this parish of Dysart-

Clonenagh, the holy disciple felt called, by Heaven, to a state of higher perfection. Some six or seven miles from Clonenagh, and at a place, since called after him Dysartenos,<sup>34</sup> it is stated, that Ængus had built a cell<sup>35</sup> for himself. Thither he frequently retired, to put in practice, unknown and unnoticed, those rigorous observances which he followed. However, it may not be improbable, that the place of his first retreat was much nearer to Clonenagh, and that it was not far from the River Nore. The anonymous Scholiast, already mentioned, calls it Disert Ænguis; and, the other Ængus, who wrote our saint's eulogy, writes it down as Disert-Bethech.<sup>36</sup> He likewise indicates, that it lay very near to Clonenagh; and, indeed, the present townland of Dysartbeytagh, or Dysartbeagh,<sup>37</sup> on which the town of Mount-rath stands, must furnish this site, now apparently lost. Colgan, in a very shrewd conjecture, supposed it was not distinct from Clonenagh;<sup>38</sup> yet, it was separated by the distance of a mile, or perhaps two miles, and he allows, that St. Ængus died perchance, and had been buried, at Disert Bethdech. Again, our Annals<sup>39</sup> certainly show, that another Desertum Ængussii differed from Cluain-edhneach, and, even from Disert Bethdech, or from Dysart-Enos, in the Queen's County.

The locality of this holy cœnobite's cell hence derived its name, Dysartenos, or the desert of Ængus, which it yet retains, supposing we are correct in assigning the habitation there, to the present, and not to a different, St. Ængus. A broken range of limestone hills, of romantic and rugged outline, probably suggested to him the idea of its suitableness as a place for seclusion and retreat. At this day, the scenes of his retirement present an aspect of solitude and grandeur, the effect of which must have been considerably heightened in that early age.<sup>40</sup> At present, on a slope of those hills, the old graveyard of Dysart, thickly studded over with headstones, tombs, and graves, may be seen there; and, even yet, it is much resorted to for the interment of enos lay within the townland of Dysart, barony of Maryborough West. The parish is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 13, 14, 18, 19. The townland is on Sheets 13, 18.

<sup>35</sup> That he built a cell for himself at Dysart Enos may be inferred, not only from the expression of Colgan, "coluit eremum," but also from a statement that he recited the first fifty psalms "in oratorio," and the second fifty, "sub diu juxta proceram arborum oratorio adjacentem." See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo Episcopo et Confessore, cap. iii., p. 579.

<sup>36</sup> The site of this old church is hardly known, with any degree of accuracy, at present; although the student and topographer may see it marked, on Sir William Petty's Map of the district. The writer has been shown a spot, near the Brigittine Convent, at Mountrath, where tradition has it, that a church formerly stood; but, he is inclined to believe, that Disert-Bethech lay still nearer to the River Nore, as the Map seems to indicate. However, from the most careful enquiries prosecuted among the people there, every trace of its existence appears to be lost. To the writer's conception, its site was quite near the present Castletown, yet on the north bank of the Nore.

<sup>37</sup> This townland, in the united parishes of Clonenagh and Clonagheen, barony of Maryborough West, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 16, 17.

<sup>38</sup> Alluding to the Scholiast's statement, as Colgan adds, "vel forte ab ipso non esse diversum, in quatenus ait in S. Ængussium esse in jam memorato deserto (et non addit quod non in Cluain-edhneach), et educatum et sepultum."

<sup>39</sup> These record, that Conn, son of Mael-padraig, Archinnee of Disert-Oenghusa and of Mungairit, died A.D. 1033. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii, n. 6, p. 52; and O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 820, 827. In a note (y) ibid., I am certain, Dr. O'Donovan fell into an error, by identifying the latter Disert-Aengusa, with Dysart-Enos, in the Queen's County. I feel satisfied, the Disert-Aengussa and Mungairit, already named, were both situated within the present county of Limerick. The former lay near Ballingarry, and the latter near Limerick city.

<sup>40</sup> Near the Dysart Hills lies a beautiful demesne, called Lamberton Park. Here, during the Wizard of the North's tour

deceased Catholics. No doubt, the very old parish church occupied this site. From or near this elevated position, the ruins of Clonenagh's "seven churches" are clearly visible under favouring circumstances. In what part of Dysartenos parish the cell of Ængus, or monastery, if such, was situated, the antiquary is not likely to discover. Many remains of curious old monuments, Dysart Church and Graveyard, Queen's County.

however, are yet standing in the immediate neighbourhood. If I might be allowed to offer a conjecture, St. Ængus possibly selected for his cell the site, on which the former Protestant Church of Dysart, erected during the last century, may now be seen, as a comparatively modern ruin.<sup>42</sup> Unroofed and desolate, yet surrounded by a serviceable cemetery wall, the tourist can penetrate to its interior ;<sup>42</sup> and, there, he will find the projecting foundations of a former and of a smaller building, which was probably of a very ancient type. An extensive tract of morass and bog now intervenes, between the ruins of Clonenagh's old monastery and Dysartenos. This moorland must formerly have rendered access, between both places, a matter of some difficulty. In this favourite retreat, we are told by his biographers, Ængus was in the habit of through Ireland, in 1825, he was hospitably entertained, by a former proprietor, the Right Hon. Judge Moore, as may be seen, by consulting Lockhart's "Life of Sir Walter Scott," chap. lxiii. What Lockhart forgets to state, however, is yet traditionally remembered in this neighbourhood. Sir Walter is said to have expressed himself, as being highly gratified, by the scenic beauty of all this surrounding locality ; and, it must be allowed, few persons had truer perceptions of taste and judgment, in reference to an opinion or a thought about such matters.

<sup>42</sup> Not many years back, and within the writer's memory, the few Protestant parishioners here were accustomed to hold their meetings within it. When Sir Charles Coote wrote his "Statistical Survey of the Queen's County," in 1801, he describes Dysart church, as standing "on one of the lofty hills of the same name, with a square tower or steeple, which has a very picturesque appearance." Chap. ix., sect. iv., p. 117.

<sup>42</sup> In his boyhood years, often had the writer, quite unaware of Dysart's historical interest, visited the spot, and on more than one occasion attended at funerals there. During his last visit, in July, 1873, he took the accompanying sketch, transferred to the wood, and engraved by Gregor Grey, Dublin. The Devil's Bit Mountain, Tipperary, looms in the distance. It formerly went by the name of Barnane Ely.

making three hundred genuflections, each day, and of reciting the entire Psalter. This latter office he divided into three separate portions: the first was said within the cell; the second under a spreading tree of large growth, that cast its branches over his rude habitation; and the third he repeated, whilst tied by the neck to a stake, with half of his body plunged in a tub of cold water. Besides these extraordinary practices, he was continually employed in singing the praises of God, and in acquiring such an ascendancy over his passions, that to all, save himself, Ængus seemed to be an angel, concealed in human form. Another and a learned authority has stated, that after leaving Clonenagh, St. Ængus travelled into Munster, and that he founded the church of Disert Aengusa, at a place situated near Ballingarry,<sup>43</sup> in the present county of Limerick.<sup>44</sup> We are told, also, that the primitive belfry, or round tower of this church, yet remains. There are good reasons for believing, however, that the latter church must have had its name, from some other saint, or person, named Ængus; for, the present holy man is known to have settled, not far from Clonenagh—in fact, so very near, that the localities Clonenagh and Dysartenos have been confounded, by ancient scholiasts on his works.<sup>45</sup> Other circumstances, relating to his Acts and incidents of his Life, probably serve to confirm our conclusions, that he lived, for some short time, at least, in Dysartenos, a parish so denominated, near the celebrated Rock and Castle of Dunamase,<sup>46</sup> and a few miles from the county town of Maryborough.<sup>47</sup>

The fame of his sanctity diffused itself, to most distant parts of the country. Numbers flocked towards his retreat, to enjoy the pious conversation and exhortations of this holy anchorite, and to derive from his example and instructions those lessons of virtue, which he could so well inculcate. Fearing the suggestions of vain-glory, and finding it a matter of utter impossibility to enjoy, in his present abode, that perfect seclusion desired, in the practice of his austerities and devotions, Ængus took the resolution of departing in a secret manner, towards some other place of retirement.

Before his departure, however, and on the route to his selected retreat, it was his intention to visit the church of Coolbanagher,<sup>48</sup> for the purpose of <sup>43</sup> There are two parishes, bearing this name in Limerick County. One is situated, in the barony of Upper Connello, and it is defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheets 29, 30, 37, 38. The other is in the barony of Coshlea, and it is shown, on Sheets 48, 49, 57, ibid.

<sup>44</sup> See Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xvii., p. 364.

<sup>45</sup> "All the country about Cluainénach for many miles, was, in the memory of men yet living, a great forest. * * * * Desert Ængus (though the name be now lost) was some part of this great wood."—Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., pp. 51, 52, note D. Harris lived in the earlier part of the last century, when his principal works were published. He intimates, likewise, that the place of his birth was at or near Brittas, where his father, Captain Lieutenant Hopton Harris of the Militia, took part in an engagement, during the Jacobite and Williamite wars in 1691. See Walter Harris' "History of the Life and Reign of William the Third," book ix., pp. 316, 317. Hence, we may take it for granted, this writer had a good local knowledge respecting Clonenagh and Dysart Enos. But, because he did not advert to the possible identity of the later denomination with Desart Ængus, he thought this place where St. Ængus resided could not then be identified.

<sup>46</sup> Here stand the ruined walls of the great fortress of the O'Moores, formerly Chiefs of Leix. A more particular account of the place will be found, in the "Legend Lays of Ireland," by Lageniensis, No. x. A Legend of Dunamase, pp. 65 to 73. A sketch of the Barbican of Dunamase, by Samuel Lover, R.H.A., and a historical article accompanying, by John D'Alton, will be found in "The Irish Penny Magazine," vol. i., No. 3, pp. 17, 18. This place lies within the parish of Dysartenos, and it is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheet 13.

<sup>47</sup> In the parish of Burris, and barony of Maryborough East, is found, ibid.

<sup>48</sup> This place is connected, it is thought, with a St. Lughach or Lughaidh, whose offering up prayers to that God, whom he so faithfully served. Whilst engaged in this exercise, a vision of angels appeared to him. These blessed spirits seemed to surround a particular tomb. Celestial songs were heard by him, at the same time, the ravishing harmony of which gave him a foretaste of canticles, intoned by the beatified in heaven. He noted the tomb thus distinguished, and immediately directed his steps to a priest, serving the church. Ængus made enquiries, regarding the name and character of the deceased. He soon learned, that the occupant of the tomb in question had been in early life a warrior,<sup>49</sup> who retired from the profession of arms, and who had devoted himself to a life of penance. This soldier of Christ had closed a long life of holy and spiritual warfare, a few days before such event. Ængus was still more desirous to learn the practices, devotions, and penitential exercises of that soldier. His curiosity being gratified, he was unable to discover anything very unusual, in these his religious observances, with the exception of a practice, followed each morning and night, which was that of invoking the prayers of all saints, whose names occurred to his memory. From this relation, given by the priest, the idea of composing a metrical hymn, in honour of all the saints, took possession of the mind of Ængus.<sup>50</sup> This hymn, only as yet a mental conception, he intended to repeat to his death, although his sincere humility deterred him from the immediate prosecution of his meditated project. Ængus, we are told, judged himself unfitted for such a task, and he also feared, that the praises of the saints might be commemorated, in a manner, hardly suited to the dignity and importance of his subject.

CHAPTER II.

ST. ÆNGUS PROCEEDS TO THE MONASTERY OF TALLAGH—HE SEEKS ADMISSION THERE IN GUISE OF A SERVANT MANUAL LABOUR AT AGRICULTURAL OPERATIONS—HIS HUMILITY AND MORTIFICATIONS—AN ACCIDENT WHICH BEFEL HIM, AND HIS MIRACULOUS CURE—THE INCIDENT WHICH FIRST DISCOVERED ST. ÆNGUS TO THE HOLY ABBOT ST. MELRUAN—FRIENDSHIP THENCEFORTH EXISTING BETWEEN THEM—ST. ÆNGUS WAS PROBABLY ORDAINED PRIEST AT TALLAGH.

At this time, St. Molruan<sup>1</sup> presided over a great monastery, on Tallagh Hill, in the present county of Dublin. Towards that religious house, our saint festival occurs, at the 6th of October, where a fuller description may be found. This parish, in the barony of Portnahinch, is defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 4, 8, 9, 13, 14. The townland proper is on Sheets 8, 13, ibid.

<sup>49</sup> Instead of the buried person being called a "soldier," according to an account, found in Professor O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," he is said to have been "a poor old man, who formerly lived at the place. 'What good did he do?' said Aengus. 'I saw no particular good by him,' said the priest, 'but that his customary practice was to recount and invoke the saints of the world, as far as he could remember them, at his going to bed and getting up, in accordance with the custom of the old devotees.' 'Ah! my God,' said Aengus, 'he who would make a poetical composition in praise of the saints should doubtless have a high reward, when so much has been vouchsafed to the efforts of this holy devotee!' And Aengus then commenced his poem on the spot. He subsequently continued it gradually, and finished it as we have already seen." Lect. xvii., p. 365.

<sup>50</sup> To this incident, allusion has been made, by Thomas D'Arcy M'Gee, in that beautiful dirge, composed on the lamented death of his friend, Professor Eugene O'Curry, and which is included in the American edition of his "Poems:"—

"Let those who love and lose him most,
In their great sorrow comfort find,
Remembering how heaven's mighty host
Were ever present to his mind;
Descending on his grave at even,
May they a radiant phalanx see—
Such wondrous sight as once was given
In vision to the rapt Culdee."

proceeded. He appeared at the monastery gate, and he begged admission, among the members of its religious fraternity, in quality of lay brother, according to Colgan<sup>2</sup> and Harris;<sup>3</sup> although Dr. Lanigan tells us. that such a title was unknown in religious houses before the eleventh century.<sup>4</sup> Studiously concealing both his name, and that of the monastery, in which he had hitherto lived, Ængus was well aware, that his fame had already extended to the institute of Tallagh, which was then in its infancy. Wherefore, he assumed a habit, calculated most effectually to disguise his real condition. He concealed the fact of his enrolment in the ecclesiastical order, and he appeared as a serving man, seeking for employment. This holy servant of Christ was permitted to prove his vocation for a religious life, by engaging in the most laborious and meanest offices, connected with the monastery. These duties, however, he cheerfully executed, and he devoted unremitting attention to their most careful performance. He was principally employed at field labour, and in the farm-yard, belonging to the monastery; for, we are told, that with the sweat of his brow, he was found as a reaper of corn during the harvest, that he bore the sheaves on his back to the barn, that he afterwards threshed out the grain, and winnowed chaff therefrom, placing what had been thus prepared in sacks. Like a beast of burden, he carried those sacks on his back, sometimes to the granary, and sometimes to the mill. This mill and a kiln, he had charge of by Melruan's orders.<sup>5</sup> During all these labours, this devout and humble brother found time to raise his heart and thoughts towards heaven. This ark of hidden wisdom considered himself, as only fitted to discharge the mean offices, to which of choice he was subjected. These daily toils showed his complete self-abnegation, and his contempt for the opinion of worldlings. During his labours, this humble workman was scantily clothed. His countenance was often disguised, owing to the combined effects of sweat and dust, which covered his features. But, he had neither the vanity nor inclination to appear well looking, in the presence of his brethren. Nor would he devote any time to the decoration of his person. He allowed the hair on his head to grow long, tangled and uncombed; the chaffy dust and straws of the field and barn, he would not even remove from his clothes. Thus, Ængus put into practical operation the virtues of his monastic profession; for, it was only by these means, he could induce worldlings to believe, that he was the most abject and vile of all creatures, having more the appearance of a monster, than of a human being. An extraordinary love of mortification was united with ecstatic flames of Divine love, in the soul of this great vessel of election; and, hence, he

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 7th of July.

<sup>2</sup> Colgan says, he applied for admission, "inter conversos,"—"Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo, Episcopo et Confessore, cap. v., p. 581.

<sup>3</sup> Taking his account from Colgan, Harris states, that he was received, "by the Abbot Mælrúan, as a lay brother."—Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., p. 52.

<sup>4</sup> "In older times some monks, it is true, were raised more or less to the clerical ranks, and the number of such promotions appears to have increased with the course of ages; but there was not as yet any radical distinction of classes in the religious institutions, so as that one of them was perpetually debarred from any ecclesiastical promotion, and destined to toil in the fields and elsewhere as subordinate to the other, and, in fact, as servants of the clerical or higher class."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. x., n. 95, pp. 247, 248.

<sup>5</sup> See, Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," Lect. xvii., p. 365. The author of this learned work declares, that he saw the ruins of this mill and kiln, in their primitive dimensions, and that only a few years have passed by, since those venerable relics have yielded to "the improving hand of modern progress."

<sup>6</sup> See Laoithe Fianntitheachta, edited

merited the title of Kele-De, which he obtained, and which may be rendered, "a lover of God." With an humble spirit, in a mortified body, a light radiated the interior of his soul. Yet, this light was destined to escape from the close sanctuary, within which it had hitherto beamed.

Meantime, it may be well to relate, that the Almighty was pleased to reward the virtues of his servant, and by the testimony of a surprising miracle. For, at one time, while this holy monk was engaged in a neighbouring wood, and when cutting down branches for the use of his monastery, it happened, that he held with the left hand a branch, which he wished to separate from the trunk of a tree, and the axe, grasped in his right hand, glanced from the object, against which it had been directed. This incautious stroke resulted in severing the left hand from his body. We are told, the very birds, in the wood, by a sort of preternatural instinct, had formed an attachment towards St. Ængus, on account of his innocent demeanour. Perhaps, the holy man had often lightened his out-door labours, by chaunting the psalmody of the Church—probably adapted to verses of his own composition. Those feathered warblers, the thrushes or blackbirds—so often celebrated in Ossianic song<sup>6</sup>—had made the dells and brakes around Glenasmoil<sup>7</sup> and Tallagh resound with dulcet melody, while spring and summer breezes loaded the air with agreeable perfume, from mountain herbs and shrubs. Their strains were often stilled, when more solemn and pathetic notes, from "a son of song," agreeably called forth the natural echoes, which resounded through wooded hill-sides and hollows, surrounding St. Melruan's monastery. Those songsters of the grove and thicket will rest with listening ear, and love to linger near any spot, where the humble field-labourer pours forth the unpremeditated lay, with a clear and modulated voice. If not disturbed, those woodland minstrels even desire human companionship and vocalism of a perfect character. We cannot doubt, the Christian's heart was naturally gentle and toned with refined feeling, while the poet's soul and senses were attuned to all the soft and sweet influences of wild scenery and its charming accessories. Sometimes, it is said, even ravens flap their wings with affright, when from a distance they scent human blood. A mysterious sympathy frequently unites irrational to rational creatures. At the moment his accident befel Ængus, birds flocked around, and, by their screams and cries, seemed to bewail the pure and angelic man's misfortune. Full of confidence in the power and goodness of God, without hesitation, Ængus took up the hand which had been lopped off, and at once set it, in its proper place, at the extremity of his mutilated arm. Instantly, it adhered, and recovered its former power, as if no accident whatever had befallen him. Hereupon Ængus poured forth his soul, in praise and thanksgiving, to the great Preserver of all creatures.<sup>8</sup> Our popular traditions, especially referring to the saints, often savour of exaggeration. The Irish people have loved and admired purity and holiness, while they have implicit faith in the sovereign power of God towards and over his elect. The foregoing miracle—one of the few miracles recorded about our saint, although he is said to have wrought many—may be classed with our Legenda Sanctorum. Probably, its rationale might accord better with the fact, that St. Ængus had almost chopped the left hand from his arm, but that he had by John O'Daly, n. 1, p. 4, "Transactions of the Ossianic Society for the year 1856," vol. iv.

<sup>7</sup> The ancient name of that romantically beautiful valley, at the sources of the River Dodder.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagio-grapho, Episcopo et Confessore, cap. vi., p. 580.

<sup>9</sup> Dr. Lanigan undertakes to explain the circumstance of this boy's proficiency in his lesson, owing to the help he derived from Ængus. See, "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. x., p. 246. At note 97 he adds: "It is thus, I immediately bandaged and united these members of his body, so nearly dissevered, and yet so fortunately preserved for future use. In the case of wounds, eminent surgeons allow, that very dangerous ones are often healed by prompt attention, and by a recuperative energy, found in the human body itself. If a piece of flesh be totally cut away, and soon after applied to the place whence taken, both parts will again unite. By the popular rumour, the cure of St. Ængus has been pronounced miraculous. However it had been effected, we cannot fail to recognise the Almighty's bounty, towards a favoured servant, who was destined to effect still greater good, and to acquire additional merits, before his day of deliverance from earth had arrived.

St. Ængus continued to exercise his usual austerities, and he remained unknown to the monks, and to the rest of mankind, for seven whole years. At length, an unusual occurrence betrayed the secret he seemed so anxious to conceal. Whilst Ængus was at work one day in the monastery barn, a scholar, who had not thoroughly prepared his lesson, and who as a consequence was afraid to appear in school, applied for admission and concealment, at least during that day. When Ængus learned the cause of this boy's uneasiness, he spoke kindly and with cheering assurances : pressing the child to his bosom, he contrived to lull the truant to sleep. After some time, this boy was awakened, and desired to repeat his lesson.<sup>9</sup> He proceeded in the task, repeated every word to the end, and this was done without hesitation or difficulty. The affectionate, kind, and patient teacher was probably exemplified, in the case of Ængus ; and hence, the child might have been encouraged to greater mental exercise, by his instructions, and through the excellent method he took in communicating them. Ængus exacted from this pupil a promise of silence regarding these circumstances, and recommended him immediately to seek his teacher. The latter, on examination of his disciple, found him very well prepared on this day—an occurrence of rare result in the boy's course of training. His master, no less a personage than the Abbot, St. Melruan, insisted on learning the cause of his forwardness, at this particular juncture. Awed by the abbot's authority and earnest manner, the boy revealed the circumstances of his case, as they had actually occurred. By a sudden inspiration, a belief in the identity of this disguised monk, with the missing Ængus of Dysartenos, rushed upon the mind of the superior over the Tallagh community. He ran immediately to the barn, and embraced Ængus with most tender affection, lavishing on him reproaches, which love and admiration could alone dictate. Ængus was blamed for those long-borne and humiliating, though willing, services rendered to the community, and for that false humility, which deprived it of the learning and experience, possessed by so great a master of science and of the spiritual life. Ængus fell on his knees, at the feet of Abbot Melruan, when he begged and obtained pardon for those faults, which merited loving reproaches. From that time forward, they became bosom friends, and unconscious rivals in that holy ambition, by which a true saint is ever prompted.<sup>10</sup>

Although Ængus is said to have become a professed monk in Clonenagh Monastery,<sup>11</sup> and to have concealed the fact of his enrolment in the ecclesiasthink, that the anecdote related in Ængus' Acts ought to be understood. The boy's improvement is indeed stated as miraculous, and as a supernatural consequence of his having slept for awhile on the bosom of Ængus. But, it can be well accounted for without recurring to a miracle." Ibid., p. 248.

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiogra-

nixæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo, Episcopo et Confessore, cap. vii., viii., ix., p. 580.

<sup>11</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. ix., p. 245.

<sup>12</sup> Regarding the first statement, Colgan says of him, "Monachum professus in nobili monasterio de Cluain-edhneach," and in the tical order, when he sought admission to Melruan's monastery at Tallagh,<sup>12</sup> it is probable, our saint had only received clerical tonsure, or at most minor orders, when he first left Dysartenos. Were Ængus advanced to the priesthood, at this period of life, a necessity for celebrating the holy Sacrifice of Mass very frequently,<sup>13</sup> with the performance of other peculiar sacerdotal functions, must soon have revealed his rank to Abbot Melruan, and to the members of his community. Even were those solitary or strictly private Masses, formerly permitted to be celebrated in many ancient churches,<sup>14</sup> allowed as a practice in our early religious houses, the secret of our saint's priestly ordination could not long be concealed. It is more difficult to comprehend how, as a monk, he had not been questioned, on the subject of his having already received the peculiar and noticeable ecclesiastical tonsure. However, there can hardly be any doubt, after Abbot Melruan discovered the real name, virtues, and learning of his highly-gifted disciple, with his dispositions for the office, Ængus must soon have been raised to the sacerdotal dignity. For want of more complete records, referring to our saint's biography, and not having seen many early or sufficiently authentic copies of his works, and with little serving for autobiography in his own writings, our present imperfect lights, regarding his private acts, occasionally require us to launch upon a sea of conjecture.

CHAPTER III.

LITERARY PURSUITS OF ST. ÆNGUS—THE MARTYROLOGY OF TALLAGH—HE ENGAGES ON THE FELIRE OR FESTILOGY—PRESENTS A COPY OF IT TO FOTHADIOUS THE CANONIST—PROBABLE DATE, ORIGIN, AND OBJECT OF THE FELIRE—TREATISE OF ST. ÆNGUS, "DE SANCTIS HIBERNIÆ"—THE "SALTAIR-NA-RANN"—PEDIGREES OR CATALOGUES OF IRISH SAINTS, AND POEMS, ATTRIBUTED TO HIS AUTHORSHIP.

THE literary labours, in which St. Ængus engaged, have given him very great celebrity through after times; but, in all probability, he had not formed the most remote idea, regarding this merited renown, at the period when he lived. His works are of exceeding value, not only as having been composed, in a comparatively remote age; but, because the subjects on which they treat give them a historical value and importance, even of which ancient pieces can rarely boast. Fiction is too often blended with fact, in many such tracts, and to the great prejudice of their authenticity. Numerous saints, that adorned the early Irish Church, are named in his writings, and records of those holy personages are thus preserved, for the veneration of posterity. While his own name has been exalted by his various works, the country that second instance, "clericale institutum occultans." See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo, Episcopo et Confessore, cap. ii., v., pp. 579, 580.

<sup>13</sup> See that very learned treatise of Cardinal Bona, "Rerum Liturgicarum de his quæ ad Missam generatim spectant," lib. i., cap. iv., pp. 203, 204, for proofs of frequently offering the Holy Victim of propitiation, and from the earliest ages of the Christian Church. "Opera Omnia" Emin. Dom. D. Joannis Bona, S.R.E. Card. Pres. Ord. Cis. Antwerp edition, A.D. 1723, folio.

<sup>14</sup> See Cardinal Bona, "Rerum Liturgica-

rum de his quæ ad Missam generatim spectant." Having described different rites for celebrating the Holy Sacrifice, he remarks: "actas aliquando in Monasteriis Missas a solo sacerdote nemine præsentante et respondente, quæ idcirco solitariæ dictæ sint . . . Verum Missas privatas non a Monachis, sed a primæ Ecclesiæ Patribus originem traxisse capite sequenti ostendam: Missas autem solitarias in coenobiis actas ex indulgentia, ut loquitur Eduensis, sive ex privilegio; canonicæ sanctiones demonstrant, quæ sublati omnibus privilegiis, ne quis solus Missas agerat, districte prohibuerunt," lib. i., cap. xiii., p. 230. Ibid.

gave him birth derives no small share of renown, from accounts he has left, respecting her beatified children. Hence, we are enabled to estimate the services of Ængus to sacred learning and literature, in a new light; for, happily, in him, we have found a true saint to record the actions of his sanctified compatriots and predecessors.

For an account of the various Tracts, attributed to St. Ængus, the reader is referred to the Introduction,<sup>1</sup> which precedes the First Volume of this work. We cannot be sure, in all cases, that they are his genuine productions; or, if so, that in some instances, additions or interpolations have not been introduced, long after his death. As we have already seen, such remarks especially apply to the joint composition of St. Melruan and of St. Ængus, usually known by the title, "Martyrologium Tamlachtense," or, "The Martyrology of Tallagh." Its origin and history have been elsewhere related. The oldest known copy—yet in part defective—is that which is found in the "Book of Leinster." A Brussels manuscript copy of the Tallagh Martyrology was probably transcribed from the leaves extracted from this Codex, and which are now kept, in the Franciscan Convent, Dublin. It is an abstract, however, for it only contains the names and festivals of Irish Saints. It takes no notice of the general sanctilogic and foreign entries which form the greater portion of that tract. It has omitted, even, the names of some Irish Saints, which occur in the margin of the MS. It also represents as defective some days, not wanting in the original, but on which,<sup>2</sup> it so happened, that no Irish Saints had been entered. Perhaps, a more complete copy had been made. If so, it does not exist, at present, among the Brussels MSS.<sup>3</sup> It would appear, Colgan contemplated a publication of the Tallagh Martyrology, could he only have found a more perfect copy or copies of it, than he had in his possession.<sup>4</sup> It is still to be greatly desired, that a more correct edition, than that published by the Rev. Matthew Kelly, D.D., were to appear. The original work, which some writers consider prior to the Festilogium, in the order of being composed, is prosaic and very comprehensive. In Colgan's opinion, the "Festilogy" or "Feilire" was first composed by Ængus, and then he resolved upon commencing "The Martyrology of Tallagh," in which should be included the names of saints, omitted in his "Feilire," that thus any doubt regarding the veneration due to them, and the intentional omission of their names in his poem, might in a measure be obviated. However, we have reason for doubting, if Ængus had part, at all, in compiling the "Martyrology of Tallagh." It seems chiefly to have been compiled, long subsequent to the "Feilire," from which probably saints' names were drawn, to furnish a prose Calendar list, with other additions made, at different periods, and even long after his death. What adds most force to this argument is the insertion of his own name, "Ængus Eps. h. Aibleni," at this very date, and that of other saints, down to the close of the ninth century. Yet, it may be admitted, there were interpolations made to supply omissions in the original draft, which probably engaged the attention of St. Maelruan.

CHAPTER III.—<sup>1</sup> See sect. ii., pp. xiii. to xxviii.

<sup>2</sup> "The confusion existing in the month of September," says Dr. Todd, "is entirely due to the transcriber of the Brussels MS. The first of the month is marked 4, and this error is continued, although it might easily have been corrected, by observing, that the notation of the days by calends, nones and ides is correct. This confusion Dr. Kelly has inadvertently retained."

<sup>3</sup> "It seems," remarks Dr. Todd, "to be alluded to under S. Donnan of Eg and his 52 companions (17 Apr.)," "quorum nomina in majore libro scripsimus." (Kelly's edit., p. xxi.)—Bolland. Actt. SS. April, tom. ii., p. 487.

<sup>4</sup> See Drs. Todd's and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal." Introduction, pp. xv., xvi., and nn. 1, 1, 2.

<sup>5</sup> This work was inaccurately noticed by Edward O'Reilly, in his "Chronological

No sooner had Ængus been called to fill a different sphere of life in the monastery, from that in which he had been at first exercised, than the forgotten vision of angels seen in Coolbanagher Church, and the purpose it evoked, came with new force upon his recollection. Inspired by devotional feeling and a poetical genius of no mean order, he took up his pen, and the result was a metrical hymn, in the Irish language, known as the "Feilire," or, in Latin, as the Festilogium of St. Ængus.<sup>5</sup> From a Scholiast's account, left us in a preface, it would appear, that the "Feilire" had not been composed, in its completed form, and in the same place. Some time must have elapsed, from its first writing, to its final revision. According to Professor Eugene O'Curry, our saint commenced his poem, known as the Festilogy, at Cuil Bennchair in Offaly, continued it at Cluain Eidhnech, and finished it during his servitude at Tallagh.<sup>6</sup> From the relation already given, we feel inclined rather to suppose, as the stay of Ængus at Coolbanagher appears to have been of no great duration, when about to pursue his way towards Tallagh, that his idea of writing the Feilire had been conceived only at the former place, and matured at the latter, where it would seem, at least, to have been partially written. Wherever the "Feilire" had been begun, it seems this poem had not been issued, until after the death of holy Abbot Malruan, which took place A.D. 792, according to the best computation.<sup>7</sup> This fact appears still more evident, as in the Festilogy, the name of Tallagh's venerable superior is found recorded, with a suitable eulogy. Professor O'Curry says, according to the best accounts, Ængus wrote his poem in or before A.D. 798; for, so far as can be ascertained, the name of any saint, who died after such date, cannot be discovered in it.<sup>8</sup> Moreover, we find recorded, that Ængus Ceilé De published or circulated his "Festilogy," for the first time, during that year, when Aidus the Sixth, surnamed Oirdnidhe, undertook his expedition against the Leinster people, A.D. 804, according to the most correct supposition.<sup>9</sup> At this period, Aedh encamped at Disert Bethech. Fothadius, the Canonist, accompanied him.<sup>10</sup> This learned man is said to have received a

Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," at the year 800, p. liii., liv.; by Dr. O'Connor, in his "Bibliotheca MS. Stowensis," vol. i., p. 30, n. 3; and in Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Irish Writers," p. 53.

<sup>6</sup> If such be the case, it is probable St. Ængus left Dysartenos, and spent some time in his alma mater at Clonenagh, before he proceeded to Tallagh.

<sup>7</sup> Such is the correction of Mr. O'Donovan, although the "Annals of the Four Masters" place his death at A.D. 787. See O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 392, 393.

<sup>8</sup> See "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xvii., p. 362.

<sup>9</sup> The account regarding the expedition of Aedh Oirdnidhe is thus given at the year 799 [recte 804], in O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 408 to 411. "Aedh Oirdnidhe assembled a very great army to proceed into Leinster, and devastated Leinster twice in one month. A full muster of the men of Ireland (except the Leinster-men), both laity and clergy, was again made by him [and he marched] until he reached Dun-Cuair, on the confines of Meath and Leinster. Thither came Connm-hach, successor of Patrick, having the clergy of Leath-Chuinn along with him. It was not pleasing to the clergy to go upon any expedition; they complained of their grievance to the king, and the king, i.e., Aedh, said that he would abide by the award of Fothadh na Canoine; on which occasion Fothadh passed the decision by which he exempted the clergy of Ireland for ever from expeditions and hostings when he said:—

"The Church of the living God, let her alone, waste her not, Let her right be apart, as best it ever was.
Every true monk, who is of a pure conscience;
For the Church to which it is due let him labour like every servant.
Every soldier from that out, who is without [religious] rule or obedience,
Is permitted to aid the great Aedh, son of Niall.
This is the true rule, neither more nor less,
Let everyone serve in his vocation without murmur or complaint.

The Church," &c.

present of the Feilire, which had been first shown to him, from our saint's hands.<sup>12</sup> Fothadh solemnly approved and recommended it for perusal, by the faithful.<sup>12</sup> He also returned this compliment of Ængus by the bestowal of another work, of which Fothadius himself was the author. This latter tract is said to have been the famous Remonstrance he drew up, as addressed to King Aidus. It inveighs against the employment of ecclesiastics, in military services.<sup>13</sup> In this canticle of the "Feilire," Ængus enumerates some of the principal saints, whom he calls Princes of the Saints. The Festilogium is brief, although saints' festivals are assigned to each day of the week, with some allusions to characteristic virtues or actions of each holy individual therein commemorated. There is a commentary or series of notes found, in the copies of this work, yet extant. These comments relate many particulars, regarding saints, named in the Festilogium. We are at a loss to discover, whether some of those notes are attributable to the saintly author of the poem itself, or to Scholiasts belonging to a later age. The latter supposition, however, is more probable.

The brevity, which characterises the Feilire, was a consequence of the object our saint appears to have had in view, whilst engaged in its composition. For, as he had resolved on imitating the practice of God's servant, whose remains were entombed at Coolbanagher, it would be inexpedient to introduce names of all the saints in his Festilogy. He was therefore obliged to confine himself to recording some of the principal ones. A recital of the entire Psalter, with his other daily exercises, left him no more than sufficient time, for the invocation and praises of saints, included in his metrical hymn, and which, it is said, formed a part of his diurnal devotions.

The "Feilire" was most probably composed, or at least completed, after the year 797,<sup>14</sup> the date for the death of Donogh, or Donnchadh, son to Donall.<sup>15</sup> Such conjecture possibly agrees with that of Colgan, that the scholia on the Festilogy of Ængus had been partly composed at Tallagh, in the time of Malruan.<sup>16</sup> Yet, such cannot be the case, so far as regards all these various com-

<sup>10</sup> "Aedh Oirdnidhe afterwards went to the King of Leinster, and obtained his full demand from the Leinster men; and Finsneachta, King of Leinster, gave him hostages and pledges." And, at this passage, Mr. O'Donovan remarks, that the decision of Fothadh na Canoine, or Fothad "of the canon," is referred to in a preface to the Feilire-Ænguis, preserved in the Leabhar Breac, fol. 32.

<sup>11</sup> Edward O'Reilly writes: "The Feilire is written in that kind of verse called by the Irish poets rinn aird, in which every verse ends with a word of two syllables, contains six syllables in the verse, and the entire rann twenty-four."—"Chronological Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," p. liv.

<sup>12</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. Vita S. Ængussii, cap. xiii., p. 581.

<sup>13</sup> On this occasion, Fothadh wrote a poem by way of precept to the king, in which he advises him to exempt the clergy from the obligation of fighting his battles. There is a copy of the entire poem, preserved in a vellum manuscript, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, H. 2. 18. It is also quoted in the Leabhar-gabhala of the O'Clerys, p. 199. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (e), pp. 409, 410. This decision of Fothadh obtained the name of a Canon; and, after its issue, the clergy were exempted from attending military expeditions.

<sup>14</sup> Edward O'Reilly tells us, that the reim-sceul, or preliminary discourse, prefixed to this performance, gives the pedigree of the author, through several generations; while, it states, that the time of its writing was the time of Conor, son of Aodh Oirdnighe, son of Niall frasaigh, for it was he who took the government of Ireland after Donagh, the son of Donall of Meath, King of Meath. It adds, Angus, in the preface to the Feilire, mentions the death of Donogh. See "Chronological Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," pp. liii., liv.

<sup>15</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (r), p. 399, where we read: "O'Flaherty places the accessions, of Donnchadh in the year 770, and his death in 797, which is the true chronology." He adds: "Quo rege, Anno 795, Dani Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ oras infestare cœperunt."—"Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xciii. p. 433. The Annals of Ulster, however, assign the death of this monarch to A.D. 796, and the Four Masters to A.D. 792. I am unable to discover any notice, regarding Conor, son of Aodh Oirdnighe, mentioned by the Scholiast on Ængus' poem, in any of our early Annals.

ments ; since Colgan himself frequently cites them, under the title of Ængusius auctus, and he attributes them to Cathal Maguire, in accordance with an endorsement on the St. Isidore's copy, which was formerly in his possession.

During the progress of the late Ordnance Survey of Ireland, the Feilire or Festilogium of Ængus came first to be noticed, as a topographical tract of great value.<sup>17</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd suggested to the Board of Trinity College, Dublin, the engagement of Eugene O'Curry to make a fac-simile copy, for its library, of the "Leabhar Mor Dûna Doighré," or "Leabhar Breac," in which the Festilogium is contained. On the Ordnance Survey Archæological Department being dispensed with, Mr. George Smith, an eminent Dublin publisher, engaged Mr. O'Curry to transcribe the Festilogium, once more, with a view to its publication. This, however, was not a fac-simile copy, which indeed it would be practically useless to print, even if such a thing were possible, because the tract consists, properly, of three parts ; namely, the text of the poem, the interlined gloss, and the interlined marginal, topographical, and other notes. These three parts were distinctly copied, all the contractions were lengthened out, and the whole disposed and arranged in such a manner, as to merit the approval of our most distinguished Irish scholars. This copy was afterwards collated with other MSS. in London and Oxford.<sup>18</sup> Yet, the copy thus prepared has not been published ;<sup>19</sup> but, in the present work, so far, the text of the Feilire, as relating to the several diurnal festivals, has been kindly supplied to the writer, and translated into English, by the learned Irish Scholar, Professor O'Looney of the Irish Catholic University.

The Psalter Mac Richard, Bodleian Library, Oxford, contains an account of the ancient Tract, called the "Feilire," or Festilogium of Ængus the Culdee ;<sup>20</sup> being a Martyrology, or Calendar of saints' days, observed in the ancient Irish Church, and compiled in the eighth century. Again, there is found a fine and an ancient copy of the "Feilire," or Festilogium, of St. Ængus the Culdee.<sup>21</sup> This part of the Manuscript appears to be more ancient than the rest, and its writing seems referable to the twelfth century. This is, moreover, probably the most ancient and perfect copy of the "Feilire" extant. Both this, and the "Leabhar Breac" copy, are accompanied by a copious interlinear gloss, and scholia, containing some exceedingly curious legends and traditions, which throw great light on the ancient state of religion and society in Ireland, at or before the period of the twelfth century. There is another copy of this <sup>16</sup> As Edward O'Reilly tells us : "The Reimsceul gives the time and place in which the author wrote this poem." After quoting a portion of this Reimsceul in Irish, the following translation is given : "There are four co-necessaries in every learned treatise, i.e., place, time, person, and cause of writing. Therefore, the place of this piece was first Cúl Banaghar, in the plain of Rechet, in the country of I Failge, or O'Faly, and its revival in Tamhlacht ; (now Tallagh, near Dublin), or else in Cluain Eidhnach it was begun, and in Cúl Banaghar it was finished, and revised in Tallagh."—"Chronological Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," p. liii.

<sup>17</sup> Under the able superintendence of Sir Thomas Larcom and Dr. George Petrie, Eugene O'Curry brought it to bear, with important results, on our local topography, in every part of Ireland.

<sup>18</sup> In the summer of 1849, Mr. Eugene O'Curry and Rev. Dr. Todd examined the

MS. collections in the University of Oxford, for four days spent there ; and during their stay, so far as time permitted, they extracted various readings, considered desirable and useful, from the Festilogium of Ængus. These were intended to further illustrate Mr. O'Curry's transcript of this poem. Amongst other valuable documents, they discovered two fine copies of the Martyrology of Ængus the Culdee, and the Psalter-na-Rann, comprising five books on the Irish Saints, by the same author. During this year, also, Mr. O'Curry spent some months in the British Museum, London, having his transcribed copy of the Festilogium with him.

<sup>19</sup> The transcript and translation into English remained in the possession of Mr. Smith, who, we believe, has since transferred this copy to the Royal Irish Academicians.

<sup>20</sup> At fol. 15.

<sup>21</sup> At fol. 59 to 73.

<sup>22</sup> On the back of its parchment cover, a work ; but with a less copious gloss or scholia. It had been used by Colgan, at Louvain ; subsequently it was preserved in St. Isidore's conventual Library, at Rome ; and, at present, it is in the Franciscan Convent Library, Dublin. It is a MS. of the fifteenth century.<sup>22</sup> The Brussels copy, of which Dr. Todd obtained a transcript made by Mr. O'Curry in 1851, was evidently taken from the St. Isidore MS. Edward O'Reilly describes an imperfect copy, on vellum, besides the "Leabhar Breac" one, as being in the Royal Irish Academy's Library, Dublin ; while, in his own possession, was another copy beautifully written on vellum. In his opinion, from its orthography, and other internal marks of antiquity, it may be concluded, that this MS. was written, at least as early as the eleventh century, and it is, he considers, perhaps, the oldest copy of that work now in existence.<sup>23</sup>

In the Introduction to this work, we have already alluded to the Tract, "De Sanctis Hiberniæ," said to have been one of Ængus's works. Only partially has this been published ; and that is the fifth part, or "Book of Litanies."<sup>24</sup> This portion of the work is especially valuable, and it furnishes a proof, that from its establishment, to the beginning of the ninth century, the Irish Church held and inculcated the doctrine of invoking the saints. The author, having flourished in the latter half of the eighth century, the Litany more immediately and directly refers to that period. We can, perhaps, go even somewhat farther back. Bearing in mind the religious opinions of Ængus, and his intimate acquaintance with the Hagiology of his native land, it follows, that when beseeching the intercession of the servants of God, whose holy deeds he had rendered so familiar to his countrymen, he would jealously avoid introducing any persons, whose convictions with regard to this important subject had not been such as he himself entertained. Therefore, this Litany is at once a proof and a result of his knowing those mentioned in it to have held, no less than himself, such a dogma of Catholic Faith.<sup>25</sup>

The "Psalter-na-Rann"<sup>26</sup> is also attributed—but, perhaps, incorrectly—to the pen of Ængus,<sup>27</sup> while this composition has been already described,<sup>28</sup> and analyzed. Various Pedigrees or Catalogues of Irish Saints are extant, in our public Libraries.<sup>29</sup> In verse and prose, the families and race-stock of different holy men and women have been celebrated.<sup>30</sup> One of the oldest Tracts among these, and even some other old genealogical Treatises, are reputed to have been compiled by our saint. Poems, said to have been com-more recent hand attributes the Scholia, to Cathal or Charles Maguire, Canon of Armagh, and Dean of Clogher, who died A.D. 1470. Charles Maguire may have been the transcriber of this latter ; but most certainly not the original compiler, for the copy in the Leabhar Breac had been written at the end of the fourteenth century, and the Bodleian copy nearly one hundred years before, so that the larger collection existed before Maguire was born. See, "The Martyrology of Donegal," edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves. Introduction, p. xiv.

<sup>23</sup> See "Chronological Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," pp. liii., liv.

<sup>24</sup> It has appeared, in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii. The months of May and June, 1867, pp. 385 to 397, and 461 to 477. An introductory and critical notice precedes, signed B. M. C., while notes and various readings accompany it.

<sup>25</sup> See ibid. May, 1867, p. 388.

<sup>26</sup> Sir James Ware's authority makes the Oxford copy of his Psalter na Rann 600 years old. See "Antiquitates Hiberniæ," p. xcvi. London Ed., 1656, 8vo.

<sup>27</sup> "Ængus who lived in the ninth century could know nothing of Brian Boromh, who was killed in the battle of Clontarf in 1014. All the parts of that MS. (Oxford), which relate to the tenth and eleventh centuries, are additions to the works of Ængus, which are accurately mentioned by Colgan."—Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Bibliotheca MS. Stowensis," vol. i., p. 30, n. 3.

<sup>28</sup> In the Oxford "Catalogue" of MSS. it appears imperfectly and inaccurately. See fol. 1697, p. 4. Neither was Bishop Nicolson accurately informed about the title or contents of this MS.

<sup>29</sup> A Manuscript, belonging to Trinity College, Dublin, and classed H. 1, 11, contains a Catalogue of Male and Female Irish Saints, in Alphabetical order.

<sup>30</sup> In the Manuscript of Trinity College, Dublin, classed H. 1, 11, we find an account posed by Ængus the Culdee, are to be found among the O'Longan Manuscripts, in the Royal Irish Academy.<sup>31</sup> There is a Poem<sup>32</sup> of 412 verses,<sup>33</sup> on Adam and the Patriarchs to the flood, on Noah and his descendants, to the building of the Tower of Babel, on its measurement, and on the Conquests or Colonizations of Ireland, anterior to the Milesian Conquest.<sup>34</sup> This Poem is even brought down to the time of Brian Boru. The author says, in the last stanza, that it was not lawful for him to make any false statement, in his composition, and the writer calls himself, "noble Aengus." Hence, this Poem has sometimes been ascribed to St. Ængus Ceile De, but, perhaps, more correctly it should be assigned to Angus Roe O'Daly, who died in 1350.<sup>35</sup>

But, until we have had a critical examination and analysis of all these attributed works, it will be impossible to decide with more authoritative statements, regarding their authenticity, and number. The Irish Archæological Society has announced the intention of supplying a desideratum, long felt in native literature, by publishing at a future period "The Hagiographical Works of St. Ængus the Culdee." We fear, however, an indefinite postponement regarding this project, although it is one of the highest national and philological importance.

CHAPTER IV.

MODES OF LIFE AT TALLAGH, UNTIL THE TIME ARRIVED FOR DEPARTURE—ST. ÆNGUS RETURNS TO CLONENAGH, WHERE HE IS CHOSEN AS ABBOT—SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN A CHOREPISCOPUS—OCCASIONAL RETIREMENT TO DYSART ENOS OR TO DYSERT-BEAGH—HIS DEATH AND BURIAL—VALUE OF ST. ÆNGUS' HAGIOGRAPHICAL WORKS—CONCLUSION.

WE may well conceive, how affectionately and agreeably passed their hours of occasional relaxation, as of study, while the holy Abbot Melruan and Ængus were companions, in the cænobium, at Tallagh. Their interchange of pious and cultivated thought must have proved mutually conducive to the accuracy and unction of those hagiographical and sacred historic works, which seem specially to have had a literary fascination for them. The teaching of ecclesiastical and secular learning probably engaged a considerable part of their daily monastic routine. For we cannot doubt, but native and foreign literature, as also the science of the period, was then taught in the school of Tallagh, with the religious training and dogma, peculiar to such an establishment. It seems evident, from references made to Eusebius and St. Jerome, that Ængus was well versed in the Greek, as in the Latin language. So long as Melruan lived, peace and security reigned within the Irish monastic enclosures. Had he survived a few years, the tocsin of alarm must have sounded the first approach of Northman invasions; while, many of the shrines and illuminated Books of Erin were destined to suffer wreck and ruin, from the Pagan spoilers. It is supposed, that not to our saint, personally, but to an order which claimed him, had been applied the title of Céléde. This was a received term, denoting rigid monastic observance, especially in the Order of Divine Service. To Ængus it was attached especially, as one of the mothers of some amongst the most remarkable Irish Saints; likewise, pedigrees of Irish Saints; as also the sacred history or pedigree of the Saints of Ireland, in verse.

<sup>31</sup> See vol. vi., pp. 52 to 54.

<sup>32</sup> It is contained in the "Leabhar Breac," and it commences at fol. 39, b.b., l. 7.

<sup>33</sup> According to Eugene O'Curry; but, of 448 verses, according to Edward O'Reilly.

<sup>34</sup> Professor Eugene O'Curry quotes the first Irish stanza, and gives an English translation, in his "Catalogue of Irish Manuscripts of the Royal Irish Academy," First Series, vol. iii., p. 912.

<sup>35</sup> See Edward O'Reilly's "Chronological Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," p. xcvi.

CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves,

who contributed to the devotional compositions of the Church, and who lived according to the strictest rule of religion. It may appear strange, this title is not oftener applied to saints of conventual distinction, amid the hosts of saints that crowd the Irish Calendar; but, it must be remembered, that the term only came into use, with anything like a determinate application, towards the end of the eighth century, when the Irish Calendar was nearly closed.<sup>1</sup>

When holy Melruan had been called to bliss, our saint keenly felt the loss of his society and gentle rule. The sylvan shades around Tallagh had less attraction, during the noontide walk, and more lonely seemed the solitudes of scarped ravines and mountains. Climbing topmost heights of the latter, the eyes of Ængus were often turned towards the rich plains beneath, through which the Liffey and Barrow flowed. Peering beyond their bounds, the hills of Dysart were seen, on a distant south-western horizon. Old associations were revived; nor were the monastery and monks of Clonenagh forgotten, in the train of awakened recollections. Perhaps, some message from its superior and inmates urged his return. In prosecuting his archaic studies, Ængus had travelled to many places, and always with some holy and useful object in view. It now seemed the will of Heaven, that he should turn once more, towards the land of Leix and Ossory; and, accordingly, we may suppose a sympathetic tear coursed down his cheeks, and those of his fellow-religious, when he took scrip and staff, bidding adieu, for the last time, to those blissful haunts of science and religion, where he had spent some of his life's best years. We know not the exact period, when he left this mountain home; but, it appears altogether likely, his renowned superior had departed this life, before Ængus thought of leaving, nor had the eighth century drawn quite to its close.

Ængus survived his friend, the holy Abbot of Tallagh, for a very considerable period. The name of St. Molruan is found in his Festilogium, where that holy man is called the "Bright Sun of Ireland."<sup>2</sup> This circumstance seems to prove, that the work, in its finished state, must have been composed, subsequently to the year 792. After remaining some years at Tallagh, however, Ængus returned to Clonenagh. His ascetic and literary fame must have culminated, to a high degree, at the time his thoughts reverted to the old retreat:—

"Here to return and die at home at last."<sup>3</sup>

Doubtless, he was welcomed by the good abbot and his community, at Clonenagh. Over this great monastery, it is thought, he was chosen as abbot.<sup>4</sup> He is said, probably to have succeeded Melathgenius, who died in "On the Céili-dé, commonly called Cul-dees," part ii., sect. ii., p. 127. This most exhaustive Treatise on the subject, is to be found in "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xxiv. Antiquities.

<sup>2</sup> A mistake, probably a typographical one, occurs in Dalton's "History of the County of Dublin," p. 761, where the death of Saint Molruan, or Maelruan, is referred to the year 787, whereas the year 788 is named, for the first arrival of Ængus, at Tallaght. The real date for St. Molruan's death is the 7th day of July, 792. This accomplished and usually accurate historian incorrectly tells us, when giving the history of Tallaght, and speaking of Ængus, that he died "Abbot of this house in 824." Ibid.

<sup>3</sup> See Oliver Goldsmith's "Poetical Works."—The Traveller.

<sup>4</sup> Another Ængus, who was almost contemporary with this saint, has left an elegant poem in praise of him. From this poem, Colgan derives a great part of St. Aengus Ceilé De's Acts. That the writer of this poem was abbot at Clonenagh, as also at Disert-Aengus, is possible, and Colgan observes, that his hints are even stronger as to the latter place. The matter can easily be settled. As both places lay near each other, within the barony of Maryborough, Aengus might have been abbot over both these establishments. Disert-Aengus, which com-

767.<sup>5</sup> If he immediately succeeded this abbot, as seems possible enough, the administration of St. Ængus, at Clonenagh, must have preceded his arrival, at Tallagh. Perhaps, on his return from the latter place, he may have re-assumed the government of Clonenagh.<sup>6</sup> He was also elevated, as has been reported, to the episcopal dignity;<sup>7</sup> for, it was a very usual practice, then prevailing in Ireland, to invest the superiors of all our great religious houses, with this exalted rank. But, we may regard this dignity he obtained, as qualifying him to be classed, only with the inferior prelates, known as Chorepiscopi, in early times. Dr. Lanigan thinks it probable, that St. Ængus had been abbot, over a monastery at Dysartenos, which, he is supposed to have founded, while he also presided over Clonenagh.<sup>8</sup> However, it seems incorrect to state, that if Desert-Ænguis took its name from this saint, and had been anciently a place of great devotion, that it was in consequence stocked with a numerous community of monks.<sup>9</sup>

But, notwithstanding his elevation, and the duties that devolved upon him, in virtue of his high office, as abbot over the greater monastery, that favourite retreat at Dysart<sup>10</sup> seems to have been ever dear to his recollections. Finding his end approaching, Ængus withdrew to the scenes of his former retirement and austerities. However, we may be quite astray in supposing, that Dysartenos was the place; for, after leaving Tallagh, he is known to have dwelt—at least, for a time—at the other Dysart, nearer to Clonenagh. Thus, St. Ængus resided at his church, adjoining in that place called Disert Bethech, which lay on the northern bank of the River n-Eoir. We are told, that his religious abode was a few miles, above the present Monasterevan,<sup>12</sup> in the King’s County.<sup>13</sup> This, however, must be menced with himself, may be considered simply as a cell to the older and greater monastery at Clonenagh. At Clonenagh and Disertenos, or Disert-Ængus, Archdall has inverted the order of Ængus’ transactions. After making Ængus found an Abbey at Disert-Ængus, Archdall sends him to Tallaght, where, it is said, he died. Now, it is clear from the Acts, that Ængus was no more than a simple monk, when he removed to Tallaght. As to the place of his death, it could not have been Tallaght; for, as we find in said Acts, he was buried at Clonenagh. That Ængus, who was panegyrist of our saint, seems to have been, as Colgan justly conjectures, Abbot Ængus, surnamed the Wise. He belonged to Clonfert-Molua, and died in 858 or 859. See Dr. Lanigan’s “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. x., nn. 98, 99, pp. 248, 249.

“The greenwood-shadowed waters of the Nore,”<sup>11</sup>

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Annals of the Four Masters,” vol. i., pp. 370, 371.

<sup>6</sup> It is not probable, however, that our saint was the immediate successor of Malathgenius.

<sup>7</sup> By his namesake, Ængus Ceilé De is called abbot. In the Martyrologies cited, in a succeeding note, it will be seen, that he was also styled Bishop.

<sup>8</sup> In a note, Dr. Lanigan remarks: “Considering the Irish practice of promoting eminent abbots to the episcopacy, we need not look for any other See for him than one of the above-mentioned monasteries.”—“Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. x., n. 99, p. 249.

<sup>9</sup> See Bishop Challoner’s “Britannia Sacra,” part i., p. 168.

<sup>10</sup> Mr. O’Donovan, in the Tenth Article of his edited “Miscellany of the Irish Archæological Society,” vol. i., note g., comments on the term Disert, a common topographical prefix to Irish localities. He says: “This word, which is translated desertus locus in ‘Cormac’s Glossary,’ and desertum by Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 579), is sometimes used in ancient Irish Manuscripts, to denote a hermitage, or an asylum for pilgrims or penitents. It occurs in this latter sense in the Leabhar Breac, fol. 100, a. a., and in the Book of Leinster, in the MS. Library of Trinity College, Dublin, H. 2, 12, fol. 113, b. a.”—“Irish Charters in the Book of Kells,” n. (g), p. 112.

<sup>11</sup> See Lines by Charles J. Kickham.

<sup>12</sup> This parish, in the barony of West Offaly, is defined on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County Kildare,” Sheets 21, 22, 26, 27. The town is shown on Sheets 21, 26.

<sup>13</sup> See Professor O’Curry’s “Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History,” lect. xvii., p. 364.

an incorrect topographical description of the locality. Ængus, while he resided at Dysartbeagh, had finished his Festilogy. A friendship was here formed between our saint and Fothadh the Canonist, who showed the poem he had composed for Aedh's decision. Before presenting it to the king, he desired and received the warm approval of his brother poet, St. Ængus.

The penitential and most useful earthly career of this holy ascetic was destined, at last, for one of immortal glory. Professor Eugene O'Curry thinks St. Ængus Ceilé De must have died, about the year 815.<sup>14</sup> But, he breathed his last prayers with his last breath, about the year 824, according to the most probable conjecture, on Friday, the 11th day of March.<sup>15</sup> However, one or other of the years 819, 824, or 830, is named conjecturally, as referring to our saint's death, from the circumstance of the 11th March falling on the feria sexta, or Friday, at each of these dates. Still, the question remains unsolved. Did he die on the 11th of March? We know not how many years Ængus the Culdee lived; but, probably this holy man had not attained a very advanced age, when his death occurred.

Ængus was buried at Clonenagh, according to his Acts, as given by Colgan.<sup>16</sup> But, whether he died there or at Disert Bethech, or at Dysartenos, has been contested.<sup>17</sup> If he built a monastery at the latter place, no trace of its ruins can be discovered, at present;<sup>18</sup> and hence, it might be a safe conjecture to suppose, Dysartenos had been only a cell or hermitage, constructed by the present or some other St. Ængus, for his sole accommodation and retirement. Again, such remarks may apply to Disert Bethech; but, here, we think, the celebrated Culdee really founded a house of some sort, for his particular order of monks. Here, also, he lived, and most probably for several years; here, perhaps, some of his works were composed; here, possibly he had a hermitage, while guiding a community of religious; here, too, according to one account, he died; and, we are inclined to think, he must be regarded, as special patron of Dysartbeagh. The evidence for these surmises we now submit. Professor O'Curry alludes to an Irish Poem, which he thinks was written soon after our saint's death. He deems it a fine composition, and while giving the original of the first stanza, he adds a literal

<sup>14</sup> See ibid., p. 362.

<sup>15</sup> "There being good reason to think, that Ængus survived the year 806. Colgan conjectures that the year of his death was either 819, 824, or 830; whereas in each of them the 11th of March fell on a Friday."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. x., n. 100, p. 249. "Ita eodem die Martyrologium Tamlacl. Ængussii Episcopi Hoblenii nepotis. Marian. Magnus Ængussius Hoblenii nepos Episcopus. Mart. Dungall. Ængussius nepos Hoblenii, Episcopus, est qui composuit festilogium. In ipso etiam Ængussii Festilio in quibusdam exemplaribus ponitur nata hac die: sed illa insula additio est: quæ idcirco in vetustioribus exemplaribus non reperitur." Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii, n. 15, p. 583. See, likewise, the prefatory notice, given by the Bollandists, in their "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xi. De B. Ængussio Kedeo Abbate et Episcopo, in Hibernia, p. 85.

<sup>16</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Ængussio Hagiographo, Episcopo et Confessore, cap. xvi., p. 582.

<sup>17</sup> In a note, already given, the anonymous

Scholiast says, that our saint was both educated and buried at Disert-Ængus. It is certain, however, that Ængus had been educated at Clonenagh. Colgan remarks, that the Disert named, either is not different from Clonenagh, or our saint most probably died, and had been buried, at the first place, his body having been afterwards translated and deposited at Clonenagh. But, he acknowledges that our Annals make a distinction, between both places, as in reality they were bound to do. A distance of some miles intervenes, between Dysartenos and Clonenagh. A lesser distance separates Dysartbeagh and Clonenagh. The present writer is fully cognizant of those facts, and he has long been conversant with the bearing and local peculiarities of all those places.

<sup>18</sup> Alluding to this locality of Dysartenos, however, a writer well knowing its folk-lore observes: "Not many years ago, the remains of the foundation of St. Ængus's sacred edifice were discovered by a farmer, who professed the doctrines of the Church of England. This farmer, much to his credit, reverentially would not suffer the remains to be disturbed. He re-covered with translation of the whole.<sup>19</sup> We present a few of the first stanzas, and the closing stanza, as of historical value, in elucidating some phases of his life.<sup>20</sup> From the foregoing, and especially from the last lines, it ought to be inferred, that Disert Beth ech, and not Disert Aengusa, was the ancient name for his church. At Dysartbeagh, too, the Poem states, he departed this life, and that there he was buried.<sup>21</sup> We find this elegy on St. Ængus quoted in the learned lectures, delivered by Professor Matthew Arnold, at Oxford, and published as contributions to a widely-circulating English periodical.<sup>22</sup> The Professor proves, that there is a complete want of style,<sup>23</sup> in the compositions of the Teutonic nations, while the contrary characteristic distinguishes the Celtic effusions. Professor Arnold remarks, in reference to this beautiful and pathetic elegy, that it was composed by no eminent bard; and, yet, a Greek epitaph could not show a finer perception of what constitutes propriety and felicity of style, in compositions of this nature. We could hardly resist giving this testimony of the Oxford Professor, so honourable to his own taste, and to the genius of our native poetry. A difficulty exists, about the exact date for the festival of this St. Ængus. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>24</sup> enters Ænghus Eps. h. Aibleni, at the present day. Marianus O'Gorman, and the Martyrology of Donegal concur, in this arrangement.<sup>25</sup> St. Ængus has his feast at the 11th of March, according to Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>26</sup> the "Circle of the Seasons,"<sup>27</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould.<sup>28</sup> However, there are very good grounds for supposing, that the festival of Aengus Mac Oengobann or O'Oiblen was on the 18th of February, in the opinion of Professor Eugene earth the stone steps, that rested at the foot of the once altar, on which the holy anchor-offered the Sacrifice of the Mass. The field in which this discovery was made is near to the dwelling of Mr. James Lawler." — O'Byrne's "History of the Queen's County," chap. xxi., p. 57.

<sup>19</sup> See his "Catalogue of Irish Manuscripts of the Royal Irish Academy," First Series, vol. ii., pp. 624 to 626.

<sup>20</sup> If we are to rely on this poem, as referring to an early date; we may possibly glean some facts of our saint's biography, from the writer's account. It runs thus:—

"Delightful to sit here, himself, (or by himself),
By the side of the cold, clear Nore,
Although populous, it was not the path of plunder,
In sacred Disert Beth ech.

"Disert Beth ech where dwelt the man,
Whom legions of Angels visited,
A religious city, by crosses enclosed,
In which resided Mac Oiblen, Aengus.

"Aengus of the host of Heaven,
Here is his Leacht, (monument,) and death-bed.
It was from this place he ascended
Upon the Friday up into Heaven.

"It was at Cluain Eidnech he was reared,
At Cluain Eidnech he was interred,
At Cluain Eidnech of many crosses,
He first read his Psalms.

"When Ængus was in the narrow cell confined,

By permission of the Son of God at Tamhlachta, (Tallaght,)

It was not a condition meet for devotion,
To be in the kiln constantly drying."

Then follow other stanzas, relating to his manner of life, at Tallagh.

<sup>21</sup> The poem concludes with this stanza, as translated by O'Curry:—

"From this place is departed a man who presided over verses,
The Sun of the Western World,
The place where he took his disease of the head,
The place which is said to be delightful."

<sup>22</sup> "The Cornhill Magazine," of 1866.

<sup>23</sup> He says: "The Celts certainly have it to a wonderful measure. Style is the most striking quality of their poetry; Celtic poetry seems to make up to itself for being unable to master the world and give an adequate interpretation of it, by throwing all its force into style, by bending language at any rate to its will, and expressing the ideas it has with unsurpassable intensity, elevation, and effect."

<sup>24</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>25</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xi., n. 15, p. 583.

<sup>26</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xi.

<sup>27</sup> See p. 71.

<sup>28</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March xi., pp. 217, 218.

O'Curry.<sup>29</sup> The O'Clerys seem to conjecture, in like manner, and because, also, there is no notice of an Ængus, in the "Feilire," at that date, whereas there is notice of some different Aengus, in it, at the present day. Professor O'Curry thinks, that Colgan and those who follow him are deceived, in making the 11th of March the festival for St. Ængus the Culdee. It is, indeed very certain—as a distinguished Irish Scholar<sup>30</sup> well observes—that St. Aengus Ceilé De cannot be set down, for an ignorant nor a superstitious monk; but, on the contrary, he must ever be regarded as a gifted writer, deeply read in the Holy Scriptures, and in the civil and ecclesiastical history of the world. He was especially versed in that historic lore, contained in what he calls enthusiastically, "The Host of the Books of Erin." Taking the Festilog of St. Ængus as a purely historic tract, largely interwoven with the early civil and ecclesiastical history of Ireland, there is probably no European country which possesses so early and so authentic a national document, and one having a character so important. A great number of the primitive Christian inhabitants and strangers, in our island, have been introduced by name, into this valuable treatise. Their festival days, with copious references to the early denominations and exact situations of our old churches and monasteries, severally founded by many of them, are accurately given; and, already, by means of this tract, if not all, at least nearly all, of these foundations may be or have been identified, by competent archaeologists. His other writings are hardly less valuable, for their historic, national, and religious interest.

The truly learned are ever truly humble. But, to raise this latter qualification to the degree of heroic virtue, requires the special intervention of the Spirit of wisdom. Towards our saint, God's choicest graces appear to have been vouchsafed. From his early years, he was gifted with a docile mind, an ardent love of true perfection, humility of disposition, an understanding capable of comprehending a wide circle of science, human and divine, with an imagination, fervid, brilliant, chaste, and correct, as ever gifted a poet. Our Church and country have received no inconsiderable services, from the literary labours and learning of this saint, while his life had been beautifully and edifyingly consistent with his teaching and acquirements. Some men possess dazzling qualities and acquire renown, in this world, while their minds and dispositions are cold, vitiated, and corrupt; they may shine among their fellow-mortals, as the skin of the venomous snake or crawling reptile appears radiant with variegated colours, under the rays of a bright sun. On the contrary, in solitude and retirement, wishing to avoid the applause or rewards of the world, under a rude garb and exterior, our saint, like the glow-worm, luminous even through the darkness of night, has diffused a steady and an undiminished light, over the obscurity of our scattered ecclesiastical records and traditions, in his own time and for preceding ages. He has likewise transmitted to us some of the most venerable remains of our ancient and holy literature, so long and so providentially preserved in Ireland, and in more distant countries. Let us hope, that under the careful editorship of a competent Irish scholar, these fragments will be gathered, ere they perish, that they will be committed to type, published, and thus rendered accessible, to the generality of readers. While such documents serve to excite and sustain our religious feelings, they also fan the spirit of patriotism, and serve to extend still more the real fame of our beloved country. The holy Aengus Ceilé De laboured wisely and well in his generation. He has left to this day, and to all succeeding generations, the heritage of his zeal, his learning, his genius, his virtues, and his noble example.

<sup>29</sup> In his "Catalogue of Irish Manuscripts of the Royal Irish Academy," First Series, vol. ii., p. 623.

<sup>30</sup> See Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xvii., p. 370.

ARTICLE II.—ST. CONSTANTINE, KING AND MARTYR, IN SCOTLAND, AND A MONK AT RAHEN, KING'S COUNTY. [Sixth Century.] Among the saints of Ireland and of Scotland, Constantine deserves to be numbered. No ancient or reliable memoir of this royal penitent has been handed down to us; yet, we are enabled, from the many scattered notices of him, found in Irish, Welsh, and Scottish Hagiologies, to construct the following brief outline of his life. In our country, he studied as a sedulous disciple, while he appears to have laboured in Scotland, as a strenuous teacher, and as a true promoter of piety. The illustrious subject of this memoir—so far as we can discriminate his Acts—despising the fleeting vanities of this life, abandoned his golden crown on this tearful earth, to become an humble disciple of the heavenly king.<sup>1</sup> Moreover, he desired to become an ambassador of glorious tidings to a barbarous people, where his true crown was obtained. The Acts of this royal penitent and martyr have been published by Colgan<sup>2</sup> and by the Bollandists.<sup>3</sup> Those accounts are not critically reconcilable with chronology, and they have been extracted from various authors. Other writers have treated about him, such as Bishop Challenor,<sup>4</sup> Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>5</sup> Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>6</sup> and Bishop Forbes.<sup>7</sup> He is noticed, in the “Annals of the Cistercian Monks.”<sup>8</sup> A Life of St. Constantine has been given, by Rev. John Adams,<sup>9</sup> in his series, “Chronicles of Cornish Saints.”<sup>10</sup> Much confusion has crept into his Acts, because he has sometimes been confounded, with another King Constantine III. of the Scots, who has been numbered among the saints, and who, leaving his royalty,<sup>11</sup> entered among the Culdees of St. Andrew's,<sup>12</sup> in the tenth century. Again the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>13</sup> states, at this day, that either a Constantine, the Briton, Welsh or Cornish, or a Constantine, son of Fergus,<sup>14</sup> who was of the Picts, had been venerated.<sup>15</sup> The former, however, was the royal monk at Rathain, now Rahan, King's County, who flourished, A.D. 588,<sup>16</sup> and whose feast is properly commemorated, at the 11th of March. The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>17</sup> confuses the times and parentage of two Constantines; for, at this date, we find inserted, by the later hand, and within brackets, Constantine, monk at Rathain, with Mochuda,<sup>18</sup> son of Fergus. The Rev. Dr. Lanigan supposes,<sup>19</sup> that the ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See “Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland,” vol. ii. Martyrology for the use of the Church of Aberdeen, from a MS. of the sixteenth century, communicated by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A., Scotland, p. 262.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xi. Martii. De S. Constantino Rege, Monacho et Martyre, pp. 577 to 579.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii xi. De S. Constantino Rege Monacho et Martyre in Scotia, pp. 64, 65.

<sup>4</sup> See “Britannia Sancta,” part i., pp. 169, 170.

<sup>5</sup> See “Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints,” vol. iii., March xi.

<sup>6</sup> See “Lives of the Saints,” vol. iii., March xi., pp. 214, 215.

<sup>7</sup> See “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” pp. 311 to 314.

<sup>8</sup> At the 11th of March, p. 332.

<sup>9</sup> Vicar of Stockcross, Berks.

<sup>10</sup> No. iii. It has been reprinted from “Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall, 1869,” No. x. Read at the Spring Meeting, May 22, 1868.

<sup>11</sup> A.D. 943.

<sup>12</sup> See Bishop Challoner's “Britannia Sancta,” p. 170.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>14</sup> He died, A.D. 820, according to a computation found in the Annals of Tighernach and of Ulster.

<sup>15</sup> In Irish: CONSTANTIN BUIRO, NO MAC FERGUSA DO CHRICNEACH.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's “Life of St. Columba.” Additional Notes (O), p. 371.

<sup>17</sup> See Rev. Drs. Todd's and Reeves' edition, pp. 74, 75.

<sup>18</sup> See his Life, at the 14th of May.

<sup>19</sup> See “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. ii., chap xi., sect. xiv., n. 161, p. 166.

account of this ex king and martyr is but a garbled alteration of the history of a British King, Constantine, of the fifth century, and who is incorrectly styled Scottish, by Buchanan,<sup>20</sup> and by other Scotch writers. He, however, was killed, not through religious hatred, but for a very different cause. Nor does the present holy king appear to have lived under St. Mochuda, at Rahen. There is an Irish Poem, by Rumann Mac Colman, which enables us to identify the Constantine, King and Martyr, who is entered in the Carthusian Auctarium, to the great work of Usuard,<sup>21</sup> and to whom several important Scottish churches have been dedicated. The legend is wild and strange, and not without some confusion, as to date.<sup>22</sup> From a careful examination of what Rumann Mac Colman states,<sup>23</sup> it is evident, that Constantine, the British King, settled at Rahen, long before the time of St. Mochuda. According to Bishop Forbes, there seem to have been two distinct saints, bearing this name: one was King of the Britons, who resigned his crown and came to Scotland, where he converted Kintyre, and who died, A.D. 588; while another was Constantine, son of Fergus, of the Picts, who succeeded Mochuda, at Rathin, somewhat later than the year 630.<sup>24</sup> Born about the beginning of the sixth century, our Constantine was the son of Cador, Duke of Cornwall,<sup>25</sup> according to one account.<sup>26</sup> The Breviary of Aberdeen<sup>27</sup> calls him, the son of Paternus, King of Cornubia, and it states, that he married the daughter of the King of Lesser Britannia. He is said, by some writers, to have ruled over the Britons, and by others, it is related, that he was King over the Picts. The former account accords best with historic truth. He was a nephew of the renowned King Arthur, and during his early life, he was a soldier, remarkable, too, for his fiery valour. He has been classed among those famous Knights of the Round Table.<sup>28</sup> At all events, he figures prominently in ancient British history.<sup>29</sup> When his valiant uncle had obtained a glorious victory, and yet had received his death wound, on the field of Camlan, A.D. 542,<sup>30</sup> Arthur is said to have nominated Constantine as his successor; and, the British forces continued for several years afterwards, to fight under his banner, against the Saxon invaders. Nevertheless, if we may credit the fierce invective against him which Gildas wrote, his early life was stained with gross iniquity. Some writers tell us that, to secure his supremacy, he cruelly murdered the two sons of Mordred, King of the Britons, and who, from their father's position and their relationship to King Arthur, might, he feared, lay claim to the throne.<sup>31</sup> Other writers, however, intimate, that those young

<sup>20</sup> See "Rerum Scotticarum Historia," lib. v., XLIII. Rex., pp. 132, 133.

<sup>21</sup> At the 11th of March, "In Scotia. Constantini regis et martyris."

<sup>22</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 311, 312.

<sup>23</sup> See Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," &c., part ii., sect. iii., subsect. 2, pp. 353 to 356.

<sup>24</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of the Scottish Saints," p. 312.

<sup>25</sup> See Matthew of Westminster, "Flores Historiarum," A.D. DXLII., p. 192.

<sup>26</sup> That of the Rev. John Adams.

<sup>27</sup> See Pars Hyemalis, fol. lxvii.

<sup>28</sup> In Harding's "Metrical Chronicle," we are told, that

"Duke Cador's sone of Cornwall bounteous
Afore had been one of the table rounde
In Arthure's time."

<sup>29</sup> As one of

"The goodliest fellowship of famous Knights
Whereof the world holds record."

See John Speed's "Historie of Great Britaine," book vii., chap. 12, pp. 335, 336.

<sup>30</sup> See Matthew of Westminster, "Flores Historiarum," A.D. DXLII., p. 192.

<sup>31</sup> The "Bulke of the Chronicles of Scotland" says:—

"Quhen he saw the greit calamitie
And seruitude tha Britis war in brocht,
He traistit weill the greit falsheid tha wrocht
In the defrauding of the King Modreid,
Quhilk richteous was till Uter to succedd;
Into his mynd thairfoir he dred sooir,
That was the caus that tha war puneist foir,
Within himself richt havelie he buir, men stirred up rebellion against him, making common cause with the Saxon foe,<sup>32</sup> and thus bringing down just retribution upon themselves.<sup>33</sup> However, those who had rebelled against him were subdued. One of his opponents fled to the Church of St. Amphibalus, at Winchester, where he thought to take sanctuary. Notwithstanding, he was murdered by Constantine himself, before the altar. His other adversary became a refugee in London. Yet, he too was taken prisoner, in a monastery, and put to a cruel death.<sup>34</sup> These sacrilegious and wicked proceedings caused Gildas<sup>35</sup> to pen that celebrated Epistle, in which he so vehemently inveighs against the king. Constantine is called, in it, the tyrannical whelp of the unclean lioness of Damnonia; while, he is also accused of being a murderer, a perjurer and an adulterer. This was written in or soon after A.D. 543. Constantine, King of Cornwall, became the chief sovereign of the league, formed by the lesser British Kings, after the death of King Arthur.<sup>36</sup> We may fairly infer, that in consequence of Gildas' invective, Constantine was filled with remorse, and reflecting on his previous wickedness, he resolved to become a true penitent. The period assigned for this change of heart is referred to A.D. 588.<sup>37</sup> According to the Breviary of Aberdeen, the untimely death of his wife,<sup>38</sup> daughter to the King of lesser Britain, caused Constantine to abandon his kingdom and to resolve on leading a religious life.<sup>39</sup> Both causes probably combined to induce him to leave his country and friends. So completely did he sever himself from the world, that he was supposed by some to have been killed in battle.<sup>40</sup> Some writers affirm, that he was murdered by Conan, his successor.<sup>41</sup> But, in reality, he seems first to have retired to the monastery, at Menevia, having left to his son, the charge of his kingdom. Thus, he seemed in complete isolation, and a general impression prevailed, that he had departed from this life. But some say, writes Florilegus, that he became a monk, and died only in a religious sense.<sup>42</sup> This latter hypothesis, no doubt, is the correct one,

So wranguslie he tuke on him sic cuir,
In the defrauding of the richteous air."

<sup>32</sup> See Matthew of Westminster, "Flores Historiarum," at A.D. 543, p. 192.

<sup>33</sup> "He was," says Fabyan, "by the two sonnes of Mordred grievously vexed, for so myche as they claymed the lande by the ryghte of tittle of theyr father. So that betwene hym and them were foughten many and sundry bataylles."

<sup>34</sup> See Matthew of Westminster's "Flores Historiarum," A.D. DXLIII., p. 192.

<sup>35</sup> See his Life, at the 29th of January.

<sup>36</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. x., n. 168, pp. 486, 487.

<sup>37</sup> According to the Annals of Tighernach and of Ulster. See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. DLXXXVIII. "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 533.

<sup>38</sup> The "Buik of Chronicles of Scotland" states:—

"Thairfoir his ladie, plesant and preclair,
The quhilk he louit ouir all erthlie thing,
And sonis als quhilk after him suld ring,
The hand of God departit hes him fro,
And left himself richt destitute in wo.
Syne quhen he knew the caus quhy and quhairfoir,

Quhat wes the caus he puneist him so soir,

Richt quyetlie on to Ybernia,
Into ane bark he passit on ane da;
Kinrik and Croun and all the world for-suik,
And syne on him religious habit tuke."

<sup>39</sup> "Constantinus, paterni regis Cornubiæ filius, regis Britanniae minoris filiam duxit in uxorem, sed ecce! sinistrante fortuna moritur regina; de cujus mortis dolore cum rex consolari noluerit, filio suo regnum et ipsius regimen consultius commisit et tradidit."—"Breviarium Aberdonense," fol. lxvii.

<sup>40</sup> "Nec cum pace fuit, quoniam cognatus in illum,

"Prælia dira movens violavit cuncta Conanus;

"Proripuitque sibi regiones, rege perempto,

"Quas nunc debiliter nec cum ratione gubernat."—"Vita Merlini," ll.

1132 to 1136.

<sup>41</sup> See Geoffrey of Monmouth's History, book xi., chap. xv.

<sup>42</sup> He writes, "et sancte demum mortuum." See Alford, "Annales Ecclesiae," A.D. 545, tome ii.

and it receives confirmation, from the following passage in a Life of St. David :<sup>43</sup> "When the fame of David's holiness was spread abroad, kings, princes, and men of the world, left their posts, and sought his monastery. Hence, it came to pass, that Constantine, King of the Cornishmen, forsook his kingdom, and submitted his stubborn neck, which had never before been bridled, to the yoke of humility, in the cell of his father, and there he remained a long time performing faithful services." Afterwards, bidding adieu to all his friends, and going on ship-board, he sailed over to Ireland, and there he desired to remain unknown and unnoticed for the remainder of his days. Some contradictions of narrative remain to be solved, in reference to his stay. According to Hector Boece,<sup>44</sup> when Constantine retired to Ireland, with his wife and children, he assumed the disguise of a poor man. He laboured for some time in the service of a miller, for love of Christ. It is generally held, however, that he took service in a monastery. At length, a monk discovered who Constantine was ; for one day, thinking himself to be alone, he thus soliloquized : "Am I Constantine, King of Cornubia, whose head bore the plumed helmet, and whose body was clad in a coat of mail-armour?" This he repeated more than once, and each time he replied in a negative sense. A monk or some other person was lurking near, and these expressions were overheard. The words were reported to the abbot and to the other members of his religious community. They hasten to him without delay, and bring Constantine within their enclosure.<sup>45</sup> At last, the royal exile was persuaded to assume the religious habit, in their monastery, and to shave his head, as the sign of his profession. He began his studies, and in due course, he became a priest.<sup>46</sup> While living in the Irish monastery, Constantine was a pattern of all virtues to the other monks.<sup>47</sup> He is said, to have sought out St. Columba, and to have been selected by him to seek out St. Kentigern, in Galloway, where he was elected abbot, and where he reformed the morals of his flock.<sup>48</sup> We are informed, that King Constantine came to the monastery of Rahen, in the time of St. Carthage ; yet, this is quite incorrect, for, it seems evident, he had long preceded Carthage, in that place, where he cleared a plain, which after him was called Magh Constantine.<sup>49</sup> In the Festilogy of St. Ængus, he is called, "King of Rathen," but this only means, that having abdicated his kingdom, he there became a monk, or according to some Calendars, an abbot. According to Colgan, Constantine entered Rahen, in the barony of Ballycowan, King's County, as a monk, and some writers state, he immediately succeeded St. Carthage as abbot there ;<sup>50</sup> but, this account appears altogether inconsistent, with the facts of history. It should then be allowed, that he must have been alive, after the year 630, or thereabouts ; and, this cannot be asserted of a man, who had been King of Cornubia, or Cornwall, in 543. We find it related, that this distinguished stranger obtained a large tract of land, near Rahen, which he cleared.<sup>51</sup> This belonged

<sup>43</sup> The original was written in the twelfth or thirteenth century.

<sup>44</sup> See "Hystorie Scotorum," lib. ix. This writer is silent as to his early excesses.

<sup>45</sup> Such is the legend, as found in the "Breviary of Aberdeen."

<sup>46</sup> The Irish Annals abound with examples of the exchange of the regal for the monastic or clerical condition. Thus, at A.D. 703, Ceallach, King of Connaught, Sellach of the Dalriada, in 723, and Echtan of the Picts in 724 are examples. Niall Freasach, King of Ireland, after a reign of seven years, retired to Hy, and, having taken the religious habit died in 778. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 703, 765. Also the "Annals of Tighernach," at A.D. 723, 724.

<sup>47</sup> See Hector Boece's "Hystorie Scotorum," lib. ix.

<sup>48</sup> Such is the account, in the "Breviary of Aberdeen."

<sup>49</sup> Such is the Poet Rumann Mac Colman's account.

<sup>50</sup> This, however, is not the opinion of Dr. Petrie. See "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," &c., part ii., sect. iii., subsect. 2, pp. 353 to 356.

to Rahen Monastery, and it was called Magh-Constantine, or "Constantine's plain." There was a town and church in this plain called Cell-Belaigh. These, Rumann, a poet, endowed with a third of his wealth. Such was the influx of foreigners here, at one time, that, as we are told, they inhabited exclusively seven streets.<sup>52</sup> It must be observed, however, that too much obscurity prevails, in reference to the period, when this royal penitent lived in Ireland. After spending some time there, Boece states, that the bishop of the district where he lived sent him to instruct the people of Scotland in the Faith of Christ.<sup>53</sup> Fordun tells us,<sup>54</sup> that Constantine, King of Cornwall, was a contemporary with St. Columba,<sup>55</sup> and that he came with the latter, in 565, to Scotia, where he preached the faith, both to the Scots and Picts. However, it is very remarkable, that neither Cumineus, Adamnan,<sup>56</sup> Prince O'Donnell, nor any other early writer of St. Columba's Acts, class him among those his companions, who are named.<sup>57</sup> Nor does his name appear among St. Columba's disciples, as found in any of his Acts, so that we must relegate this statement to the file of spurious traditions. At what particular period he left Rahen for Scotland is altogether uncertain. Ussher thinks, it was when St. Columba last left Ireland.<sup>58</sup> Constantine founded the church of Govan,<sup>59</sup> on the River Clyde. It is said, he desired the crown of martyrdom, and he heard a voice from heaven assuring him, that his wishes should be crowned. He converted the inhabitants of Kintyre or Cantire to Christianity. Some wicked persons came to the place, where he lived, and, according to the Aberdeen Breviary, they cut off his hand, which was again healed. Then, they inflicted various wounds, cutting off his arm, and leaving him almost dead, they departed. Calling his brethren towards him, Constantine felt consoled, and soon he slept in peace. Having attained a good old age, he was crowned with this martyrdom, in Kintyre,<sup>60</sup> towards the close of the sixth century. He was slain, by the Scottes, according to Boece, and "eckit to the nowmer of martiris."<sup>61</sup> While the Breviary of Aberdeen places his death, so early as 576,<sup>62</sup> Ussher<sup>63</sup> and Colgan have 590,<sup>64</sup> while Bishop Forbes gives A.D. 596.<sup>65</sup> It is related, that he was buried in his own church, at Govan. This great penitent, on the authority of Scottish writers, is classed among St. Columkille's disciples, by Colgan.<sup>66</sup> Several of the Scottish churches were formerly dedicated to his memory,<sup>67</sup> as Boece takes occasion

<sup>52</sup> The foregoing particulars are related by Rumann Mac Colmain, called the Virgil of Ireland, and whose death is entered in the Annals of Tighernach, at the year 747. The original of his poem is said to have been copied from the Book of Rahin. See, Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," &c., part ii., sect. iii., subs. 2, pp. 353 to 356.

<sup>53</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxv., pp. 624, 625.

<sup>54</sup> See "Hystorie Scotorum," lib. ix.

<sup>55</sup> See "Scotichronicon," vol. i., lib. iii., cap. 26, p. 130. Goodall's edition.

<sup>56</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>57</sup> See his Life, at the 23rd of September.

<sup>58</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. xiv., n. 161, p. 166.

<sup>59</sup> This departure is placed at A.D. 590. See Index Chronologicus. "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," pp. 533, 534.

<sup>60</sup> See "Notices of the early History of the Parish of Govan," By J. C. Roger, Esq., F.S.A., Scot. "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii., pp. 212 to 216.

<sup>61</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Martyrology for the use of the Church of Aberdeen, from a MS. of the sixteenth century, communicated by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A., Scotland, p. 262.

<sup>62</sup> See Bellenden's Boece, vol. ii., p. 88.

<sup>63</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xi. De S. Constantino Rege, &c., num. i., p. 64.

<sup>64</sup> See Index Chronologicus, A.D. DXC. "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," pp. 533, 534.

<sup>65</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xi. De S. Constantino Rege, p. 578.

<sup>66</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 311.

<sup>67</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., p. 489.

to state.<sup>68</sup> Besides the church of Govan,<sup>69</sup> the churches of Kirkconstantine,<sup>70</sup> of Kenneil, or Kinnoul,<sup>71</sup> and Dunnechtyn or Dunnichen<sup>72</sup> held the earlier King Constantine in esteem as chief patron.<sup>73</sup> The following churches are dedicated to a later King Constantine: Kilchousland in Cantyre,<sup>74</sup> St. Cowstin in Stornoway,<sup>75</sup> St. Constantine in Inverness,<sup>76</sup> Garabost in Ey, St. Cowslan or St. Cutchew,<sup>77</sup> Crawfordjohn,<sup>78</sup> Edigham Chapel,<sup>79</sup> Urr,<sup>80</sup> and Colmanell.<sup>81</sup> It seems undecided to what Constantine, Chonsland Chapel,<sup>82</sup> near Cranston, had been dedicated.<sup>83</sup> Several local memorials of Constantine's veneration remain in Cornwall, although we have no historical record of his mission there. From a very remote period, a parish has been called after him, in the Deanery of Kirrier. Some crumbling ruins, denominated St. Constantine's Chapel, with a well<sup>84</sup> near, were on the shore of St. Merrin, not far from Padstow. As a rule, whenever an ancient church bears the name of a British Saint, that saint was generally its founder; churches only which owe their origin to monastic institutions being an exception, and sometimes deriving their names from that of the parent monastery. We may believe then, that on the site of the Parish Church of St. Constantine, as well as on that of the old chapel, on the sands of St. Merrin, oratories of the saint himself once stood.<sup>85</sup> At what time of his life, Constantine occupied those places, we have not sufficient data to determine; but, we are told, in an old Life of St. Petrock, that on his return to Cornwall, a certain rich man, called Constantine, who lived in the vicinity of the saint's hermitage, was restored to health by his prayers, and that afterwards he became a Christian teacher.<sup>86</sup> May we not venture to identify this Constantine with the saint of that name, and suppose, that he built those oratories, immediately after his conversion, and before his departure to Ireland? It may be, that he was attracted to the coast of St. Merrin, by its contiguity to Petrock's abode at Padstow; and, as regards the other centre of his ministerial labours in the parish, which still preserves his name, there could have been no spot in his native land more likely at that time to kindle the interest and zeal of a courageous follower of Christ, for it was one of the strongholds of Druidism. On the bleak granite

<sup>67</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 169, 170.

<sup>68</sup> See Bellenden's Edition, vol. ii., p. 88.

<sup>69</sup> See the "Martyrology of Aberdeen," the "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. i., p. 17, "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Lanark, p. 675.

<sup>70</sup> See "Registrum Glasg.," vol. i., p. 122. This may have been identical with Govan.

<sup>71</sup> Near Perth. See "Martyrology of Aberdeen," "Old Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. xxiii., p. 551.

<sup>72</sup> See ibid., vol. i., p. 422. Also "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Forfarshire, p. 152. There is St. Cousland's Fair and St. Cousland's Flaw.

<sup>73</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Martyrology for the use of the Church of Aberdeen, from a MS. of the sixteenth century, p. 262.

<sup>74</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. ii., p. 19, "Old Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. x., p. 536.

<sup>75</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Inverness, p. 115.

<sup>76</sup> See ibid., p. 126.

<sup>77</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. ii., p. 381. Martin's "Western Isles," p. 27.

<sup>78</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. i., p. 163.

<sup>79</sup> See "Lib. Cart. Sanctæ Crucis," pp. 42, 55.

<sup>80</sup> See ibid., p. 68.

<sup>81</sup> See ibid., pp. 19, 61.

<sup>82</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Edinburgh, p. 192.

<sup>83</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 314.

<sup>84</sup> It is built round with stone and arched over—Hals.

<sup>85</sup> "Adjoining St. Merran or Harlyn Warren was in ancient times a village with a chapel, or, as it is said, a parish church, dedicated to St. Constantine; some ruins of this building still remain, consisting of part of the east end, some broken arches and pillars, and a considerable part of the tower; a richly-ornamented aisle is said to have been standing till about the year 1780."—Lyson's "Cornwall," p. 226.

<sup>86</sup> "Quadam die [Petrocus] vidit cervum ad se fugientem, quem Constantini cujusdam divitis servi venatores cum canibus sequebantur. Hunc sanctus pietatis affectu con-

downs, in its vicinity, there were many Druidical monuments, which in those remote days were high places of superstition.<sup>87</sup> Various doubts have been thrown upon the identity of the Cornish Constantine, with the saint of that name, who toiled and died in Scotland, at the close of the sixth century. Haigh conjectures, that the Constantine, who abdicated his throne, whose conversion is recorded in the Annals of Cambria, Ulster, and Tighearnach, who sojourned in St. David's monastery, and subsequently evangelized the Picts of Cantyre, was a son of Muircheatach, an Irish king, who was banished from his own country, and who reigned for seven years in Britain; but, his conjecture is supported by no historical evidence whatever.<sup>88</sup> All the best authorities concur, in designating the Scottish Constantine, as the son of Cador, Duke of Cornwall; and, the identity receives further confirmation, from the fact, that the festival of the saint, in the Calendars both of Scotland and of Ireland, is March 11th. In the Cornish parishes abovementioned, his feast is still kept on the Sunday nearest to that day.<sup>89</sup> Besides, the allusion to Constantine, King of Rathain, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, the name of Constantine, a Briton,<sup>90</sup> with the words, "no Mac Fergusa do Cruthnechaibh" <sup>91</sup> added, is the record we find in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>92</sup> concerning him, at the 11th of March. The Calendar of Cashel, according to Colgan, notices, also, St. Constantine of British origin, Abbot of Cul Rathain Mochudda, in the country of Delbhna, Meath: Marianus O'Gorman has Constantine a Briton, while his commentator adds, that he was the son of Fergus, of Cruthenian origin, or according to others, a Briton, Abbot of Rathen of St. Mochuda. At this date, likewise, Cathal Maguire alludes to him, as being Constantine, King of the Britons, who abdicated his sovereignty, and as a pilgrim came to Rathen, during the time of St. Mochudda. The same writer adds, that he was comorban or successor of St. Mochudda, at Rathen, and that he had previously been King of Albyn, or that he was Constantine, son to Fergus, and of Pictish origin.<sup>93</sup> Again, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>94</sup> inserts within brackets, and in a later hand than that of the O'Clerys, Constantine, royal-monk at Rathain, with Mochuda, son of Fergus. His parentage here is a mistake, for Constantine, son of Fergus, died so late as A.D. 820.<sup>95</sup> In the Scottish Martyrologies and Calendars, likewise, he is recorded. The Breviary of Aberdeen contains a Collect and Lessons for his feast day, at March the 11th. Again, the Kalendar of Drummond states, at March 11th, or v. Idus, that in Hibernia, the Holy Confessors Libren, Senan, Constantine, and Ængus, went to Christ.<sup>96</sup> The Kalendar of Arbuthnott enters, at the same date, St. Constantine, King and Martyr.<sup>97</sup> Also, the Kalendar in the Breviary of Aberdeen, noting, that he had an Office of Nine servavit illæsum, et venatores, cervum sub tutamine Sancti tangere verentes, rem Domino per ordinem retulerunt. Qui indignatus, et acri ira permotus, cum Dei servum gladio ferire niteretur, subito stupore totis membris dirigit, quousque humilitatum interventu militum, piis Sancti precibus persolvit; et sibi et viginti militibus suis fidem Christi docens, ex tyrannis mites et ex paganis reddidit Christianos."—Vita S. Petri. See "Acta Sanctorum." June 4th.

<sup>87</sup> Three remarkable stone monuments in this parish have been described in Borlase's "Antiquities of Cornwall," p. 156, Edition of 1754.

<sup>88</sup> See "The Conquest of Britain by the Saxons," p. 359.

<sup>89</sup> See the Rev. John Adam's "Chronicles of Cornish Saints," No. iii. S. Constantine. Reprinted from "Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall, 1869," No. x. Read at the Spring Meeting, May 22nd, 1868.

<sup>90</sup> This means, that he was Welsh, or rather Cornish.

<sup>91</sup> This signifies, that he may have been, by an alternative supposition, Constantine, son of Fergus, who was of the Picts.

<sup>92</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>93</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xi., nn. 1, 2, pp. 578, 579.

<sup>94</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

<sup>95</sup> According to the Annals of Tighearnach and of Ulster.

<sup>96</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Calendars of Scottish Saints," p. 7.

Lessons.<sup>98</sup> Adam King, in his Kalendar, at the same date, remarks, that Cōstantin, King of Scotland, was Mōke and mart. vnder King Eugenius 3.<sup>99</sup> Again, Dempster<sup>100</sup> notices, at St. Andrew's, Constantine III. King, who abandoned his sceptre for monastic quiet; while, David Camerarius has St. Constantine Martyr and second King of the Scots bearing that name, at this date.<sup>101</sup> In the modern Scottish Kalendar, to be found in Bishop Forbes' work,<sup>102</sup> at the v. Ides of March, corresponding with the 11th, there is a notice, "Const. 3. King," evidently referring to the present saint. At this date, he is commemorated, in several of the foreign Martyrologies. In the "Memorial of Ancient British Piety,"<sup>103</sup> as likewise in the "Circle of the Seasons,"<sup>104</sup> we find the record of his penitence, his piety, and his victory, over the Powers of Darkness.

ARTICLE III.—ST. LIBREN OR LIBERN OF CLUAINFODA, NOW PROBABLY CLONFAD, COUNTY OF WESTMEATH. [Sixth or Seventh Century.] This holy man was the son of Aid, son to Colgan, son of Thuathel Cruinnbheoil, son to Fedhlemid, son of Fiach Cassan, son to Colla Dachriùch.<sup>1</sup> He was brother to St. Magnend,<sup>2</sup> Abbot of Kilmainham, near Dublin, to St. Cobthac<sup>3</sup> and to St. Tuan.<sup>4</sup> Colgan<sup>5</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>6</sup> have noted the feast of a St. Librenus, who was Abbot of Cluainfoda, at the 11th of March. He was born, probably in the sixth, and he lived, it is supposed, in the beginning of the seventh century, since his father Aidus, Prince of the Oirghialla and of all the Airtheara,<sup>7</sup> died, A.D. 606,<sup>8</sup> while on a pilgrimage to Clonmacnoise.<sup>9</sup> The place of this present saint was formerly called Cluain-foda-Fini, or Cluain-foda-Librain, now the head of Clonfad parish,<sup>10</sup> in the barony of Fertullagh, and county of Westmeath. A monastery was founded here, in the sixth century, most probably by St. Finian of Clonard.<sup>11</sup> Afterwards, it seems to have been inhabited by St. Etchen, who died on the 11th of Feb-

<sup>97</sup> See ibid., p. 97.

<sup>98</sup> See ibid., p. 113.

<sup>99</sup> See ibid., p. 147.

<sup>100</sup> In his "Menologium Scoticum," p. 194. Ibid.

<sup>101</sup> See Scottish Entries in the Kalendar of David Camerarius, p. 235. Ibid.

<sup>102</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 249.

<sup>103</sup> At p. 49.

<sup>104</sup> See p. 71.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup>Such is the pedigree given in the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. xiii. Selbach has the same account, in his "Genealogies of the Irish Saints," chap. xi.

<sup>2</sup> His feast occurs, at the 19th of October, and at the 18th of December.

<sup>3</sup> His feast does not seem to be known.

<sup>4</sup> His feast is held, on the 1st of April.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xi. De S. Liberno Abbate Cluainfodensi, p. 584.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," xi. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 53.

<sup>7</sup> The Orientales, or the inhabitants of the eastern part of Oirghialla. The name is still preserved in that part of the baronies of Orior, in the east of Armagh County. Aedh, son of Colgan, seems to have lived in a habitation, on an island in Loch-da-damh, or the "Lake of the two Oxen." It was probably situated in Oirghialla, but the spot has not been identified. In certain Irish verses, given by the Four Masters, some obscure allusion is made to Aedh and to Loch-da-damh. Colgan thinks, they allude to his abdication. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxiv. Vita S. Mochtei, cap. xvi., and n. 15, p. 732.

<sup>8</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 232, 233.

<sup>9</sup> We are informed, that of him was said:—

"There was a time when Loch-da-damh was a pool of splendour, The lake was [nothing else] but splendour in the reign of Aedh, son of Colgan. Indifferent to me who destroyed it; my friend has abandoned it; Though it was he that placed a brilliant house upon the island of Loch-da-damh."

<sup>10</sup> See the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheets 25, 32, 33, 38, 39. The townland proper is on Sheets 32, 33.

<sup>11</sup> Here the relics were preserved, but these

ruary, A.D. 577.<sup>12</sup> As there was another place, called Cluain-foda, and different from that of Meath, Colgan does not decide to which of them this saint belonged. However, Harris was not so scrupulous as Colgan, for he places Librenus, at Cluainfoda, in East Meath, adding this mistake of his own, in thus assigning it, and not to Westmeath, as he should have done.<sup>13</sup> He also identifies the place, with Ecra-Tulach,<sup>14</sup> as the modern designation.<sup>15</sup> An entry occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>16</sup> at the 11th of March, relating to St. Libren, Cluana fota. Again, Marianus O'Gorman enters his feast, at this day, and in the same words. On this day is registered, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>17</sup> Libren, of Cluain-foda-Libren, Anglicised, "St. Libren's long Lawn or Meadow." In the year 887, Conchobhar, son of Flannagan, lord of Ui-Failghe, was destroyed by fire, in this church.<sup>18</sup> There can hardly be a doubt, the present saint was here venerated; and, yet, Colgan is uncertain, for he considers, that it may be at this locality, or at Cluain-foda,<sup>19</sup> in Fiadh-mor, in Lagenia, where he may have been commemorated.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. LIOBRAN OR LIBRAN, SAID TO HAVE BEEN ABBOT OF IONA, BUT MORE PROBABLY HE WAS ABBOT OF DURROW, KING'S COUNTY. At the 11th of March, Colgan<sup>1</sup> has entered a few short notes, regarding this saint; from which it would appear, in one instance, a writer states, that he belonged to Iona, or to Cluain-foda. Thus, he would seem to have been confounded with another saint, bearing the same name, and venerated on the same day. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> and Bishop Forbes<sup>3</sup> have some notices of this holy man. In Adamnan's Life of St. Columba,<sup>4</sup> allusion is made to a Libran. But, whether he was identical with the present saint, or not, may admit of doubt. Another mention of a Libran occurs in a poem, attributed to St. Columkille, before he left Durrow for the last time. At this epoch, Liber was not residing there, but he was expected to arrive at a future period.<sup>5</sup> Although, it has been stated, that this holy man was Abbot of Iona, still we cannot find him noted, among the list of its superiors; however, it may be deemed more probable, that he presided over the monastery of Durrow, in the King's County. Again, Dr. Reeves calls him Abbot of Tamlacht-Librein, and quotes Colgan for his authority.<sup>6</sup> As we have seen already, he is commemorated in the Festivity of St. Ængus, at this day. In the Scholia, annexed to Maguire's copy, the Scholiast doubts, as to whether he had been connected with Hy or Clonfad. The name merely of Libran is entered, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>7</sup> at the 11th of March. Again, the Martyrology were destroyed in 887. See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 555.

<sup>12</sup> According to the Martyrology of Donegal and the "Annals of the Four Masters." See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 208, 209.

<sup>13</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. ix., n. 102, p. 128.

<sup>14</sup> I have not been able to find it out.

<sup>15</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "The Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 264.

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>17</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>18</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 540, 541, and n. (n). Ibid.

<sup>19</sup> Possibly Clonfad, in the parish of Offer-lane, and barony of Upperwoods. Its situation is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 16, 22.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xi. De S. Librano, Abbate Hiensi, p. 584.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," xi. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 53.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 378.

<sup>4</sup> See, Dr. Reeves' Edition. Vita S. Columbæ, lib. ii., cap. 39, p. 162, and n. (u). Ibid.

<sup>5</sup> See ibid. Additional Notes G, p. 277, and n. (f.)

<sup>6</sup> After a careful search, however, I cannot find at the page quoted, any warrant for this assertion.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

of Donegal<sup>18</sup> on this day, records, Liobran, Abbot of Ia-Coluim Cille. His history is very obscure.

ARTICLE V.—ST. FINCHANUS, FINNICHEN, OR FINCHAN, REPUTED TO HAVE BEEN ABBOT OF ARDCHAOIN. We have nothing very definite on record, to warrant us in placing the festival of this St. Finchanus, or Finchan, at the present date. Colgan<sup>1</sup> assigns his festival, however, to March the 11th, owing to certain inferences he draws, from the Irish Calendars. He chooses that, from one of the five several days, at which this name of Finchan occurs, in the Irish Calendar; yet, his attempts at identification can hardly be deemed satisfactory. Notices of this saint occur in the Bollandists'<sup>2</sup> and in Bishop Forbes'<sup>3</sup> works. On a doubtful surmise of Colgan, this holy man is classed among the disciples of St. Columkille,<sup>4</sup> it being thought, he was the Findchan,<sup>5</sup> who assisted at the ordination of Aedh Dubh, and who thus displeased his illustrious superior.<sup>6</sup> He is known as Finnichen, in Scotland. Among the lowland Scotch, this saint is commonly called St. Fink; and, his name is preserved in Kilfinichen,<sup>7</sup> a parish in the island of Mull.<sup>8</sup> It is situated, between Lochs Na Keal and Scridan. According to Rev. Dr. Reeves, the Sancta Fincana,<sup>9</sup> proposed in the "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ,"<sup>10</sup> as the patron of this parish, seems scarcely possessed of equal claims, with our St. Findchan, to that distinction. The Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>11</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>12</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>13</sup> commemorate a Fionn-Chan, at the 11th of March. In that table, appended to the Martyrology of Donegal, we find a St. Fionntain of Cluain-caoin set down for this date,<sup>14</sup> and he is probably intended to represent the present saint. Either some error of entry has here occurred, or a second festival to St. Fionntain of Clonkene,<sup>15</sup> now the Kill of the Grange, county of Dublin, took place on this day. It seems more probable, however, that Ardchaoin and Cluain-caoin have been confounded.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. CUANDA THE BLIND. There is an acephalous Life of a St. Cuona, in Latin, among the Burgundian Library Manuscripts, at

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xi. Martii. De S. Finchano, Abbate de Ardchaoin, pp. 583, 584.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," Martii xi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 53. The writers, however, are doubtful, not alone as regards his identity, but even as to whether the supposed saint should find a place in our ecclesiastical Calendars.

<sup>3</sup> See "Calendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 347, 348.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., p. 490.

<sup>5</sup> In the title of Adamnan's, lib. i., cap. 36, his name is found. This title the Bollandists omit, and thereby mutilate the text. Instances of this kind are frequent, in the course of St. Columba's Life, as given by Adamnan.

<sup>6</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," pp. 66 to 71.

<sup>7</sup> This is noticed in old records, under the forms, Killenachin, Keilfeinchen, Killennachan, and Killinchen.

<sup>8</sup> St. Finnichen's Chair is just above the church. See "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Argyle, p. 296.

<sup>9</sup> According to Scottish accounts, she is said to have been one of the nine daughters of St. Dovenald.

<sup>10</sup> See vol. ii., part i., p. 314.

<sup>11</sup> As edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii., we have the notice: "Findchan Airicsiren." The Rev. Dr. Reeves thus amends the reading: finnchan aipe i pñemh, Finnchanus qui fuit in angustis (sive cruciatibus), dinturnis: the expressions of suffering having reference, as he supposes, to the visitation recorded in the work of Adamnan.

<sup>12</sup> He enters, finnchan gel oc spaironech, Finnchanus virgo, purus et amarusus.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75. Here, we find no distinguishing epithet, for this holy man; but, in the table added to their work, a commentator enquires, if this saint be Finchan, i.e., Finngar. See ibid., pp. 418, 419.

<sup>14</sup> See Dr. Todd's and Dr. Reeves' Edition, pp. 420, 421.

Bruxelles.<sup>1</sup> From Mr. S. Bindon's short description, however, it is not possible to determine his identity. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have brief allusion to Cuanna Dal, i.e., cæcus, at this day; but, we know not, if he be the same person as St. Cuona. On the 11th of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> we find the festival, Cuannae ceci, recorded. He is also entered in the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman, at this date. From the epithet, applied to this saint, we may presume he suffered from the loss of sight. It is again repeated, for we read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> about Cuanda, the Blind, as having a festival on this day. Colgan supposes him, to have been a disciple of St. Patrick;<sup>5</sup> but, in the absence of other authority, nothing more can be advanced with certainty respecting him.

ARTICLE VII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. EUDONUS, OR ENDENUS, ABBOT. Father Henry Fitzsimon, on the authority of the Carthusian Martyrology, enters St. Eudonus, an Abbot, at the 11th of March.<sup>1</sup> Quoting Fitzsimon, the Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> at this date, notice him as Endenus, and they conjecture, that he may not be different from St. Endeus of Aran.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. MOSHENOC, OR SENOCUS, ALSO CALLED SENAN, AND KESSOGUS, OF BEITHEACH. The Bollandists have only a very brief allusion to this holy man, at the present date.<sup>1</sup> He is mentioned, likewise, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus the Culdee. His name is written, Mosenoc, no Senan Bethrech, in the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>2</sup> at the 11th of March. According to Bishop Forbes,<sup>3</sup> we are to regard this holy man as being identical with a saint, already alluded to on the day previous.<sup>4</sup> Thus, as we are told, Senan is called Kessogus, in the Breviary of Aberdeen.<sup>5</sup> Moshénoc,<sup>6</sup> of Beitheach, is recorded in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> as being venerated on this day. His period or place we cannot determine, unless we adopt the suggestion of Bishop Forbes, and this seems likely enough to be the correct interpretation.

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. GELLOCUS OR KELLOCUS. Citing the authority of Marianus O'Gorman, the Bollandists note Gellocus or Kellocus, at the 11th of March.<sup>1</sup> To us, there seems some confusion of name, in making this entry, and, perhaps, the name Kessogus was the one really intended.

<sup>1</sup> See notices of this saint, at the 7th of February.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Vol. xxii. It commences at fol. 218.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 53.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 72, 73.

<sup>5</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. c., p. 167, and n. 147, p. 188. Also Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 54.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," Martii xi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 54.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of March.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sancto-rum," tomus ii., Martii xi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 53.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 373, 374, 444.

<sup>4</sup> He accepts the identification, on the authority of Rev. Dr. Reeves.

<sup>5</sup> Pars Hyemalis, at the 11th of March, fol. lxvi., b.

<sup>6</sup> In a note by Dr. Todd we are here informed, "The more recent hand adds here, Senán ar ainnm do ro as Aongus iníoch: "Senan is his name in Aongus (i.e., in the Feilire of Aongus), at this day." The word iníoch, we are told, is a corrupt spelling for iníoch.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 53.

Twelfth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MURA, MURUS, OR MURANUS, ABBOT AND PATRON OF FAHAN, COUNTY OF DONEGAL.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

GIVING Acts of this saint, on the day of his festival,<sup>1</sup> Colgan remarks, there can be no doubt, his Life was formerly extant; but, not having come into his possession, our Irish hagiographer had been unable to present more than some of the following special particulars regarding him. The Bollandists have an account of him, likewise, at this day;<sup>2</sup> but, it is chiefly borrowed from Colgan. The “Memorial of British Piety,”<sup>3</sup> Mrs. Anastasia O’Byrne,<sup>4</sup> and Bishop Challoner,<sup>5</sup> have a few remarks, at the same date, in reference to him. The Rev. William Reeves has written a very interesting paper on Saint Mura.<sup>6</sup> A brief notice is in Rev. S. Baring-Gould’s work.<sup>7</sup> This saint sprung from an illustrious family, and from the founder, Niall, who gave name to the O’Neills, he being son to Feredach,<sup>8</sup> who was son to Ronan, son of Eugene Mercheom, son to Muredach, son of Eugene, son to the aforesaid Niall, called the Great.<sup>9</sup> The mother of St. Mura was called Derinilla, and she obtained the surname, Cethuir Chichead, Anglicised, “of the four breasts.” Colgan explains this, as not referring to any monstrosity of figure or birth; but, rather, as seems most probable, on account of her having nurtured one child, or more children, by four different husbands. Yet, the real meaning of Cethuir-Chichead must be rendered, “of the four provinces,” according to the Rev. Dr. Reeves.<sup>10</sup> This woman was of noble origin, and as stated, she gave birth to six children, by different husbands.<sup>11</sup> All of these children are numbered among the saints.<sup>12</sup> St. Muro or Mura,<sup>13</sup> Murus, or Muranus,<sup>14</sup> was Abbot of Fathen,<sup>15</sup> on the west side of the Peninsula of Inishowen, and in the county of Donegal. It was in the diocese of Derry. The most ancient documents

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii xii. De S. Muro sive Murano, p. 587.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii xii. It is written in four paragraphs, p. 212.

<sup>3</sup> See p. 50.

<sup>4</sup> See “The Saints of Ireland,” pp. 34, 35.

<sup>5</sup> See “Britannia Sancta,” part i., p. 172.

<sup>6</sup> See “The Ulster Journal of Archæology,” vol. i., pp. 271 to 273.

<sup>7</sup> See “Lives of the Saints,” vol. iii., March xii., p. 238.

<sup>8</sup> The O’Clerys state, that St. Mura was descended, from the race of Eoghan, son to Niall.

<sup>9</sup> Such is the paternal pedigree, as found in the “Sanctilogic Genealogy,” chap. ii. The Psalter of Cashel, as we are told, inserts the same pedigree. See Colgan’s “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii xii., nn. 3, 4, p. 587.

<sup>10</sup> See “Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore.” Appendix S., p. 236.

<sup>11</sup> The O’Clerys observe, that Deirinill was his mother, and the mother of Domhanguart, son of Eochaidh, and a number of other saints.

<sup>12</sup> In the “Opuscula,” attributed to St. Ængus, it is stated, that Derinilla, surnamed Cethuir Chichead, was the mother of St. Domangart, son of Eochod, of St. Ailleán, of St. Aidan, of St. Muran of Fathen, of St. Machumman of Druimbo, and of St. Cillen of Achadh-cail, in the territory of Leith-Cathuil, at the banks of Duindroma estuary, lib. iv., cap. vii.

<sup>13</sup> This is the Irish form of the name.

<sup>14</sup> The two latter forms are used in Latin. See Colgan’s “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xii. Martii, nn. 1, 2, p. 587.

<sup>15</sup> Harris says erroneously, that Fathen Othna monastery was founded by St. Murus. See his edition of Sir James Ware’s Works, vol. ii., “The Antiquities of Ireland,” chap. xxxviii., p. 265.

and Martyrologies, quoted by Colgan,<sup>16</sup> ascribe its foundation to St. Columba.<sup>17</sup> This monastery was about five miles, westward from the city already named. It lay near romantic Lough Swilly. The monastery, at this place, likewise, was called Othan-mor.<sup>18</sup> St. Muro was looked upon, as the patron of this parochial district;<sup>19</sup> and, he was also revered, as tutelar saint of the O'Neill family, being sixth in descent from Eoghan, their local founder. From him the name of Innishowen was derived; and, it is probable, that Mura had ancestral claims, on the lonely spot he had selected for his retirement.<sup>20</sup> This saint flourished after the beginning, or about the middle, of the seventh century.<sup>21</sup> Our Irish authorities assign the death of St. Kellach, Abbot of Fathen-Mura, to A.D. 657.<sup>22</sup> He must have been a successor of Mura, and consequently—unless we are to suppose that Mura resigned the government of the monastery—Kellach was a survivor of our saint.<sup>23</sup> Mura is said to have written a Metrical Life of St. Columkille,<sup>24</sup> and to have composed it in the Irish language.<sup>25</sup> Fragments of this are to be found quoted, in other Acts of St. Columba. This poem was preserved for many ages at Fahan, and until the sixteenth century. The Reformers carried it off or destroyed it, with many other monuments belonging to this church. There was also preserved, here, and before Colgan's time, a very ancient Book of Chronicles, and other histories of the whole country.<sup>26</sup> These were held in great esteem, by learned antiquarians. Various relics, having relation to St. Muro, and to other saints of this neighbourhood, for many centuries had been preserved in Fahan monastery and church;<sup>27</sup> but, in Colgan's time, one of those relics, called by the Irish Bachull Mura, or, the "Staff of Mura," was kept with great veneration. Formerly it served for the pastoral staff of our saint. It was richly ornamented with gold and precious stones, and many miracles were said to have been wrought, in connection with this relic. The people, living in this neighbourhood, and especially the O'Neill families, were accustomed to swear on St. Mura's staff, and it was popularly believed, in all cases, to have been

<sup>16</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. ii., num. 49, p. 495.

<sup>17</sup> Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Bibliotheca MS. Stowensis," vol. i., pp. 33, 34.

<sup>18</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 268, 269.

<sup>19</sup> The parish of Lower Fahan, containing 24,782 acres 2 roods and 24 perches, is shown on Sheets 19, 20, 28, 29, 30, 38, and the parish of Upper Fahan containing 10,040 acres 1 rood and 12 acres, is described on Sheets 29, 38, 39. Both lay in the barony of Inishowen West. See "Ordinance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal." The townland of Fahan proper, parish of Upper Fahan, is on Sheet 38.

<sup>20</sup> See the "Ulster Journal of Archaeology," vol. i., St. Mura, by Rev. William Reeves, D.D., p. 272.

<sup>21</sup> Colgan infers this, as well from his family pedigree, as also from the fact, that he wrote the Acts of St. Columba, who died A.D. 597. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xii., n. 2, p. 587.

<sup>22</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. ix., p. 510. Also, Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp.

268, 269, and Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiv. Februarii. De S. Cellaco, &c., n. 7, p. 334. Instead of 657, Archdall has (at Fahan) by mistake, 637. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 98.

<sup>23</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. viii., n. III, p. 38.

<sup>24</sup> See the account contained in Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. iv., p. 26.

<sup>25</sup> At the year 600, Edward O'Reilly says: "St. Murus lived at this time. He wrote the Acts of St. Columb. Cille, in Irish verse."—"Chronological Account of nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers," p. xli.

<sup>26</sup> Yet, among the many lost books of Ancient Erin, enumerated by Professor Eugene O'Curry, no mention of these is to be found. See "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. i., pp. 1 to 28.

<sup>27</sup> Colgan was unable to tell, whither they had been removed, if they had been saved from the Protestant spoilers, he living in Belgium, an exile from this locality, with which formerly he had been well acquainted.

<sup>28</sup> It was formerly kept by the O'Neills; but, it is believed to have passed into the instrumental for establishing the truth of an assertion. Any perjury, which was deliberately perpetrated during the course of an investigation, and then committed, was visited by some signal and miraculous punishment on the delinquent.<sup>28</sup> The Bell of St. Mura<sup>29</sup> is a very interesting relic, and drawings of it, with an elaborate description, are to be found, in the Ulster Journal of Archæology.<sup>30</sup> Likewise, there is an interesting account of it, and a drawing, among John Windale's collection of Manuscripts.<sup>31</sup> Several curious legends are told, in connexion with it. It has no tongue, and tradition asserts, that it appeared at first descending from heaven to earth, while its approach was announced by loud ringing. When almost within reach of the people, attracted by its sounds, it suddenly ceased to ring, the tongue was observed to detach itself from the bell, and to return towards the skies.<sup>32</sup> In an Appendix to the Introduction of the Donegal Martyrology, a commentator remarks, that in a certain discourse or tract, relating to a St. Murro,<sup>33</sup> he saw it stated, that this saint subdued wild beasts, and raised a person to life, who had been dead for three days.<sup>34</sup> It seems probable enough, this St. Murro was identical with St. Mura of Fahan; at least, we can find no other name, in our Irish Calendars, more closely corresponding. Calculating from the names of his kinsmen, who are equidistant from a common ancestor, and making an average for his age, the Rev. Dr. Reeves arrives at A.D. 635, for St. Mura's obit, or allowing for his being an ecclesiastic, it is thought, that ten may be set down in addition. Hence, A.D. 645 should be an approximation, for the date of his death.<sup>35</sup> This very celebrated abbot departed some time before A.D. 658,<sup>36</sup> according to a conjecture of Dr. Lanigan, as Kellach, successor to our saint, died during that year.<sup>37</sup> His memory was venerated, on the 12th of March, in Fathan church, and in the territory of Inishowen. Marianus O'Gorman calls him the great Murus of Fathen, and Maguire notes him;<sup>38</sup> while on this day, we find registered, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>39</sup> Mura, of Fathain, in Inis Eoghain. His church had once been richly endowed with lands and possessions. However, through lapse of time and owing to neglect, this noble Fathan monastery became ruinous, and, at length, it was converted into a parish church. During the seventeenth century, the day of his festival was observed, in that part of the country, with which he was connected. It is to be regretted, that no trace of his once collection of Mr. John Bell, Dungannon. See article on "The Bell of St. Mura," communicated by John M'Clelland, Jun. of Dungannon, to the "Ulster Journal of Archæology," vol. i., p. 274.

<sup>29</sup> It was lately in possession of John M'Clelland, Jun., of Dungannon, and it probably remains with him, having been purchased from the former holder, to the great discontent of the Fahan people.

<sup>30</sup> There are two lithographic illustrations of this Bell of St. Mura of Fahan, together with two interesting and appropriate communications, one from the Rev. William Reeves, and the other from John M'Clelland, Jun., Dungannon, in the "Ulster Journal of Archæology," vol. i., pp. 271 to 275.

<sup>31</sup> See "Irish Researches," vol. vi., pp. 861 to 865, in the Royal Irish Academy. No. 51.

<sup>32</sup> See "Ulster Journal of Archæology," vol. i. Mr. John M'Clelland's communication, p. 275.

<sup>33</sup> In the margin, the following comment has been attached to this proper name by the commentator: "Meacúir .i. machaire, seu Meacharius." I cannot find such a name, or even one very similar, in our Martyrologies, except as the father of two saints, viz., Diarmaid, son of Meachair, at the 16th of January, and again, the daughter of Meachar, at the 6th of September.

<sup>34</sup> See, ibid., p. xlvii.

<sup>35</sup> See the "Ulster Journal of Archæology," vol. i. Saint Mura, by the Rev. William Reeves, D.D., p. 271.

<sup>36</sup> Dr. Lanigan is in the habit of advancing the Chronology of the Four Masters, by one year. Their date is A.D. 657.

<sup>37</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. viii., p. 37.

<sup>38</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii. Martii, n. 10, p. 587.

<sup>39</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

<sup>40</sup> Maghtochair's "Inishowen: its His-famous abbey now exists, in the parish of Fahan; but, his grave is yet pointed out, and a holy well is dedicated to him. These revered objects are much frequented by people living in the neighbourhood.<sup>40</sup> We are told by Colgan, that he saw a fragment of this Saint's Office, containing a relation of his virtues; but, he does not state—probably he could not learn—if it escaped the ravages of sacrilegious hands.

ARTICLE II.—ST. KENNANACK, OR CEANNANNACH, OF INIS MEADHAIN, OR MIDDLE ISLAND, OF ARAN, AND PATRON OF BALLYNAKILL PARISH, COUNTY OF GALWAY. Very little appears to be known about St. Kennanach—called in the Irish language Ceannfhionnac—except the popular tradition, that he was son to a King of Leinster.<sup>1</sup> Who his father had been, is not stated, nor when he reigned. Yet, it is believed, that St. Ceannannach was one of the earliest among Christian preachers, in the extreme west of Ireland. He must have lived for some time in the curious oratory, which is still so perfect, on Inis Meadhain, or the Middle Island, of Aran. After him, it is called Tempull Ceannanach.<sup>2</sup> By the haven of Dowras<sup>3</sup> stands the parish church of Ballynakill parish,<sup>4</sup> off the western coast, and in the county of Galway. Its patron, St. Kennanack, was venerated, on the 12th of March. It is thought, he was identical with the St. Kennanack, who was celebrated in the Middle Island of Aran,<sup>5</sup> and whose ancient oratory, on the south tory, Traditions and Antiquities," chap. viii., p. 55.

Tempull Ceannanach, on Inis Meadhain, or the Middle Island, of Aran.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. iii., subsect. I, p. 189.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Petrie's work contains an engraving of this very curious old oratory, as it stood, over thirty years ago.

<sup>3</sup> This denomination is not noted on the Ordnance Survey Maps.

<sup>4</sup> This very extensive cure, with its islands, is in the barony of Ballynahinch. It is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheets 9, 10, 11, 22, 23, 24, 37.

<sup>5</sup> See Roderic O'Flaherty's "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Con-

shore, is so picturesque an object, standing just over the verge of the Atlantic waves. Measured on the outside, the walls—about three feet in thickness—are 16 feet 7 inches, in length, by 12 feet 6 inches, in width.<sup>6</sup> A square-headed old doorway is in the west end, and a large elder tree, with other shrubs, grows within the ruin, so as effectively to preclude an easy entrance. A stunted growth of ivy forms on the walls, which are of fine island limestone, and built with dressed blocks of Cyclopean size. Numbers of flag tombstones, with modern inscriptions, are in the graveyard around it.<sup>7</sup> A curious old window of very small dimensions is in the east gable.<sup>8</sup> According to local tradition, as recorded by Hardiman, the original name of St. Kennanach<sup>9</sup> was Gregory; while, under the latter appellation, on the remote islands, and along the western and south-western coasts of Ireland, some person, greatly celebrated for his holiness, was held in popular veneration. Some have thought him to be identical with Pope St. Gregory the Great,<sup>10</sup> who was formerly called by the Irish, "Gregory of the golden Mouth,"<sup>11</sup> as probably suggestive of his great eloquence. Roderick O'Flaherty tells us, that his memory was kept, on the great Island of Aran; however, his editor, James Hardiman, observes, that there is no authority for any direct or immediate connexion between him and the Aran Islands. Tradition asserts, indeed, that the ship-road, between Aranmore and Inis Meadhoin, was called, Gregory's Sound, after "Gregory of the golden Mouth;" while, Hardiman maintains, that the latter was identical with St. Ceannannach.<sup>12</sup> Tradition has it, that by order of a pagan tyrant, who ruled on the north-west coast of Galway, St. Ceannannach was seized, and beheaded, near the eastern extremity of the present village of Cleggan.<sup>13</sup> There, a heap of stones is pointed out, as a monument, said to have been erected on the spot, where he suffered. Two miles north of Cleggan, at the foot of Cartron hill<sup>14</sup> are the ruins of Ballynakill's ancient parish church,<sup>15</sup> which had been dedicated to St. Ceannannach. His well, enclosed by a circular wall, is situated about a furlong east of the church.<sup>16</sup> It is thought to be not improbable,<sup>17</sup> that he is the same naught," edited by James Hardiman, M.R.I.A., pp. 118, 119.

<sup>6</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the spot by the writer, in June, 1877, has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>7</sup> Not far away is shown the site of an old graveyard, now covered over with fine white sea-sand. A storm once washed away sands and loose stones, showing inscribed tombs, buried in the subsoil. The clearing away of the sandbank might probably show the remains of an old church, and perhaps reveal several old Irish inscriptions and sculptures.

<sup>8</sup> Mr. Hardiman states, that this oratory is considered to be the most ancient and perfect of all the ecclesiastical remains in the Aran Islands. It is named, in Archbishop O'Keely's list of the Aran churches, which he furnished to Colgan; while there, it is said to have been dedicated to St. Ceannannach, and to be subject to the parish of St. Endeus.

<sup>9</sup> In Irish, written, Ceannfionach.

<sup>10</sup> It is remarkable, likewise, that his feast falls on the present day, to which O'Flaherty, in the work quoted, assigns that of St. Kennanack.

<sup>11</sup> It is remarkable, Cummian, in his celebrated Epistle, referring to the Paschal controversy, acknowledges this as his received title, "oris aurei," even at that early period. See Ussher's "Veterum Epistolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge." Epist. xi., p. 31.

<sup>12</sup> See Roderic O'Flaherty's "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught, written A.D. 1684," edited by James Hardiman, M.R.I.A., p. 80 and n. (c.)

<sup>13</sup> This and the townland, so called, are in the parish of Ballynakill, and barony of Ballynahinch. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheets 9, 22.

<sup>14</sup> See ibid.

<sup>15</sup> The east gable is of great antiquity; but, there is a modern chapel, at the west end, built by Edmond Laidir or "the strong" O'Flaherty, who is interred in it. On this chapel is inscribed A.D. 1709.

<sup>16</sup> See Roderic O'Flaherty's "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught, written A.D. 1684," edited by James Hardiman, M.R.I.A., n. (z), pp. 118, 119.

<sup>17</sup> See Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Archi-

as St. Ceanannan, whose festival is marked, in the Irish Calendars, at the 26th of March.

ARTICLE III.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. GARALT, OF MAIGH EO, NOW MAYO, WITH HIS COMPANIONS. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] It seems to us, the name of St. Garalt, or Gerald, of Mayo, has been misplaced, in the present instance; especially, as it has been omitted—in the work subsequently quoted—on the following day, when such an entry should receive insertion. A festival is recorded, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 12th of March, in honour of Garalt Maghi Eo, cum suis.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists notice this entry, likewise, but they prefer relegating St. Gerald's Acts to the day succeeding.<sup>3</sup> This feast, however, might have been regarded, as a vigil to the principal one, omitted in the Tallagh Martyrology.

ARTICLE IV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. MOCHUA, AILIUN, OR AILUIN. This is an additional insertion of the Tallagh Martyrology<sup>1</sup> regarding a saint's name, not found elsewhere, yet referable to the present day. In the Franciscan copy, there is an entry, Mochua Ailuin.<sup>2</sup> It may be questionable, however, if this entry be not intended to account for the saint, who follows next in order.

ARTICLE V.—FESTIVAL OF ST. CULAN, OR DACHUAILEN, BISHOP, SON OF GUAIRE. [Possibly in the Seventh Century.] The Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and Maguire place the feast of St. Dacualenus or St. Culanus, at the 12th of March. Notices regarding this saint occur, at the 18th of February, in Colgan;<sup>1</sup> and, at the same date, we have given fuller detail about him.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists briefly insert the name, Dochualenus, on the authority of Marianus O'Gorman, at March the 12th.<sup>3</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>4</sup> mentions, that on this day was venerated, Dachuailein, son of Guaire. He sprung from the race of Eoghan, son to Niall.

ARTICLE VI.—FESTIVAL OF POPE ST. GREGORY THE GREAT, CONFESSOR AND DOCTOR. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] This illustrious Sovereign Pontiff and learned Doctor of the universal Church deserves the highest veneration, on account of his distinguished holiness, and great actions. At the 12th of March, the festival of St. Gregory was celebrated, in Ireland, according to our ancient Calendars. In the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, it is thus set down.<sup>1</sup> As already mentioned, in our notices of St. Kennanack, at texture and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. iii., subsect. I., p. 189.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> At this date, the entries in the Franciscan copy of the Tallagh Martyrology resume, with 23 notices of foreign saints and festivals. Then follows, at iiiii. Idus, Garalt magi eo cum suis.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 104.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Rev. Dr. Kelly's Edition, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> In the original language, it reads, mo-chua ailuin.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Februarii. De S. Culano, alias Dacualeno, pp. 368, 369.

<sup>2</sup> See our "Lives of the Irish Saints," vol. ii. Eighteenth Day of February, Art. ii.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," xii. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 103.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> The following stanza, extracted from the "Leabhar Breac" copy, with its English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

A. 1111. 10. Re nictam a parrano ar cpiu epochar colaimo in torgan c. mbuaoa Spigoiu puama polaino.

this day, the holy Pontiff, Pope Gregory of the Golden Mouth, was greatly revered, by our ancestors in the Faith. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> record his Acts,<sup>3</sup> at great length; but, the generality of English readers will find them recorded, in their own language, by the Rev. Alban Butler.<sup>4</sup> Under the head of Rome, Duald Mac Firbis enters, Gregory of Rome, March 12th.<sup>5</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—ST. MELCOIRGEAS, OR MAELCORGHAI. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> records S. Melcoirgeas, or Melecorgais,<sup>2</sup> at the 12th of March. The Bollandists quote as well Marianus O'Gorman; and, at this date, they name the present saint Moelcorgusius.<sup>3</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>4</sup> registers on this day, as having veneration paid him, a saint, called Maelcorgghais. No place is particularized, in connexion with the entry of this saint's name.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. CILLIN, OR KILLIAN, OF LILCACH. An entry is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 12th of March, regarding a St. Cillen, of Lilchaig.<sup>2</sup> Besides this, although Colgan notes St. Killianus of Lilcaich, at the 14th of February,<sup>3</sup> with many other saints of the name, he omits all notice of him, at the present date, as the Bollandists observe.<sup>4</sup> Cillin, of Lilcach, occurs, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> at this day. The place of this saint cannot be readily identified.<sup>6</sup>

ARTICLE IX.—FESTIVAL OF ST. DAGAN, BISHOP OF ACHADH-DAGAN, OR ENNEREILLY, COUNTY OF WICKLOW. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] We find Dagan, Bishop, set down in the Martyrologies of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> as having a festival on this day. This however does not seem to

Before arriving in his country,
For Christ he mortified his body,

The slaughter [er] of an hundred victories

Gregory of Rome, the intrepid.

Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints,
p. 103.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp.
74, 75.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr.
Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> In the Franciscan copy, it reads, Cillein Lilchaig.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiv.
Februarii. De S. Killiani Martyris et Sociorum ejus Translatione, n. 3, p. 331.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii.,
Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints,
p. 103.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp.
74, 75.

<sup>6</sup> We find, however, a MS. note of Mr.
Hennessy, suggesting a query, if it could be identical with Bective, in the county of Meath. We are then referred to a notice, in Grace's "Annales Hiberniæ," edited by Rev. Richard Butler, M.R.I.A., note (i) at
p. 20, A.D. 1195. We there read, that Bec-tive, in the Irish language, had been called Lieltrede, and in Latin, De Beatitudine.
However, Lieltrede seems to differ from Lilcach.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr.
Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, the entry stands, Dagan epī.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp.
74, 75.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii.,
Martii xii. De S. Gregorio Magno, Pontif.
Romano et Eccles. Doctore, pp. 121 to 211.

<sup>3</sup> These are preceded by a previous commentary, in eight sections, containing 40 paragraphs. This is followed by an anonymous but synchronous Life, taken from ancient Codices, in 5 chapters, comprising 28 paragraphs; a Life by the Deacon John, having a prologue, and in Four Books, containing altogether 42 chapters, in 274 pa-graphs. An epilogue, in Latin verses, concludes the latter Life. Several notes are added by the Bollandists, by way of elucidation.

<sup>4</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xii.

<sup>5</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 124, 125.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr.
Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>2</sup> In the Franciscan copy, we find, Sci
melecorgais.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii.,

have been his principal feast. Under the head of Inver Dagile,<sup>3</sup> Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Dagdan, Bishop, at March 12th. The place is identical with Ennerelly.<sup>4</sup> According to our Irish Calendars, on this day, there is a festival, commemorating St. Dagan, Bishop over Achadh Dagan. His Acts, which are given at this date by Colgan,<sup>5</sup> will be found, deferred to the 13th of September. The Bollandists<sup>6</sup> allude to his festival, at the 12th day of March. This is thought to have been the anniversary for some translation of the saint's relics.

---

ARTICLE X.—FESTIVAL OF THE BLESSED BRYAN BOROIMHE, KING OF IRELAND AND MARTYR. [Tenth and Eleventh Centuries.] The Bollandists remark,<sup>1</sup> at this date, that the English Martyrology inscribes a festival to Brian, King and Martyr, in Hibernia, at the 12th of March. His Life will be found, at the 23rd of April, the anniversary for his glorious death. Colgan promised to treat of him,<sup>2</sup> at the 13th—most probably a typographical error for the 12th—of March; however, at neither day has he redeemed this promise.

---

ARTICLE XI.—FESTIVAL OF ST. KESSOG, MACKESSOG, OR MACKESSAGUS, BISHOP AND CONFESSOR, PATRON OF LENNOX, SCOTLAND. [Sixth Century.] The Martyrology of Usuard, enlarged by Hermann Greuen, gives the feast of Kessogus, Bishop, in Scotia, at this date, as the Bollandists observe.<sup>1</sup> We have already inserted his Acts, at the 10th of March.

---

ARTICLE XII.—ST. COMAN, COMMANUS, OR CORMAN, PRESBYTER OF IONA, SCOTLAND. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] With regard to this holy man, Colgan<sup>1</sup> thinks, that a Cormán may be identical with a St. Coman,<sup>2</sup> a Presbyter, who was a nephew,<sup>3</sup> on the sister's side, of St. Virgnoius or Fergna,<sup>4</sup> Abbot of Hy,<sup>5</sup> and whose feast has been assigned to the 12th or to the 18th of March. St. Corman is said to have been the first Irish or Scotch preacher of the Gospel, among the Northumbrians.<sup>6</sup> However, as we are told, the subtlety of his intellect, and his peculiar style of eloquence, were unsuited to the capacity of his hearers; so that his mission proved a failure,<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 112, 113.

<sup>4</sup> The parish of Ennerelly, in the barony of Arklow, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 35, 36, 40, 41. The townland proper is on Sheet 41.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii. Martii. De S. Dagano, Abbate et Episcopo. Ex variis, pp. 584 to 587.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 104.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 103.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Januarii. De S. Colmano Lismorensi Abb. et Ep., n. 10, p. 155.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 103.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga."

Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 30, 38, p. 489.

<sup>2</sup> Adamnan alludes to him, as having given information, regarding a miraculous vision, related by Virgnoius. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. iii., cap. 19, p. 225.

<sup>3</sup> He had for brothers St. Cuimine Fionn, the seventh Abbot of Hy, who was venerated on the 24th of February, and whose pedigree and Acts will be found, at that date, in our collection. He had another brother, who is called Becan, and who has a festival, at the 17th of March. See ibid., n. (e). Also Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 22, p. 386.

<sup>4</sup> Also called St. Fergna Britt, whose Acts will be found, at the 2nd of this month.

<sup>5</sup> He was the fourth abbot, in order.

<sup>6</sup> See Hector Boece, "Hystorie Scotorum," lib. ix., fol. clxxv.

<sup>7</sup> See Francis Godwin, "De Præsulibus Angliæ," pars. ii., p. 91.

and he returned again, to make way for the more fortunate mission of St. Aidan.<sup>8</sup> John Lesley classes him among the saints.<sup>9</sup> Dempster will have it,<sup>10</sup> that he wrote some works,<sup>11</sup> and that he flourished, A.D. 630; while his festival is assigned to the 12th day of March, in the "Menologium Scoticum." There he enters, in Scotia, Corman, a Bishop, and an Apostle of Anglia. He quotes Hector Boëtius, for this statement.<sup>12</sup>

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. FETCHUON, FIECHNON, ALSO CALLED FETHUO, FETHCHUO, FIECHNO AND FETNO, CONFESSOR AND MISSIONARY AMONG THE SCOTS AND PICTS. [Sixth Century.] Among the missionary disciples of St. Columba,<sup>1</sup> when he left Ireland, to preach the Gospel, among the Scots and Picts, this devoted servant of Christ is to be classed. He is stated to have brought his neophytes back to the piety of St. Ninian's days.<sup>2</sup> Colgan has inserted some notices regarding him, at the 12th of March.<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists<sup>4</sup> notice him, likewise, at the same date, as also Bishop Forbes, under the name of Fechno, or Fetno.<sup>5</sup> Colgan thinks his true appellation was Fethchno or Fethchu,<sup>6</sup> or, at least, Fiechno or Fiechna, which names are to be found attached to saints, in our Irish Calendars. It seems likely, this holy missionary was born in the north of Ireland,<sup>7</sup> early in the sixth century, and that he spent some time there, under St. Columba's religious discipline. Again, Dempster<sup>8</sup> has notices of St. Fethuo, and among other gratuitous statements, this holy man is made an abbot,<sup>9</sup> and the writer of "Epistolæ ad Patres in Iona," lib. i. According to John Lesley,<sup>10</sup> he lived in the year 606. At the 12th day of March, with a eulogy for his piety, zeal, erudition, and extraordinary evangelical labours, David Camerarius has noticed St. Fetno,<sup>11</sup> Confessor; <sup>12</sup> but, his real name is Fiachna,<sup>13</sup> and he is said to have died about the year 580.<sup>14</sup> Miracles were wrought at his sepulchre.<sup>15</sup> Colgan supposes—although the 12th of March has been set down for Fethuo's or Feccenon's feast by foreign Martyrologists—that in reality, he may be the Fiechnon, or Fiachna, venerated in our Irish Calendars, at the 30th of March, or the Fetchchuo, commemorated, at the 23rd of July, or at the 2nd of August.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>8</sup> See his Life, at the 31st of August.

<sup>9</sup> See his Scottish History, lib. iv., p. 158.

<sup>10</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iii., num. 257, p. 154.

<sup>11</sup> These are thus enumerated: Documenta Fidei ad Northanhumbros, lib. i., Conciones, lib. i., Commentaria in Scripturas, lib. i., Acta Legationis, lib. i.

<sup>12</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>2</sup> See Camerarius, at p. 116. He quotes Boëtius, "Hystorie Scotorum," lib. ix., fol. 166 a. ed. 1575. The feast of St. Ninian occurs, at the 16th of September.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii. Martii. De S. Fetchuone, sive Fiechnone, Scotorum et Pictorum Apostolo, ex variis, pp. 588, 589.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 103.

<sup>5</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 336.

<sup>6</sup> This Irish word denotes "a wolf."

<sup>7</sup> According to an addition in Codex B.

of Adamnan, Fethuo and Rus—St. Columba's missionary companions to Scotland—were the two sons of Rodan. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes, A, p. 245, and n. (l.)

<sup>8</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. vi., num. 535, p. 293.

<sup>9</sup> Dempster adds, "et puto inter Soderenses illos Scotos montanos."

<sup>10</sup> See "Historia Scotorum," lib. iv., p. 152.

<sup>11</sup> By this name, he is so called, likewise, in the Dunkeld Litany, in the English Martyrology, and by Ferrarius.

<sup>12</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 235.

<sup>13</sup> See ibid., p. 336.

<sup>14</sup> According to John Wilson's English Martyrology, Phillip Ferrarius and Camerarius.

<sup>15</sup> So it is stated, by Camerarius. See "De Statu Hominis Veteris simul ac novæ Ecclesiæ, et Infidelium Conversione," lib. i., cap. iii., sect. 2, p. 165.

<sup>16</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. INDREACTACH OR INNRECHTACH O'FINACHTAIN, ABBOT OF IONA, SCOTLAND, AND MARTYR. [Ninth Century.] We learn, from the Annals of Innisfallen,<sup>1</sup> that the surname of this holy man was Uo Finachta or Ua Finachtain.<sup>2</sup> Idreachtach O'Finachtain is called Coarb of Columbkille,<sup>3</sup> and from this it has been inferred, he was abbot over Londonderry Monastery, in the olden time.<sup>4</sup> However, this title he obtained, because he was the twenty-first Abbot of Hy, and he held office A.D. 849, in which year he went to Ireland, with St. Columba's relics.<sup>5</sup> As the date of his predecessor's death is not recorded, although we know, that Diarmait, the twentieth abbot, visited Ireland, on a similar errand; it cannot be known, when St. Innrechtach began his rule, over the Iona monks. He was regarded as an eminent sage. On the 12th of March, A.D. 852, he suffered martyrdom, among the Saxons, according to the Annals of the Four Masters.<sup>6</sup> He was on his way to Rome.<sup>7</sup> According to the Annals of Ulster,<sup>8</sup> the date for his departure to Christ is A.D. 853, while the Rev. Dr. Reeves places it, at A.D. 854.<sup>9</sup> A legend,<sup>10</sup> by William of Malmesbury, misdates his martyrdom, by one hundred and sixty-five years, and places it near Glastonbury.<sup>11</sup>

---

Thirteenth Day of March.

---

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCHÆMHOG, OR MOCHÆMOC, ALSO CALLED PULCHERIUS, ABBOT OF LIATH-MORE, OR LIATH-MOCHÆMHOG, NOW LEIGH, IN THE PARISH OF TWO MILE BORRIS, COUNTY OF TIPPERARY.

[SIXTH AND SEVENTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—VARIOUS ACTS OF ST. MOCHÆMOC—HIS PARENTAGE, BIRTH AND EARLY EDUCATION—HIS STUDIES AND ORDINATION, AT BANGOR—HE IS SENT TO FOUND A MONASTERY, WHICH HE ERECTS AT ANNATRIM.

AMONG the Irish, as among the Jews of old, it was customary to record the pedigrees of remarkable and holy persons. St. Ambrose finds a reason for this ancient practice, by stating, that the writers of the Sacred Scriptures not only desired to praise the morals of great individuals, but even to show how virtues and renown have descended as an heirloom from their Martii. De S. Fethuone sive Fiechnone, &c., and nn. 6, 7, pp. 588, 589.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> At A.D. 840.

<sup>2</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba." Additional Notes (O), p. 390.

<sup>3</sup> His Life occurs, at the 9th of June.

<sup>4</sup> See "Memoir of the City and North-Western Liberties of Londonderry," part ii, sect. 2, p. 27.

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv. Annales Ultonienses, A.D. DCCCLVIII., p. 219.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 486, 487.

<sup>7</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 468.

<sup>8</sup> At A.D. DCCCLIII. "Heres Columbe cille, sapiens, optimus, iv., Id. Marcii apud Saxones martyrizatur."—"Annales Ultonienses," p. 222.

<sup>9</sup> See his edition of Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba." Additional Notes (O), p. 390.

<sup>10</sup> Yet in Manuscript.

<sup>11</sup> See Haddan's and Stubbs' "Councils ancestors.<sup>1</sup> We have reason to believe, as in case of the present saint, that the genealogies of our holy persons descend to us from more reliable sources, than do the wonderful miracles too frequently attributed to them, through those unauthenticated stories collected by so many legend-mongers.

There is an Irish Life of St. Mochoëvog, transcribed by Michael O'Clery, among the Burgundian Manuscripts, at Bruxelles.<sup>2</sup> There is also a Vita S. Mochoëmoci, but imperfect at the beginning. This is marked fol. 49, in a Trinity College, Dublin, Manuscript.<sup>3</sup> Likewise, in that Manuscript of Marsh's Library, Dublin, and which has been called, but incorrectly, the Codex Kilkenniensis, there is a Vita S. Mochoëmoci seu Pulcherii Abbatis, Liatmorensis, in Hibernia.<sup>4</sup> Pulcherius is regarded as a Latin rendering of the Irish name. An idea, that the legendary Life of St. Mochoëmoc, as published, had been written by one of his contemporary disciples, seems unfounded.<sup>5</sup> Fleming has published Acts of this holy abbot,<sup>6</sup> but without any critical acumen. The Life of St. Mochoëmoc or Pulcherius, extracted from the Codex Kilkenniensis,<sup>7</sup> has been published by Colgan.<sup>8</sup> The Bollandists,<sup>9</sup> likewise, reproduce these Acts. A commentary, in five paragraphs, precedes this account.<sup>10</sup> Bishop Challoner,<sup>11</sup> the Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>12</sup> and the Rev. S. Baring-Gould<sup>13</sup> have their respective Lives of this renowned saint.

The father of St. Mochoëmoc was Beoan, son of Mellan, son to Nesson, son of Erc, son to Cuinned,<sup>14</sup> son of Finnchöemy, son to Cömscrag,<sup>15</sup> and thus is the genealogy<sup>16</sup> continued to the family of Connhaicne,<sup>17</sup> belonging to the province of Connaught.<sup>18</sup> His mother was Nessa, the sister of St. Ita,<sup>19</sup> and daughter to Keannfoelad, son to Cormac. She descended from the Decies race. It happened, however, that Beoan, who was a renowned artificer in wood and stone, as also a brave warrior, had incurred the displeasure of some enemies, who drove him from the place of his birth, and who compelled him to find a refuge in Munster. He took up his abode, in and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland," vol. iii., p. 139.

ARTICLE I. — CHAPTER I. — <sup>1</sup> See "Opera," Homilia, lib. i., in Lucam.

<sup>2</sup> The Codex is classed vol. iv., part ii., p. 179. This was copied by Professor Eugene O'Curry, and it has been translated into English, by Professor O'Looney, who has kindly afforded us the use of his Manuscript.

<sup>3</sup> It is classed E. 3. II.

<sup>4</sup> From fol. 81 to 85.

<sup>5</sup> Such is the opinion of Rev. S. Baring-Gould, who thinks it cannot have been written, before the twelfth century. See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., p. 245.

<sup>6</sup> See "Collectanea Sacra," in 30 paragraphs, pp. 380 to 391.

<sup>7</sup> This belonged to the Friars Minor, and the author of it is thought, by Colgan, to have lived contemporaneously with St. Mochoëmoc and St. Canice. He is thought, likewise, to have written the Acts of St. Ita, for January 15th, of St. Maidoc, for January 31st, and of St. Fintan, at February 17th, as also other Lives in the collection. The style is rude, and the language sometimes ungrammatical; but, the phrases are often antique, while the ablative absolute is used on occasions for the nominative case.

<sup>8</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiii. Martii. Vita S. Mochoëmoci Abbatis de Liath-mor, in Helia. An Appendix, in five chapters is added. See pp. 589 to 599.

<sup>9</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiii. De S. Mochoëmoco, seu Pulcherio, Abbate Liatmorensi in Hibernia, pp. 280 to 288.

<sup>10</sup> This copy, collated with Colgan's Life, had been obtained by them from the Very Rev. Hugh Ward.

<sup>11</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 172, 173.

<sup>12</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xiii.

<sup>13</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 13, pp. 245 to 249.

<sup>14</sup> Others have it Cared.

<sup>15</sup> According to the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chapter xxvi. The Psalter and Calendar of Cashel agree with this account.

<sup>16</sup> The Psalter Mac Richard, Bodleian Library, Oxford, has at fol. 9, the genealogy of St. Mochemog.

<sup>17</sup> From this tribe, many of our saints spring, and some noble families.

<sup>18</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, that Connaicne was the name of various districts in this province, and chiefly in the county of Galway. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. v., n. 58, p. 29.

<sup>19</sup> Her Life will be found, at the 15th of January.

<sup>20</sup> This district is now represented, by the

a territory called Corcoic, in the country of Hua-Conaill-Gabhra,<sup>20</sup> and it is incorrectly said to have belonged to the Corcobhaiscinn people.<sup>21</sup> Here, he seems to have become acquainted with a beautiful, virtuous, and noble woman, named Nessa, who had desired to lead a life of virginity. Yet, through a prophetic spirit, her sister St. Ita<sup>22</sup> knew, that the Almighty willed her to be the wife of Beoan. This union was soon accomplished, and the husband was most tenderly attached to his spouse. For a time, they were childless, but, one day, after the artificer had completed a building for St. Ita, she asked him, what reward he desired. Beoan reminded her, that no heir had been born since his marriage, and he entreated her, to pray for the birth of a son. Then said the holy virgin to him, "You shall have a son, beloved by God and by men." This prophecy was afterwards fulfilled. Meantime, a certain cruel king, named Crunnmhœl, from the southern part of Hua-Conaill, undertook a hostile incursion against the Corcóche Tuath. With a large force, he commenced the work of devastation and slaughter. Beoan was obliged to take up arms, with his adopted tribesmen; but, he fell, in an engagement, which ensued, and he was then beheaded, according to a barbarous practice of conquerors, at the time. In profound grief, his wife came to the battle-field, where she found the mangled remains of her husband. Taking the head, and recognising his ghastly features, she bore it in tears to St. Ita, crying out, "Oh, dear! sister, have you not declared to us, that he should leave a son to succeed him, and now he is slain, while I am still left childless?" Ita said, "Sister, weep not, for God is able to assist us, and to ratify my promise. Go, therefore, and attach this head to Beoan's body." Nessa declared, that she could not identify it, so great had been the number of the slain. Then, the holy virgin replied, "In the name of the most Holy Trinity, call him thrice, by his own name, when he shall arise and come to you. Afterwards, replacing the head, he shall say to you, 'O woman, why have you called me, for I had gone to my rest?'" All this was accomplished, as directed, and Beoan was restored to his former vitality and health. Both went to St. Ita, and they returned thanks. She asked Beoan, whether he should prefer to remain in this life, or to go at once to heaven. He declared, that in comparison with the rewards of eternal life, he deemed all this world as smoke. However, Ita said, "It is right, that the reward I promised you should be paid." Then washing his wounds, no trace of them subsequently appeared, and blessing him, she sent Beoan and his wife away to their own house. Soon afterwards, Nessa conceived, and when the time of our saint's birth approached, a wonderful miracle was wrought, in favour of St. Fachnan, or Fachannan,<sup>23</sup> of Ross-alithre.<sup>24</sup> Resolved on paying a visit to St. Ita, and accompanied by her husband, she sat in a chariot. "Verily," cried out Ita to her nuns, "that chariot approaching resounds beneath a king, go ye out and see, who is the occupant." The messengers reported, that her sister Nessa was in it. Then said the saint, "Truly, it sounds beneath a king, for the child she bears, through God's grace, shall be great in the kingdom of Heaven." On returning to their home, the child came to light, and soon barony of Connello, in the county of Limerick. See the "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," edited by Dr. O'Donovan, n. 692, p. lxxvii.

<sup>21</sup> The reader is referred to what has been already stated, in regard to their territory, at the Life of St. Senan, which is given on the 8th of March, chap. i., nn. 33, 34, 36, 37. Yet, the present account, in Colgan's Acts, makes it extend, into the county of Limerick. Professor O'Looney's copy has it Corcoic.

<sup>22</sup> Her father is called Faelan, in Professor O'Looney's Life.

<sup>23</sup> See his Life, at the 14th of August.

<sup>24</sup> Now the town of Ross, in the parish so called, in the baronies of East Carbery, Ibane and Barryroe. The parish is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cork," Sheets 121, 133, 134, 143.

this news was conveyed to St. Ita. With great joy, she exclaimed, that Beoan deserved to have a son, who should be exalted before God and before men, and whose memory should not fade from recollection. She added, likewise, "He shall be beautiful and old." Whereupon, his first name was Cœmhghin;<sup>25</sup> but, almost immediately, this was dropped for Mochœmog,<sup>26</sup> which was applied to him by St. Ita. The year of his birth is not known; however, it could not have been later than 550, as his aunt Ita died A.D. 570.<sup>27</sup> From the font of baptism, his life was illustrated by miracles and graces. One day, as his mother Nessa went out from the house, and left her infant sleeping within it, on looking back, she saw a globe of fire settle over the roof. Quickly returning and crying out, the fire vanished and did not reappear; while, looking at the infant, she found him rosy-cheeked and smiling, so that all who heard her account concluded, that the Holy Spirit came specially to visit her beloved child.

The parents then came to St. Ita and said, "O lady, the grace of God miraculously shines in your little favourite, and in our son; so that, as he is spiritual and we carnal, he is unsuited for our worldliness, nor can he live with us." Immediately she replied, "Bring him hither, and he shall be fostered by myself." They consented to this arrangement. Mochœmog was trained up from the time he was a child, in the fear and love of God, by St. Ita, who took charge of her nephew, during twenty years. She educated him for the priesthood, and while prosecuting his studies, she also watched most sedulously over his morals. She had a foreknowledge, that he should found a monastery, in a certain place, whence he should take his departure for heaven, and that there a city, of which he must be patron, should afterwards be built. All this, Ita told her young ward, and he said to her, "Oh, pious matron, let it be as thou wilt." With the consent of his parents, and having received the blessing of his aunt, it was next deemed necessary, that the holy young man should be committed to the care of St. Comgall,<sup>28</sup> who lived in his monastery of Benchor, in the province of Ulster. Mochœmog set out, with five other companions, and they were all joyfully received by the illustrious abbot. While here, Mochœmog had many distinguished school-fellows. He lived for several years, under the discipline of that great saint, whose name, as a teacher and cœnobite, had extended all over Ireland. In Bangor, he was ordained a priest, after he had passed through the requisite course of preparation.

While St. Comgall and his disciple St. Pulcherius were one day engaged at prayer, the Prior of the monastery had been abroad, and he came in a fright to acquaint them, that he had seen, when returning home, a great multitude of devils around their monastery. They laid, as it were, a close siege to it, on all sides; whereas, he could discover but one devil over the castle of Rath-leamain,<sup>29</sup> where the neighbouring king kept his court. This one even appeared to be idle. St. Mochœmoc, on hearing this, cried out to St. Comgall, "Father, let us arise, and return thanks to God, because our brethren are so faithful in his service, that the devil assembles all his hellish troops to wage war against them; for, where Satan is served, he thinks one evil spirit sufficient to maintain his usurpation; and this same one appears to

<sup>25</sup> This signifies, "handsome born."

<sup>26</sup> Meaning, "my Chœm" or "my Chœmog."

<sup>27</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. v., p. 23.

<sup>28</sup> See his Life, at the 10th of May.

<sup>29</sup> According to Colgan, this was in the diocese and county of Down. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii., n. 11, p. 597. I am informed, by Rev. James O'Laverty, P.P., Hollywood, that such a rath once stood near the town of Bangor, but that it had been levelled down over thirty years ago, no trace of it now remaining.

be idle ; but, where men bravely resist his tyranny, he employs all his forces against them. Thus, as a king sends the brave ones of his army to contend against his stoutest enemies, who are in arms against him, so does he send only a messenger, where no opposition is offered." St. Comgall approved very much his disciple's sentiments. Joining with him in prayer, Comgall obtained from God, and for the encouragement of his brethren, that their eyes should be opened to discern those infernal legions, and to see them put to flight by their prayers.<sup>30</sup> Comgall ordered, likewise, that Mochœmog should go to the left, while he would take the right, side of the monastery. When casting forth the demons, Comgall commanded them, in Christ's name, never again to assemble there, until the day of judgment. According to this mandate, they fled away from the monastery of Bangor ;<sup>31</sup> and, in doing so, they alighted on the castle of Rath-leamain, where the King of Ultonia resided. There they settled, as if guarding it with a garrison force.

On witnessing this miracle, St. Comgall deemed it right, to send out a number of his disciples, so that he might establish houses, in different parts of Ireland. Being arrived at an eminent degree of religious perfection, Mochœmog was commissioned, and sent with other monks, to found an institute for these religious. "My son," said the abbot to our saint, on his departure, "it is necessary that you should become the spiritual father of others, and that you should erect a house for God's service, wherever he may decree." Then going forth, with his colony, Mochœmog journeyed to Leinster. The place he first pitched on for this purpose, was Enachtruim, now Antrim,<sup>32</sup> on Mount Bladhma, at present Slieve Bloom. Here a man, named Bronach,<sup>33</sup> sought to prevent him from building ; but, the saint said, he should carry out his purpose, while he declared, that opponent should be banished, with his generation, from the country, and by its chieftain. All this was literally fulfilled, and there Mochœmog began to build cells, which he afterwards resigned to St. Cœmhan, for whom this place was specially destined by the Almighty.<sup>34</sup>

CHAPTER II.

ST. MOCHŒMOC GOES TO ANATRIM, WHICH HE LEAVES, AND NEXT PROCEEDS TO HELIA—HE VISITS CLUAIN-MOR, AND A CHIEF, LIVING AT RATH-EANAIGH—THE TERRITORIAL KING OF HELIA RECEIVES HIM, AND BESTOWS ON HIM A DESERT PLACE—HERE THE BALBAN SOUNDS—LIATH-MOR AND ITS EXISTING RUINS—THE CHIEF OF HELIA DIES, AND HE IS SUCCEEDED BY RONAN—MIRACULOUS INCIDENTS RECORDED.

AFTER some time, St. Cœmhan<sup>1</sup> came to Antrim, and then St. Mochœmog, resigning in his favour, departed thence to the land of Eile,<sup>2</sup> or Helia, in the

<sup>30</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 173.

<sup>31</sup> The old writer remarks, that three thousand monks are said to have lived in cells there, under the presidency of St. Comgall.

<sup>32</sup> This town and townland, in the parish of Offerlane, barony of Upperwoods, are shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheet 16.

<sup>33</sup> Professor O'Looney's copy has it, Sen Bronach, i.e., "sorrowful inheritance."

<sup>34</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. Vita S. Mochœmoci Abbatis de Liath-mor in Helia, ex Codice Kilkenniensi, cap. i. to xii., pp. 589 to 591.

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> His feast occurs, at the 3rd of November.

<sup>2</sup> This was known, as Eile Ui-Fhogartaigh, or O'Fogarty's Ely. This southern part of the original Eile was withdrawn from the O'Carrolls, shortly after the English invasion, and it was added to the Earl of Ormond's country. However, the native chieftains, O'Meagher and O'Fogarty, were left in possession of it, yet tributary to the east of Munster, and lying on the west border of Ossory, in Leinster. He arrived at a place, called Cluain-mor.<sup>3</sup> Near it, in a castle, known as Raith-eanaigh,<sup>4</sup> there dwelt a certain powerful chief, named Cœmhan. This religious and good man received a visit from our saint, and in or attached to his castle there was a church.<sup>5</sup> Mochœmog was treated with great courtesy and kindness, by the chief. While remaining in the chapel, one night, Cœmhan's wife, looking out from the solar,<sup>6</sup> beheld the walls of the building surrounded with fire on every side, and she called her husband to witness the same sight. They both found out, how great was the sanctity of Mochœmog, who thus deserved to be visited by Angels, in the church, and full of admiration, they gave thanks to God. On the following day, the chieftain said to Pulcherius, "We know that you are a man of God, and many visit you, therefore you cannot find a place sufficiently large, in my poor domain; but, let us both go to my superior the Chief<sup>7</sup> of Eile,<sup>8</sup> that he may give you a suitable and an extensive property." This advice was adopted by Mochœmog. However his Magus<sup>9</sup> had persuaded the Chief of Eile, that he ought not permit the saint, to settle within his territory; as he predicted, that the stranger should be potent, in the land, of which he must be recognised always as the patron. Then replied the chief, "If he come armed against me, I shall bravely resist him, but if he shall simply visit me as the meek preacher of Christ, in whom I believe, it shall please me." Soon afterwards, Mochœmog approached the chief's castle, and on seeing him, its owner was greatly rejoiced, and bent his knee, in token of reverence. Understanding from the saint, the errand on which he had come, the chieftain received Mochœmog with courtesy,<sup>10</sup> and this petty king<sup>11</sup> was moved, by the spirit of God, to offer not only his castle<sup>12</sup> and what it contained, but even all its dependent lands. The holy man returned thanks for such a generous offer, yet he declined accepting it, and stated, that he only required some retired and desert spot. Then said the chief, "I have a certain lonely and deserted place thickly covered with woods, and near the bog, called Stagni Lurgan,<sup>13</sup> and this I grant to you and to the Almighty, with its crich, or lands, if you are satisfied." This was very acceptable to the saint; and, the chief ordered his swine-herd to point out the locality, which he well knew, to the saint and to his disciples. This office of guide the swine-herd declined, alleging as his excuse, that several of his hogs had strayed from him, and that he must seek them out, lest any accident might happen. Then said the saint, "Come

Earl of Ormond. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na-g Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (i), pp. 78, 79.

<sup>3</sup> This may have been Clonmore, in the parish of Inch, and barony of Eliogarty. It is represented, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheet 40. However, no ancient remains are there to be seen; and, as the name, "big meadow," is generic, its former denomination was possibly changed to some other, now not capable of being discovered.

<sup>4</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life of our saint, it is written Rathenaigh, chap. xi.

<sup>5</sup> Or "ecclesiastical," as O'Clery's Irish Life terms it.

<sup>6</sup> The Latin words are "respiens foras de solario," &c. In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, this is rendered "a window."

<sup>7</sup> In a foot-note, to the "Leabhar Breac," p. 99, he is called a Rígh Tuatha, which means "a territorial king." In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, he is styled Tigerna, meaning "a lord," or "a king."

<sup>8</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, this potentate is named Duchon.

<sup>9</sup> Or Druid, according to Professor O'Looney's translated Life.

<sup>10</sup> Professor O'Looney's translated Life states, that the chief bent his knee, in the saint's presence.

<sup>11</sup> In the translated Life, at this passage, he is called "a king," in Irish rí; but, in all the other passages, he is called *ti*geirna, properly speaking "a lord."

<sup>12</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, this residence is called Tór.

<sup>13</sup> At present, several boggy tracts lie near Leigh. In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, at this passage, we read, "a great inwith me, and when you return, all the animals you seek shall be found safe, within the lawn of this castle."<sup>14</sup> The swine-herd believed the saint's words, and accompanied Mochœmoc, who went forth to take possession of the place thus granted to him. When Mochœmoc reached the place, the Balban,<sup>15</sup> namely, the little bell he got from his nurse, the holy woman St. Ita, struck and sounded audibly. When he was leaving Ita, she gave him this little bell, and she said: "Here is this dumb bell for you, it will not sound till you reach the place of your resurrection, and where it shall speak or sound, there shall be the place of your resurrection." When Mochœmoc heard the sound of the bell, he was joyful, and he gave thanks to God; for, he knew that was to be the place of his resurrection. There too he found a great wild hog, under the shade of a large tree, and his colour was Liath,<sup>16</sup> or gray; and, on recognising the people of God, that animal abandoned his natural wild rage, and made greetings to them. Then, Mochœmoc said: "As the colour of that hog is Liath or gray, so shall it be the name of this place for ever." Hence it is called Liath,<sup>17</sup> to this day,<sup>18</sup> and the angels visited that place, at the coming of Mochuada.<sup>19</sup> After a three days' fast, St. Mochœmoc consecrated that place to God.

The principal church of Mochœmog was established here, and thus it was called Liath-mor<sup>20</sup> or "the great," as also Liath-Mochœmhog, after our saint's name. It has been described, in a gloss to the Feilire of Aengus, as having been situated in Southern Ely of Munster. It is now called Liath Mochœmhog, anglice, Leamokeyvege. It lies in the parish of Two-Mile-Burris, in the barony of Elyogarty,<sup>21</sup> and county of Tipperary. The ruins and traces of old ecclesiastical buildings may still be seen at Liath-Mochœmhog.<sup>22</sup> There while Pulcherius lived, a neighbouring cenobite, St. Colman,<sup>23</sup> the son of Daire,<sup>24</sup> who dwelt at Derrymore,<sup>25</sup> frequently beheld angels passing and re-passing on visits to the holy founder. A distance of not more than four miles separated both places.<sup>26</sup> A great friendship existed, between the holy men themselves. As St. Ita had predicted, St. Mochœmoc built a cathair.<sup>27</sup> A great city afterwards sprung up, at that place; and, in honour of our saint, in Latin it bore the name, "Civitas Liath-Mochœmoc." His fame was soon tricate wood, near to the cold-streamed Loch Lurcan." This lake seems to have dried up, since our saint's time.

<sup>14</sup> Professor O'Looney's translated Life has "upon the lawn of this Dun."

<sup>15</sup> In English, it means, "dumb bell."

<sup>16</sup> The old Latin Acts have it, "canus enim latino, Liath scotice dicitur." This Colgan deems an indication of their antiquity, as they were written, when the native language was called the Scottish, rather than the Irish.

<sup>17</sup> It is further called, Liath-Mochœmoc, to distinguish it from another place, called Liath-Manchen.

<sup>18</sup> The origin of the name "Leith" is explained, in the Irish Life of St. Mochœmoc, by the foregoing legend, which has been furnished to the writer, by Professor Brian O'Looney, and taken from the "Leabhar Breac," p. 99, foot note. It agrees, too, with our saint's old Acts.

<sup>19</sup> See, also, O'Clery's Life of St. Mochuada, chap. 11, 12, 13. His festival occurs, at the 14th May, where his Life will be found.

<sup>20</sup> Leighmore is about four miles from Thurles, and it is only a little distance removed, from the old coach-road, between Cashel and Dublin.

<sup>21</sup> This barony was anciently called the territory of South Ely, to distinguish it from Ely O'Carroll, included within the present King's County.

<sup>22</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (b), pp. 266, 267.

<sup>23</sup> His festivals were held, on the 20th of May, and on the 31st of July.

<sup>24</sup> Also called Dairine.

<sup>25</sup> It was probably in Tipperary County. But, we only find there, a townland so called in the parish of Corbally and barony of Ikerrin, in the North Riding; it is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 17, 18; and one, in the parish of Clogher, in the barony of Lower Kilnamanagh, on Sheet 46, ibid.

<sup>26</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, we read, that the distance between both places was not "much more than a mile."

<sup>27</sup> So states the Irish Life.

greatly extended, and several disciples hastened to place themselves under his religious guidance.<sup>28</sup>

The old ruined church, now remaining at Leigh, and the situation of which was first pointed out by John O'Donovan, is divided into nave and choir; the nave measuring 41 feet 2 inches, in length, and 18 feet 8 inches in breadth; while the choir is 27 feet, in length, and 16 feet 6 inches in breadth.<sup>29</sup> The east gable of the choir contains a window, which is quadrangular, on the inside, where it measures 6 feet 6 inches in height, and 4 feet in width: but, on the outside, it forms two curvilinear points, at top, and it measures 5 feet 9 inches, in height, and 1 foot 11 inches, in width. It is Old Church at Leigh, County of Tipperary.

separated into four compartments, divided on this side by stone mullions; one mullion is perpendicular and the other lies across, each division measuring 2 feet  $7\frac{1}{4}$  inches, in height, and  $8\frac{1}{2}$  inches, in width. The window is placed at the height of 4 feet 6 inches, from the level of the ground, on the outside. The choir has a semicircular arch overhead, which appears to have supported some superstructure, or chamber, as fragments of walls are still to be seen, and rising high over it. At the distance of 7 feet 5 inches, from the east gable, the south wall of the choir contains a window, which was round-headed, inside and outside. On the inside, it is 6 feet 9 inches, in height, and 3 feet 11 inches, in breadth, but, it is broken on the outside. From what remains, it would appear, that it had been constructed of chiselled limestone. In the same wall, and close to the middle gable, there is a pointed doorway, constructed of cut lime-stone. This communicates with a stone stair-way, leading up to the apartment, or priest's house, over the choir; this passage, however, is now stopped up with loose stones. Still, it is easily <sup>28</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. Vita S. Mochoemoci, &c., cap. xii., xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., pp. 590 to 592, and nn. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, p. 597.

<sup>29</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the spot, by Mrs. Margaret X. White, 20 Eccles-street, Dublin, in May, 1878, was transferred to the wood by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

entered, and up the stair-way the visitor can safely ascend. The choir-arch was ancient and beautifully constructed, but nothing remains of it now, save its sides, up to the points whence it sprung. These are 8 feet 2 inches, in height, and 9 feet 9 inches asunder. They are constructed of cut sand-stone, which is of a brownish colour. The wall is 3 feet 8 inches thick. At the distance of 5 feet 7 inches, from the middle gable, the nave south-wall contains a window, which was quadrangular, on the inside, and round-headed, on the outside. It measures, on the inside, 4 feet 8 inches, in height, and 4 feet, in width; but, on the outside, it is destroyed, except the top stone, in which its round head is formed. A doorway is placed on the same wall, at the distance of 7 feet 9 inches, from the west-gable, but, it is now nearly destroyed; there is another doorway directly opposite to it, on the north-wall, and it forms a low arch, constructed of thin, hammered lime-stones, on the inside, and a semicircular arch of cut brown sand-stone, on the outside. On the inside, it is 7 feet 8 inches, in height, and 4 feet 10½ inches, in breadth, while, on the outside, it is 7 feet in height, and 3 feet 4 inches, in width. The west gable contains a pointed window, about 12 feet from the ground, destroyed on the inside, and measuring about 4 feet, in height, and 7 inches, in width, on the outside. The north-wall contains another window, placed at the distance of 6 feet 3 inches, from the middle gable; it forms a low arch, on the inside, and a semicircular one, on the outside, where it is constructed of cut brown sand-stone. It measures, on the inside, 5 feet 4 inches, in height, and 4 feet 4 inches, in width; and, on the outside, it is 2 feet 10 inches, in height, and 7½ inches, in width. There are three rudely-carved heads, placed over this, on the outside, and these look to be of considerable antiquity. The side-walls of the nave, belonging to this church, are 3 feet 8 inches, in thickness, and about 12 feet, in height. They are constructed of hammered lime-stones, cemented with sand and lime-mortar.<sup>30</sup> The churchyard is now deserted, and unenclosed. Owing to this, cattle take refuge within the church-walls, and the interior is in a most filthy condition. It was told the writer, that beneath the ordure, the nave is flagged with tombs. Among these are two, and the image of a bishop, in raised work, will be found on each, with curious carvings.<sup>31</sup>

At a distance of over seventy paces from the church ruins already <sup>30</sup> Besides the writer's personal observations on the spot, he has the late Dr. O'Donovan's accurate measurements recorded in the text, as found in "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Tipperary, collected during the progress of the Ordnance Survey, in 1840," vol. i. Description of the parish of Two-Mile-Borris, pp. 454, 455. Letter, dated Nenagh, October 5th, 1840.

<sup>31</sup> A very intelligent farmer, Mr. Michael Hayes, who lives on the townland of Leigh, furnished the writer with the following local information, in a letter, dated June 3rd, 1878: "The old people here have very little knowledge concerning the old buildings. There were three distinct plots of burying-ground, and about forty years ago, while the owner of the land was levelling and removing some old mounds, he dug up the largest skulls and bones of the human frame. The people could scarce imagine persons to be so big in former days. The ruins of an old mill were found convenient in a stream, while sinking a river, and the mill-stones were of a small size, in the form of an old fort near. It is told, that there was a subterraneous passage, but the mouth of it has been stopped up—this was said to be a place of refuge. There was hidden treasure there, people say, but the parties who went to explore would not venture to go in more than a few yards. Several parties went there, in search of treasure, after dreaming of hidden gold. Inside and under a window in the church, one party got a chalice about three feet from the floor. They left it there again, but found no gold. The ruins of a row of houses were found near, and the fireplaces could be pointed out. A lot of old bronze coin, like a penny, came to light; but, the date and figures could not be explained by any person here at that time. There was about a gallon full of these in one heap, and within three feet of the surface. This was about forty years ago."

<sup>32</sup> The accompanying illustration of this described, and without the churchyard extension, within the townland of Leigh, on level ground, and in a meadow, are the ruins of the remotely-aged oratory or ancient house, which evidently had a croft apartment, as still shown by joist holes, which are over the lower chamber. This little building is 20 feet 4 inches, in length, and 11 feet 4 inches, in breadth, on the inside; while the side walls are 2 feet 7 inches, in thickness, and 11 feet 6 inches, in height.<sup>32</sup> The two gables are remarkably sharp, and in tolerable preservation. There was a window, on the east gable; but, it is now destroyed, with the exception of two or three stones, on the inside, from which it appears, that it was round-headed. The side walls are featureless. The doorway was on the west gable, as is usual with Irish churches or oratories of the primitive ages, but its sides are now entirely defaced. The lintel remains, from which it can be ascertained, that this doorway was 5 feet 11 inches, in height; its width, however, is not easily ascertainable. The lintel is a large lime-stone, measuring 5 feet 2 inches, in length, and 10½ inches, in height, while extending 1 foot 10 inches, into the thickness of the wall. This oratory is built of field lime-stones, cemented with sand and good lime-mortar.<sup>33</sup> It is quite evident, from the local indications, that an antiquary could easily investigate the sites of old buildings,<sup>34</sup> and discover road-ways adjoining, that formerly led to the old city and monastery of our saint.

Old Oratory, at Leigh.

old building was sketched by the writer, on the spot in May, 1878. The drawing was transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>33</sup> See "Letters containing Information relative to the Antiquities of the County of Tipperary, collected during the Progress of the Ordnance Survey in 1840," vol. i. John O'Donovan's Letter, dated Nenagh, October 5th, 1840, pp. 452, 453.

<sup>34</sup> Within this parish, and at Two-Mile-Borris village itself, there is an ancient church. About 150 paces to the north-west rises an old castle. On the townland of Rathmanna is a deserted churchyard, and the foundations of a ruined church, measuring 38 feet in length, and 18 in breadth. About 25 paces to the north of Ballydavid Castle ruins, there is a remarkable large fort, measuring 94 paces in diameter. It

After Pulcherius had been some time established in this place, his kind patron the Chief of Eile died. To him succeeded one Ronan,<sup>35</sup> the son of Bledin, who resolved to expel the saint from his territories; and, for that purpose, he came with several soldiers, but by a miracle their course was arrested, nor could they move from a certain spot. Finding this to be the case, their chief called out to a band of monks,<sup>36</sup> whom he saw, that they should bring their abbot to him, so that he might express sorrow for his evil intention. The monks told the chief, that their abbot was engaged in offering sacrifice, and that afterwards he should chaunt the third hour, before any person dare interrupt his devotions. When Tierce<sup>37</sup> was completed, the monks told their superior, what had occurred. The saint then sent a message to the chief, that he should not go out, until None<sup>38</sup> had been finished. Then, indeed, Mochœmog went forth, the chief remaining immovable. The saint exclaimed, "O cruel man! what now doth profit thy power and thy heartlessness? You have come to destroy this place, where you shall be buried." The chief replied, "O servant of God! whatsoever you order me to do, I shall obey, but I entreat you to release me from this bondage." Mochœmog then ordered him to depart, and immediately he was able to do so. As his predecessor had previously done, in the presence of his chiefs, he gave the place to God and to his holy servant, while he ordered that himself and his generation<sup>39</sup> should there be buried. He withdrew, much pleased that the saint had pardoned him, and had also given a blessing. Thenceforward, he was very obedient to Pulcherius, and the saint loved him in return. After some time, however, Ronan died, and as he had desired it, they buried him at Liath-mor. The saint prayed for his eternal repose. A certain scribe had a controversy with a St. Finian<sup>40</sup>—for they were both stopping with the abbot—regarding the utility of prayers for a man, who had passed away from life, a slave to his pleasures. St. Mochœmog took part in this dispute, by alleging the many examples of Divine mercy on record, and he added, "The soul of Ronan is in the hands of God, so that, on my account, his sins shall be forgiven, while you," he said addressing the scribe, "puffed up with conceit in your own knowledge, shall know it to be so, and that your contention is in vain, since death is near, and your grave shall for ever be unknown to men. Nevertheless, I shall not denounce you, lest you be without God's kingdom." The scribe departed. He died far away from his people, by a sudden visitation of Providence. As the saint had predicted, where his burial had taken place was unknown to all his friends.<sup>41</sup>

CHAPTER III.

THE CHIEFTAIN SUIBHNE'S REPENTANCE—FAILBHE FLANN BEG, KING OF MUNSTER, AT CASHEL—HIS PUNISHMENT AND VISION—VARIOUS MIRACLES ASCRIBED TO THE MERITS OF ST. MOCHœMOC.

THERE are some incidental passages, in the Life of St. Mochœmoc, which illustrate the idea entertained by our fathers, regarding the necessity and has a parapet, about 16 feet in height from the level of the field, on the outside. This mound rises about 5 feet over the platform of the fort itself. See ibid., pp. 448 to 456.

<sup>35</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life he is called, "son of Beldine."

<sup>36</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life they are called "a band of the Ma-nachs."

<sup>37</sup> The Irish Life has it "Teirt."

<sup>38</sup> The Irish Life has it "Noin."

<sup>39</sup> The Irish Life has it Cenel or "tribe."

<sup>40</sup> The Irish Life has Finán. His identity does not seem to have been discovered.

<sup>41</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ." Vita S. Mochœmoci, &c., cap. xvii., xviii., p. 592.

CHAPTER III.—<sup>1</sup> Thus is he named in advantages of sacramental confession. Thus, in the case of a chieftain, who usurped rule in Eile, and who is named Suibhne, the son of Diarmait, it is mentioned, that he expelled Feidelim,<sup>1</sup> the son of Ronan. Mochœmoc, however, made peace between them ; but, after this covenant, Elebinus,<sup>2</sup> the son of Suibhne, killed Feidelim, through spite. This crime greatly grieved our saint, who ordered the corpse to be interred in his own cemetery. Before going into the church, Mochœmoc planted and forgot his staff, at the ground, where the corpse was to be laid down, previous to its being brought within the building. The local legends had it, that the staff took root, and grew up into a large tree, which was shown at the spot, when the ancient Acts of our saint were written. St. Cainech happened to be present, at the time, and he contended, that there was no justification for burying a man thus suddenly killed, among the monks. Mochœmoc humbly said, "I do not desire to oppose thee, O father, but, let the corpse be interred in a separate place, on the outside, although his soul is in the presence of God, in Heaven. For such reason, he is entitled to have his resurrection, among the monks, and my Bachal,<sup>3</sup> and my Molad,<sup>4</sup> will be over him, in the place where he shall be buried, and they will not be loosed, until the young man, who accomplished this treacherous death, and the hand which perpetrated this murder, shall perish. The hand shall fall from his side, and soon after he will die, and be buried in this grave ; while Feidelim shall yet come to life and be buried among the monks." The punishment and death of Elebinus followed, as the saint had predicted. The corpse of Feidelim was then exhumed, and washed with water. The young chief came to life, in presence of all the people, and he received the Sacrament, at the hands of the holy abbot. Mochœmoc then said, "O son, do you desire to exist in this world, or do you rather wish to go to Heaven ?" Then revealing to the saint, the rewards of the righteous, and the pains of the unrighteous, Feidelim replied, "O chief and father ! this world is but vanity, and, therefore, let me go into the heavenly kingdom." Imparting a blessing, Mochœmoc allowed the purified spirit to depart, and his body was buried with honour among the monks. Elebinus was interred, moreover, on the outside of the church, where Feidelim had been at first deposited. These remarkable miracles urged Suibhne to repent, and to ask for the protection of Mochœmoc, by stating that he was ready to go on a pilgrimage, or even to suffer martyrdom for his sins. Being thus penitent, he was ordered by St. Pulcherius, to confess his sins,<sup>5</sup> to live in a righteous manner thenceforward, to give alms for his own soul, and for that of Ronan, as also for the souls of his friends, and to endow Christian churches, since the mercy of Christ was ready for those persons, who returned to him. Everything enjoined by the holy abbot on the chieftain was faithfully performed ; and, at last, Suibhne departed from this life, in a good state of mind, and while in his island castle, on the River Suir.<sup>6</sup>

Faibhe Flann<sup>7</sup> Becc, King of Munster, resided at Tor na Righ, or the Professor O'Looney's translated Life, but in the Latin Acts, he is called Foelanus.

<sup>2</sup> Such is the name in Professor O'Looney's translated Life. In the Latin Acts, he is called Slebinus.

<sup>3</sup> The Latin Acts have it, "baculus meus."

<sup>4</sup> In the Latin Acts, this Irish word is called "chrysmale."

<sup>5</sup> The Latin Life states, "Videns eum vir Dei visitatum verâ poenitentia, ait ei ; Confitere peccata tua, et esto de cætero fidelis in omnibus," &c.

<sup>6</sup> The Latin Life has it, "in castello suo, in quadam insula in medio fluminis syure."

<sup>7</sup> In John O'Dugan's Chronological Poem on the "Kings of the Race of Eibhear," we find his reign thus determined :—

a ceat air véag fáilbe flann.

translated by Michael Kearney into English :—

"Ffaibhe Fflann, his raigne 14 yeares held out,"

Kings' Tower, in Cashel.<sup>8</sup> This place, where rises the celebrated Rock, in pre-Christian times, was called Sidhe Druim, or "the Ridge of the Fairies," and it was also known as Drum-feeva, being surrounded by extensive woods. It was called, likewise, Ciothdhrum. The Rock of Cashel is a huge mass of limestone, rising to a considerable height from the surrounding land, and Fortress and Tribute Cross, on the Rock of Cashel.

perfectly isolated ; it is rugged and irregular, besides being difficult of ascent. Corc, the son of Lughaidh, and belonging to the race of Heber Fionn, was a contemporary with Niall of the Nine Hostages, who ascended the throne of Ireland, after the death of Crimhthann, which happened in the year 378.<sup>9</sup> Keating has a legend,<sup>10</sup> connected with its first appropriation for building

—See John O'Daly's edition, pp. 18, 19. This toparch gained a victory over the Connacians, in 622, at Carn-Feradhaigh, or "Feradach's Cairn," supposed to have been the ancient name for Seefin, in the barony of Coshlea, county of Limerick. He also fought, at the battle of Ath-Goan, or "Goan's ford," a place not now known, but, lying west of the River Liffey, in 628. He died A.D. 633. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (g), p. 41. Also pp. 244, 245, 250, 251, and nn. (y, z), pp. 252, 253.

<sup>8</sup> The accompanying engraving, by Mrs. Millard, of the Castle and Tribute Cross, on the Rock of Cashel, was drawn on the wood from a photograph of Frederick H. Mares, by William F. Wakeman.

<sup>9</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's very interesting and readable "Popular History of Ireland," chap. vii., p. 106.

<sup>10</sup> It runs thus : Two herdsmen of the Kings of Ely and Muskerry, named respectively Cularan or Ciolarn and Durdru, or Durdre, having charge of the great herds of swine belonging to these chieftains, were having them fed, in the great woods around the rock. When, they had continued on the hill, about a quarter of a year, there appeared to them a figure as brilliant as the sun, whose voice was more melodious than any music they had ever heard. It was engaged consecrating the hill, and prophesying the coming of St. Patrick. The herdsmen having returned to their homes, related what they had seen to their masters. This story soon reached Corc, who repaired without delay to Shee-drum. He built a palace there, which was called Lis-na-Lachree, or "the Fort of Heroes;" and, being King of Munster, his royal tribute was received on this rock, now called Carriack Patrick.

purposes,<sup>11</sup> in the reign of Corc, King of Munster.<sup>12</sup> This celebrated prince most probably erected the Caiseal, or circular stone fort, here, in the fourth century of our Christian era. Most likely, too, he first changed the original name of this place. We have no evidence of his having been a Christian;<sup>13</sup> on the contrary, we find, that when St. Patrick<sup>14</sup> visited Cashel, in the reign of Aenghus-mac-Nadhfraech, who was the grandson of Corc, idol worship was in full exercise there.<sup>15</sup> There can be no doubt, that the great Rock fortress had been of importance in pagan times; and, from its defensive position, it was probably the chief regal fort of the Munster dynasts. According to one authority, the name of this place has been derived from cais-il, meaning a stone on which they used to lay down pledges, or from cis-aíl, referring to a payment of tribute, owing to the tribute given on it, by the men of Eire.<sup>16</sup> However, this latter statement must probably be interpreted, only to mean the men of Southern Ireland. The toparchs of Munster are frequently called, the Kings of Cashel, while this regal and archiepiscopal city is often styled, Cashel of the Kings. It so happened, that the horses of King Failbhe Flann—then the reigning king—had been put into a meadow, belonging to Liath Monastery, and containing some dry hay. They were driven out of it, by St. Mochœmog, and on hearing this, the toparch became highly incensed. He even commanded the ceithirn, or mercenary troops, to seize the Chief of Eile, and his children,<sup>17</sup> who were to be killed, unless Mochœmog were banished from his lands. On learning this, the saint boldly repaired to Cashel, in person, and there he met the king, who said to him, in a rage, “You bald little man, no honour shall here be given to you, but you shall be banished out of our kingdom.” The saint replied, “If I am bald, thou shalt be blind.” No sooner were these words spoken, than a keen and burning pain was felt in the king’s eyes, so that he was completely deprived of sight. Then the king’s friends entreated Mochœmoc to restore his vision. The abbot said, “I will cure the pain, but he shall not see the light.” Mochœmoc then blessed water, with which Failbhe Flann bathed his eyes. Although the pain was removed, his sight was not restored. Then the king slept, and on the night succeeding this event, he had a remarkable vision. A comely senior, whose figure was covered with a bright glory, seemed coming to the king, and taking him by the hand, Failbhe was led from his own house, on the mur, or rampart, of Tur Chaisil, to the south side of the Tor. Thence he saw Magh Femen<sup>18</sup> all occupied by a congregation of white saints, in beautiful array. The king asked the old divine, “Who are they forming Wherefore, the rock was named Cashel, i.e., Cios-aíl, or “the Rock of Tribute.” See “General History of Ireland,” part i., p. 58. Duffy’s edition.

<sup>11</sup> In addition to the old circular cashel or stone cincture, which has been replaced by a more modern stone wall, and the old royal residence yet remaining, on this elevation, yet stand the remains of the Cathedral, and Cormac’s Chapel, nearly in a perfect state; the Round Tower, in fine preservation, and retaining its stone roof; the Vicar’s Hall, and a number of mediæval domestic buildings. The gate-tower, and portions of the ancient walls, are still traceable.

<sup>12</sup> In O’Dugan’s Chronological Poem, he is said to have gloriously reigned thirty years over Munster.

<sup>13</sup> See Richard Rolt Brash’s “Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, to the close of the Twelfth Century,” chap. vii., No. x., p. 85.

<sup>14</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

<sup>15</sup> See Colgan’s “Trias Thaumaturga,” Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xxix., xxx., pp. 155, 156. He appears to have been the first Christian King of Munster, and the legend of his conversion to the true religion is there found related. He was slain, A.D. 489.

<sup>16</sup> See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Leabhar na-g Ceart, or the Book of Rights,” pp. 28, 29. The tributes due to the King of Caiseal are set down, at pp. 42 to 69, ibid.

<sup>17</sup> Such is the account in Professor O’Looney’s translated Life, but in the Latin Acts it is stated, that the obsides, or “hostages,” of Hele were thus threatened.

<sup>18</sup> The Latin Life states, that the “arx

that noble congregation?" The senior answered him, "These are the high bishops, and Patrick the Patron of Erin, and all his saints with him: it is to assist Mochœmoc, whom you seek to destroy, they have come. I say to you, O king, unless you allow Mochœmoc to have his own desire, you shall soon die, and you shall be sunk among the reprobate." Again, the king slept, and once more the senior appeared, and took him away to the north side of the same Tur. Looking out on Magh Mosadh,<sup>19</sup> it was filled with a beautiful congregation, clothed in white. The king thought they remained, on the confines of the two territories of Magh Femen and of Magh Mosadh. He asked the senior who they were, and then he received for answer, "The most glorious Virgin Brigid<sup>20</sup> is there, and St. Ita is with her, besides all the virgins of Erin, who come to assist Mochœmoc, whom you are persecuting; and behold, I predict, O father of your country, that you shall perish, and that none of your race shall ever reign, if you do not give Mochœmoc whatsoever he wills." After this, the senior departed, and the king awoke. Calling his councillors to him, Failbhe related all that had occurred, and then summoning Mochœmoc to his judgment chair, in presence of those assembled, he told what had been revealed. The holy abbot gave praise to God, because the king graciously allowed him to take his own course. Mochœmoc then bestowed his blessing, in return, when highly honoured and rewarded, the superior repaired to his monastery.

Again was this same king visited by St. Mochœmoc and by St. Colman, son of Dare. Failbhe spoke haughtily to both, but he was reprovèd by our saint, who declared, that the bishop, his companion, on account of his nobility, relationship, and virtues, at least ought to receive some courtesy from the monarch, while Mochœmoc also announced, that the Demon of Pride and the Demon of Lust held sway over him. Sensible of his crimes, the king felt sorrowful, and Mochœmoc then cried out to the Demon of Pride, "Thou seed-sower of vices, take flight, and sit on yonder stone, until joined by your companion, when I shall speak to you." Next was the Demon of Lust banished from the king, and he went to keep company with the other wicked spirit. Then said the saint to both, "Depart you two seducers to the north side of Cashel Tor, where we have not to travel, and may you do little mischief until the Day of Judgment." The mediæval legend pointed out the place of their captivity, where their moans and wailings were frequently heard. The king then thanked the Almighty for his miraculous liberation, and he took leave of the holy men, with blessings and honours bestowed on them, when they parted for their respective monasteries.

The monks of St. Mochœmoc once went eastward of Liath Monastery, to hew timber in a wood. It so happened, that one of them cut down a tree, and in falling against another tree, the monk was held fast, nor could he even shout, to make himself heard by his companions who were apart. Not thinking about him, these returned to their house, but, as all were sitting down to table, Mochœmoc remarked, and enquired, regarding the absence of the imperilled brother. The monks said they knew not what had become of him, but the abbot replied, "O sons and brothers, you have committed a great mistake, not considering his danger." Then sending them back, they found the monk, in such a position, that they feared he must be killed, even if they cut that tree. Then Mochœmoc went to the place, and invoking the Cassel" looks over this plain, to the south of it.

<sup>19</sup> In one passage, the Latin Life has this written "Campus Monaël," evidently a mistake for "Mossadhe." This plain reached northward from Cashel.

<sup>20</sup> Her feast occurs, on the 1st of February.

name of the Most Holy Trinity, the tree rose upwards to its former position, while the mark of a deep cut was for a long time afterwards seen in it. The monk was at once miraculously released, and all the company returned to their monastery, giving thanks to God for his mercies. Again, the saint's monks went one day to cut down corn, and three of them suddenly died on the spot. This grieved Mochoemoc, who went thither and blessing some water, he converted it into wine. After an aspersion, the three dead men came to life, but they were faint, until tasting the liquid, their strength returned, when resuming their labours, they lived afterwards for several days. Thence returning to his cell,<sup>21</sup> Mochoemoc saw a tree, the fruit of which was exceedingly bitter. He made the sign of the cross upon that tree, and the fruit subsequently became sweet. Thus, on the same day, Mochoemoc wrought three distinct miracles; first, by converting water into wine, secondly, by raising the dead to life, and thirdly, by changing bitter into sweet fruit. Two of Mochoemoc's monks—an old and a young man—were seized with sickness: the latter died and was buried, the former lived. Then the saint exclaimed after this manner, "O Lord Jesus Christ, how have I deserved of thee, to inflict death on the young man, whom I desired should live, and follow thee, and spare for life the old man so advanced in years!" Then, he told the grave to open, and give up its dead, in the name of Christ, the Son of God. The young man instantly arose, and he blessed the Saviour of all. Next turning to the old man, Mochoemoc asked, if he were ready to die. The senior replied, "It is meet for a very old person to have a desire to go to Christ." He then received the Sacrament, when perfect and pure he departed. Soon, afterwards, an Angel of the Lord came to Mochoemog, and he said, "O servant of God, Christ hath granted thee a privilege, that as you know and desire, so long as you live, whatever may be judged necessary for your people, shall be obtained." The Latin Acts add, that such a Divinely-procured permission, the holy man Pulcherius granted to his disciples.<sup>22</sup>

CHAPTER IV.

ST. MOCHÆMOC'S ACQUAINTANCE AND TRANSACTIONS, IN REFERENCE TO SAINTS CANICE, DAGAN, MOCHUMBA, MOLUA, MOFECHTA, FURSEY, DYMA, CUANCHEIR, AND CAINER, AS ALSO TO THE CHIEFS COLMAN, ÆNGUSS, FEIDELIM, CUAN, AND SCANLAN—ST. MOCHÆMOC'S DEATH AND BURIAL—HIS FESTIVAL AND MEMORIALS—CONCLUSION.

ON a certain day, the holy Abbot Canice promised, that he would come to Liath, and at the ninth hour, to visit St. Pulcherius. Canice then lived at Aghaboe, in the territory of Ossory, but, when the appointed hour came, he had forgotten that promise; yet, then a sudden recollection brought it to his mind, and he was troubled on account of that neglect. However, by some extraordinary means, Canice was speedily transported to Leith, the ordinary journey of a day, and there he timely arrived, notwithstanding, to chaunt Nones with St. Pulcherius.<sup>1</sup> The latter ordered a bath to be prepared, for his guest; and, he said to Canice, "O brother, celebrate<sup>2</sup> Mass for us, in the

<sup>21</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, we find, here, Sella, with an annotation within a parenthesis ["probably Sellach-Tellach, household-residence, or monastic establishment."]

<sup>22</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hibernæ," Martii xiii. Vita S. Mochoemoci Vol. III.—No. 6.

Abbatis de Liath-mor in Helia, cap. xix., xx., xxi., xxii., xxiii., xxiv., xxv., xxvi., pp. 592 to 594. With some differences of reading, the Life, translated by Professor O'Looney, corresponds in the order of chapters.

CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> The Latin Acts add:

meantime, so that the monks may return from their work to hear it, acting in the spirit of obedience." This request Canice at first refused, until a miracle, which soon afterwards took place, compelled him to comply. Pouring forth acts of thanksgiving, both holy men then returned to partake of food, the whole community being edified and filled with spiritual joy.

At Liath, too, St. Dagan<sup>3</sup>—afterwards Abbot of Inbher Daile, or Enne-reilly—received his early education, while his career, even then, was marked by the performance of great miracles. Colman, the son of Feradach, and a chief of Ossory, had dared to violate the monastery of Mochæmoc, where a fugitive had taken refuge; and, for this, the saint decreed his chastisement. Yet, afterwards, on repenting, and on making reparation, the chief obtained a pardon, especially owing to his friendship with St. Canice. At one time, Mochæmoc gave the site for a church or cell, to one of his disciples, who was named Mochoimbe, or Mochumba.<sup>4</sup> There he built, at first, a church, and a refectory,<sup>5</sup> or a Tech-osta,<sup>6</sup> "a house of entertainment." Before the latter had been thatched, Saints Mochæmoc, Caineach, Molua<sup>7</sup> Mac Occæ,<sup>8</sup> and Mofechta,<sup>9</sup> happened to arrive there. Mochoimbe asked them to go into the church, as no other building was then ready for their accommodation. Mofechta replied, "We shall not do so, but we shall go into the Tech-osta, for although it is unthatched, God will not let the rain or wind fall upon us this night." There the holy visitors supped and remained until morning. Subsequently, Molua said, "In this place, where charity has been practised towards us, may it abound in riches forever." Then said Mochæmoc, "Though bare this roof of mine be, yet God has sheltered us this night under it, from the wind and rain; so may it be blessed, and may a noble building fail not to be here, at a future time." St. Canice then said, "May no man be killed, in this place." Thus, all three blessed the spot, and their blessing remained on it. Whereupon, taking their departure, Mochoimbhe, its patron, said, "O saints of God, are you going to leave me here alone?" They returned for answer, "We shall be with you spiritually, and you shall be venerated in this place, while you shall come with us to the judgment seat of God." Then, for a sign of this covenant, the five saints present set up five small stones there, in the holy cemetery. These monuments were to be seen, in that same spot, when the Acts of Pulcherius were written, nor could any human power remove them.

Next have we an account, so strongly flavoured with the marvellous and incredible, that it should be ridiculous to attach any credence to it, at least in some of the extravagant circumstances related. This refers to a quarrel,

"Deus, qui eum conduxit citissimè, ipse scit quod illi accidit, qui sibi et nobis latebat, nisi quod ipse viribus perambulet suis." From this passage, Colgan infers, the writer must have been living in the time of St. Canice, whose death is generally referred to about the close of the sixth, or to the beginning of the seventh, century. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii., n. 29, p. 597. However, a different conclusion might be drawn from this passage, which seems very considerably changed in wording, at least, as found in Professor O'Looney's English translation from the Irish Life.

<sup>2</sup> In the Latin Acts, the words are, "cantabimus frater interim missam," &c.

<sup>3</sup> His feast occurs, on the 12th of March, and on the 13th of September. At the latter date, his Life is given, as it is his chief festival.

<sup>4</sup> Colgan thinks his feast may be that of Mochumma, venerated on the 4th of January, or of Mochumma, commemorated on the 17th of June. The latter seems to us the more likely alternative.

<sup>5</sup> So is it designated, in the Latin Acts.

<sup>6</sup> Teach-osta means, "a house of entertainment," and it is now applied to an inn, or to a public ale-house. This was the degenerate successor to the ancient Tech-aoided, or house of hospitality, according to a note, at this passage, by Professor O'Looney, in his translated Life.

<sup>7</sup> His Life may be seen, at the 4th of August.

<sup>8</sup> In the Latin Acts, he is called "filius Coche."

which took place, between a chief,<sup>10</sup> called Ængus, of the Nan-Desies territory,<sup>11</sup> and another<sup>12</sup> of the same race, who is called Feidelem,<sup>13</sup> or Fœlan,<sup>14</sup> son to Eochaidh,<sup>15</sup> or Eatach.<sup>16</sup> However, they agreed to make peace, in the presence of Mochœmoc; yet, this was treacherously broken, by Ængus, who killed his rival, Feidelim. This wicked proceeding greatly irritated our saint, who set out to bring the murderer to repentance, or to denounce him for his grievous crime. Yet, Ængus told our saint, that Cuimin Fota<sup>17</sup> had already blessed him, and had promised him the kingdom on earth and in heaven. "Then," said Mochœmoc, "as Cuimin blessed you, I shall not curse you; but, I shall pronounce a malison against your wife and son." Whereupon, the chieftainess came with her son, and bending her knee most humbly, in the presence of Pulcherius, she said, "For the sake of Christ, spare us, O father, and willingly shall we do whatever you require from us, for you know, it was not within our power to correct the acts of our lord, the king, who has offended." With this submission, Mochœmoc was pleased, and, he replied, according to the legend, "I shall pronounce a malediction on this lake, which surrounds and defends his castle, and on its occupants." Then the waters of the lake were mysteriously absorbed in the land, beneath and around, which seemed to be dry, while the castle itself disappeared. This portent did not remove his obduracy, from Ængus; but, to punish him still more, his favourite daughter, and a war-steed, which was strong and fleet, died, on the instant. The chief was now moved to sincere repentance, and he asked the saint's pardon. Mochœmoc prayed for him; and, once more, the lake and castle appeared, while the favourite daughter, and his war-steed, came to life. As a thank-offering, Ængus granted land, whereon a church might be built, to God and to Pulcherius. The saint imposed a suitable penance upon him, and having regulated for the building and government of that cell, Mochœmoc returned again to his own monastery.

The holy Bishop Furse<sup>y</sup><sup>18</sup> and the devout Abbot Pulcherius greatly loved an alumnus, named Scanlan, the son of Fœlan, and who spent much of his boyhood days, in their company. This youth was of a noble family, and he grew up, under their teaching, in morality and piety. Owing to a dynastic jealousy, lest he might aspire to power, a chief, called Cuan or Cuana, seized on the young man, and then cast him into a prison. The saints at once set out to procure his release, and coming to Cuan, Mochœmoc said to him, "O chieftain, restore our friend safely to us, for he has no evil intent against you." The chief answered, "Truly, as yet, he hath done nothing evil against me, but I fear, he may do it by contending for my principality." St. Mochœmoc replied, "I promise, he shall not injure you during life." Then the chief re-assured said, "I shall do what you wish, but come with me to <sup>9</sup> He is supposed, by Colgan, to have been St. Fechin, Abbot of Fore, whose Life has been already given, at the 20th of January.

<sup>10</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated Life, I find him called Iarla Engusa. Iarla means "an earl," but in this sense, as we are told, in a note, it signifies a Rígh Tuatha, who was entitled to follow next after the high king; and, it may be derived, perhaps, from the Irish iar-f-laic, "a rear-chief," or a "following-king," and not from the English word, Earl, or its derivatives.

<sup>11</sup> The old author remarks, that the mother of St. Mochœmoc belonged to this tribe.

<sup>12</sup> In Professor O'Looney's translated

Life, also, he is called, Iarla.

<sup>13</sup> So is it found, in Professor O'Looney's translated Life.

<sup>14</sup> Such is the name, as given in the Latin Acts.

<sup>15</sup> Thus written, in the translated Life.

<sup>16</sup> Thus written, in the Latin Acts.

<sup>17</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 12th of November, and, he died, A.D. 661, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 270, 271.

<sup>18</sup> Colgan supposes him, to have been St. Furse, Abbot of Perrone, and whose Life has been already given, at the 16th of January. Additional notices are at the 9th of February.

Cashel city,<sup>19</sup> and, that he may stand as a witness,<sup>20</sup> I shall release him, in your presence, before the king." When they came to Cashel, Cuan gave Scanlan his liberty, in presence of the monarch. For, at this time, the bishop of Imlech, or Emly,<sup>21</sup> happened to be with the king, in Cashel, and he said, "O sovereign, Cuan is very dear to you ;" and the king replied, "Truly do I love him." Then the bishop urged, "Propose to Cuan, that he shall comply with the wishes of Mochœmoc, for on whatever day Cuan shall incur his displeasure, he shall die." Although, Cuan then promised to be at peace with Scanlan, yet he afterwards displeased Mochœmoc, and died as a consequence. Through a love for our saint, the King of Cashel willed that Scanlan should succeed as chief. He also asked the bishop for his opinion, regarding the merits of Mochœmoc. "I believe," said the bishop, "that if Mochœmoc told Sliabh Cua<sup>22</sup> to remove into the place of Magh Feymin<sup>23</sup> beyond the River Suir, and that Magh Feymin should leave its own position, and go to Sliabh Cua, the Almighty would grant it to honour his saint." The king gave praise to God, and the fame of Pulcherius was greatly magnified. One Dima, a good man, whose father is called Feichin, or Fiechenus, was a faithful friend of our saint, and he had asked the holy abbot, in the name of the Blessed Trinity, whenever his last sickness took place, that he Dyma might enjoy the happiness of receiving Holy Communion from the abbot's hands. This favour Mochœmoc promised. He happened to be living, in the Monastery of Inis Leamlachta,<sup>24</sup> or Inishlounaght,<sup>25</sup> in the southern part of Ossory territory, where the Feor river flows into the strait of the sea,<sup>26</sup> when a messenger arrived from the infirm Dyma. At once, Pulcherius hastened to see him, but before his arrival, the sick man died, and his friends were bewailing his loss, and making preparations for his burial. They watched around his corpse, and when Pulcherius came, he went alone at night to the coffin, a bright light shining above, and signing the cross over Dyma's body, the saint cried out, "My dear friend Dyma, arise in Christ's name, that you may receive the Holy Viaticum from my hands, as your faith desired it." Immediately, as if awaking from a profound sleep, the dead man rose up, and he praised God. Mochœmoc then said, "Do you now desire to live with your people again, or to go back to the repose you have left?"

<sup>19</sup> In the Irish Life, the word, Cathair, is used.

<sup>20</sup> The Irish word used is fiadnaise.

<sup>21</sup> In the year 660, Conangius or Conaing Ua Daint, Abbot of Imleach Ibhair, or Emly, died. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 270, 271. As he departed five years after the death of our saint, Colgan thinks he may be the prelate here noticed, and he is assigned a festival, at the 23rd of September.

<sup>22</sup> This was the ancient name for the mountain, now called Cnoc Mældomnaigh, or Knockmældown, south of Clonmel, in the county of Waterford. The name is still preserved, but pronounced Sliabh Gua, and it is now popularly applied to a district in Seskinan parish, lying between Dungarvan and Clonmel, and in the barony of Desies without Drum. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na-g Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (t), p. 16.

<sup>23</sup> Relatively to the former place, it extended northwards, and beyond the River Suir.

<sup>24</sup> Professor O'Looney renders it into English, "Island of the new milk."

<sup>25</sup> In his Tract, "Cœnobium Cisterciensium Hiberniæ," Sir James Ware tells us, that about the year 1187, a Cistercian monastery was founded and endowed, at Inishlawnaght, by Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, and by Malachy O'Felan, Chief over the Decies. It lay on the banks of the Suir, in the county of Tipperary, and hence, it was also called the Monastery of the Suir. See p. 74. It is represented now by a parish, called Inishlounaght, situated partly, in the baronies of Iffa and Offa East, in the South Riding of the county of Tipperary, and this part is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 76, 77, 82, 83, while the townland proper is on the last-noted Sheet. Another part is in the barony of Glenahiry, and this is found on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Waterford," Sheet 1.

<sup>26</sup> This identification of site is only found in the Latin Acts.

All those persons in the house ran to hear the conversation, between the saint and their master Dyma, for whose restoration they blessed our merciful Lord. Dyma expressed his great desire to leave the world, and he gave himself and his posterity to St. Mochœmoc. Then receiving Holy Viaticum from his hands, Dyma departed in peace, and Mochœmoc took care to have his remains deposited, in his monastery, at Liath.

Again, it happened, that our saint despatched one of his monks, named Cuancheir,<sup>27</sup> to the western part of Ireland. On returning, this monk died in the city of Emly, situated on the plain of Munster, and there he was buried. Hearing this, Pulcherius set out to bring the body for interment to his monastery, but the Archbishop of that city would not consent to such removal. While this point was contested, Pulcherius said, "Is it right for you to keep the body of my monk, who gave both his soul and his body to my monastery?" The bishop replied, "God knows it, for I do not." When Mochœmoc heard this, he said, "You know, my Lord, that this is an injustice, and you shall see a corresponding indication." Going to the tomb, the monk's grave was miraculously opened, and his abbot took him by the hand, when the monk came forth from his place of burial. Then, the bishop, giving praise to God, cried out in a loud voice, "I ought not keep your revived monk, whom the Almighty hath brought to life, like Lazarus,<sup>28</sup> owing to the merits of his servant. God knows, that I acted through no evil intention, but solely to have the relics of a saint in the cemetery of this church." Afterwards, obtaining the permission and blessing of the bishop, Mochœmoc and his monk Cuancheir returned with joy to their monastery. Subsequently, Mochœmoc sent that monk to build the monastery of Glassmore. There he lived, for many years, a very holy life, and there, too, he wrought miracles, until he happily departed to a better life. Another miracle, Mochœmoc wrought, in favour of a holy virgin, named Cainer,<sup>29</sup> who had lost her sight for a long time, but who was led to the saint. She asked him, in Christ's name, to bless her eyes, and he complied, at the same time recommending her to bathe her face with holy water. This she did, and soon she saw the earth and sky, in the presence of a great multitude of persons. Then Cainer returned to her sanctuary blessing God, for the miracles wrought through his saints. Thus, after the Almighty had performed many wonders, such as raising the dead to life, curing many afflicted persons, and exorcising demons, through the instrumentality of our saint, and when Mochœmoc had founded many monasteries, old age came upon him, and he was warned, that his term of life had expired. Calling his monks around him, he imparted a blessing, on them, and on Liath, where he was buried with great solemnity.<sup>30</sup>

Calculating on circumstances related, and the periods of some persons, stated to have lived contemporaneously with him, Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, that our saint must have been, at least, 106 years old, at the time of his death, which occurred on the 13th of March.<sup>31</sup> According to the quatrain of <sup>27</sup> This Cuan, surnamed Cearr, is supposed by Colgan to be identical with St. Cronan, the Patron of Glassmore, whose Life is given, at the 10th of February. Thus, Cuan, Mochua, and Cronan, are names often confounded by Irish writers. Yet, to us, it does not seem to be clear, that the present holy monk can be identical with St. Cronan, of Glassmore, or Clashmore, as may be found on a comparison of the respective Acts.

<sup>28</sup> St. John xi.

<sup>29</sup> Colgan supposes her to have had a festival, on the 5th of November.

<sup>30</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xlii. Vita S. Mochœmoci, Abbatiss de Liath-Mor in Helia, &c., cap. xxvii., xxviii., xxix., xxx., xxxi., xxxii., xxxiii., xxxiv., xxxv., xxxvi., xxxvii., pp. 594 to 596, and nn. 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, pp. 597, 598. With several differences of detail, Professor O'Looney's translated Life substantially agrees.

an Irish Poem,<sup>32</sup> quoted by the O'Clerys,<sup>33</sup> Mochæmhog attained the very extraordinary age of 413 years.<sup>34</sup> This, however, is clearly a mistake, or an extraordinary exaggeration.<sup>35</sup> They also add, that A.D. 655 was the date for his departure, apparently relying on the chronology of the Annals of Ulster,<sup>36</sup> and on that of the Four Masters.<sup>37</sup> After his death and burial, in his monastery, various miracles were performed, at the tomb of St. Pulcherius. The Irish Calendars commemorate the feast of St. Mochæmoc, or Pulcherius, at the 13th of March. Thus, is he noticed, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus,<sup>38</sup> in the Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>39</sup> of Cashel, and of Marianus O'Gorman; in Ængussius auctus, in the Carthusian Martyrology, by Hermann Greuen; in the Martyrologies of Canisius, of Philip Ferrarius, and of Donegal.<sup>40</sup> In the Patrician Decade,<sup>41</sup> also, it is noted,<sup>42</sup> and the name of this saint occurs as Mocœvogus, in the anonymous list of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare.<sup>43</sup> He is frequently called Pulcherius, in various Calendars.<sup>44</sup> In that Calendar, compiled by the Rev. Dr. Reeves, the name of this saint is entered, as Abbot of Dundrum, who died A.D. 496.<sup>45</sup> Here, evidently, a mistake of entry has been permitted. His references to other pages of his <sup>31</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. v., p. 25, and nn. 72, 73, pp. 28, 29.

<sup>32</sup> Mr. Joseph O'Longan has kindly furnished this quatrain, to the writer, from the Book of Leinster, where it is found in the foot margin, col. 3, p. 353. He has also given the accompanying English translation:—

Sægul moœæmoc leit noœo œelat tuip na tœeit œa reœt mbliaœan œœtu cœt nï iapmap nï immapbœœc.

The age of Mochæmoc Liath,
Noble or humble do not deny,
Twice seven years and four hundred
It is no addition, it is no fiction.

Substantially this agrees with the O'Clery's Irish version, and with the corresponding English translation. Mr. O'Longan says, that Leith, "grey," refers to Mochæmog himself, on account of his great age.

<sup>33</sup> In the margin of the original Calendar were the letters f. 40., which are interpreted by Dr. Todd, as meaning, "the Feilire of Aongus."

<sup>34</sup> Colgan would here make an emendation, that this notation ought probably to be 14 over 100, which should give him a term of 114 years. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. Appendix ad Acta S. Mochæmoci, cap. v., p. 599.

<sup>35</sup> The Irish words are said, by an excellent authority, to have been entered for others, signifying above one hundred. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 266, 267, and n. (c.) Ibid.

<sup>36</sup> See Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," Annales Ultonienses.

<sup>37</sup> These writers, however, place his death at the 3rd of March: they must have meant the iii. of its Ides.

<sup>38</sup> The following stanza, from the Leabhar Breac copy, with the English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

b. iii. 10. Rœnfaœoe moœæmoc œon biœhoœmnu biaœ
œuangur œaœo œœœœœ
O liaœ moœ maœœ biaœ.

May Mochæmoc protect us,
To the eternal protection to come,
Cuangus the chaste of perfect knowledge,
From Liath Mor, good the two men.

<sup>39</sup> At the iii. Idus, Rev. Dr. Kelly's edition simply records, "Mochæmog Lieth moir," at p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at the same day, and after the entry of ten foreign saints, we find Mochæmoc leith moir. Attached to this, is the gloss: Sægul moœæmœc leith nï œelat tuip na tœeit xiiii. cccc. nï bægul nï himmaibœœc.

<sup>40</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75. There he is called Mochæmhog, Abbot of Liath-mor.

<sup>41</sup> See lib. x., cap. 2.

<sup>42</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. Appendix ad Acta S. Mochæmoci Abbatis de Liath-mor, in Helia, cap. v., pp. 598, 599.

<sup>43</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernix Compendium," toms i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49.

<sup>44</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 73.

<sup>45</sup> To me, this appears confounding the present saint with St. Mochaol, Abbot of Ændruim, who died on the 23rd of June, A.D. 496, according to O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 158 to 161, and n. (h.) Ibid. The Annals of Inisfallen have A.D. 490; the Annals of Ulster, A.D. 493, and from a different authority A.D.

work,<sup>46</sup> however, serve to create some confusion, in the minds of his readers.<sup>47</sup> There is allusion made to the Castle of Rath-Temayn,<sup>48</sup> where the King of Ulster dwelt, as mentioned in the ancient Life of St. Mochœmog or Pulcherius, found in the Book of Kilkenny.<sup>49</sup> This place, as we are told, was in Kilmore parish, county of Down. With more or less of ideal accuracy, in reference to his individuality, the Scotch Kalendars also commemorate St. Pulcherius. Thus at the 13th, iii. Idus, the Kalendar of Drummond has, in Hibernia, the Natal Day of the Holy Confessors, Mochœmoc and Cuangus, was celebrated.<sup>50</sup> To the succeeding article, our readers are referred, for some additional illustration. Besides his own place, at Leigh, where he was venerated as chief patron, there is a church, called Kill Mocœmog, or Kil-makevoqe,<sup>51</sup> from this saint, and it is situated in the barony of Ida, and county of Kilkenny.<sup>52</sup> There is, also, a large parish, called Kilmocomoge,<sup>53</sup> in the West Riding of Cork County, and which probably derives its denomination from him.

If the life of every good man can be presented, "to point a moral and adorn a tale," some account regarding the labours, and life of a holy Irish monk, who flourished in the sixth and seventh centuries, may claim attention and interest, when brought before Irish readers. They serve to illustrate the habits and usages of our early monasticism, and the efforts of its promoters. Opposition, too, St. Mochœmoc had to meet with. However, his calm and collected mind, so far from being disconcerted, only displayed a fertility of resource, and all the greater, in proportion to the magnitude of the difficulties, with which he had to cope. Christian courage enabled him, not only to overcome those difficulties, but even to turn them into so many helps to favour his great enterprises. Thus, in a short time, he had the happiness to see the walls of a magnificent monastic establishment rising before his eyes, and it encouraged him the more to resume his labours of love. The Almighty crowned his work, with marvellous success, as he always desires to aid those, who are in earnest, about good and useful undertakings.

ARTICLE II.—FESTIVAL OF A REPUTED ST. KEVOCA, IN SCOTLAND. Passing from, or rather reverting to, the previous Life of St. Mochœmoc, we have next to consider cautiously the accounts furnished to us, from the Scottish Calendars, and by Scottish writers, regarding a St. Kevoca, or Kennocha—as named by the Bollandists<sup>1</sup> at this day—and who is reputed to 498; while the Annals of Tighearnach, give A.D. 497.

<sup>46</sup> At p. 236, we find nothing regarding this saint, if he be not confounded with St. Mochumma of Druimbo.

<sup>47</sup> He alludes to a townland, called Rademnan, in which the Down Survey has a castle, called Radaman. It was in the Kinealarty portion of Kilmore parish, baronies of Kinealarty and Upper Castlereagh, county of Down. See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix M, p. 216, and Calendar, LL, p. 377.

<sup>48</sup> Colgan has printed it incorrectly Rath-leamain. See "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," xiii. Martii. Vita S. Mochœmoci, Abbatis de Liath-mor in Helia, cap. x., p. 590.

<sup>49</sup> Fol. 81, col. 2, l. 39. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' work, at p. 216,

<sup>50</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 7.

<sup>51</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 40, 41. The townland proper is on Sheet 41.

<sup>52</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (b), p. 267. The editor tells, that when he wrote, the peasantry were beginning to corrupt this church to Kill-Ivory, from a false notion, that Cæmhog denoted ivory.

<sup>53</sup> It is situated, in three different baronies, viz.: Bantry, East Carbery and West Carbery. Its bounds are defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cork," Sheets 79, 80, 91, 92, 93, 104, 105, 106, 107, 117, 118, 119, 131.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiii. De S. Kennocha Virgine in Scotia, p. 338.

have been a holy virgin, who was venerated in Scotland. How far the claim can be admitted requires further elucidation than we have yet found. Some account of her is in the Chronicle of Scone.<sup>2</sup> The legend of St. Kevoca, Virgin, as contained in the Breviary of Aberdeen,<sup>3</sup> supplies us with little that can be relied upon, as furnishing historical facts. In general terms, it details, that she sprung from a noble race of the Scoti. Her purity, piety, amiability, as also the miracles which she wrought, are chiefly the subjects for eulogy. Though beautiful in face and figure, she declined proposals of marriage from nobles, and she affirmed, that her only spouse was Jesus Christ, and he crucified. It is stated, that she suffered persecution and exile, because she would not sacrifice to idols. Prayer, watching, alms-giving, and austerities, were practised, and she willingly embraced poverty, as the chief means for avoiding all secular attachment. Neither threats, exile, nor poverty, could divert her from this determination. She is said to have attained a holy old age, and to have beheld the Angels then inviting her to partake of a heavenly inheritance. In Kyle, a church was built, and there, too, it is stated, she died, and was held in great honour.<sup>4</sup> The name of this saint is still preserved, in the parish of St. Quivox or St. Evox, in the immediate vicinity of Ayr.<sup>5</sup> There is a Kevoek burn, in the parish of Eaglesham.<sup>6</sup> Her chief church is said to have been near to Glasgow.<sup>7</sup> According to Camerarius and Dempster, this saint is thought to have departed, in the year 1007, and during the reign of Malcolm II. over Scotland.<sup>8</sup> The Scotch, as we are told, were accustomed to invoke St. Kennocha, in an ancient form of prayer.<sup>9</sup> Again, the Scottish Kalendar of Arbuthnot has a feast of St. Kevoca, a Virgin, with nine Lessons, at the iii. Ides of March, or the 13th of this month;<sup>10</sup> as likewise that Kalendar, in the Breviary of Aberdeen, where she is noted as Virgin and not Martyr.<sup>11</sup> In the Martyrology of Aberdeen, at the 13th of March, we read, S. Kennoche virg. in scotland vnder King Malcoline 2.<sup>12</sup> At the 13th of March, in his "Menologium Scoticum," Dempster introduces, in Scotia, Kenneir, a holy virgin.<sup>13</sup> Camerarius,<sup>14</sup> Laherius,<sup>15</sup> Hermann Greuen,<sup>16</sup> Ferrarius,<sup>17</sup> and Arturus,<sup>18</sup> also, notice her.<sup>19</sup> However, according to the Rev. Dr. Reeves,<sup>20</sup> the St. Kevoca of Scottish Hagiology is simply the same as Cæmhog, pronounced, Keovóg, and more generally called Mo-Chæmhog, with the familiar

<sup>2</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xiii.

<sup>3</sup> Pars Hyemalis, fol. lxxiii.

<sup>4</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 374, 375. There, too, it is stated, she was buried. See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 173, 174.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xiii.

<sup>6</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland." Renfrew, p. 385.

<sup>7</sup> It is called St. Kennock's Kirk. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xiii.

<sup>8</sup> The transactions of his reign are given in Buchanan's "Rerum Scotticarum Historia," lib. vi., pp. 183 to 187.

<sup>9</sup> It is thus set down: "Deus amator castitatis et auctor, S. Kennoche Virginis tue precibus, mentis et corporis eam nobis tribue puritatem, per quam æternam valeamus evadere corruptionem. Per Dominum," &c.

<sup>10</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 98.

<sup>11</sup> See ibid., p. 114.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid., p. 147.

<sup>13</sup> See ibid., p. 194. In his "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomos ii., lib. x., num. 758, p. 412, Dempster has an account of a St. Kennotha, said to have had a festival, at the 13th of March.

<sup>14</sup> At the 10th of March.

<sup>15</sup> In Menologio Virginum.

<sup>16</sup> In his additions to Usuard's Martyrology.

<sup>17</sup> In Catalogo Generali Sanctorum.

<sup>18</sup> In Gynæceo Sacro.

<sup>19</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomos ii., Martii xiii. De S. Kennocha Virgine in Scotia, num. 2, p. 338.

<sup>20</sup> See "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xxiv. Antiquities. On the Céili-dé, commonly called Culdees, part iii., sect. ii., n., p. 152.

<sup>21</sup> We are told, that the Irish peasantry consider for this reason St. Dabheog of prefix. His Acts we have already given, for this same day. The history of his metaphysis is thus explained. The termination og is grammatically feminine,<sup>21</sup> and the Gaelic-speaking Scotch of the middle ages, not knowing the antecedents of St. Cæmhog, changed the gender, while the hagiologist accepted this name upon the terms.<sup>22</sup> All this is very curious, and it serves to show, how slow we should be, to accept without a critical examination and judgment many legends related of the ancient saints.

ARTICLE III.—ST. GERALD OR GARALT, ABBOT OF ELITERIA, AND BISHOP OF MAYO, COUNTY OF MAYO. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] Although this distinguished Irish-Saxon saint was a man of great virtue and usefulness in the Church, it is to be regretted, that his Acts, as remaining to us, are not quite authentic. In the Franciscan Convent, Dublin, there is a Latin Life of St. Gerald, Abbot.<sup>1</sup> This is thought, by Colgan, possibly to have been written by Augustine Magraidin, a Canon Regular, living on the Island of All Saints; but, Rev. Dr. Lanigan<sup>2</sup> deems, from some of his genuine Tracts, that Magraidin could not be the author of what he terms such “barbarous stuff,” which the Bollandists declare to be full of nonsense and intolerable. Some Manuscript Codices are extant, containing the Acts of this saint.<sup>3</sup> That Life, taken from the Book of the Island, has been published by Colgan, at the 13th of March.<sup>4</sup> The Bollandists,<sup>5</sup> in like manner, have emended or partly inserted these Acts; while, Bishop Challenor,<sup>6</sup> and Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>7</sup> have brief notices of St. Gerald, or Giraldo, also called Garalt, by the Irish. The mediæval Life of this saint, not alone abounds with fables, and contradictions, but even it contains anachronisms. According to it, Gerald was the son of a certain King Cusperius, and his mother was a queen. He was born in England, it is supposed; and, he is said to have been the youngest of four brothers, but, he surpassed the other three, both in dignity and miracles. His other brothers are named, Balanus,<sup>8</sup> Berikertus<sup>9</sup> and Hubritanus.<sup>10</sup> The birth of our saint was manifested by a miracle. While St. Colman<sup>11</sup> lived at Lindisfarne, all the foregoing brothers were placed under his charge; and, by him, they were instructed in the liberal Sciences, as also in Theology. They were brought up in the monastic profession, and in due time promoted to Holy Orders. Of the original monastery, at Lindisfarne, we have left no remains; however, it seems probable enough, the fine ruins yet standing there borrowed their chief features from the older architecture, incorrectly called Anglo-Saxon, but most certainly of early Irish Lough Derg to have been a woman. “And if we were not possessed of record evidence concerning the sex of St. Dabheog, we can very easily conceive how a legend writer who was guided by popular conceit would create a Sancta Davoca.”

<sup>22</sup> Thus, St. Fintan or Munna, in one Scottish charter, is called Sancta Munda. See “Origines Parochiales Scotiæ,” vol. ii., p. 72.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> In the Manuscript, “Vitæ Sanctorum,” ex Cod. Inisensi, pp. 251 to 257.

<sup>2</sup> See “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vii., n. 85, p. 167.

<sup>3</sup> These are MS. Bodl. Rawl. R. 505, pp. 231-235, vell. folio, xiv. cent. MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 485, f. 179, vell. 4to, xiv. cent.

<sup>4</sup> See, “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xiii. Martii. Vita S. Geraldii Abbatis Elithe-

rensis et Mageonensis. This is illustrated by notes, and by an Appendix, in four chapters, which follows, pp. 599 to 606.

<sup>5</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomos ii., Martii xiii. De S. Geraldo Abbate et Episcopo Mageonensi in Hibernia, Synopsis historica, 3 sections and 27 paragraphs, pp. 288 to 293.

<sup>6</sup> See “Britannia Sancta,” part i., p. 172.

<sup>7</sup> See “Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints,” vol. iii., March xiii.

<sup>8</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 3rd of September.

<sup>9</sup> He is also called St. Nem, and notices regarding him will be found, at the 18th of February, and at the 6th of December.

<sup>10</sup> In the Irish Calendar, he is called Uildbrith or Hulbritan, and his feast is set down, at the 24th of April.

<sup>11</sup> See his Life, at the 8th of August.

or Scottish fashion. In the peculiar turning of the arches, zig-zag and chevron mouldings of the arches and columns, bases and capitals, as also in the well-chiselled stones, and in the massive, well-fitted style of masonry, not to speak of many patterns in details, the Priory on Holy Island presents the closest types of Irish Romanesque architecture.<sup>12</sup> How long the brothers remained at Lindisfarne is not related, but, we are informed, that Gerald was promoted to be Abbot at Winchester.<sup>13</sup> This is denied, however, as being incompatible with the truth of his story.<sup>14</sup> He cured the lame, the paralytic, and those afflicted with various diseases, while the fame of his sanctity, likewise, brought many monks to live under his rule. When St. Colman left Lindisfarne, in 664, for the purpose of going to Ireland, a doubt seems to exist, as to whether or not, he remained afterwards for three years, at Iona. But, it is related, that he founded a monastery, in Inisbofinde or Bophin Island, off the coast, and within the present county of Mayo, A.D. 665,<sup>15</sup> or 667.<sup>16</sup> He had brought with him all the Scottish or Irish, that lived at Lindisfarne, and about thirty English monks, who volunteered to accompany him to his new home.<sup>17</sup> Whether or not, St. Gerald was one of his travelling companions<sup>18</sup> seems to <sup>12</sup> The interior view here presented exhibits some of those features. It has been drawn, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

Lindisfarne Priory, England.

<sup>13</sup> It is remarked, by Colgan, that there were two monasteries there; and, that, in the older one, St. Gerald had embraced the Benedictine rule. But, all this is a mistake, for St. Gerald belonged to the Columbian, and not to the Benedictine Order. Archdall has copied this misstatement. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," at Mayo, p. 505.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vii., n. 87, pp. 167, 168.

<sup>15</sup> Such is Ussher's chronology, in "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 499, 539.

<sup>16</sup> Argued on the supposition, that he spent three years at Iona, after leaving Lindisfarne.

<sup>17</sup> Long after St. Colman's death, English and other students continued to frequent the school, which he probably founded, at Mayo. See Ven. Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. 4.

<sup>18</sup> So states Sir James Ware, in "De Hibernia, et Antiquitatibus ejus," cap. xxvi., p. 220.

<sup>19</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan thinks, that if this be a mooted question ;<sup>19</sup> but, in any case, our saint, having embarked on several ships well provided with all necessities for the voyage, with his three brothers, and, it is stated in the Acts, three thousand disciples, from England, followed St. Colman, when he had left Lindisfarne. These landed at the mouth of the Shannon, and in the province of Connaught. Our saint's brothers are named, Ballon, Berechert and Hubriton. It is related, in the Acts, that the voyagers met with opposition, from a certain wicked ruler there, named Ailill,<sup>20</sup> who was very hostile to religious men. He sent a force to oppose their landing. However, we are told, that by a miracle of a very unusual kind, he was mollified, and he not only gave them permission to remain, but they obtained possessions to found a monastery. It was called Elitheria,<sup>21</sup> and Colgan has ventured to conjecture, that as the word seems to have a similarity to Elitheir, "a pilgrim," so the church of Ros-irial,<sup>22</sup> or of Kill-na-elitheir,<sup>23</sup> in the county and diocese of Galway, may be identified with it.<sup>24</sup> Afterwards, the legend of his Life relates miracles, performed by St. Gerald, and especially one, whereby he removed a large stone, from the bed of the River Muayd, or Moy,<sup>25</sup> and which caused obstruction to the nets of fishermen. St. Colman had founded a monastery at Mayo,<sup>26</sup> in Connaught, for English monks, and hence the place is frequently called "Mayo of the Saxons," in old documents. However, the Acts of St. Gerald mention, that a certain King of Connaught, named Ragallus,<sup>27</sup> hearing about the mode of living, adopted by the holy abbot and by his monks, sent a message, that they should visit him. On obeying this order, he bestowed land, whereon were so, Gerald must have been very young, at the time of St. Colman's departure. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vii., p. 166.

<sup>20</sup> He is thought, by Colgan, to have been identical with Ailell, the father of St. Lochan, and the son of Cathal or Cathaldus, son to Cobchach, son of Ennius, son to Ailell, son of Fiach, as stated in the "Sancitologic Genealogy," chap. vi. The posterity of this Fiach had great power, in the western parts of Connaught, where St. Gerald set up his religious foundations.

<sup>21</sup> The Acts of St. Gerald attribute the origin of the name, from the legend told, about a tame deer, that remained in the place, during the lifetime of St. Gerald : "Unde ab illa cerva ibidem miraculose permanente nominata est illa Abbatia Eliteria, cerva enim in Hibernico sermone, idem sonat, quod Elith," cap. vii. However, Colgan doubts, that such was the cause for this name ; and, he prefers to derive it from Elitheir, which means "a pilgrim," and which probably alludes to the fact, that the Saxons came there as pilgrims. In no part of Connaught could he find a church, called from "a deer," except in one instance, in the diocese and county of Galway, i.e., Aghmagh, not Elit-magh. In both cases, the Latin might be "cervæ Campum," or the "plain of the deer."

<sup>22</sup> Here there was a Franciscan convent, in Colgan's day. Some thought, this name might be derived, from Ros-riaghla, i.e., "the promontory," or "hill of the Rule."

<sup>23</sup> This could mean "the cell of the pilgrim," or "foreigner." It was near to Mayo, and in the same diocese, where St. Gerald afterwards had rule. In this diocese, too, was the church, called Tech-Saxon, or "the house of the Saxons," while there was another, called Kill-an-gail, or "church of the Galls." The Irish were accustomed to apply the latter term, more correctly to the Gauls, at first, but afterwards it was used for the Angles or Anglo-Saxons, who were called Gail, or "strangers," while their country was denominated Gall.

<sup>24</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii., nn. 9, 11, p. 603. Dr. Lanigan thinks, that Eliteria had been possibly a dependency on Mayo, as was probably also a church in the same diocese, called Tech-Sasson, "the house of Saxons," or of "Englishmen." See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vii., n. 90, p. 168.

<sup>25</sup> This river rises near the borders of Roscommon County, and taking a northerly course, it falls into the Atlantic Ocean, through Killala Bay.

<sup>26</sup> This is now a parish, in the county to which it gives name, and extending into the baronies of Clanmorris and Kilmaine. Its bounds are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheets 90, 91, 100, 101. The town and parks are found on Sheets 90, 91.

<sup>27</sup> In 670, we read, that Cellach, son of Ragallach, King of Connaught, died, after taking Holy Orders. See John D'Alton's "History of Ireland, and Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., p. 112.

they built an abbey, which subsequently was called Magionia. Near this spot was a place, known as the Hill of the Magi, where a chief professor of magic art had a school and a number of scholars. They were opposed to our saint's community, at first, but a wonderful miracle convinced them of their impotence to prevent the spread of Christianity in these parts. St. Gerald divided his community into three bands; one of these he sent back to England, a second band was employed in building walls around the monastery, while the third was occupied at prayer for the people, or in singing the holy Mass and the Canonical Hours. The Lord's fold thus increased in honour and sanctity, under the pastoral care of St. Gerald. While here, nine robbers, who were relations, endeavoured to hide, in a lake-island, nine oxen, stolen from the saint, but these were miraculously recovered. During the joint reigns of Diarmait and Blathmac,<sup>28</sup> over Ireland, a great famine prevailed, and the multitude of people in Ireland was very great. An edict went forth, that as a sufficient scope of land had not been set apart for tillage, that each inhabitant should get seven acres of plain land, or eight acres of rough land, or nine acres of wood land,<sup>29</sup> for purposes of cultivation. This famine was followed by that pestilence, known as the Icteritia. Soon afterwards, St. Gerald journeyed into that part of Connaught, called Corand.<sup>30</sup> There the Chieftain Etran, and a great number of people, had been afflicted with the plague, then raging. The chief besought St. Gerald to save him, and when the holy abbot had put his hood over the heads of Etran and of his family, the other people of Corand ran to obtain a like favour. All, who touched it, were healed from their infirmity; and, as a token of gratitude, they promised on behalf of themselves and of their posterity, to accept St. Gerald as their patron, and to protect in turn his religious family. Afterwards, he is said to have gone to his monastery of Elitheria, where he heard about his sister's death, with that of one hundred nuns, who were her companions. She is called Segresia.<sup>31</sup> Fifty of his monks had also died of the pest. Then the holy abbot and his subjects went to Mayo. There he continued to live in the love of God and of his neighbour, to the very close of his life. At what time St. Gerald became superior, at Mayo, is not known;<sup>32</sup> probably, it was not prior to the eighth century.<sup>33</sup> The Acts state, that while here, the holy Abbot Adamnan<sup>34</sup> paid him a visit, and formed a friendship with him, when he had gone over the whole of Ireland.<sup>35</sup> St. Gerald bestowed a farm, with a limpid fountain on <sup>28</sup> These monarchs are said to have commenced their reigns A.D. 657, and to have been carried away by the Buidhe Chonnail A.D. 664. The events of their reigns are to be found in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 268 to 277.

<sup>29</sup> Were we to place reliance on the Acts of St. Gerald, he should have been in Ireland, A.D. 664, the year of the great pestilence, or even before it; but, the legend there introduced is opposed to the Chronology of Venerable Bede, and also to that of our native Annals.

<sup>30</sup> It seems likely enough, this district differed not from Coran, or Corran, which extended over a large portion of Sligo County, "comprising not only the barony of Coran, properly so called, but also the baronies of Gallen and Leney, including the residences of the sept's of the O'Haras and M'Donoughs."—John D'Alton's "History of Ireland, and Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., n. (a), p. 112.

<sup>31</sup> Colgan thinks, she may be identical with St. Seghnat, or Segnecia, Virgin, of Domhnach Ceirne, and whose feast occurs, at the 18th of December.

<sup>32</sup> Colgan thought, that St. Gerald must have died before A.D. 697, inasmuch as he is not mentioned among those, who attended a great Synod, convened during that year, by Adamnan, whereas several other persons of less note have their names appended to the Decrees. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. Appendix ad Acta S. Geraldii, cap. ii., p. 604. However, Dr. Lanigan observes, that this omission only warrants Colgan to conclude, that Gerald was not an abbot, or much distinguished, in the year 697.

<sup>33</sup> This is evidently Dr. Lanigan's meaning, although he introduces the words "seventh century." See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. 'xix., sect. vii., p. 167, and n. 91, p. 168.

<sup>34</sup> See his Life, at the 23rd of September.

it, and recommended his church to Adamnan, so that it might be protected from the persecution of laics, after his own death. This charge, we are told, Adamnan assumed and fulfilled.<sup>36</sup> However, when it is stated, that he ruled Mayo for seven years, after the death of St. Gerald, that he there was engaged transcribing books, casting bells, and teaching his monks, until he returned to depart this life, as Abbot in Iona; it is manifest, all this is a figment, and contradicted by well-known facts of history. After working many miracles, and founding many monasteries—for in addition to Mayo and Elytheria, or Tempul-Gerald, in Connaught, that of Tegh-na-Saxon is named, besides a convent of sacred Virgins, which he committed to the care of his sister St. Segretia—he is said to have rested from his labours, in the Monastery of Mayo. Whether he was simply an abbot, at this place, or whether he exercised, in addition, episcopal functions, has been disputed. Some authorities call him Pontiff of Magh-Eó of the Saxons; however, notwithstanding all the great works, attributed to him, in the Acts, he is merely styled abbot. The title, Pontifex,<sup>37</sup> has been often used in an equivocal manner, and sometimes, in the same sense, as President.<sup>38</sup> St. Gerald died, on the iii. of the Ides, or on the 13th of March, according to his Acts; and, our Calendars, likewise, contain a similar statement. However, the Registers of the church, at Mayo, note, that his Natalis was on the 10th of March; but, Colgan suspects this may be a transcriber's error, for the 12th or 13th of this month.<sup>39</sup> As we have already seen, the Martyrology of Tallagh has noticed it, at the 12th: Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire place the festival of St. Gerald, Abbot and Bishop of Mayo, at the 13th of March.<sup>40</sup> We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>41</sup> that Garalt, of Maigheo, Abbot, and Bishop, had veneration paid him on this particular day. Duald Mac Firbis enters him,<sup>42</sup> at the same date, as Gerald, Pontiff of Magh-Eó of the Saxons. In the Martyrologies of Hermann Greuen,<sup>43</sup> the Florarian Manuscript, the German Martyrology of Petrus Canisius,<sup>44</sup> in the "Memorial of Ancient British Piety,"<sup>45</sup> and in the "Circle of the Seasons,"<sup>46</sup> St. Gerald's feast is marked, at this date. According to some authorities, this holy abbot died in the year 697;<sup>47</sup> but, this is too early a date, although the learned Ussher, <sup>35</sup> Adamnan was in Ireland, so late as A.D. 703.

<sup>36</sup> The Bollandists imagine, that possibly some other Adamnan, different from the Abbot of Iona, may have been St. Gerald's successor, at Mayo. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiii. De S. Geraldo Abbate et Episcopo Magionensi in Hibernia, sect. iii., num. 24, p. 292. But, as the establishment at Mayo was exclusively Saxon, it does not seem likely, that any Irishman, named Adamnan, had been chosen as superior.

<sup>37</sup> Spelman and Ducange, at the words Pontifex and Pontificium, show the shades of meaning attached to this term.

<sup>38</sup> "I am inclined to think," writes Dr. Lanigan, "that his having been called pontifex, Pontiff of the English, gave rise to the supposition of his having been a bishop. * * * * It may be, that, as the English were strangers in Ireland, the Abbot of Mayo enjoyed some particular privileges as protector of his countrymen."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vii., n. 94, pp. 169, 170.

<sup>39</sup> This Colgan had from a list of the churches in Tuam diocese, furnished by the Archbishop Malachy O'Keely, who was so anxious to aid Colgan's labours, and who was in addition a proficient in Irish Ecclesiastical History. See an account of this prelate, in Very Rev. Laurence F. Renahan's "Collections on Irish Church History," vol. i., pp. 402 to 405. Edited by Rev. Daniel McCarthy, D.D., and now Bishop of Kerry.

<sup>40</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. Appendix ad Acta S. Geraldii, cap. i., p. 604.

<sup>41</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

<sup>42</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 122, 123.

<sup>43</sup> Usuard enlarged. Edition of 1521.

<sup>44</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiii. De S. Geraldo Abbate et Episcopo Mageonensi in Hibernia, sect. i., num. 1, pp. 288, 289.

<sup>45</sup> See, p. 50.

<sup>46</sup> At p. 73.

in making a false calculation, lent it the weight of his opinion.<sup>48</sup> The year 726 is assigned, as that for his departure to Christ, in one account ;<sup>49</sup> while the Annals of Tighernach and of Ulster have A.D. 731.<sup>50</sup> The "Memorial of Ancient British Piety"<sup>51</sup> gives A.D. 732. St. Gerald was buried at Mayo, where there was a church dedicated to God in his name,<sup>52</sup> and of this town he is regarded as the special Patron. The successors of St. Gerald, at Mayo, have been styled bishops,<sup>53</sup> as well as abbots. The church,<sup>54</sup> built there by our saint, was destroyed, A.D. 818, by the Norwegian tyrant Turgesius ; however, the occasion was signalized by remarkable miracles, whereby the holy patron's intercession saved some among the inhabitants. Various vicissitudes befell the monastery, and its records are interesting,<sup>55</sup> to the time of Queen Elizabeth, when its cloisters and lands were confiscated by the crown, and then rented to the burgesses and commonalty of the town of Galway.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. CONCHENNA, CONCHEND, OR COINCHEAND, VIRGIN, OF KILL-SLEBHE, OR KILLEVEY, COUNTY OF ARMAGH. [Seventh Century.] Colgan endeavours to evolve some incidents regarding this holy virgin, at the 13th of March.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists have only a short notice of St. Conchenna.<sup>2</sup> This saint was daughter to Tulchan, and her mother was Fethlemidia. She was a sister to St. Fintan Munnu,<sup>3</sup> who is venerated at the 21st of October.<sup>4</sup> Thus was she descended, from the noble Hy-Niall race of Ulster. This holy virgin embraced a religious life, in a nunnery, which had been founded by St. Monennia,<sup>5</sup> at Kill-Slebhe, now Killevey,<sup>6</sup> at the foot of Sliabh Cuilinn, or Slieve Gullion, in the southern part of the county of Armagh. Here she lived a very holy life, and illness which caused her death happened. But she was brought to life again, by her holy brother St. Munnu, and at the request of their mother. There seems to be a doubt, as to whether she was abbess over the community, at Kill-Slebhe, or a simple member of it.<sup>7</sup> She finally departed this life, A.D. 654 ;<sup>8</sup> and, although the Four Masters give her no distinctive title, yet, Colgan remarks, they scarcely ever note the death of holy persons, not distinguished as presiding over religious houses. The Martyrologies of Tallagh<sup>9</sup> and of Marianus O'Gorman register the name

<sup>47</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 505. Also, John D'Alton's "History of Ireland, and Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., p. 114.

<sup>48</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 499, and Index Chronologicus, ad A.D. DCXCVII., pp. 540, 541.

<sup>49</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 322, 323.

<sup>50</sup> See Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores, eodem anno, tomus ii., iv.

<sup>51</sup> See p. 51.

<sup>52</sup> See Bishop Challenor's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 172.

<sup>53</sup> We are told even, "for centuries after the rural bishoprics had generally merged, by the decrees of the Synod of Cardinal Paparo."—John D'Alton's "History of Ireland, and Annals of Boyle," n. (a), p. 114.

<sup>54</sup> The Acts state, that it had a roof, secured in some way with lead.

<sup>55</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 505, 506.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiii. Martii. De S. Conchenna Virgine, pp. 606, 607.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 258.

<sup>3</sup> She is mentioned in Vita S. Munniæ, cap. xvi.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 482.

<sup>5</sup> See her Life, at the 6th of July.

<sup>6</sup> At present, it is a parish, in the baronies of Upper and Lower Orior. It is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh," Sheets 18, 21, 22, 25, 26, 28, 29, 32.

<sup>7</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. ix., and n. 119, pp. 39, 42, 43.

<sup>8</sup> The Age of Christ, 654, "Coincenn, of Cill-Sleibhe, died."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 266, 267.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. The Conchend, at the 13th of March. Also, on this day, the festival of Coincheand was celebrated, as we read, in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>10</sup>

ARTICLE V.—ST. CUANGUS, ABBOT OF LIETHMORE, OR LEIGH, COUNTY OF TIPPERARY. [Eighth Century.] Some brief notices of St. Cuangus are to be found in Colgan<sup>1</sup> and in the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> This saint's father, according to one account,<sup>3</sup> was named Alill, or Ailta, and he was a man of respectable lineage. Our saint received the name Mac-dall, according to some of our Calendars. This signifies the "blind son;" probably, because he laboured under a defect of vision, in his youth, or at some future period of his life. Other accounts, however, seem to make his father's name, Dall.<sup>4</sup> After the death of St. Mochæmoc,<sup>5</sup> he was appointed Abbot of Liethmore or Leigh Monastery. Cuangus was renowned for his unblemished character and great learning. He departed this life, in the year 747.<sup>6</sup> On this day, his feast appears to have been set down with that of the greater patron at Liath-mor. The name is written, Cuangusa, Mac Aililla, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>7</sup> at the 13th of March. On the same day, the Calendar of Cashel has Cuangus mac dall of Lethmor, as also have placed the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Maguire. Cuanghas, Macdall,<sup>8</sup> has a festival thus recorded, likewise, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> and at this date. Colgan observes, he had been unable to learn more regarding this saint, whose memory was celebrated in all our Irish Martyrologies and Annals.

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FEAST OF COLMAN, BENEDIC., CLUANA TIBRINN, OR CLONTIVRIN, COUNTY OF FERMANAGH. We cannot consider the present Colman to have been distinct from one bearing the same name, and belonging to the same place, as commemorated at the 9th of this month. The adjunct benedic. is probably intended for benedictus, "blessed." We find, set down in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> that a festival, in honour of Colman benedic, Cluana tibrinn, was celebrated, on the 13th of March.

ARTICLE VII.—REPUTED FEAST OF ST. CANOC, OR CANOCUS, ABBOT AND CONFESSOR, OF BRECHINIA, IN WALES. [Fifth or Sixth Century.] Already have we treated about this holy man, whose missionary career has Franciscan copy enters, at this date, the simple word, Concheno.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xiii. De S. Cuangussio Abb. Liet-mor, p. 607.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 257.

<sup>3</sup> That found in the Martyrology of Tallagh.

<sup>4</sup> The glossographer, on the "Feilire" of St. Ænguss, at the 13th of March, adds, that Mochæmoc, the son of Beodh, and Cuangus, the son of Dall, are of Liath mor, in the Southern Ely." Also, according to the Martyrologies of Cashel, Marianus O'Gorman, Maguire, and Donegal.

<sup>5</sup> His Life has been already given, at this day.

<sup>6</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 348, 349, we find this following entry, at A.D. 747: "Cuangus, Abbot of Liath-mor," died.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at the same date, is entered, Cuangusa mac Ailta.

<sup>8</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd says, at this word, Macdall: i.e., "Blind boy." The more recent hand adds here, ó Uaé móir é fíor ex. p. 40.: "He is also of Liath-mór, according to the Felire of Aongus." In the margin are the letters p. 40., i.e., "Felire of Aongus."

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 74, 75.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at this date, we read, Colman boic cl tīb-pinne.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., xi. Februarii. Prætermissi et in alios dies relati, p. 507.

been connected with Ireland, at the 11th of February. The Bollandists there notice him,<sup>1</sup> and again, at the 13th of March,<sup>2</sup> chiefly on the authority of a Second Edition of John Wilson's English Martyrology. This enters a festival for St. Conoc, Abbot and Confessor of Brechinia, in Wales, for the latter date.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. VIGANUS. [Tenth and Eleventh Centuries.] A saint, called Viganus, or Vigan, is entered for the 13th of March, in the anonymous Calendar of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare. On the authority of the English Martyrology, Henry Fitzsimon places him on the list of our national saints, at the same date.<sup>1</sup> There is a Viganus, invoked as Viganach, in the Dunkeld Litany. He was an anchorite in Leven province, Scotland; but, whether he was born in Ireland, or in Scotland, does not appear. After proving his vocation in the monastery of Cluney, he withdrew to an island of Lovin<sup>2</sup> or Loumond<sup>3</sup> Lake, where he might see and taste how gracious the Lord was in solitude. He was a friend of King Malcolm II.<sup>4</sup> An enemy, Grim, otherwise known as Girgh Mac Kinat Mac Duff, or Kenneth III.,<sup>5</sup> wished to force a combat on him; but, Malcolm, shouting out, "Scatter the nations that delight in war, Thou that sittest above the heavens," defeated his opponent, according to a legendary account of the battle. This took place at Moeghanard, or Monzievard,<sup>6</sup> in Stratherne, A.D. 1005.<sup>7</sup> David Camerarius places the death of our saint, at A.D. 1012. In the Kalendar of David Camerarius,<sup>8</sup> at the 13th of March, we find St. Viganus, Confessor and Anchorite, celebrated in Leuina or Leven province.<sup>9</sup> Vigeanus is another form of this saint's name, and it is only the Latinized Irish denomination of Fechin.<sup>10</sup> St. Vigan's Cross<sup>11</sup> is still an object of religious and antiquarian interest, in the churchyard of St. Vigeans, near Arbroath.

Fourteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. TALMACH, CONFESSOR.

[SIXTH AND SEVENTH CENTURIES.]

SOME short notices of St. Talmach are given by Colgan, at the 14th of March.<sup>1</sup> At this same date, the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have even a briefer <sup>2</sup> See ibid., tomus ii., Martii xiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 258.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. x., p. 48, cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 57. Fitzsimon refers to a St. Vulgan, or Volcan, mentioned by Jocelin, in Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. 141. See "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 96. Allusion is also made to St. Wulgan, a Bishop, at the 2nd of November, where he is called a Scot, in the Chronica Cameracensia. In Convæus' Catalogue, we read, "S. Wulganus, Epis. Artesiæ. 2 Novem."

<sup>2</sup> Now Loch Leven.

<sup>3</sup> Now Loch Lomond.

<sup>4</sup> His reign lasted from A.D. 1005 to the 25th of November, 1034. A very interesting account of it will be found, in William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: a History of Ancient Alban," vol. i., book i., chap. viii., pp. 384 to 398.

<sup>5</sup> He reigned from A.D. 997 to 1004. See ibid., cap. vii., pp. 382, 383.

<sup>6</sup> See E. William Robertson's "Scotland under her early Kings," vol. i., p. 92.

<sup>7</sup> See Innes, "Critical Essay," Appendix V.

<sup>8</sup> He cites the authority of Boethius and Leslæus, as also that of the Liber Plusquartensis. See "De Statu Hominis Veteris simul ac novæ Ecclesiæ, et Infidelium Conversione," lib. i., cap. iii., sect. 2, pp. 165, 166.

<sup>9</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," pp. 236, 456.

<sup>10</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: a History of Ancient Alban," vol. ii., book ii., chap. iv., p. 178, n. 101.

<sup>11</sup> This and other sculptured stones are described from casts taken by Mr. Henry Laing, by his namesake Mr. Laing, F. S. A. Scotland, in "Proceedings of the Society of account. Some casual references to him, especially taken from an old Life of St. Finnbar of Cork,<sup>3</sup> are all we have to draw from. St. Talmach was born in the sixth century, as would seem most probable. We are left in the dark, however, regarding his parentage, family and place of birth. This saint appears to have received his ecclesiastical training under St. Barr, at Loch Erce, in the southern and maritime part of Ireland. He flourished in the commencement of the seventh century;<sup>4</sup> and, he had a celebrated school, with many disciples, at the place, so called, in former times.<sup>5</sup> Some have supposed, that Loch Eirce or Irc was identical with the present romantic lake, known as Gougane-Barra, said to mean, "the hermitage of St. Finbar,"<sup>6</sup> or "Finbar's rock-cleft."<sup>7</sup> This retreat is justly esteemed one of the greatest curiosities, in the county of Cork; for, the lake lies embedded beneath vast and hoary perpendicular rocks, enclosing it around.<sup>8</sup> The lake itself is almost circular, and comprises about 200 acres. The River Lee, being the Luvius of Ptolemy, takes its rise here. Shrubs and evergreens grow in the rock-clefts, which are scored throughout with deep fissures and water-courses.

Gougane Barra, County of Cork.

Antiquaries of Scotland." See vol. i., pp. 294 to 296.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiv. Martii. De S. Talmacho, Confessore, p. 607.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 342.

<sup>3</sup> See his Life, at the 25th of September.

<sup>4</sup> Ussher will not allow the story told, that St. Finnbar of Cork could have been a contemporary with St. David, Bishop of Menevia. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 493, 503, and Index Chronologicus, at A.D. DCXXX., p. 537.

<sup>5</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's "History of the City and County of Cork," chap. iii., pp. 38, 39.

<sup>6</sup> See Charles Smith's "Ancient and Present State of the County and City of Cork," vol. i., book ii., chap. ii., pp. 192, 193.

<sup>7</sup> This latter is the rendering of Dr. P. W. Joyce, in his "Origin and History of Irish Names and Places," part iv., chap. vi., p. 446.

<sup>8</sup> The present view, drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard, admirably illustrates the site, the wooded island, and St. Finbar's hermitage, yet the scene of frequent pilgrimages, with the surrounding lake and distant mountains.

Colgan supposes, that our saint must have studied here, under St. Barr, in the time of Pope Gregory the Great, and either before or soon after his death, which occurred A.D. 604.<sup>9</sup> Having been distinguished for his virtues, in common with other fellow-disciples, under the same illustrious master, St. Talmach is said to have built a church, which became subject to St. Barr's government. Where this church had been erected, we have now no means left for determining. The date of St. Talmach's death is not known; but, his Natalis was observed, on the 14th day of March, according to our Irish Martyrologists. Thus, the name, S. Talmac, occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>10</sup> as also in that of Marianus O'Gorman, where he is styled, a very meritorious and a rigorous virgin. Maguire does not forget to mark his commemoration, in a similar manner. We read, likewise, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>11</sup> about Talmach, as having a festival at this date. Little more is known, regarding this saint.

ARTICLE II.—ST. FLANNAN OF CILL-ARD. On the 14th of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> we find the name of Flanan, Cille aird.<sup>2</sup> Many places, called Killard, are known, in different parts of Ireland. The Bollandists,<sup>3</sup> who barely notice St. Flannanus, at this date, also assert, that, probably, his Kill-aird—formerly called Druimard—was at Hy-Garchon, in Lagenia. For this statement, however, they quote Colgan's authority,<sup>4</sup> in his Acts of St. Aidus.<sup>5</sup> Under either name, it is not to be found on the Ordnance Survey Maps for the county of Wicklow; although, it was called Kill-aird there, in the time of Colgan. There was a Cill-airidh—said to be known at present as Killerry,<sup>6</sup> in the barony of Tirerrill, county of Sligo—where there appears to have been an ecclesiastical establishment, in the middle of the fourteenth century.<sup>7</sup> The ancient name for Kilworth,<sup>8</sup> in the county of Cork, is said to have been Cill Uird.<sup>9</sup> Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire have notices of this saint, in their respective Martyrologies. Flannan, of Cill Ard, is mentioned in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>10</sup> on this day. The time when he flourished does not appear to have been ascertained.

ARTICLE III.—ST. ULTAN, OF H. AIGNIGH, OR, OF MAGHNIDH. There appears to be a great difficulty, in determining who this saint was, when he

<sup>9</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiv. Martii. De S. Talmacho, p. 607.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. After the entry of 32 foreign saints, at this date, the Franciscan copy places, Séi Talmachi.

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, we have this entry, Flannan Cille aird.

<sup>2</sup> There is a Latin Vita S. Flannani—his identity not being determined by this short description of Mr. S. Bindon—among the Burgundian Library Manuscripts, Bruxelles, vol. xxii., at fol. 168.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Februarii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 342.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Februarii. Vita S. Aidi Epis. et Confessoris, n. 15, p. 422.

<sup>5</sup> His festivals are celebrated on the 28th of February, and on the 10th of November.

<sup>6</sup> See its bounds defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 15, 21, 27, 28. The townland proper is marked on Sheets 15, 21.

<sup>7</sup> In 1362, the Archdeacon of this place died. See "Annals of Loch Cé." Edited by W. M. Hennessy, vol. ii., pp. 24, 25, 541.

<sup>8</sup> This parish is in the baronies of Condons and Clangibbon, as shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cork," Sheets 19, 20, 27, 28. The town and townland proper are marked on Sheets 27, 28.

<sup>9</sup> Mr. Joseph O'Longan's Translation of "Forbuis Dromadamhghaire," n. 12 to p. 8.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

lived, and where he had been venerated. Colgan<sup>1</sup> appears to regard him, as a disciple of St. Declan,<sup>2</sup> Bishop<sup>3</sup> and Abbot of Ardmore, and to whom he is said to have become a successor. As too often happens, Archdall assumes Colgan's conjecture to be a fact, when he thinks, the saint of this day lived after the year 550.<sup>4</sup> The Bollandists briefly notice him, and with doubt intimated.<sup>5</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan shows, that as the disciple of St. Declan is called Ultan, son of Erc, he must probably be different from the present holy man, who is called Ultan Magonighe.<sup>6</sup> Thus are we left to further conjecture. An entry is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>7</sup> at the 14th of March, regarding Ultan h. aighnigh. Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire have him down, at the same date, as Ultan Maignidhe. Again, the festival, in honour of Ultan, of Maghnidh, was celebrated on this day, according to the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>8</sup> His locality may have been identical with Magh Niadh, in the county of Fermanagh.<sup>9</sup>

ARTICLE IV.—FESTIVAL OF ST. DIONYSIUS, THE BISHOP, AND OF ST. SALVATOR. In our early Irish Church, the festival of the holy Bishop Dionysius and of St. Salvator was kept on this day, as appears from an entry, to be found in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus.<sup>1</sup> St. Dionysius, with other martyrs, at Thessalonica, is mentioned, in a manuscript copy of St. Jerome's Martyrology, and from another Codex, belonging to Rheinau, as mentioned by the Bollandists, at this date.<sup>2</sup> St. Salvator appears to have suffered martyrdom, at Carthage, according to a Manuscript of Prague, and the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE V.—ST. CÆMHAN, OR CŒMAN. A record is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 14th of March, regarding a saint, who is only called Cœman. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> allude to Caimanus, on this day, as found in the Irish Calendars. St. Patrick is said to have built a church, called Seandomnach, at a place denominated Ard-lice, in the territory of Tir-chai-readha, in Connaught. Over this, he set a deacon, named Cœman.<sup>3</sup> How-

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiv. Martii. De S. Ultano, Abb. Ardmorensi, p. 608.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 24th of July.

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks it probable, that although he was so called, no permanent See had been at Ardmore, in his time. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. vii., n. III, p. 463.

<sup>4</sup> See his "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 684.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 341.

<sup>6</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. ix., sect. vii., p. 461, and n. 113, p. 463.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at this date, we find, ultan .h. aighnigh.

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

<sup>9</sup> See notices of St. Monoa, Virgin, at the 16th of January.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> The following Irish stanza, taken from the "Leabhar Breac"

copy, with its English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

C. 11. 10. *Ḍionys in tērruc
Acta clēri cōema
Cōmann cūre pōrtnaioe Saluactur pōrtnoera.*

Dionysius the bishop
Whose clericks were chaste
May the name of Christ protect us.
May Salvator save us.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 341. At the 13th of March, other notes of Saints Alexander and Dionysius, Martyrs, are given. See ibid. Martii xiii., p. 262.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 342.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, we find the entry, Cōmann.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 342.

ever, to identify him with the present saint, is not so easy a matter; although Colgan refers the festival of a St. Coeman of Kill Rath,<sup>4</sup> to the 14th and 18th of March,<sup>5</sup> while he is set down among the disciples of St. Patrick.<sup>6</sup> We find Cæmhan, simply set down, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> as having a festival, at this date.

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. MEDOTHUS, OR ST. METHODIUS, CONFESSOR. In the anonymous Catalogue of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 14th of March, we find a St. Methodius. On the authority of the Carthusian Martyrology, we have the same saint noted as a Confessor, at the same date, in Henry Fitzsimon's list of Irish Saints,<sup>1</sup> and by Dempster.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists, who notice St. Medothus, at this day, assert, that they could not find his festival in the Breviary of Aberdeen, which Dempster quotes as his authority.<sup>3</sup> In the mountains of Scotia, which are called Hibernia, Medoth is set down as a saint, at the 14th of March, in Dempster's "Menologium Scoticum."<sup>4</sup> In his History, the same writer calls this saint Methodius, and states, that he was a Scottish abbot, but that the year of his death was uncertain.<sup>5</sup> A festival has been assigned, by Ferrarius, to St. Medothus, supposed to be identical with St. Maidocus, Patron of Ferns; and, it is said to have fallen, on the 14th of March. But, the Bollandists<sup>6</sup> were not able to find any confirmation of this statement; not alone, in any known Kalendar, but even in the pages of Ferrarius himself, at that date. Colgan appears to make this Medothus identical with a Moedocus of Cluain-escrach, said to have had a festival, at the present day;<sup>7</sup> however, he is omitted here, by Colgan himself.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. CUIMNECH, CUINNECH, OR CUIMNIG. In that Calendar of the Trinity College, Dublin, Manuscripts, and in the Codex classed, B. 3. 10, I find, at March 14th or Ides ii., Sanctæ Connete Matronæ. She is said to have had an Office, consisting of nine Lessons. From this entry, we might naturally conclude, that the present holy person was a female. However, the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> alluding to the Irish Fasti, at this date, enter the name, Cuinnechus, which gives us a masculine termination. The name of this saint is written, Cuimnig, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> at the 14th of March. On this day, a St. Cuimnech, is entered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having veneration paid, but where, we are not further informed.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xlvii., p. 136. Colgan identifies him with a St. Coeman of Kill-rath. See n. 88, p. 177.

<sup>4</sup> This place is identified, likewise, with a Rath Cairbre, by Colgan.

<sup>5</sup> See ibid., lib. iii., cap. xxxvii., [p. 157, and n. 68, p. 186.

<sup>6</sup> See ibid. Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 267.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 49, and cap. xii., p. 56.

<sup>2</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 894, p. 472.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii.,

Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 342.

<sup>4</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>5</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xii., num. 894, p. 472.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., xxxi. Januarii. Vita S. Aidani sive Maidoci. Præmium, sect. 4, p. 1111.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Januarii. Appendix ad Acta S. Maidoci, cap. i., p. 221.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 342.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, the reading is Cumng.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. KENOCE. The Martyrology for the use of the Church at Aberdeen,<sup>1</sup> at the day before the Ides of March—corresponding with the 14th—has an entry of the feast of St. Kenoce, in Scotland. It is said, she was distinguished by her great miracles. The people who were near paid her special honour and proclaimed her praises.<sup>2</sup> We refer to what has been said, at the preceding day, under the head of St. Kevoca.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. BRIGIDA, OR BRIGID. A Scottish St. Brigida's relics were preserved at Abernethy.<sup>1</sup> A St. Brigida is said to have been educated with St. Cuthbert, at Dunkeld, and to have been brought from Ireland.<sup>2</sup> St. Columba was the instructor of both saints.<sup>3</sup> Whether or not this was the St. Brigida of Abernethy, venerated on the 14th of March, seems undetermined. The latter is associated with the nine Maidens,<sup>4</sup> and with a St. Mayota or Mazota,<sup>5</sup> a virgin, whose feast is assigned to the 23rd of December.<sup>6</sup> Most likely, the present St. Brigida, or Brigid, was an Irish saint.

ARTICLE X.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. COMNANUS, ABBOT OF IONA, SCOTLAND. At the 14th of March, David Camerarius enters a St. Comnanus, Abbot of Iona.<sup>1</sup> Wion and all the Scottish Annals are quoted. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> notice him, on the authority of Camerarius, as the preceptor of King Ferquard;<sup>3</sup> yet, they do not consider it as certain, that he should be classed among the saints.

Fifteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—SAINTS DICHULL, MUNISSA, AND NESLUG, BROTHERS, OF INIS-MEIC NESSAN, OR IRELAND'S EYE, COUNTY OF DUBLIN.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

FEW among the citizens of our Irish Metropolis have failed to take advantage, during the summer months, of the ready means of transit, for one of the most exhilarating and healthful localities, in its immediate neighbourhood. The Hill of Howth<sup>1</sup> affords ample sources for enjoyment, ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> From a Manuscript of the sixteenth century, communicated by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A., Scot.

<sup>2</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 262.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See Ussher's Works, vol. vi., pp. 256, 257, 451. Elrington's edition.

<sup>2</sup> This is mentioned, in an Irish Life of St. Cuthbert.

<sup>3</sup> See "Libellus de Nativitate S. Cuthberti," cap. xxi.

<sup>4</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 291.

<sup>5</sup> See notices of her, at the 23rd of December.

<sup>6</sup> See ibid., p. 395.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 236. See also, Camerarius' "De Statu Hominis Vete-ris simul ac novæ Ecclesiæ, et Infidelium Conversione," lib. i., cap. iii., sect. 2, p. 166.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xiv. Among the prepermitted saints, p. 342.

<sup>3</sup> Neither King Ferchard I., nor King Ferchard II., appears to have profited much in morality or religion from their teacher's care. See George Buchanan's "Rerum Scoticarum Historia," lib. v., pp. 145, 146. Again, it must be observed, that among the Rev. Dr. Reeves' list of Iona Abbots, we find not one named Comnanus. There is a St. Cuimine Albus, however, and he lived contemporaneously with both the Kings of Scotland already named, and who all flourished, in the seventh century. We have already inserted notices of him, at the 24th of February, the date for his festival.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> This hill and the peninsula were once known as Ben Edair. In Irish and combines the most picturesque marine and mountain scenery, easily accessible ; while there is no other city in the British empire, that can boast such a variety of charming landscapes, as are comprised within a circuit of ten or twelve miles, around the city of Dublin.<sup>2</sup> But, here, our attention, in connexion with the present subject, must be chiefly confined to the rocky island, about half-a-mile to the north of Howth's fine harbour,<sup>3</sup> and which is said to have been formerly called Inis-Ereann.<sup>4</sup> In the sixteenth century, it was named Irlandeseya,<sup>5</sup> and this has been converted into Ireland's Eye,<sup>6</sup> at the present day. The appearance of this islet, from the main shore, is rugged and picturesque, in the highest degree. It contains, over fifty-three acres.<sup>7</sup> Its eastern extremity, rent by some convulsion from the main cliff, forms a detached mass of great height, which resembles some curious fragments on Antrim coast, and known as the chimney of the Giant's Causeway.<sup>8</sup> The visitor usually lands in Carrigeen Bay, where on a gentle slope he beholds an old oratory in the foreground, and behind it rise hills and rocks, clothed with heather, fern, brushwood, briars, wild plants and lichens, giving fragrant odour, and every variety of tint. A steep ascent leads to the rocky cliffs, on the north-side, and from a height of 350 feet, the rocks descend precipitously and fantastically to the sea, which has hollowed out several caves, into which the waves break in sheets of foam. Altogether, the soil and its seclusion, with the size and wild beauty of surface and scenery, must have strongly attracted to its shores the holy men, whose memory has deserved commemoration, on this day, when Colgan has inserted their Acts.<sup>9</sup> The Bollandists<sup>10</sup> have but a brief notice. These saints were born, probably about the beginning of the seventh century. They were sons to Nessan,<sup>11</sup> the son of Erc, son to Aidus Kerr,<sup>12</sup> son to Colman, son of Corpre, son to Dunlung, son of fabulous topography, Breagh and Edar were brothers, who gave their names to the two headlands, now known as Bray Head and Howth. This latter denomination is said to be derived from Hoved, a Norse word, meaning "head." To this fair scene, the beautiful Poem of Sir Samuel Ferguson, LL.D., charmingly illustrated by the drawings of Miss Stokes, alludes :—

"To speak the air, the sky to speak,
The freshness of the hill to tell,
Who roaming bare Ben Edar's peak
And Aideen's briary dell,
And gazing on the Cromlech vast,
And on the mountain and the sea,
Shall catch communion with the past
And mix himself with me."
—"The Cromlech on Howth."

<sup>2</sup> See an admirable handy-book of J. Hubbard Smith, "A Day at Howth ; or, Guide to its most prominent objects of interest ; containing notices of its early History and Archæological Remains, its Geological Structure, Botanical Productions, and objects of Natural History," &c., pp. 47, 48.

<sup>3</sup> Archer, treating of Ireland's Eye, says, "it was supposed to have been formerly joined to the Hill of Howth."—"Statistical Survey of the County Dublin," chap. v., sect. 2, p. 91.

<sup>4</sup> Or Erin's Island, according to the "Dinnseanchus."

<sup>5</sup> So is it called, by Archbishop Alan.

Ussher says : "Hæc ille ; ex Vita Nessani : in qua parva illa insula Oculus (leg. Oculus) vocatur, ad orientalem plagam ad sex miliaria de Dublin."

<sup>6</sup> This name is said to have been given to it, by the Danes, in whose language Ey, or Ei, means "an island."

<sup>7</sup> This island is in the parish of Howth, and barony of Coolock. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheets 15, 16.

<sup>8</sup> "Dark o'er the foam-white waves,
The giant's pier the war of tempests braves,
A far projecting, firm, basaltic way
Of clustering columns wedged in dense array ;

With skill so like, yet so surpassing art,
With such design, so just in every part,
That reason pauses, doubtful if it stand
The work of mortal, or immortal hand."

—Rev. William Hamilton Drummond's Poem, "The Giants' Causeway," Canto i., ll. 97 to 104.

<sup>9</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Martii. De S. Dichullo, Munissa, Neslugio et Fratribus, p. 609.

<sup>10</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 373.

<sup>11</sup> He was descended, according to the Rev. Dr. Todd, in the eleventh generation from Cathair Mór, King of Ireland, A.D. 174 to 177.

<sup>12</sup> He died, A.D. 591.

Enda Niadh, son to Bressal Belach.<sup>13</sup> Their ancestors were princes of Leinster, and the holy brothers were fourth in descent from Colman, its king, who died A.D. 576.<sup>14</sup> Nesson was the father of seven sons, who all became distinguished ecclesiastics. These all departed in the odour of sanctity.<sup>15</sup> Their festivals, however, are celebrated on different days, if we except three of them, namely, Dichull Derg, Munissa, and Nesluagh, whose memories are commemorated on this day. They were disciples, it has been thought, to St. Maidoc<sup>16</sup> of Ferns; and, we are told, in the Life of this latter, that having erected a monastery, at a place, then called Cluain-Dicholla Gairbh, and now Clonmore, he placed Dichull over it as abbot, yet subject to his own jurisdiction. From this place, it would appear, Dichull removed to that little island already described. Whether, at the same time, his brothers arrived with him or not is unknown; but, all seem to have been companions there, at one period. In a Brief of Pope Alexander III.,<sup>17</sup> directed to St. Laurence O'Toole—whose Life occurs at the 14th of November—it is termed "Insula filiorum quondam Nessori,"<sup>18</sup> or "formerly the Island of Nesson's sons."<sup>19</sup> These saints are said to have lived here, probably about the middle, or not later than the close, of the seventh century.<sup>20</sup>

These brothers built an oratory, on this island, some portions of which remain to the present time.<sup>21</sup> About the same period, and most probably by them, was transcribed a copy of the Four Gospels, called the "Garland of Howth."<sup>22</sup> In his "Liber Niger," Archbishop Alan says, that God's judgments were feared by those, who should forswear themselves upon it.<sup>23</sup> Even a righteous and an innocent man feared this ordeal.<sup>24</sup> For a considerable time, this curious Codex had been preserved in the Abbey of Howth,<sup>25</sup> with great reverence and care.<sup>26</sup> Formerly bearing the local name of Ker-lowre,<sup>27</sup> the

<sup>13</sup> According to the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. 20.

<sup>14</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 208, 209, 214, 215.

<sup>15</sup> Besides the three holy brothers, venerated on this day, our Calendars commemorate the other four, viz.: Beoan, Abbot of Ard-Cullin or Fidh-Cuillin, venerated on the 8th of August, Cairell, Bishop, of Tir-rois, venerated on the 13th of June, Flann, venerated 20th of April, and Muredach, said to have been venerated on the 15th of May, or on the 12th of August. We have here corrected some typographical errors in Colgan, and guided by the entries in our Martyrologies.

<sup>16</sup> See his Life, at the 31st of January.

<sup>17</sup> He reigned from A.D. 1159 to 1181. See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," p. 208.

<sup>18</sup> See Ussher's "Veterum Epistolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge," Epist. xlvi., p. 113.

<sup>19</sup> Ussher adds: "quam oculum Hiberniæ dici, vulgariter Irelande-eyam, ubi sanctus ille insistebat crebris orationibus, jejuniis & vigiliis, Johannes Alanus Dublinensis Præsul annotat."—"Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 497.

<sup>20</sup> According to Rev. Dr. Todd's calculation,

<sup>21</sup> Such was the opinion of Dr. Petrie, as expressed in his "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, anterior to the Anglo-Norman Invasion," part ii., sect. iii., subs. i., pp. 177, 178.

<sup>22</sup> This was a wrong name for it, as not belonging originally to Howth, but rather to Inis Meic Nesson. It was apparently written in the seventh century, as indicated by its penmanship. Another Codex, called the "Book of Howth," must not be confounded with the former; and, it is yet preserved, at Lambeth, in the Library of the Archbishops of Canterbury. This is a compilation of Anglo-Irish legends and of historical records, written in the middle of the sixteenth century.

<sup>23</sup> See, Warburton, Whitelaw and Walsh's "History of the City of Dublin," vol. ii., p. 1256, note.

<sup>24</sup> From such account, it would seem probable, that in the sixteenth century, it had been preserved in some ornamented and precious box or case.

<sup>25</sup> This old structure was drawn by Francis Grose, in 1790, and engraved, with descriptive letterpress accompanying it. See Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland," vol. i., pp. 19 to 21.

<sup>26</sup> Archbishop Alan quotes Vita Nessori, for his account of this Codex.

<sup>27</sup> Correctly spelled it should be Ceathair

Garland of Howth is now a most remarkable relic of ancient art and piety.<sup>28</sup> It is still preserved, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.<sup>29</sup> A description of this Codex, with two fac-simile chromo-lithograph illuminations, by a gifted lady artist,<sup>30</sup> was the last literary production of the late Rev. Dr. Todd.<sup>31</sup> Towards the middle of the eleventh century, restorations of the old oratory appear to have been made. In these were preserved some of the principal features of the primary church. To it was added a square chancel, Inis Meic Nesson Church, Ireland's Eye, County of Dublin.

which served as the basis of a Round Tower, about twelve feet in diameter, with a corresponding elevation, a mode of architecture, which presented at that period a rather novel feature in Ecclesiological art. The ruins of this church were tolerably well preserved, at the commencement of the present century. According to some writers, it would seem, that Inisfaithlenn, or the "Elder Island," was formerly the name of this island; others have that Irish name translated into "Woodbine Island." Rev. Dr. Todd translates it, "grassy," or "lawn island." During late years, some curious antiquities were here discovered,<sup>32</sup> as also on the peninsula of Howth.<sup>33</sup> About this time or shortly afterwards, the Rev. Mr. Shearman, aided by the subscrip-

Leabhair, or "the Quadruple Book," i.e., the Four Gospels. Ussher says of it: "Qui et hujus librum quatuor Evangeliorum fuisse significat, ab incolis Ker-lowre inde dictum; quem hodie the Garland of Howth corrupte vocitant: licet argentæ lingulæ illi annexæ S. Talmani nomen insculptum ego observaverim."—"Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 497.

<sup>28</sup> It fell into the possession of Archbishop Ussher, in the seventeenth century.

<sup>29</sup> The clasp or tongue of silver, attached to the book, with St. Talman's name inscribed, has unfortunately disappeared; and the book itself, having been rebound over forty years ago, suffered considerably in the operation, performed by an ignorant binder. St. Talman's feast or history is not known.

<sup>30</sup> Miss Stokes.

<sup>31</sup> See "Descriptive Remarks on Illuminations in Certain Ancient Irish Manuscripts," by the Rev. James Henthorn Todd, D.D., F.S.A., &c., pp. 11 to 14. London, 1869. Imp. fol.

<sup>32</sup> An account of these, by the Rev. John F. Shearman, C.C., of Howth, had been communicated to the members, on the 8th of June, 1868. This interesting paper has tions of several friends, originated and undertook the duty of superintending the restoration of the old church, so far as data<sup>34</sup> allowed of its being faithfully repaired. The learned Ussher appears to have been egregiously mistaken, when he supposed, that St. Nesson,<sup>35</sup> a Deacon,<sup>36</sup> who is classed in the second order of Irish Saints, lived on this island.<sup>37</sup> Yet, he took Archbishop Alan as an authority, and by him, it has been said, that Nesson passed his time there, engaged in constant prayer, fasting and watching. Depending on these early writers, a prevailing opinion, that St. Nesson, in A.D. 570,<sup>38</sup> founded an Abbey, on this island, has obtained some degree of credit.<sup>39</sup> A curious tradition,<sup>40</sup> regarding St. Nesson and Puck's Rock,<sup>41</sup> which is a huge detached mass of granite on the opposite shore of Howth, has been put on record.<sup>42</sup> Colgan<sup>43</sup> has connected St. Dichull, the son of Nesson, with the Island of Inisfallen, in the Lower Lake, at Killarney, and he has led Archdall,<sup>44</sup> with some modern writers, astray, in this particular.<sup>45</sup>

Existing ecclesiastical appurtenances on Ireland's Eye are said to have been the original prebendal land and church of Howth, to which this establishment had been transferred, in 1235, by Luke, Archbishop of Dublin.<sup>46</sup> At the east end of the ruins, an arched chancel formerly supported the belfry, which was a Round Tower.<sup>47</sup> This church was very small, not more than twelve feet, by twenty-four, in the interior.<sup>48</sup> Unfortunately, the doorway, in the west front, was destroyed, now many years ago, and its stone materials were removed to the mainland.<sup>49</sup> It had a semicircular arch, built in the Roman manner.<sup>50</sup> been published, in "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. x., No. xxxii., sect. iii., pp. 332 to 334.

<sup>33</sup> See ibid., sect. i., ii., pp. 330 to 332.

<sup>34</sup> Such was furnished from a sketch, made by George Petrie, LL.D., and R.H.A., on the 7th of September, 1828, and now in possession of Miss Stokes. The Rev. Mr. Shearman set up the interior arch, doorway and other features of the old building, according to that model. He also kindly furnished the drawing here represented, and which was transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman. It was engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>35</sup> His feast seems to be referable, to the 25th of July, at Mungairit.

<sup>36</sup> Ussher says: "Mitto quod in Vita S. Albei Inelacensis scriptum habetur; ipsum atque egregium et sanctissimum diaconum Nessonum simul locutos fuisse de mysteriis Dei et quæstionibus quas Nessianus quærebat sibi solvi."

<sup>37</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 474, 497.

<sup>38</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. DLXX., p. 532. Ibid.

<sup>39</sup> Archdall says: "St. Nesson founded an Abbey here about A.D. 570, where he passed the evening of a well-spent life in fasting and in prayer." * * * * "The ruins of St. Nesson's church still remain on the south side of the island."—"Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 221.

<sup>40</sup> This is to be found, originally related, in the "Registrum" of Archbishop Alan.

<sup>41</sup> See Warburton, Whitlaw and Walsh, "History of the City of Dublin," vol. ii., p. 1266.

<sup>42</sup> It is related, in Gaskin's elegant volume, "Varieties of Irish History," sect. x., pp. 343, 344.

<sup>43</sup> In enumerating various saints bearing the name of Dichull, he only says regarding the present: "Primus est S. Dichullus filius Nessani, Abbas de Inis Fatllein in Momonia, qui cum duobus suis fratribus Macnissa et Neslugio ibidem colitur die 15 Martii." See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Januarii. Vita S. Fursæi, n. 6, p. 92.

<sup>44</sup> See, at county of Kerry, Innisfallen, A.D. 640, "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 301. No such date has been furnished by Colgan, at the page quoted.

<sup>45</sup> This statement has been copied by a more modern writer, and he adds, that this island was then called Innis-Nesson or Inis-Mac-Nesson, i.e., the Island of the sons of Nesson, from Nesson, the father of Dichull. See that beautifully-illustrated work, Rev. G. N. Wright's "Guide to the Lakes of Killarney," p. 22. The designs of its various views were drawn, by the distinguished Irish antiquary and artist, George Petrie, LL.D.

<sup>46</sup> Then a new church was built upon the Rector's glebe, at Howth. See "History and Antiquities of the Church of St. Patrick," book i., chap. x., p. 63.

<sup>47</sup> See Whammond's "Illustrated Guide to Dublin and Wicklow," p. 11.

<sup>48</sup> Dr. Petrie promised to give a description of this church, with its round Tower Belfry, in the Third Part of his Work, which, however, has not yet appeared.

<sup>49</sup> They were used, for the purpose of building the Catholic church, at Howth. A

This was composed of well-cemented calpe-blocks, which sprung from square imposts, almost exactly similar to the ancient so-called Saxon doorways.<sup>51</sup> It measured six feet, six inches, in height; three feet, in width, at the base; and two feet, eight inches, immediately below the imposts. The depth of the wall was two feet, eight inches. It has been supposed, that some inequalities of ground close to the church exhibit indistinct evidences of house or other foundations once existing there.<sup>52</sup> Having landed, on more than one occasion, the writer has had an opportunity for observing here traces of some enclosure around this oratory. The space within seemed to have been formerly under culture. Probably, a portion of this ground had been used as a cemetery, although no peculiar features of one now appear. How long the brothers, Dichull, Munissa, and Neslug, lived here has not transpired, and we have no means left, for determining the days of their respective deaths. Again, the year or years when these saints departed, from this life, we do not find recorded. However, their festival was celebrated, on the 15th of March,<sup>53</sup> in the island; for, this is the simple way, in which it is mentioned, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus.<sup>54</sup> In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>55</sup> at this date, we find the entry: Filiorum trium Nessani; Monisu, oculus Nesloga, oculus Diuchaill, Trenach Derg.<sup>56</sup> But, Colgan observes, that Sestugius was inserted through an error of the copyist, Neslugius being the name, according to other authorities. The Calendar of Cashel mentions Dichull alone, as being more celebrated than the others.<sup>57</sup> Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>58</sup> at the same day, writes of these brethren, that they were three holy sons of Nesson, of Inis Faithlenn, namely, Munissa, Neslug, and Dichull Derg.<sup>59</sup> The three sons of Nesson, of Inis Faithlenn, i.e., Muinissa, Nesslugh, and Duicholl Derg,<sup>60</sup> are recorded in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>61</sup> as having veneration paid them, at this same date. Thus, too, the Scottish Kalendar of Drummond coincides.<sup>62</sup>

Their church, hallowed by the learning and piety of these holy men, was devastated in the year 701, when Irgalach, King of Bregia, was slain on Innis MeicNesson—whither he had fled for safety—by the Britons, who then made a raid on the east coast of Ireland. In the ninth century, and more frequently still in the tenth, this island was the scene of many a conflict with the Danish drawing of this doorway was taken by George Petrie, LL.D., and, it is engraved, with a detailed description, in his "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, anterior to the Anglo-Norman Invasion," part ii., sect. iii., subs. i., pp. 177, 178.

<sup>50</sup> See, a very interesting and complete descriptive article, headed, "The Isles of Ireland, Historic, Legendary and Scenic. I. Ireland's Eye." It is contained in "Duffy's Hibernian Magazine," vol. iii., No. 14, pp. 56, 57, & 8, 59.

<sup>51</sup> This is a complete misnomer, inasmuch as the Saxons originated no sort of ecclesiastical architecture, only having adopted that which they received from their early Irish missionaries.

<sup>52</sup> In the "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. ii., No. 60, pp. 60, 61, will be found an interesting description of Ireland's Eye, with a correct wood engraving of what has been designated, the "Ruins of St. Nesson's Church."

<sup>53</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Martii, nn. 10, 11, 12, 13, p. 609.

<sup>54</sup> According to Colgan, St. Ængus, in his Metrical Festivity, says: "Tres filii Nessani de Inis, devotioni assueti." Maguire adds, "id est, Munissa, Neslugius, & Dichullus Derg."

<sup>55</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>56</sup> In the Franciscan copy, beginning with a contracted capital letter of a peculiar form, and which seems to represent SS., we have afterward entered, at the Ides of March, 13 foreign saints preceding, Ῥῥῶρ .ιιι. ηῆραν, i.e. monirru asur Seirlosa asur Oucail. Tpenec Derg.

<sup>57</sup> Thus, "S. Dichullus Derg, filius Nessani, de Inis-Nessani in Bregiis."

<sup>58</sup> "Tres sancti filii Nessani de Inis Faithlenn, nempe Munissa, Neslugius, & Dichullus Derg."

<sup>59</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Martii, nn. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, p. 609.

<sup>60</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd adds: "Read Ῥιυῆοιῤῥ: 'Duicholl Derg.'"

<sup>61</sup> Edition of Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

<sup>62</sup> It states at the 15th, Idus, In Hibernia, invaders ; its ecclesiastical buildings doubtless shared the sad fate of which their advent was the usual harbinger.

ARTICLE II.—FESTIVAL OF THE APOSTLES, ST. LUKE, AND ST. JAMES. [First Century.] Besides the foregoing saints, at this date, we find entered, in the “Feilire” of St. Ængus,<sup>1</sup> the festival of St. James,<sup>2</sup> the Apostle, and Brother of our Lord, according to the Manuscript Martyrologies of Tallagh and of the Monastery of St. Cyriacus.<sup>3</sup> Again, we find St. Luke, the Evangelist, at Jerusalem.<sup>4</sup> According to two old Martyrologies,<sup>5</sup> this day was his Natalis ; according to another record,<sup>6</sup> it was his Ordinatio ; while, in Saussay, it is entered, Memoria Leodii. St. Luke’s chief festival is celebrated, on the 18th of October.<sup>7</sup>

ARTICLE III.—THE THREE DAUGHTERS OF ELTIN. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 15th of March, we find the entry Tui [Tres ?] inghen Eltine. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> note their feast, but remark, that elsewhere, except in the Irish Calendars, of Eltin and his daughters, they do not meet any account. On this day, a festival was celebrated to honour the three daughters of Eltin, as we read in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE IV.—ST. EUGENIUS OR EOGHAN. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> enters a festival for S. Eugenius, simply, at the 15th of March. The Bollandists have merely the name, with an observation, that it is one often met with in the Irish Calendars.<sup>2</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>3</sup> this day records, Eoghan. “I think,” remarks the writer, “this is Eoghan, son of Saran, of Cluain Caolain, for whom Ailbhe,<sup>4</sup> of Imleach Iobhair, composed the very hard rule, which begins, ‘Say for me to the son of Saran,’ &c. For every other person of the same name, that is in the Martyrology, has some title, or the holy sons of Nessan went to Christ. See Bishop Forbes’ “Kalenders of Scottish Saints,” p. 7.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> The following stanza, taken from the “Leabhar Breac” copy, with the English translation, has been furnished by Professor O’Looney :—

Ó, 10. Seirín iacop oríon Lucar lír uar tóilír fín eiríe cearraic fanair
mec neppan on inír.

Proclaim James with dignity,
Luke oft over the surfeul seas,
With Christ they loved knowledge,
The sons of Nessan from the Island.

<sup>2</sup> His chief feast is held, on the 1st of May.

<sup>3</sup> In this is added, “Carthagine.” And in the old Martyrology, ascribed to St. Jerome, he is classed among martyrs at Carthage. He was the son of Alpheus, and of Mary, sister of the Blessed Virgin Mary. He was called the Less, to distinguish him from St. James, the son of Zebedee and of Salome ; and the latter is noted in some old Calendars, as having had a feast, at this day, although his chief festival is on the 25th of July.

<sup>4</sup> According to MSS. S. Hieronymi, Leodiense S. Lamberti, paruum S. Maximini, Parisiense Labbæi. In MS. Ado of St. Laurence, prope Leodium, we only have the entry, Lucæ Evangelistæ.

<sup>5</sup> In MSS. Tornacensi et Lætiensi.

<sup>6</sup> The Martyrology of Tallagh.

<sup>7</sup> See the Bollandists’ “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 373, 374.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at the Ides of March, we have this entry, Tui inghen eltine.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 373.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, the entry is similar, Sci Eugeni.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 373.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

church, which he possessed, except the Eoghan, who comes at this day." In a subsequent page of the Martyrology of Donegal, Dr. Todd places Cluain Celain,<sup>5</sup> in the county of Tipperary.<sup>6</sup>

ARTICLE V.—FESTIVAL OF ST. ALDETRUDE, OR ALDETURDIS, VIRGIN AND ABBESS OF MALBOD, OR MAUBEUGE, BELGIUM. [Seventh Century.] Already have we given the Acts of this holy woman, at the 25th of February. In some Manuscript additions to Usuard and Greuen, to be found in the Carthusian Monastery, at Bruxelles, another festival was assigned to her, for the 15th of March, as the Bollandists observe.<sup>1</sup>

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF A ST. CONLÆTH, OR CONLEATUS, BISHOP OF SODER. We find, that Bishop Forbes<sup>1</sup> has some notices of a St. Conlæth, supposed to have been Bishop of Soder. To this same holy person, Dempster seems to allude, when making St. Conleatus, a Scot,<sup>2</sup> but a bishop attached to no fixed See, as was usual, at the time he flourished, about the year 700. Nothing more, he tells us, is known concerning Conleatus, except what her nephew Cogitosus mentions, regarding his friendship, with the holy Virgin Brigid.<sup>3</sup> Hence, it is evident, he has been most unchronologically confounded with St. Conleth, Bishop of Kildare, who died early in the sixth century, and whose Life we have recorded, at the 3rd of May. The feast of St. Conleatus is set down, at this present date, also, by Camerarius,<sup>4</sup> who calls him, Bishop of Soder. For the particulars of his Acts are quoted, Alexander Mills, George Newton, the Life of St. Brigid, and other authorities. The Bollandists<sup>5</sup> refer to St. Conleatus, at this day.

ARTICLE VII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. FETHNO, FETCHUON, FIECHNON, FETHUO, FETHCHUO, FIECHNO OR FETNO, CONFESSOR AND MISSIONARY AMONG THE SCOTS AND PICTS. [Sixth Century.] In the English Martyrology, at this date, there is a festival of St. Fethno, Companion of St. Columba,<sup>1</sup> as a Missionary among the Picts.<sup>2</sup> We have noticed him already, at the 12th of this month.

ARTICLE VIII.—FESTIVAL OF ST. ALBUINUS, BISHOP, AND APOSTLE OF TURINGIA, UPPER SAXONY. [Eighth Century.] At the 15th of March, Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> treat about this celebrated saint, who is found, also, in Dempster's "Menologium Scoticum."<sup>3</sup> St. Albuin was an Irishman,

<sup>1</sup> In a note here, Dr. Todd says, "Ailbhe. See, Sept. 12."

<sup>5</sup> It is said to be near Emly, in Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xviii., p. 374.

<sup>6</sup> See p. 247, n. 3, in "Martyrology of Donegal."

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 372.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 236, 311.

<sup>2</sup> He says, "ex Keldeorum genere."—"Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iii., num. 283, p. 166.

<sup>3</sup> See her Life, at the 1st of February.

<sup>4</sup> See "De Statu Hominis Veteris simul ac novæ Ecclesie, et Infidelium Conversione," lib. i., cap. iii., sect. 2, p. 166.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 373.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>2</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 372.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xv. Commemoratio S. Albuini Episc. Turingorum Apostoli, p. 610.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 374.

<sup>3</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>4</sup> Ferrarius has it, that he was here an and he became a monk,<sup>4</sup> in the monastery of Iona, in Scotland. Thence he set out for Germany, and filled with a zeal for souls, he there collected many to the fold of Christ. He laboured especially in the province of Thuringia.<sup>5</sup> Fortified by the authority of the Sovereign Pontiff, at Rome, he was consecrated Bishop of Frislar,<sup>6</sup> a city of Lower Hesse, upon the River Eder, in Germany. His consecration took place in the town of Burbach. In his adopted country, many virtues and miracles signalized his mission. Dempster will have it, that he wrote Ad Thuringios, lib. i., and that he flourished in or about A.D. 755.<sup>7</sup> On the vii. day of the November Kalends, his blessed spirit passed away, after a life of great labour.<sup>8</sup> He is regarded as the Apostle of Thuringia, and by Trithemius he is placed among the illustrious men of the Benedictine Order.<sup>9</sup> On this day, there is a festival to his memory, and Bishop Forbes assigns him one, on the 29th of November;<sup>10</sup> but, his principal feast is held, on the 26th of October, when more shall be told regarding him. Bishop Forbes remarks, that Trithemius, being Abbot of the Scots' Monastery of St. James at Wurzburg, was likely to have ascertained the fact, regarding the existence of this saint, whose early Celtic name—probably Fionan,<sup>11</sup> of November the 25th, from Fionn, rendered Albus—may be hidden under Albinus or Albuinus.<sup>12</sup>

Sixteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FINIAN LOBHAIR, OR THE LEPER, ABBOT OF SWORDS, COUNTY OF DUBLIN.

[SIXTH OR SEVENTH CENTURY.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—ACTS OF ST. FINIAN—HIS FAMILY AND PLACE OF BIRTH—HIS EARLY YEARS, EDUCATION AND ORDINATION—HE FOUNDS A MONASTERY BESIDE A LAKE—AND HE PERFORMS MANY MIRACLES—INNISFALLEN.

THE Acts of St. Finian, the Leper, which have come down to us, are exceeding meagre and unsatisfactory, especially in presenting dates and names to elucidate the phases of his biography. The places where he dwelt are disguised, by misspelling, or by a want of particularity; while, comments on our Martyrologists are liable to be inaccurate, and are hardly verified, by reference to the legendary biographical accounts. Much, therefore, is left for conjecture; and, hence the difficulty of collecting and com-abbot. He quotes a Scottish Martyrology and Kalendar, and Trithemius, also, but incorrectly, for this statement. See "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum," and additional notes. But among the Abbots of Iona, as presented in Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," there is no such name, as Albuinus. See Additional Notes O., pp. 369 to 413.

<sup>5</sup> This is a Landgraviate of Upper Saxony. Its chief city is Erfurth, or Duringhen.

<sup>6</sup> Trithemius says: "Sed dudum cessavit Episcopatus ibidem."

<sup>7</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. i., num. 36, pp. 29, 30.

<sup>8</sup> See Arnold Wion's "Lignum Vitæ," lib. ii., cap. 42.

<sup>9</sup> See "De Viris Illustribus Ordinis S. Benedicti," lib. iii., cap. 267, and lib. iv., cap. 190.

<sup>10</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 269, 270. Most probably, however, this is a misprint for the 25th.

<sup>11</sup> Son of Fionnlogh, of Brigoon, county of Cork.

bining matter, to place the order of asserted narrative, in its true form, or in its best points of view.

It is stated,<sup>1</sup> that there had been two different Manuscript copies of this saint's life, in the time of Sir James Ware. They are quite different accounts, however, as would appear from their introductory sentences. They even refer to Saints, called Finian, yet to persons wholly distinct.<sup>2</sup> Still, one of these Lives seems to have been a Tract, which the Bollandists obtained from Father Henry Fitzsimons, and which they published at this day. Although somewhat qualifiedly praised by the Bollandists, it has been justly condemned by Dr. Lanigan, as a wretched compilation, and filled with fables. It was probably written by some Englishman, after the Anglo-Saxon settlement, in Ireland,<sup>3</sup> as may be gleaned from some of the expressions introduced.<sup>4</sup> Colgan<sup>5</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>6</sup> give the Acts of St. Finian Lobhair, at the 16th of March. The former writer justly infers the existence of an ancient Life, from circumstances related about our saint, in the Martyrology of Salisbury,<sup>7</sup> which calls him a bishop, and which mentions his having raised three persons to life, matters not alluded to by the Irish Calendarists. This old Life, however, did not come into Colgan's hands. Notices of St. Finian, the Leper, are to be met with in the works of Bishop Challenor<sup>8</sup> and of Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>9</sup> as also, in the "Memorial of Ancient British Piety."<sup>10</sup>

St. Finian was born of an illustrious family, for he belonged to the race of Cian, son to Oilíoll Olúim, according to the O'Clerys, and our genealogists.<sup>11</sup> Thus, he was a son to Conell, or Conald, son to Eochad, son of Thadeus, son of Kien, son of Alild or Olild Oliem, King of Munster.<sup>12</sup> The published Acts state, that his mother belonged to the southern part of Ireland. According to Dr. Jeoffrey Keating,<sup>13</sup> however, he is said to have descended from the posterity of Fiachadh Muillethan; but, he seems to have had in view another saint,<sup>14</sup> yet bearing a like name. The Acts of our saint, as published by the Bollandists, are silent as to the place of his nativity. If we are to believe some accounts, this saint was a native of Ely O'Carroll, then a part of Munster; yet, such was not the case, for he seems rather to have been born in that part of Leinster, known as Bregia, on its eastern coast. He received the surname of Lobhar, or "the Leper," from the circumstance of his being afflicted with the leprosy, or with some similar scrofulous disorder, during many years of his life. Although the word Lobhar

<sup>12</sup> See ibid.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> See Charles Smith's "Natural and Civil History of Kerry," chap. vi., p. 127, n. (f.)

<sup>2</sup> One of these Lives is that of St. Finian, of Lough Laoidhach, or of Kinnety, venerated on the 7th of April; while the other, beginning with, "Fuit vir vite venerabilis," &c., refers to the present saint.

<sup>3</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. iii., n. 26, p. 85.

<sup>4</sup> As for example, when the author speaks of "Finianus, in Hibernia quidem natus ac nutritus, sed gentis morum penitus expers."

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Martii. De S. Finiano cognomento Leproso, pp. 627 to 629.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. De Sancto Finiano, Abbate Sardensi in Hibernia. A previous commentary of 7 paragraphs is added to the more ancient Acts, pp. 444 to 447.

<sup>7</sup> "In Hibernia S. Finani Episcopi, singularis sanctitatis viri: qui inter multa miracula tres mortuos ad vitam revocavit."—Whitford's "Martyrologium Salisburiense," Londini 1526.

<sup>8</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 174.

<sup>9</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xvi.

<sup>10</sup> See p. 52.

<sup>11</sup> The "Menologic Genealogy," cap. xxxvi., and Selbach, are quoted as authorities.

<sup>12</sup> Archdall absurdly makes our saint the son of this Alild. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 301.

<sup>13</sup> See Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., p. 404. Duffy's edition.

<sup>14</sup> Called St. Finan of Druim Abhradh, the son of Garuan, son to Amalgad, son of Ennius, son to Alild, son of Corc, son to Lugad, son of Alild Flanbegg, son to Fiach means literally "a Leper," yet, it has been used, by the Irish, to denominate a person, suffering from a chronic infirmity of body, especially of any ulcerous or scrofulous kind.<sup>15</sup> From our saint's infancy, Divine Grace seemed to surround him, and even to have been communicated to that place, in which he was born; for, its inhabitants bore witness, that no animals went into it, nor appeared there. In the Bollandists' Acts, it is stated, in one passage, that Finian went to the place of his nativity, which is designated Sord, or Swords; and, the territory around this spot is called Ard-Ceannachte, by Adamnan,<sup>16</sup> owing to the circumstance of Tadhgy or Thadeus—the reputed great-grandfather of our saint—having defeated the Ultonians in the battle of Crinna,<sup>17</sup> and having received for his services a grant of that part of Bregia, extending from Glasnera, near Druim-Inesclann or Dromiskien,<sup>18</sup> on the north, to Cnoc Maoildoid, by the River Liffey, on the south. His father being called Cian, and his descendants having occupied this territory, it was called the Cantred of Cianacht.<sup>19</sup>

In the Acts of our saint, as published by the Bollandists, it is stated, that Finian had been a disciple to St. Columkille, that great Apostle of the Picts. But, Dr. Lanigan conjectures, that our saint had only been educated in some house of the Columbian Order. We are told, indeed, that St. Columba,<sup>20</sup> having built Swords Monastery,<sup>21</sup> placed, it has been said, Finian over it as abbot.<sup>22</sup> But, according to Dr. Lanigan,<sup>23</sup> our saint, in all probability, was not born, until after St. Columkille's death. Hence, he adopts an opinion, that Swords Monastery had been founded by St. Finian himself, and not by St. Columba, who is said by O'Donnell to have erected it, before he left Ireland in 563.<sup>24</sup> Were it otherwise, Finian must have discharged abbatial duties before or during this year.<sup>25</sup> In opposition to this story, he contends, that it is sufficient to observe, St. Finian did not die, until between the years 674 and 693. However, such a date is not to be inferred from this saint's Acts; and, it evidently has reference to a different Finian.<sup>26</sup> The foundation of Swords most probably took place, as Dr. Lanigan supposes, after the death of Columba, to whose institution, however, it seems to have belonged.<sup>27</sup> It is Muilleathan, according to the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. xxxiv.

<sup>15</sup> In the Irish Martyrologies, we read of different saints, who had the cognomen Lobhar.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. ii., cap. 4, p. 110.

<sup>17</sup> This was fought A.D. 226, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., and n. (h), pp. 110 to 112. Now, according to this account, Tadhgy must have been more remote in relation to our saint, than he is represented to have been in the Genealogies.

<sup>18</sup> This parish, in the barony of Louth, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Louth," Sheets 11, 12, 15. The town and townland are on Sheets 12, 15.

<sup>19</sup> In Irish, ṭmocha ceo Cianaḡta.

<sup>20</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>21</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," p. 279.

<sup>22</sup> "The church of Swords was, itself, dedicated to St. Colomb; there were, besides, within the town, two chapels; one dedicated to St. Finian, which, with its adjoining cemetery, was situated on the south side near to the Vicar's manse, on the road to Furrows; St. Bridget's chapel was on the north side of the town adjoining to the prebendaries' glebe and not far from the gates of the old palace; near to it was an ancient cross, called 'Pardon Crosse;' this last chapel was waste in the time of Alan; the ground whereon they stood, now forms part of the oconomy lands of this parish."—Mason's "History and Antiquities of the Collegiate and Cathedral Church of St. Patrick," book i., chap. x., sect. 11, p. 49.

<sup>23</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. x., p. 132.

<sup>24</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Vita S. Columbæ, lib. i., cap. lxviii., p. 400.

<sup>25</sup> O'Donnell states, that Columba, having built a church at Swords, consigned it to the care of St. Finian, surnamed the Leper. See ibid.

<sup>26</sup> That Finian, son of Garuan, mentioned by Dr. Geoffrey Keating.

<sup>27</sup> "Ware does not make mention of it; yet Harris does, erroneously ascribing it to St. Columba. Archdall has bungled his account of it in a most shameful manner. He says, that it was founded, in 512 by Co-thought, this monastery must have been founded, at some time, in the seventh century. Notwithstanding, Dr. Lanigan's opinion, although apparently plausible, is founded on the assumption, that the death of our saint should be referred to the close of that age.

When grown to be a boy, Finian was educated by a senior, named Brendan, to whom he had been brought. By him, the child was instructed in the Christian doctrine, and in a knowledge of literature. Having received his course of training, with the master's permission, Finian set out for the south of Ireland, to which part his mother belonged. There, he found the bishop, called Fathlad, who honourably received him, and finding that Finian was remarkable for his sanctity and gravity of demeanour, it was deemed right to promote our saint to Holy Orders. We are even told, he attained to the episcopal rank. He was consecrated by Bishop Fathlad, and soon his virtues and miracles rendered him very renowned. He had frequent angelic visions, and colloquies with the heavenly messenger, so that he was thus consoled and comforted. One day, St. Finian heard certain Angels singing, "These are they who are come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb,"<sup>28</sup> when he conceived a great desire for the martyr's crown. A certain woman came to him, and brought with her a small boy, who was blind, mute, and a leper, from the time of his birth. For this afflicted creature, Finian prayed to the Almighty, but received for answer, that he must bear the leprosy himself, if he willed the child to be healed. Finian cheerfully accepted that condition, when, like holy Job, he was covered with ulcers from the sole of his foot even to the top of his head.<sup>29</sup> At the same time, the boy was healed, and the saint bore his infirmity, not only with patience, but even with joy.

A woman came to him, and brought a boy, at the point of death; but, our saint prayed, and health was restored to the patient. Next we are informed, that Finian sat reading one day by the margin of a lake, into which his book fell, by an accident, and it sank to the bottom. The water was so deep, no one could recover it; however, after an hour's immersion, it came to the surface, in the presence of many persons there assembled. What was even more wonderful, on being restored to the saint, it seemed to have undergone no damage. There he built a basilica,<sup>30</sup> and he established a cemetery, where miracles were wrought, in favour of some sick persons, during his life, and even at the time his Acts were written. If any person slept in the church, even although its doors were closed, he was found without the building, and on the banks of the lake; because Finian had founded God's house for prayer, and not for sleeping. We are not told, in the old Acts of our saint, where this church and lake were to be found. However, it seems to have lumba. Yet this may have been an error of the press, although not marked in his table of errata. For, elsewhere he lays down, that that Columba was born in 521. But what are we to think of his statement, that Finian died before 563, and his referring to three different pages of the Tr. Th., in none of which does any such thing occur? In one of those pages (p. 509) Colgan says, that the monastery was founded prior to the year 563, but has nothing there about the time, in which Finian died. Archdall then adds, that others extend Finian's years to 593, or 597, and refers to his Acts. Now in the very page referred to, neither of these dates is mentioned; but, it is expressly stated, that Finian died between 674 and 693,"—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," by Rev. Dr. Lanigan, vol. ii., chap. xi., sect. x., p. 132.

<sup>28</sup> See Apocalypse, vii. 14.

<sup>29</sup> See Job. ii. 7.

<sup>30</sup> This name is supposed, by Ducange, to have been at first applied to the house of a king—Basileus in Greek. Afterwards, it was applied to the sacred edifice, in which worship and sacrifices were offered to God, the King of all. See "Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis," tomus i., sub voce, Basilica, p. 611. In illustration, among other authorities, the writer refers to Canones Hibern., lib. 42, cap. 26.

been in the south of Ireland, and it may have been that monastery, said to have been built by St. Finian, on Inisfaithlen<sup>32</sup>—now usually written Innisfallen<sup>32</sup>—a most romantically-situated island<sup>33</sup> in the Lower Lake of Killarney. Several Irish writers ascribe its foundation to the sixth century,<sup>34</sup> assuming that the founder had been the disciple of St. Columkille. The beautiful old oratory, with its Irish rounded door-head, and chevron mouldings, may even date back to that period.<sup>35</sup> It is situated on the extreme eastern point of this island, said, by the English traveller, Arthur Young, to be the most beautiful in the king's dominions, and perhaps in Europe, and having every variety, that range of beauty, unmixed with the sublime, can give.<sup>36</sup> Yet, assuredly, the surroundings of broad lake and wild mountain scenery impart sublimity to it, and even in a high degree. We have already seen, at the <sup>32</sup> In the "Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland," by W. H. Bartlett, there is a beautiful illustration of Innisfallen, Lake of Killarney, in vol. ii., p. 21, and, on a smaller scale, there is a nearly similar view, in Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland; its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. i., p. 241.

Innisfallen, Lower Lake, Killarney.

<sup>33</sup> The accompanying illustration of this island and of its surrounding and distant scenery is from a photograph, by Frederick H. Mares, drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>34</sup> Isaac Weld thus happily alludes to it, in his valuable pictorial and descriptive book: "Fancy at least is willing to indulge in the idea, and fondly recalls the time, when this little island was the abode of piety and learning. Here the venerable fathers are seen meditating in their cells; here straying through the lofty groves in deep conversation with their pupils; here at the solemn, silent close of day, seated on one of those rocks which eyes have not altered, contemplating the varied beauties of nature; and from the splendour of the departing sun drawing inferences of the glories of that celestial paradise, towards which their enthusiastic hopes unceasingly aspired."—"Illustrations of the Scenery of Killarney and the surrounding country," sect. ii., p. 90.

<sup>35</sup> Among these may be mentioned Sir James Ware, and his editor Harris, Rev. Mervyn Archdall, Charles Smith, &c.

<sup>36</sup> Its desecration seems to have been permitted, during a part of the last century, when the noble proprietor converted the chapel, standing at some distance from the abbey, into a banqueting house for the reception of visitors to the romantic scenes of Killarney. See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 303.

previous day, that Colgan has confounded this island with Inisfaithlen, or Ireland's Eye,<sup>37</sup> and he has thus led some readers astray.<sup>38</sup> How long St. Finian dwelt in his island retreat of Inisfallen—if this were his home—we are unable to determine. Few visitors to Killarney sail over its enchantingly beautiful lakes, without landing here. Very sweet is the air of perfect peace, and the soft sylvan solitude, which pervade this island of the lower lake. It is just large enough to wander about, on a balmy summer day, too small for the possibility of fatigue. The island itself is covered with a grove of venerable ash trees, which have great size and surpassing beauty. But the lion, in the way of trees, is a gigantic holly, whose trunk is sixteen feet in circumference, and which all travellers are taken to see. This holly looks, as if it had been growing since the beginning of time.<sup>39</sup> Never, perhaps, was there a fitter spot for lonely study or poetic musing—so fair a scene that one would think only gentle fancies should there come to the dreamer.<sup>40</sup> Indeed, the "poet of all circles" has immortalized its lovely features of scenery, investing them with traits of fancy and sentiment, such as he could alone draw, from the spring of his incomparable imagination;<sup>41</sup> nor has he been the only person of refined taste and feeling, who revelled in thought on the inspirations this lovely spot must ever excite, in the minds of poets, artists and antiquaries.<sup>42</sup> Not far removed, from the ancient oratory of St. Finian,<sup>43</sup> are the crumbling and ivy-crowned walls of a more modern religious establishment, in the midst of venerable trees that tower high above them.<sup>44</sup> Pictorial and descriptive

<sup>36</sup> See "Tour in Ireland," p. 295.

<sup>37</sup> In referring to Dichull, son of Nessan. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Januarii xvi. Vita S. Fursai Confessoris, &c., n. 6, p. 92.

<sup>38</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 301.

<sup>39</sup> Near the centre of the island stands a large ash tree, a deep space under the trunk of which is popularly known as "The Friar's Grave;" another curious tree is shown, called "The Needle," also a yew tree, distinguished by the name, "Bed of Honour."

<sup>40</sup> See an article in "Belgravia," by the editor, Miss Baddon, on the occasion of her tour in Ireland.

<sup>41</sup> In the "Irish Melodies" is found "Sweet Innisfallen," sung to a beautifully plaintive air:—

"Sweet Innisfallen, fare thee well,
May calm and sunshine long be thine!
How fair thou art let others tell,—
To feel how fair shall long be mine.

"Sweet Innisfallen, long shall dwell
In memory's dream that sunny smile,
Which o'er thee on that evening fell,
When first I saw thy fairy isle.

"'Twas light indeed, too blest for one
Who had to turn to paths of care—
Through crowded haunts again to run,
And leave thee bright and silent there;

"No more unto thy shores to come
But, on the world's rude ocean tost,

Dream of thee sometimes, as a home
Of sunshine he had seen and lost.

"Far better in thy weeping hours
To part from thee, as I do now,
When mist is o'er thy blooming bowers,
Like sorrow's veil on beauty's brow.

"For, though unrivall'd still thy grace,
Thou dost not look, as then, too blest,
But, thus in shadow, seem'st a place
Where erring man might hope to rest—

"Might hope to rest, and find in thee
A gloom like Eden's, on the day,
He left its shade, when every tree,
Like thine, hung weeping o'er his way.

"Weeping or smiling, lovely isle!
And all the lovelier for thy tears—
For though but rare thy sunny smile,
'Tis heav'n's own glance when it appears.

"Like feeling hearts, whose joys are few,
But, when indeed they come, divine—
The brightest light the sun e'er threw
Is lifeless to one gleam of thine!"

<sup>42</sup> We speak from the experience of three distinct visits to this island, and with intervals of years between each visit, for a knowledge of names, then fresh in the memory of our guides.

<sup>43</sup> From a photograph of this beautiful little oratory, taken by Frederick H. Mares, the accompanying illustration, drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, has been engraved by George A. Hanlon.

illustrations of Innisfallen are numerous enough, in the many useful Guide Books,<sup>45</sup> that have been written for visitors to the Lakes of Killarney; and, yet, it were to be desired, that historic detail and accuracy were better attended to by many of the writers.<sup>46</sup> Several of the Killarney stories and legends have been rendered into verse<sup>47</sup> and prose.<sup>48</sup> In this Island of Inis-fallen, the celebrated Annals, so designated, are said to have been compiled.<sup>49</sup> During the middle ages, and after the English invasion, the monastery there established had its historical life, until the period of its dissolution, in the thirty-seventh year of Queen Elizabeth's reign.<sup>50</sup> Some very legendary accounts,

Innisfallen Oratory, County of Kerry.

<sup>44</sup> In a lately-published volume, intituled, "The Fall of Rora, the Search after Prosperpine, and other Poems, meditative and lyrical," by Aubrey de Vere, we find the following allusion, in Sonnet VIII., to these objects:—

"Hard by were groves of ash through which we spied
The ruined convent with its weather-stains,
From whose calm bosom passed of old the strains
This Eden of blue lakes that sanctified."

—"The Island of Innisfallen," p. 275.

<sup>45</sup> Besides the very complete description, in Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland: its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. i., pp. 178 to 274, these accomplished writers have prepared a separate Guide Book, elegantly illustrated.

<sup>46</sup> In this respect, Mr. John Windale's "Hand Book to Killarney, through Bantry, Glengariff and Kenmare," is one of the happy exceptions, among Irish Guide Books.

<sup>47</sup> Among such compositions may be noted, "Lays of Killarney Lakes, Descriptive Sonnets, and Occasional Poems," by Thomas Galway, A.M.

<sup>48</sup> A very amusing book, and graphically written, will be found in "Killarney Legends," edited by T. Crofton Croker, Esq.

<sup>49</sup> Besides those published, with prenotations, and additions, in Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus ii., pp. 1 to 122, from the Bodleian copy, and from the Dublin copy, pp. 2 to 83 following, there is a folio paper Manuscript, in Edward O'Reilly's collection, now belonging to the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin. It is numbered 5, 6. Again, the folio paper MSS., No. 4, 5, in the R.I.A., is an English translation of the Annals of Innisfallen, by one O'Gorman.

<sup>50</sup> Then, "the possessions of this abbey were granted to Captain Robert Collann."—Charles Smith's "History of the County of Kerry," chap. vi., pp. 127, 128.

regarding Finian, while he dwelt beside the lake,<sup>51</sup> are related in his Acts; <sup>52</sup> but, these are hardly worthy of insertion, in the present account of our saint.

CHAPTER II.

ST. FINIAN LEAVES THE MONASTERY BY THE LAKE, AND GOES ELSEWHERE—HE VISITS SWORDS, AND THERE RECEIVES CHARGE OF ITS MONASTERY FROM ST. COLUMKILLE—MIRACLES RECORDED—HIS DEATH—HIS MEMORIALS, AND PLACES SAID TO HAVE BEEN UNDER HIS PATRONAGE—CONCLUSION.

IN our saint's published Acts, it is stated, that some differences arose, where he dwelt, regarding the erection of a mill; and, then it is related, that Finian departed from the lake habitation, he had at first selected, and went to a place, called Olnaimar.<sup>1</sup> In thus printing it, we suspect some error, probably attributable to the original writer himself; and to us, it seems likely, that Cluain-mor, or Clonmore, was intended, since there, it is thought, St. Finian closed the latest years of his life. However, he lived in the former place, and suffered greatly from his infirmity.<sup>2</sup> It seems, that a penitent desired to share this suffering with him, and he even asked, to become a leper, so that with an afflicted body, his soul might be assured of salvation. However, Finian sought to dissuade him from such a purpose, by telling him, he could not endure the pain. The penitent next prayed to God, that his request might be granted, and immediately his whole frame was seized with an intolerable itching and agony, caused by leprosy. He soon repaired to St. Finian, and besought him, that it might be removed. Our saint sent him to some water that was near, in which he washed, as directed, and again the man was restored to his former sound state. Next have we an account, regarding a neighbouring king, to whom the clerics of that church owed an annual entertainment, and they requested Finian to intercede for them, that such an expense might be removed. He sent a maid servant, to represent this desire to the king. At first, the ruler was inexorable, but St. Finian having threatened the Divine displeasure, a wonderful miracle was wrought, which convinced the king of his error, and which caused him to fall on his knees, to ask pardon from the holy man.

Afterwards, as we are told, wishing to visit his own country, he came to a place, named Sord, where he found St. Columba. Finian expressed the desire he had to visit Rome, when Columba said, "You shall not go, but

<sup>51</sup> The traditions of Killarney people assign our saint to their enchanting region, and especially to Innisfallen:—

"Thither led by voice divine
St. Finian ceased his quest,
And reared to God a votive shrine,
To man a place of rest."

—Thomas Galway's "Lays of Killarney Lakes," &c. Innisfallen, p. 68.

<sup>52</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Vita Auctore Anonymo Anglo ex nostro MS. Hiberniensi, pp. 445, 446.

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists attribute this spelling, to the ignorance of the English writer, not accustomed to a proper pronunciation of Irish words. They imagine, that the place in question may really be called Inismore, or "the great Island," and that it possibly corresponded with one so named, in the Life of St. Senan, at the 8th of March. They add: "Inis-mor enim, Insula major est, quod Anglicana paullo antiquiori dialecto Holma-mar dicebatur." rather shall you remain here." Then replied the man of God, "I have vowed to do so, and I cannot fail to fulfil my vow." Desiring Finian to place his head on the knees of Columba, the former slept awhile, and afterwards awaking, he was asked by the latter what he had seen. Finian related, how he had been to Rome, and how he had visited all its holy places. Then said Columba, "Just now, you shall remain here, and you shall not go to Rome." Then, St. Columba, taking his own departure therefrom, gave that place, and all its immediate bounds, to Finian. There, too, our saint healed the sick, and exercised the duties of hospitality; he gave no rest to his limbs, but for a fourth part of the night, he sat in cold water, to sing his psalms. The other three parts of it, he lay on the cold ground, having four stones around him, and on these in regular succession his head was reclined, whenever he wished to have a little sleep. Such was the rigorous life our saint led, and for his asceticism he was renowned.

<sup>2</sup> His Acts state: "Scaturiebat totum corpus ejus vermibus ob magnitudinem lepræ, fluebantque vermes de corpore ejus ad aquam quandam quæ prope erat, et iterum revertebantur: vocatur etiam hodie via, per quam ibant, Via vermium. Accidit autem ut nocte quadam vigilantibus sociis, Sanctus acriter ingemiseret, interrogatusque a sociis quid hoc esset, Unus, inquit, de civibus meis deest, et ideo non possum somnare."

<sup>3</sup> The legend writer remarks, that a great

The legendary Acts relate, that one night, while he wrote, a certain rustic looked into the place of his retirement, and saw that light was given the saint, from the fingers of his left hand. This curiosity displeased the holy man, and on that instant, the rustic lost the sight of one eye, and a similar punishment fell upon his posterity, as was believed in a prevailing popular tradition.<sup>3</sup> While here, too, St. Finian frequently passed to a certain island,<sup>4</sup> and visited brothers<sup>5</sup> who were there. During one of those voyages, an immense whale threatened his destruction; yet, making a sign of the cross, the man of God put this huge monster to flight. Again, a great number of mice overran the island, but our saint prayed, and afterwards, not even a mouse appeared. Once when he arrived, the brothers had not a single fish taken; notwithstanding, Finian ordered them to let down their nets, and immediately thirty salmon were secured. One of the brothers, going round the island somewhat incautiously, fell from a great precipice, and he was instantly killed. His other brothers came in great grief to Finian, and bewailing his death; the man of God prayed, when, at once, he was restored to life. At length, it was intimated to him, that his sojourn on the island was not agreeable to the brethren; and, then, he proceeded to disembark, but the winds were unfavourable. However, he raised the sails, and buffeting against the breeze, he touched at a wished-for port. When he arrived at Swords, the doors were all closed; yet, without the knowledge of any among the inmates, those were miraculously unlocked. While there, he blessed a tree, and caused it to bear sweet fruit, although previously this was bitter. Other miracles he wrought, in favour of the poor, of lepers, of the mute, deaf, and cripples. One Sunday, wine was wanting for the Holy Sacrifice; water was brought to him, and he miraculously changed it into wine. Frequently, while he celebrated Mass, all who assisted saw a globe of fire over his head. A certain man, being obliged to set out on a warlike expedition, came to the saint, to ask his prayers, and to receive his blessing. In the course of that war, he fell among the slain, and kindred coming to search for his corpse, they called his name aloud, when the man arose to life, through the merits of St. Finian. A rustic, whose son died, bore the body to the holy man, and vowed in tears he would not leave, until the youth was revived. Finian replied, "God is merciful, number of the people there—he seems to speak of Swords—were born blind, or, otherwise, with deformed limbs. This serves as a clue to indicate, that the writer must have passed some time, at Swords, for he remarks, that he had seen what he thus records.

<sup>4</sup> It may be, this was Inis-Mac-Nessain, or Ireland's Eye, which is not far from Swords. We may ask, too, could it be the Innisfaithlen of his early home?

<sup>5</sup> These may have been the sons of Nesson, whose Acts have been already given, at the 15th of this month; or, the word "fratres" may be predicated for monks simply.

he will bring your son to life," and so it immediately happened. Certain guests arrived at his monastery, in the winter season, when a vessel to warm water had been wanting. Finian prayed, and a patella<sup>6</sup> descended from Heaven, which for a long time was to be seen at that place. A quarrel arose between two persons; one of these fled to seek the protection of St. Finian; while the other pursued, with an intent to do his opponent some grievous injury. Refusing to accept the proffered mediation of our saint, the man obdurate of heart became blind on the instant, and his adversary escaped. Among the other miracles, related in his Acts, it is mentioned, that once coming from the island, to which allusion has been made, and at the Paschal season, Finian left his Missal behind; but, the next morning on arising, he felt sorrowful. Nevertheless, when he entered the church, there was found that Missal, restored to him, by the hands of Angels. Finian extinguished a fire, which broke out in the monastery, by making a sign of the cross. He restored an insane woman, to the use of her reason; he caused a barren tree, by his blessing, to bear fruit; he restored to life, by his prayers, a disciple, called Bœcan,<sup>7</sup> who had been drowned. This was a subject of great admiration to many. Then, without any mention, as to the place of his death, yet leaving it to be inferred from the context, it must have been at Swords; the writer of his Acts states, that after performing the foregoing, and many other miracles, Finian slept in peace, and frequent miracles continued to be wrought through his relics,<sup>8</sup> or before his tomb.<sup>9</sup>

Now according to some other accounts, St. Finian presided over Clonmore Monastery,<sup>10</sup> which was founded by St. Maidoc,<sup>11</sup> son of Ainmire, first Bishop of Ferns, and which was called after him. But, it has been supposed, that when Finian came to this place, another St. Maidoc, the son of Setna, had succeeded there. This latter holy man died, A.D. 656, and so it is thought to be not unlikely, that Finian spent some six years under his spiritual jurisdiction. Now, if Finian presided there at all, it had been—so state some—subsequently to this date. It is said, indeed, that he passed the last thirty years of his life at Cluain-mor-Mædoc, and, according to conjectural accounts, his last end came, about A.D. 680.<sup>12</sup> Taking these matters into consideration, it is no wonder, that his Patron, St. Mædoc,<sup>13</sup> should have appeared, as the legend states, to his subordinate at Clonmore, when about to announce the approaching dissolution of Christ's happy servant.

On the eve of St. Maidoc's feast,<sup>14</sup> Finian saw in a vision a chariot descending from Heaven, towards the city of Ferns, in which was placed a venerable old man, with a clerical habit, having a very beautiful countenance, and a virgin, covered with a cloak. Finian asked who they were, when the old man answered, "This is the most holy virgin Brigid, the Patroness of Ireland,<sup>15</sup> and, I am Maidoc, the servant of Christ. On to-morrow, my

<sup>6</sup> This was a sort of flat dish or pan.

<sup>7</sup> The Bollandists think, that this is a mistake of spelling, and that the name should rather be written, Boitan, or Baitan, which was one more common among the Irish.

<sup>8</sup> The text has it, "apud cujus reliquias crebra fieri miracula non desinunt," &c.

<sup>9</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Vita Auctore Anonymo Anglo ex nostro MS. Hiberniensi, with notes, pp. 446, 447.

<sup>10</sup> In the present county of Carlow.

<sup>11</sup> It is thought, he was venerated, on the 11th of April.

<sup>12</sup> Following Colgan's inferences, many, if not most, among our modern historians, arrive at this conclusion.

<sup>13</sup> In a communication to me, and directed, Dublin, Patrick-street, September 27th, 1876, supposing that St. Finian the Leper must have lived to a late period, in the seventh century, Mr. John M'Call deems this holy man to have been the second Maidoc of Clonmore.

<sup>14</sup> The festival of St. Maidoc, Bishop of Ferns, occurs on the 31st of January, at which day may be found the record of his Life.

<sup>15</sup> Her feast is held, on the 1st of February, and, at that date, her Life may be seen, festival shall be celebrated, and on the following day, the feast of this most holy virgin; and, now have we come, that we may bless our places, and those, who by their gifts and oblations, honour the days of our departure. But, be you joyful and prepared, for, on the next day, you shall ascend to Heaven." Arising in ecstasy, Finian ascended his chariot, and then went to Kildare, the city of Brigid, relating his vision to all. As had been predicted regarding him, on the third day after this vision, he obtained relief from his infirmity, having been translated to the felicity of Heaven.

From this relation—which does not occur in St. Finian's proper Acts—but, given by the author of St. Maidoc's Life, it would appear, if he were the person designated, that our saint departed, either on the 1st or 2nd day of February—most likely on the latter. Hence, one or other day should represent his Natalis. However, all our Martyrologies, as well native as foreign, place his festival, at the 16th day of March. This, as some think, commemorated a Translation of his relics; but, there are no strong grounds, for not deeming it to be the actual day of his demise.

According to Dr. Jeffery Keating,<sup>16</sup> in the reign of Finnacta, Monarch of Ireland,<sup>17</sup> died Colman,<sup>18</sup> the pious Bishop of Inis Bo Finne; and, about the same time, Fionnan, who pronounced his benediction over Ardfionan, left the world. This latter, however, may have been a person, altogether different from St. Finian the Leper. Some writers are of opinion, that the death of St. Finian the Leper occurred at Ardfinnian. That our saint probably died at Swords, is Dr. Lanigan's<sup>19</sup> contention; but, holding to a theory, that Finian lived in the seventh century, he assumes, that doubts may be cast on the genuineness of a composition, ascribed to St. Moling,<sup>20</sup> and, which states, that St. Finian died, and was buried, at Clonmore, incorrectly supposed to have been in the county of Wexford. Were that Poem really the composition of St. Moling, Dr. Lanigan allows, there should be no question, regarding his death and burial, at the latter place; for, had he died either at Swords, or at Ardfinnian, the monks would hardly consent to allow his entire body to be removed to Clonmore. But, he questions the attributed authorship of this poem, which he is inclined to refer rather to some monk of Clonmore, who lived at a later period. He supposes, that Onchuo,<sup>21</sup> appearing to have been later than Finian, or Moling, and who therefore could not have been mentioned in a poem, written by the latter, had a portion of the relics belonging to St. Finian the Leper in his collection, and that these might have been deposited in Clonmore church.<sup>22</sup> Now, Colgan states,<sup>23</sup> that our saint was buried, neither at

<sup>16</sup> See Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., p. 404.

<sup>17</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 282 to 297, we find Finachta Fleadhach accorded a reign of twenty years. Keating, however, only assigns him a reign of seven years, from A.D. 678 to 685.

<sup>18</sup> See his Life, at the 8th of August.

<sup>19</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. iii., p. 84, and nn. 33, 34, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>20</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of June.

<sup>21</sup> See this saint's Acts, at the 8th of February.

<sup>22</sup> Mr. M'Call remarks: "Dr. Lanigan, for what reason I cannot imagine, has endeavoured to throw a doubt over either St. Onchuo or his relics being buried at Clonmore, or even of St. Moling being the author of that little poem, attributed to him; but, whoever will take the trouble of reading over his train of reasoning must observe, he has entirely perverted the meaning of the above passages from Colgan, who distinctly states, that it was at the very period of St. Onchuo's death, and not several years afterwards, that the controversy occurred as to which of the monasteries he should be buried in; and that, according to his own dying injunctions, his remains were deposited with his numerous relics, in the cemetery of Clonmore, and in the same grave where St. Maidoc and St. Finan were buried."—"The Antiquities and History of Cluain-mor-Mædhoc," chap. iii., pp. 15, 16.

<sup>23</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Martii. De Sancto Finano cognomento Leproso, cap. viii., p. 628.

Swords, nor at Ardfinnian, as some suppose, but at Clonmore, and this is deemed, as being altogether the most probable statement, by those who follow his account. To prove this, Colgan cites a passage from a Poem, written in the Irish language, and which he attributes to St. Moling, Bishop of Ferns. Here, it is said, our saint was buried near the cross, and towards the southern part of the cemetery, with Saints Maidoc and Onchuo. The latter is thought to have flourished, three or four generations before Finan Lobhar,<sup>24</sup> and to have been born in the latter end of the fifth, or in the commencement of the sixth century.<sup>25</sup> Still, the exact year of St. Finian's death is not known; although very incorrect and even contradictory statements have been hazarded, in reference to the date.<sup>26</sup>

In Ireland, the feast of St. Finan or Finian, the Leper, Bishop and Confessor, was formerly celebrated with an Office, consisting of Nine Lessons.<sup>27</sup> In the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, "St. Finan, the luminous Leper," is commemorated, at the 16th of March. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>28</sup> registers him, at the 16th of March, as Finan (i Lobhar) Suidr. Marianus O'Gorman, and his Scholiast, at this date, place him at Swords, at Cluainmor, in Lagenia, and at Inisfallen, in Lough Lene. In addition to these places, the Calendar of Cashel adds, that he belonged to Ardfinain. Whitford, in the Martyrology <sup>24</sup> My attention has been called to this circumstance, by Mr. John M'Call, and, to other mistakes occurring, especially in the account of St. Oncho or Onchuo, at the 8th of February, in a letter, headed, Dublin, 25 Patrick-street, September 27th, 1876. In it, Mr. M'Call states, it is asserted, and with very positive proof, that Maidoc of Clonmore was really the first Bishop of Ferns, and he refers for authority to Rev. John F. Shearman's "Loca Patriciana." Being older than his uterine brother, Aid, son of Ainmire, King of Ireland, and who was born in 532, Maidoc's birth must have occurred about 530. Sometime in the latter half of the sixth century, he founded the monastery of Cluain-mor-Mædhoc, thus called after him. Before he became Bishop of Ferns, he was president over Clonmore, when the holy Onchuo came thither, after his pilgrimage, collecting the relics of all the Irish Saints. Through the instrumentality of Brandubh, King of Leinster, whose great friend he was, St. Maidoc of Clonmore was advanced to the bishopric of Ferns, towards the close of the sixth century. He died A.D. 624, and he was buried in his own monastery of Clonmore.

<sup>25</sup> As St. Onchuo, writes Mr. M'Call, was much advanced in years, at the time he concluded his pilgrimage and rested at Clonmore, he became very infirm, and in verification of St. Maidoc's prophecy, he died some time afterwards, and was buried in "the angelic cemetery of Clonmore." In that same grave, Maidoc, first Bishop of Ferns, and Finian Lobhar, were subsequently interred. Now, Maidoc, of the Connacians, not being born until about A.D. 570, it is impossible that he could have been the first Bishop of Ferns, according to Mr. M'Call, who thinks, he must have succeeded his namesake of Clonmore, as second president there, and as second Bishop of Ferns, A.D. 624. This accounts for his festival day, January 31st, having been observed, at Clonmore, so late as A.D. 1780; and, it also renders intelligible the closing scenes, in the life of the assumed St. Finian Lobhar, where on the eve of this feast, or January 30th, he saw in a vision at Clonmore that holy man, his patron, and Brigid, who came to warn him of his approaching end. Mr. M'Call states, that the greater part of the Acts of the second Maidoc of the 31st of January should more correctly be placed to the credit of his predecessor, the first Maidoc of Clonmore, whose feast has been assigned to the 11th of April. The two very distinct obits were a great mystification to writers; when St. Meadhog, Bishop of Ferns, is placed at the 31st of January, A.D. 624, in the "Annals of the Four Masters," and Maidoc the Second, born about 570, having died, A.D. 656, according to the "Chronicon Scotorum." We believe, that this whole subject still requires a considerable share of study, to clear away the obscurity, in which it now rests.

<sup>26</sup> Thus, Archdall, at Swords, has his death, A.D. 563, and at Clonmore, it is placed under A.D. 680. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 256, 734.

<sup>27</sup> This appears from Kalendars, in the Trinity College, Dublin, Manuscripts, classed, B. 3. 12. B. 3. 13. Again, in "The Book of Obits and Martyrology of the Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ Church, Dublin," in the Kalendar, at Kal. xvii. Aprilis, March 16, we find, "ix. lec." See p. 63.

<sup>28</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy is the entry, at this day, Finian, and over it the comment lobhar; then follows Suidr, while over it again is the gloss, t et mor.

of Salisbury, and the Carthusian Martyrology, commemorate him.<sup>29</sup> He is also entered, in the Martyrology of Christ's Church Cathedral, Dublin.<sup>30</sup> We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>31</sup> as having a festival celebrated on this day, Fionán, the Leper, of Sord, and of Cluainmór, in Leinster; and of Ard Fionán,<sup>32</sup> in Munster. This is likely to be the St. Finianus, mentioned at the 16th of March, in the anonymons list of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare. Henry Fitzsimon also commemorates him,<sup>33</sup> on the authority of the Carthusian Martyrology.<sup>34</sup> In the "Memorial of British Piety,"<sup>35</sup> and in the "Circle of the Seasons,"<sup>36</sup> he is commemorated, at the 16th of March.

This saint's festival seems to have been celebrated, even in Scotland. Thus, he had churches at Killinan, otherwise Kilfynan,<sup>37</sup> at Elan Finan,<sup>38</sup> at Mochrum,<sup>39</sup> at Abersnetheck, in Monymusk,<sup>40</sup> and at Migvie.<sup>41</sup> Here, too, a fair had been held,<sup>42</sup> under the name of St. Finzean's fair. There is a Finzean's fair, also, at Perth. The name of the church of Lumphanan, where Macbeth is believed to have been killed, is probably dedicated to St. Finian.<sup>43</sup> In the Dunkeld Litany, he is addressed as Finnanach.<sup>44</sup> St. Finian, was venerated, especially at four different places, in Ireland, viz., Swords, Ardfinnan, Inisfallen, and Clonmore, according to a generally received opinion. However, it does not appear so certain, that all of these, and other places named, must be regarded, as under his particular patronage; for, possibly, at some early period of our ecclesiastical history, popular tradition got into confusion, regarding him and some other Finian, who may have been more immediately connected with localities designated. It has been stated, that a house, established by our saint, stood at Ardfinnan,<sup>45</sup> which signifies, "the high place of Finian," within the baronies of Iffa and Offa West, in the South Riding of the county of Tipperary, and in the diocese of Lismore.<sup>46</sup> According to Dr. Jeffry Keating, a St. Finian blessed Ardfinnan, during the reign of Finachta Fleadhach, King of Ireland.<sup>47</sup> The town

<sup>29</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Martii, n. 14, p. 629.

<sup>30</sup> See "The Book of Obits and Martyrology of the Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ's Church, Dublin," edited by John Clarke Crosthwaite and Rev. James Henthorn Todd. Introduction, p. xliii., "xvii. Kal. April (March 16), S. Finani, episcopi et conf." This entry, however, is in a later hand, than by that of the original compiler.

<sup>31</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

<sup>32</sup> It received the present name, it is said, from this saint. Prior to his time it was called Druim Abhradh, in the Irish Annals. See "The Illustrated Dublin Journal," vol. i., No. 6, p. 89.

<sup>33</sup> He also quotes Hector, lib. 9, fol. 177.
<sup>34</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 54.

<sup>35</sup> See p. 52.

<sup>36</sup> At p. 76.

<sup>37</sup> It is called S. Finani Ecclesia, in the Registrum de Passelet, pp. 113, 131, 139.

<sup>38</sup> There his fair was held, next to St. Patrick's Day. See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. ii., p. 198.

<sup>39</sup> See "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Wigton, p. 61.

<sup>40</sup> See "View of the Diocese of Aberdeen," p. 585.

<sup>41</sup> See ibid., p. 632. Agnes, Countess of Mar, granted the Ecclesia S. Finani de Miggeveith, to the Prior and Canons of St. Andrews. See "Registrum Prioratus S. Andree," p. 249.

<sup>42</sup> In the beginning of the last century, at the Kirk of Migvie. It "was kept whiles in March, and whiles in April, on the Tuesday before Midlenton fair at Banchrie."—"Antiquities of Aberdeen and Banff," vol. ii., p. xlv. Aberdeen's New Prognostication for the year 1703 is quoted.

<sup>43</sup> Although in the "View of the Diocese of Aberdeen," p. 635, it is stated to have been dedicated to St. Vincent, whose day is January 22nd.

<sup>44</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 347.

<sup>45</sup> This parish is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 82, 88. The town itself is on Sheet 88.

<sup>46</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 174.

<sup>47</sup> See Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," Book ii., p. 404, Duffy's edition.

of Lismore was constituted the Deanery of this diocese, in after time; and, the feast of its patron and founder was kept, we are told, on this day. It was a solemn festival, as tablets belonging to the church bear record. Besides the monastery of Innis-Faithlenn, which was the home of learned men until destroyed, the Cathedral Church of Aghadoe,<sup>48</sup> as we are told, was also dedicated to St. Finnian Lobhar.<sup>49</sup> He is considered to be the patron of South Kerry,<sup>50</sup> likewise; but, we are not quite assured—although present local traditions seem to confirm this opinion—that he was that chief patron there venerated. On June 1st, St. Finnan's Tower, Ship-street, Dublin, fell, and, by exertions of the parish Beadle (F. Durham), a number of lives were saved.<sup>51</sup> Most probably, that tower had been dedicated to the present saint.

The truly pious man feels a happiness under affliction, when patient and submissive to the decrees of Providence. Confidence in God, and love towards him, inspire the soul, and create a great peace within, even when the body is wasted with suffering and disease. Those gifts of mind and of grace are the great sources of fortitude. With manly courage and firmness should we bear our occasional crosses, since our Divine Redeemer showed us how to suffer, and to triumph over suffering.

ARTICLE II.—FESTIVAL OF ST. ABBAN, ABBOT OF MAGHARNADHE, SAID TO HAVE BEEN ADAMSTOWN, COUNTY OF WEXFORD. [Sixth or Seventh Century.] The "Feilire" of St. Ængus, and several Irish Kalendars, have this holy abbot's feast, at the present day. The name, Abban mac h. Cormaic, occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 16th of March. According to the O'Clerys, he descended from the race of Labhraidh Lorc, son of Ugainé Mór; and, again, they state, that Miolla, sister to Bishop Iobhar,<sup>2</sup> was his mother, as his own Life states, in the first chapter.<sup>3</sup> In that Table postfixed to the Martyrology of Donegal, this holy man is styled "Prægratus."<sup>4</sup> His Acts are thought to have been confounded, in some particulars, with the Life of another Abban.<sup>5</sup> As if seeking to connect him with the place, a later hand inserts within brackets, in the O'Clerys' copy of the Donegal Martyrology, that there is a Machaire Arnaidhe, in Oirghialla, in the diocese of Ardmacha, in the county of Muineachan or Monaghan. However, we find entered, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>6</sup> of Maguire, and of Donegal,<sup>7</sup> as being venerated on this day, Abbán, Mac Ua Corbmaic, of Magh Arnaidhe, in Ui Ceinnsealaigh, in Leinster; and, of Cill Abbain, in Ui Muiredhaigh, in Leinster. The present is supposed to have been his natal day on earth, by Colgan, who gives his Acts in full, with notes, and an Appendix, in five chapters.<sup>8</sup> The Bollandists have briefer notices, at the <sup>51</sup> See the Annals of Dublin, contained in Pettigrew and Oulton's "Almanac, Registry, and Directory for the year 1846." These Annals were compiled, by Owen Connellan, Esq.

<sup>48</sup> The extent of this parish, in the baronies of Dunkerron North and Magunihy, is given, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kerry," Sheets 50, 58, 59, 60, 65, 66, 67, 68, 74, 76.

<sup>49</sup> The interesting doorway of Aghadoe church is engraved and represented in Miss Cusack's "History of the Kingdom of Kerry," chap. iii., p. 51.

<sup>50</sup> See ibid.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at this day, we meet with the entry, Abban m. h. Cop.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the 23rd of April.

<sup>3</sup> The same statement occurs, in the Acts of this saint, as published by Colgan, at the present day, but in cap. iii.

<sup>4</sup> See pp. 354, 355, ibid.

<sup>5</sup> See a valuable paper, by Rev. John F. Shearman, C.C., Howth, and intitled, "Loca Patriciana," in the "Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland," Fourth Series," vol. ii., No. 14, pp. 339 to 352.

<sup>6</sup> Marianus enters, "Abbanus fil. Ua Corbmaic."

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

16th of March.<sup>9</sup> Yet, as the 27th of October is considered to have been our saint's natal day in Heaven, we have preferred it, as more suitable for taking into account various difficulties, that beset his biography, and these are not easily soluble, even after the most close and attentive study.

ARTICLE III.—FESTIVAL OF ST. EUGENIA, MARTYR, AT NICOMEDIA, IN BITHYNIA. In the "Feilire" of St. Ængus,<sup>1</sup> at the present day, we find a commemoration of St. Eugenia, who appears to have been one, among a band of holy martyrs, who suffered for the Faith, at Nicomedia, in Bithynia. This festival was probably taken from the ancient Martyrology, ascribed to St. Jerome, and supposed to be about twelve hundred years old. A more particular account of these martyrs will be found, in the Bollandist collection.<sup>2</sup> Eugenia alone is found entered, in some of the old Calendars;<sup>3</sup> and, again, her name seems to have been incorrectly rendered, into the masculine form of Eugenius. The period, when this martyrdom took place, seems not to have been recorded.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. FEITHMECH OR FELMAC, OF CILL-TOAMA, NOW KILTOOM, COUNTY OF WESTMEATH. The Bollandists very briefly notice this saint, at the present day, but they style him, incorrectly, Tetmechus Episcopus de Kill-tuama.<sup>1</sup> On the 16th of March, we read in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> the record, Esp. Felmac o Cill Cuanda (no Tuama). From the prefix, we must regard this saint, as having been a bishop. Yet, we find simply, Feithmech, of Cill-Toama, set down in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman<sup>3</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> as having been venerated on this day. Under the head of Cill Cuana, Duaid Mac Firbis enters Fethmech, Bishop of Cill Cuana, i.e., Fethmech, Bishop of Cill Tuama, or (Cill) Toama.<sup>5</sup> The former should now be written Kilquan, and the other Kiltuome. There are many places, in Ireland, bearing these names. The locality here indicated is thought to have been Kiltuom,<sup>6</sup> near Castlepollard,<sup>7</sup> county of Westmeath.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>8</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Martii. Vita S. Abbani Abbatis de Magharnuidhe. Ex MS. Membrano Codice Kilkenniensi, pp. 610 to 627.

<sup>9</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 418.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> The following Irish Rann, taken from the "Leabhar Breac" copy, and translated into English, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

E. æ. 1111. Inman áct laeoman
Eugenia for dooman
Abban doirp oir ainglech finan laimpech lobur.

Beloved by all but the Demon
Was Eugenia on earth,
Abban the angelic golden bush,
Finan the luminous leper.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xv. De Sanctis Martyribus Castorio seu Castore, Dionysio, Nonno, Sereno, Quiriaco, Milisa, Eugenia sive Eugenio, Juliano, Asclepiodoro, Pione, Nicomediæ, in Bithynia, p. 420.

<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists state: "At sola Eugenia refertur in MSS. Casinensi, Pragensi, Treurenensi S. Martini, Bruxellensi, S. Guldæ, Coloniensi Carmelitarum, Florario Sanctorum et Auctario Greueni ad Vsuardum. In Diario historico Joannis Schmidii dicitur in Hispania a Saracenis interfecta, de qua cum Hispanis agemus xxvi. Martii, unde facilis error potuisset irrepere in illum aut hunc xvi. Martii."—Ibid.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 416.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, we find entered, at this date, Epi feith mc o chll tuama.

<sup>3</sup> Marianus enters, "Fethmechus de Kill-Tuama."

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 78, 79.

<sup>5</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 94, 95.

<sup>6</sup> It is in the parish of Faughalstown, and barony of Fore. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 7.

<sup>7</sup> In the parish of Rathgarve, and barony of Fore. See ibid., Sheets 3, 7.

During the eighth and ninth centuries, certain abbots of this place are recorded, in the Annals of the Four Masters; and, yet, we have not been able to find the present saint's name among them.<sup>9</sup>

ARTICLE V.—ST. CURITAN, BISHOP AND ABBOT OF ROS-MEINN. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> have a short notice of this holy man, at the present date. On the 16th of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>2</sup> mentions a festival, in honour of Curitan, Bishop and Abbot of Rus mic Bairend. His place does not seem to have been identified. He is more fully described, elsewhere, for the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman<sup>3</sup> and of Donegal<sup>4</sup> register on this day, Curitan, Bishop, and Abbot, of Ros-Meinn. We are further informed, the Cáin Adamnáin states, that Curitan, the Bishop, was one of the saints, who went security to free the women [of Erin]<sup>5</sup> from that bondage, in which they had been hitherto detained. At this same date, and under the head of Ros Bairenn, Duaid Mac Fírbis enters, Cuiritan, or Ciriach, Bishop and Abbot, of Ros-Menn, or Ros-Bairenn.<sup>6</sup>

ARTICLE VI.—FESTIVAL OF A REPUTED ST. BAIRRFIONN, OR BARRINDUS, BISHOP. The festival of Bairrfionn, or Barrindus, Bishop, is registered in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman<sup>1</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> on this day. The Bollandists remark,<sup>3</sup> that where in the Martyrology of Tallagh Ros-macbarenn is read, at this the 16th of March, Marianus O'Gorman has Rosmean, and then apart, Barindi Ep., as if this were the name of a person to be venerated, on the same day.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. DENEG, OF INIS SEDNA. The record, Denach, Innse Detnac, appears in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 16th of March. It will be found somewhat difficult to identify the island, with which this saint was connected. We find entered, also, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman<sup>2</sup> and of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having a festival at this date, Degenius, or Deneg, of Inis Sedna.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. AEDHAN, BISHOP OF LISMORE, COUNTY OF WATERFORD. [Probably in the Eighth Century.] In high and in humble stations, religion does the best function. The noblest work of life is always the spiritual. The garden of the soul it should be our first and chiefest care to cultivate. From the holy and wise tending of it, great is the florescence of

<sup>8</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (h), p. 349.

<sup>9</sup> See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 580.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 416.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, at this date, will be found, Curitanus p̄ci ep̄i agur ab p̄uip m bairinn.

<sup>3</sup> Thus is he recorded in Marianus, "Curitanus Ep. et Abb. de Ros-meann."

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

<sup>5</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd here says, "The word Erinn is added by the later hand."

<sup>6</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish

Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 126, 127.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> In Marianus we read, "Barrindus Ep."

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 416.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan Martyrology, after the entry of seventeen foreign saints, at this date, we have the notice, De-nach in̄i ōetnac.

<sup>2</sup> Marianus enters, "Denegius de Inis Sedna."

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 78, 79.

beauty. So, from the first bright examples of virtue, in the consecrated places of Ireland, were found to proceed successors, anxious to cultivate the seed, which had been sown by our earliest saints. When St. Carthage<sup>1</sup> had established his religious foundation in Lismore, numerous were the votaries that sought his guidance, in the rule of monastic observance. The old abbey sites have there disappeared, and modern fine mansions rise on their traces, looking proudly and grandly over the Blackwater River.<sup>2</sup> Yet, the noblest associations of Lismore are with the days of its abbots and bishops. Their succession is to be found in our Annals. Among these, Marianus O'Gorman has Aidanus Ep. Lismorensis, and again, Aedhan, Bishop, of Lis-mór, occurs, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day. The same record seems to identify him, with an Aedhan of Lis-mor, who died A.D. 761, according to the Annals of the Four Masters,<sup>4</sup> or, perhaps, with Aedhan, Abbot of Lismore, whose death is assigned to A.D. 763.<sup>5</sup> It is probable, they were not different persons, but that the error of date arises from a double entry having been made, as found in distinct authorities. A festival, in honour of Lawdan, is set down, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>6</sup> at the 16th of March; however, as the Bollandists remark,<sup>7</sup> this seems to be an error of spelling, and it must have been intended for Aedhan.

Lismore Bridge and Castle, County of Waterford.

---

ARTICLE IX.—FEAST OF THE TRANSLATION OF THE SAINTS, AT BOBBIO MONASTERY, ITALY. From the Tablets of this monastery, as also in the

---

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See his Life, at the 14th of May.

<sup>2</sup> The finely-situated Castle of Lismore is a chief object of attraction here, owing to its extent and stately proportions. It stands on a high cliff, falling almost perpendicularly to the surface of the Blackwater. The view presented, in the text, is taken from a photograph, by Frederick H. Mares, and drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman. The engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 76, 77.

<sup>4</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 364, 365.

<sup>5</sup> See ibid., pp. 366, 367.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy is also found, Laudan.

Topographical Index for the Saints of Italy, Ferarius<sup>1</sup> notes such a festival, at the 16th of March. Especially is there a record of the Abbots, St. Attala,<sup>2</sup> and St. Bertulph.<sup>3</sup> As some of the early saints of this church were Irishmen, and as its celebrated founder St. Columbanus<sup>4</sup> was a native of our country, we deem it right to include the present, as a commemoration, in which we have a national interest. The Bollandists<sup>5</sup> notice it, at the present date.

---

ARTICLE X.—FEAST OF A REPUTED ST. ABBEN, HERMIT, OF ABINGDON, ENGLAND. In the Martyrology of Whitford,<sup>1</sup> there is the entry of S. Abbenus, Eremita, at this day. He is thought to have been venerated at Abingdon, in the county of Berks, England. This city is said to have been of importance, in the time of the Britons,<sup>2</sup> and to have derived its name from St. Abban, the Irish saint, commemorated at this date. The feast of St. Abben, Hermit, is referred by John Wilson,<sup>3</sup> to the 13th of May.<sup>4</sup> While noting the feast, at the 16th of March, the Bollandists<sup>5</sup> determine nothing, but promise a possible reversion to the subject, at the 27th of October.

---

ARTICLE XI.—SUPPOSED FEAST OF THE DEPOSITION OF ST. PATRICK, BISHOP AND CONFESSOR, AT AUVERGNE, FRANCE. A festival, bearing such a designation, is recorded by Usuard, Bellinus, Galesinius, and in the Roman Martyrology, at the 16th of March. Joannes Sauaro, a learned historian, has investigated this matter; but, he asserts, that among the bishops of Auvergne, there is no trace of the relics or cultus of a St. Patrick, Bishop. Baronius,<sup>1</sup> not finding him among the bishops of Auvergne, supposes his name had been left out, through some error, unless perhaps he were the bishop of some other city. However, it has been well conjectured, that the saint here named must have been St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland; the word Avernus or Arvernus, Arvernix or Avernix, having been substituted for Hibernis or Hibernix, and the word Depositionis having been substituted for Vigilia, by some of the Calendarists.<sup>2</sup> This seems all the more probable, since Usuard, on the following day, enters in the first place, "Natalis S. Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris in Scotia."<sup>3</sup> Therefore, we may dismiss, without any great attention, the idea, that any St. Patrick, distinct from the illustrious Irish Apostle, had

---

<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 416.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> In "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum."

<sup>2</sup> His feast is held, on the 10th of March.

<sup>3</sup> His festival occurs, on the 19th of August.

<sup>4</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 21st of November, where his Life will be found.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 417.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> The edition of 1526.

<sup>2</sup> See an account of it, in Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. i., pp. 5 to 7.

<sup>3</sup> In the edition of his Martyrology, printed A.D. 1640.

<sup>4</sup> See some notices, at this date.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints,

p. 418.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> In his notes to the Roman Martyrology, at the 16th of March, he says, "inter Episcopos Aruernenses non recenseatur." And again, it is thought "errore prætermisum, nisi alterius fortassis civitatis Episcopus fuerit."

<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists, who notice this matter, at the present date, have remarked, that Tamaius Salazarius, in his "Martyrologium Hispanicum" has for this Patrick substituted another denominated, "Patricium Episcopum Malacitanum in Betica," but without proper warrant. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 417. The Bollandists moreover add: "Verum hunc Malacitani non agnoscunt Sanctum, ut constat ex libro Martini de Roâ de Malacà urbe et ejus Sanctis."

<sup>3</sup> Such entry is found, likewise, in many other very ancient Martyrologies and Kalendars.

been commemorated, on the eve of his chief festival. It is highly probable, also, that the vigil of his principal feast had been marked by some national religious celebration, as a suitable preparatory rite, for the more effective solemnizing of the day, so lovingly remembered by the clergy and people of Ireland. It will prove a task of considerable difficulty, to indicate the many lives, panygerics or poems written, which refer immediately or mediately to our great saint. In more ancient times, allusions have been made to him, by some of the best-known authors, during the earlier or middle ages of Christianity. In more recent times, biographical compilations are still more numerous, and these shall be referred to, in the succeeding article.

---

Seventeenth Day of March.

---

ARTICLE I.—THE LIFE OF ST. PATRICK, APOSTLE AND CHIEF PATRON OF IRELAND.

[FOURTH AND FIFTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—THE GENUINE AND SPURIOUS WRITINGS ASCRIBED TO ST. PATRICK, AS SERVING TO ILLUSTRATE HIS BIOGRAPHY—ACTS AND LIVES OF ST. PATRICK YET EXTANT, IN VARIOUS COLLECTIONS AND MANUSCRIPTS—THE BIOGRAPHIES ALREADY PUBLISHED—OTHER SOURCES LEFT, FOR INVESTIGATING THE FACTS OF HIS HISTORY.

RESPONSIBILITY assumed by the biographer of so illustrious a personage, as the great Apostle of Ireland, is one of no ordinary delicacy, difficulty and importance. Numerous, indeed, are the Lives of this saint, which have been written; while, yet, the evidence that has been hitherto gleaned and preserved is bewildering and conflicting, for the patient and studious investigator of our history. The authentic facts of his life are few, as compared with the cloud of fable, which has served to obscure them. A just estimate of those almost superhuman labours and trials, our great patron surmounted, is hardly possible, at the present time, so imperfect are some of those records, which profess to reveal past events, and so ill-digested are many of the ancient tracts, that have special reference to St. Patrick. Modern criticism and research have done much, to clear the field of vision; still, it must be allowed, that a wide scope has been left for conjecture and speculative opinions, nor have writers been able wholly to reconcile or explain many divergencies of statement, which intrude too frequently in his Acts. However, we must try to examine and—if possible—to form some fair conception of those wonderful triumphs he achieved for Religion and Civilization, by accomplishing that holy enterprise, he had so cheerfully and zealously inaugurated. Through the mysterious designs of Providence, St. Patrick had been pre-ordained, as that humble servant of Christ, by whom the Irish people were to procure a joyous revelation. The Almighty had destined him, to bear glorious tidings of the Gospel to their shores, and to obtain their redemption, from Pagan ignorance and error. Those churches he built, those dioceses he formed, those monasteries he founded, and those places where he travelled or dwelt, have preserved his memory, among the Irish people, from his own time to all succeeding ages. The wonderful conversion of this Irish nation, its subsequent perseverance in the holy faith he so firmly planted, the missionary character its children assumed, their progress in sanctity and learning, with such zealous propagation of these blessings, at home and abroad, resulting from his labours, have justly impressed all with gratitude, love and veneration, for so great an Apostle. Not alone the universal traditions of our island, but those of all Christendom, proclaim the triumphs he achieved on earth, and the glory he has acquired in heaven. Mementoes of the past have preserved his memory fresh, undying, and vigorous, to the present day. They must perpetuate, even to the most remote generations, imperishable recollections of a man, who has rendered such inestimable services, to our nation and race. We shall endeavour, therefore, to investigate the facts, relating to his biography, with a caution and diligence the subject itself requires; but, before we advance farther, it will be necessary to state, for the satisfaction of our readers, those chief sources, whence we have drawn information, and the safest guides, we have principally followed, through our devious and impeded way.

The genuine writings of St. Patrick himself—provided they be sufficiently authenticated—are admittedly the most trustworthy materials, as they must be the most ancient and immediate documents available, for the compilation of his life. Various tracts have been attributed to him, as the writer; yet, all of these have not equal claims to such a distinction, and here criticism has been exercised, to separate the most authentic from several spurious compositions. It is remarkable, that all his assumed writings have been composed, in the Latin or Irish language. Aably-edited issues of these tracts have been published.<sup>1</sup> Among them, especially the one, intituled his Confessio, or “Confession,” should most engage our study and attention.<sup>2</sup> It has been greatly regarded and prized, by learned critics, holding very distinctive views and positions, in reference to matters of historic and religious belief. Many of the ancient authors of St. Patrick’s Life frequently cite this “Confession,” as his genuine work. The more modern writers, such as the Bollandists, Ware, Ussher, Colgan, Tillemont, Mabillon, Martene, O’Conor, Butler, Lanigan,<sup>3</sup> Todd and Reeves, seem equally to admit its genuineness,<sup>4</sup> as an important document. The most precious copies of this biographical Treatise<sup>5</sup> are said to be contained, chiefly in five very ancient manuscripts. The first of these, found in the Book of Armagh,<sup>6</sup> is thought to be more than one thousand ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> In the year 1656, Sir James Ware first collected and published at London, in 12mo, “Opuscula adscripta S. Patricio.” A still more valuable and critical edition of St. Patrick’s attributed works is that issued, at Dublin, in 8vo, A.D. 1835, by the learned Spanish refugee Priest, Joachim Lorenzo Villaneuva, and intituled, “Sancti Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula, et Scriptorum quæ supersunt, Fragmenta; Scholiis illustrata,” a Joachimo Laurentio Villanueva, Presbytero. It contains valuable Appendices, and it is altogether a most scholarly and critical production.

<sup>2</sup> See, report of a Lecture, “St. Patrick: his Life and Labours,” by Rev. J. Scott Porter, in the Northern Whig, of February the 11th, 1860.

<sup>3</sup> Besides the Bollandists’, Colgan’s, Ussher’s and Ware’s learned investigations, Dr. Lanigan’s authority has been very much followed, in the present Life of St. Patrick. To our Apostle’s biography, he seems to have devoted the most unremitting care and study. His criticisms, too, are beyond all praise, for their originality and deep thought.

<sup>4</sup> The texts of Scripture, quoted in this Tract, are taken from the Septuagint, and not from St. Jerome’s version. This is a good proof of its great antiquity.

<sup>5</sup> This Tract has been translated, with notes, by Rev. Thomas Olden, Dublin, A.D. 1853, 12mo.

<sup>6</sup> It is supposed, by Dr. Graves, Protestant Bishop of Limerick, to have been written by the Scribe Ferdomnach, in the year 807, during the reign of Tobach, Archbishop of Armagh, who died on the 16th of July, A.D. 808, according to the Catalogue, contained in the Psalter of Cashel. This was discovered, from an inscription in the Codex, almost obliterated, until ingeniously years old ;<sup>7</sup> it is preserved, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin. The second was formerly in St. Vedast's Monastery,<sup>8</sup> at Noailles, near Beauvais, in France.<sup>9</sup> The third is preserved, in the Cottonian Library<sup>10</sup> of the British Museum, London. Two other copies are kept, in the Library of Salisbury,<sup>11</sup> in England. In addition to these, there are two copies,<sup>12</sup> contained in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford.<sup>13</sup> St. Patrick's "Confession" was published by restored by Dr. Graves, who used for the purpose a weak solution of Gallic acid, in spirits of wine. The Book of Armagh, as the Codex has been styled, commences with a short Life of St. Patrick, taken from the Tripartite ; then follows the "Confession ;" then the New Testament, the Gospels being found in the usual order, while the Acts of the Apostles follow the Apocalypse ; the Life of St. Martin of Tours, St. Patrick's relative, is to be found, near the end. It was believed, for a long time, that St. Patrick himself had been the writer of this volume ; and, accordingly, it obtained the name, "Canoin Phadraig," or "the Scripture of Patrick." Yet, in its present form, it is discovered to be the copy of a still older work. The Life of St. Patrick, contained in the Book of Armagh, was written by Muirchu-Maccu-Machteni, who relates, that he composed this tract, by command of Aedh, Bishop of Sletty, who died A.D. 692. A summary of contents, headed "Annotationes Aidi," has been placed, at the end of the Life, and closing it is the note : "Hæc pauca de Sancti Patricii peritia et virtutibus Muirchu Maccu Machtheni dictante Aiduo Slebtensis civitatis episcopo conscripsit."

A comparison of the Lives will serve to show, that the Life of St. Patrick, by Probus, the Fifth in Colgan's collection, is only an amended version of that, by Machtheni, in the Book of Armagh. A folio has been lost from it, but identity of subject and composition enables us to supply this deficiency, from the Life of Probus. In the year 937, the Canon of Patrick was encased by Donough, son of Flann, King of Ireland. This case was perhaps the leathern satchel, still preserved with it, and which is of very great antiquity. Dr. Petrie has given drawings of this, with a description of the Book itself. In the beginning of the eleventh century, when Bryan Boromhe, King of Ireland, visited Armagh, his Secretary and Confessor, Maolsuthian, Latinized, Calvus Perennis, made an entry in it, in Bryan's presence. The Book was often used, for the administration of solemn oaths. A keeper was appointed, and eight townlands, known as Balli Moyre, were near Armagh, and conferred on the hereditary keepers, the Mac Moyers, who held them, in 1656, when Sir James Ware wrote. Florence Mac Moyer was one of the suborned witnesses, who gave evidence against Dr. Oliver Plunket, and in a blank page is found the entry, Liber Florentini Muire, June 29, 1662. Edward Lhuyd, the eminent Welsh Philologist, who died in 1709, mentions this book, in his "Archæologic Britannica," as leabhar Apoc Macha. Mac Moyer had pledged it for five pounds, when he went over to England, and it then fell into the hands of one Arthur Brownlow. From 1680 to 1846, it was in possession of the Brownlow family. During this latter year, Rev. Francis Brownlow deposited it, in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy. On the 30th of November, 1846, the Rev. Charles Graves read an interesting paper, on this Manuscript. In 1853, it was purchased for £300, from Mr. Brownlow, by the very Rev. Dean Reeves of Armagh. In 1858, the Protestant Primate Beresford purchased it from Dr. Reeves, for the sum he had previously paid ; and, then, it was deposited, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin. See Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. ii., pp. 59 to 68. See also "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. iii., pp. 259, 260, 316 to 324. See Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, anterior to the Anglo-Norman Invasion," &c., part ii., sect. iii., subsect. i., pp. 332 to 338.

<sup>7</sup> A version of it has been published, in Sir William Betham's "Antiquarian Researches," vol. i., part ii., pp. 417 to 432. A description of The Book of Armagh is to be found in his Vol. i., pp. 243 to 442. In J. T. Gilbert's "Facsimiles of National Manuscripts of Ireland," partii., there is to be found a version of St. Patrick's "Confession," as taken from the Book of Armagh, which is in course of editorial preparation by Very Rev. Dean Reeves, with a view of its being published.

<sup>8</sup> It was destroyed, at the time of the French Revolution.

<sup>9</sup> This is described, as a vel. fol. 3. 16.

<sup>10</sup> It is classed, Nero E. i., a vel. fol., xi. cent., ff. 1676-1726.

<sup>11</sup> See Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus i. Prolegomena, pars. i., p. cxx.

<sup>12</sup> These are classed, Fell. i., in a vel. fol., xi. cent. Conf. S. Pat., ff. 7-13., and, 3, in a vel. fol., xi. cent., Conf. S. Pat., ff. 158-166.

<sup>13</sup> A considerable portion of the "Confession," as given by the writers of the British Museum and Bodleian Library copies, is not contained in the Book of Armagh version. It seems probable, that the latter, being the oldest copy, is also the most authentic. In her version of this, Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack has very properly enclosed, within brackets, those portions she added the Bollandists,<sup>14</sup> in the year 1668. There are other different copies of this work, published by various persons. One of those editions, by Sir James Ware, appeared, in the year 1656;<sup>15</sup> another, by Dr. Charles O'Connor,<sup>16</sup> was issued, in the year 1814;<sup>17</sup> a third, by Sir William Betham, saw the light, in the year 1826, while a fourth,<sup>18</sup> by Rev. Dr. Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva, was published, in the year 1835, in Dublin. These several versions have been made, from one or other of the ancient manuscripts, already described. Besides these, English translations of St. Patrick's "Confession" have been published. One of these appeared,<sup>19</sup> in Dublin, edited by the late Ven. Archdeacon, John Hamilton;<sup>20</sup> and, later still, at Kenmare, Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack has presented one, very correctly rendered, with the Latin text, in parallel columns.<sup>21</sup> This latter is one of the most authentic and valuable editions of it, as yet printed.<sup>22</sup> In addition to St. Patrick's "Confession," his letter to King Coroticus,<sup>23</sup> or Carotic, as also the Canons of two Councils, which he is said to have held, are considered, by some of the best critics, to have been written by him. A Cottonian Manuscript, in the British Museum, contains the text of the Epistle to Caroticus.<sup>24</sup> It has been published, and even with an English version.<sup>25</sup> Certain Synodal Canons are attributed to St. Patrick's authorship alone;<sup>26</sup> and, again, there are others, which are ascribed to St. Patrick, to St. Auxilius, and to St. Iserninus.<sup>27</sup> Canons—differing from the foregoing—have been edited, likewise; from the Bodleian copy. The "Confession" of St. Patrick, she has carefully and conscientiously edited, while the marginal notes are collations, with five different copies, viz.: B, representing the Cotton MS., British Museum, F, denoting copies 1 or 3, Fell. Bodleian Library, V, signifying Villanueva, corresponding with the Bollandists, and W, standing for Sir James Ware's version.

<sup>14</sup> From a copy, procured by Father Andrew Denis, Atrebas, of the Society of Jesus, from St. Vedast's Monastery.

<sup>15</sup> In "Opuscula adscripta Sancto Patricio." Confessio S. Patricii, pp. 1 to 23.

<sup>16</sup> Compare MS. Bodl., Rawl., B. 505.—"Lives of the Irish Saints," in Irish. See also Dr. O'Connor's Catalogue of Stowe MSS. and MS. Laud. 95. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland to the end of the reign of Henry VII.," vol. i., part i., p. 71.

<sup>17</sup> See "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus i. Prolegomena, pars. i., pp. cvii. to cxvii.

<sup>18</sup> This version coincides with the Bollandists' one, and he gives various readings, from other Codices, without however indicating the sources.

<sup>19</sup> See "The Confession of St. Patrick, concerning his Life and Conduct." Translated from the original Latin, as contained in an ancient Manuscript, over 1,000 years old. Dublin, 8vo.

<sup>20</sup> He was then P.P. of St. Michan's Church, and it was written a short time previous to his death, and published in 1859. To this had been prefixed, a Dedication to his parishioners, as likewise a summary of St. Patrick's Life.

<sup>21</sup> See her admirable and interesting work, "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. xi., pp. 580 to 611.

<sup>22</sup> Her copy of the "Confession" is taken from the Book of Armagh, as transcribed by the Rev. T. O'Mahony of Trinity College, with various readings, from copies, found in the British Museum, in the Bodleian Libraries, and in that copy, printed by the Bollandists.

<sup>23</sup> A copy of this was published by Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor, in "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus i. Prolegomena, pars. i., pp. cxvii. to cxx. The editor adds some notes to the foregoing Epistle. The Rev. John Lynch, P.P. of Ballymena, has appended the "Confessio," in five chapters, and the "Epistola," to his "Life of St. Patrick."

<sup>24</sup> There are two other Manuscript copies extant, Fell. 1, and 3, in the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

<sup>25</sup> See Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. xi., pp. 612 to 620. Her text is from the Cotton Manuscript, in the British Museum.

<sup>26</sup> These are found, in an old book of Canons, belonging to the Cottonian Library, Tit. lxvi. See Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Scholia, n. 2, p. 20.

<sup>27</sup> See Sir Henry Spelman's "Concilia, Decreta, Leges, Constitutiones in Re Ecclesiarum Orbis Britannici," published in 1639. These Canons were copied by Wilkins, Ware and Villanueva. They are taken from a Codex of the Benedictine Library, and preserved, in the College of Corpus Christi, at Cambridge, Num. 221. The original was found to be defective, however, and, by some of the most judicious critics,<sup>28</sup> they have been attributed to St. Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland, while other writers contend, they were drawn up, by a St. Patrick, called the Junior.<sup>29</sup> Some Synodal Decrees<sup>30</sup> are stated to have been penned, by our saint ; but, great doubts are entertained, regarding their authenticity.<sup>31</sup> However, Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva believed in their genuineness, at least, so far as some are concerned.<sup>32</sup> St. Patrick is said to have left behind him certain Proverbs, in the Irish language, which were afterwards rendered into Latin.<sup>33</sup> Another work, attributed to him, is a book, "De Abusionibus Sæculi,"<sup>34</sup> as also one, "De Tribus Habitaculis."<sup>35</sup> It is quite apparent, that the Charta, or Epistola, "De Antiquitate Avallonica"—notwithstanding the assertion in the opening sentence—cannot be ascribed to our saint.<sup>36</sup> In the Irish language, likewise, there are several prose and poetic tracts, which purport, and are stated, to have been written by St. Patrick. However, we have no sufficient evidence in some passages, which required great critical care for a restoration.

<sup>28</sup> Among these may be noted, Archbishop Ussher, Sir James Ware, Fresne, Colgan, Martene, D'Achery, Lanigan, &c.

<sup>29</sup> According to a theory of some writers, in this case, there might be no contradiction, since they make Palladius, the old Patrick, and the Irish Apostle, the junior Patrick.

<sup>30</sup> These were taken, in part, from the Monastic Library of St. Augustine, at Canterbury, as appears from a prefixed inscription. They have been edited, by Sir James Ware, in "Opuscula Adscripta S. Patricio," p. 87, and, after him, by Wilkins, in "Concilia Magnæ Britannię et Hibernię." These are preserved, in the old Codex Manuscript of Canons, under the title lxvi., and classed, Otho, E. 13., in the Cottonian collection. This Codex is supposed, as dating back to the Anglo-Saxon times. Again, in part, two unauthenticated Patrician Canons are found, in a Cambridge Codex. There are nine Canons, similarly attributed, and found in the Codex of Canons, Tit. lxvi. of the Cottonian collection. Edmund Martene has edited the Fragment of an Irish Synodal Decree, thought to have come down from the time of St. Patrick, and which begins with, "Synodus Ibernensis decrevit," and, seven other Canons, referring to the payment of Tithes, which begins with, "I. Dicunt auctores decimas," &c. Both were taken, "ex Cod. Bibliothecæ Bigotianæ," and they were written more than eight hundred years ago. They are published, in "Thesaurus Novus Anecdotorum," toms iv., pp. 1. et seq.

<sup>31</sup> See Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Scholia, n. 1, p. 146, n. 7, p. 155.

<sup>32</sup> See ibid., n. 1, p. 160, n. 1, p. 170, and n. p. 173. See also, on this subject, Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Essays on the Early Irish Church," Appendix, Nos. vi., vii., pp. 304 to 320.

<sup>33</sup> Such is the opinion of Sir James Ware, in a note to Liber, "De Abusionibus Sæculi," p. 139.

<sup>34</sup> Among the works of St. Cyprian, Jacobus Pamelius has printed this Tract ; and, it has appeared, also, among the supposititious works of St. Augustine, edited by the Benedictine Maurists, under this title, "De duodecim abusionibus gradibus," toms vi., col. 691. Sir James Ware has doubts, as to whether this Treatise should be ascribed or not to St. Patrick ; and, yet, he thinks it possible, it may be that Irish Book of Proverbs, to which Jocelyn alludes, "ædificatione plurima plenum."—Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxv. See also, Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hibernię," lib. ii., cap. i., p. 102.

<sup>35</sup> See ibid., pp. 101, 102. John Boston, a Benedictine monk of St. Edmund's Monastery, at Bury, who flourished in the beginning of the fifteenth century, under King Henry IV., and who visited nearly all the chief Libraries of England and Scotland, afterwards wrote a work, "De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis." In this, he states, that Patrick, Archbishop of Ibernia, flourished, in the year of Christ 429, and wrote, "De Tribus Habitaculis, cœli, mundi et inferni," having for its beginning, "Tria sunt." This Archbishop Ussher states, and he had the original Manuscript. That Treatise has also been included, among the works of St. Augustine, as edited by the Benedictine Maurists, toms vi. Appendix, col. 639. However, Sir James Ware shows, that it cannot be the work, either of St. Patrick, or of St. Augustine ; since, in their times, St. Jerome's version of the Sacred Scriptures had not appeared, and, yet, all the Scriptural text, quoted in the Treatise, are taken from his version.

<sup>36</sup> See the Scholion, subjoined to it, in Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Appendix i., pp. 297 to 306. The Abbe Migne has published the works of St. Patrick, Apostle of the Irish, in his very voluminous edition, "Patrologiæ Cursus Completus," &c., toms liii.

<sup>37</sup> He is assigned a double festival, one on to establish their authenticity, and their consequent value, as biographical authorities ; but, hereafter, more at length, shall we endeavour to examine their nature and origin. Many of these were written, apparently at a remote period. Notwithstanding, than those tracts already indicated, we must receive with greater hesitancy the traditional accounts, which profess to connect others, with the genuine writings of our saint.

We can have no reason whatever to doubt, that soon after the departure of our illustrious St. Patrick from earth, many of his disciples and relations undertook the appropriate and pleasing duty of recording his miracles, virtues, and actions ; indeed, we have assurances, that such was the case, and, therefore, we must refer to the accounts left, regarding his earlier biographers. It is stated, that St. Loman,<sup>37</sup> one of our saint's nephews, and a Bishop of Trim, in Meath, wrote some tract respecting his holy uncle, even while the latter was living. Loman flourished about the middle of the fifth century. St. Secundinus,<sup>38</sup> Bishop of Dunshaughlin,<sup>39</sup> in Meath, and another of St. Patrick's nephews, composed a hymn, in praise of his uncle. Colgan has published this composition. It has also been generally thought, St. Cianan,<sup>40</sup> or Kienan, Bishop of Damhlaig, or Duleek,<sup>41</sup> in East Meath, lived about 480, and that he wrote a Life of St. Patrick. It has been asserted, that St. Maol, or Moel,<sup>42</sup> thought by some, to have been one of St. Patrick's nephews, and the first Bishop of Ardagh,<sup>43</sup> wrote a book, on the virtues and miracles of his reputed uncle. He departed, towards the close of the fifth century. It is said, St. Patrick the Younger <sup>44</sup>—by some called a nephew of our saint—wrote his Acts, and flourished about the same time. St. Benignus,<sup>45</sup> Archbishop of Armagh, is accounted to have been one of St. Patrick's earliest biographers, as also St. Fiach,<sup>46</sup> Bishop of Sletty. St. Evinn, or Emhin,<sup>47</sup> is also considered to have been the writer of his Acts ; yet, it seems probable, these have been interpolated, by later compilers. The Scholiast on St. Fiach's biography is supposed to have written, in the sixth, or, at latest, in the seventh, century. Again, St. Ultan was one of our Apostle's biographers, and he was Bishop of Ardraccan. He departed this life on the 4th of September,<sup>48</sup> A.D. 656.<sup>49</sup> The Annotations, or Life of St. Patrick, by Tirechan,<sup>50</sup> had been in Ussher's possession. He used these Notes, in compiling the "Primordia." Tirechan flourished, towards the middle of the seventh century, or before his master's release. The alumnus wrote, perhaps, before this date, the 17th of February, and, another, at the 11th of October.

<sup>38</sup> His feast occurs, at the 27th of November.

<sup>39</sup> This is now a parish, in the barony of Ratoath, and its bounds are defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 38, 44. The Town proper is on the latter Sheet.

<sup>40</sup> His festival is held, on the 24th of November.

<sup>41</sup> There are two distinct parishes, one Duleek, in the baronies of Lower and Upper Duleek, and this is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 19, 20, 26, 27, 32, 33 ; the other is Duleek Abbey, Upper Duleek barony, shown on Sheets 27, 33. The town of Duleek is on Sheet 27. See ibid.

<sup>42</sup> His feast takes place, on the 6th of February.

<sup>43</sup> The parish of Ardagh is in the baronies of Ardagh and Moydow. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Longford," Sheets 14, 19, 20. The town proper is on Sheet 19.

<sup>44</sup> He is thought to have retired to Glas-tonbury, after the death of his uncle, St. Patrick, and to have died there. See regarding him Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," chap. xvii., pp. 426, 429, 460 to 464.

<sup>45</sup> His feast occurs, at the 9th of November.

<sup>46</sup> His festival is held, on the 12th of October.

<sup>47</sup> His feast is on the 22nd of December.

<sup>48</sup> This is also the date for his festival.

<sup>49</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 268, 269.

<sup>50</sup> He was a bishop, and by some of our writers, he was classed among the saints. His feast has been assigned to the 3rd of July.

<sup>51</sup> See "Fac-Similes of National Manu-

as stated in the copy, found in the Book of Armagh,<sup>51</sup> for, it is there said,<sup>52</sup> the author obtained his information, from the book or from the oral instruction of his preceptor, St. Ultan.<sup>53</sup> Various other biographers succeeded, but many of their compositions are said to have perished, during the wars of the Danes and Northmen. Indeed, no less than sixty-six different Lives of Ireland's illustrious Patron had already appeared, before the close of the twelfth century, when Jocelyn composed his Acts.<sup>54</sup>

The most complete and useful work for information, regarding this great Apostle's career, will be found, in those seven ancient Lives or Tracts,<sup>55</sup> prepared for the press, and edited, by the learned Father John Colgan.<sup>56</sup> These we shall endeavour to describe, in their order of position. Our celebrated Irish Hagiologist, no doubt, has fallen into various mistakes, while endeavouring to investigate the authorship of St. Patrick's several biographies, as included in his great collection.<sup>57</sup> Considering his foreign residence and position, with the want of aids subsequently provided, his misconceptions were almost inevitable. So far as possible, we shall make some corrections. The First Life, contained in the collection, has been attributed to St. Fiech, or Fiacc,<sup>58</sup> regarded as the disciple of St. Patrick. He was the first Bishop of Sletty, and, afterwards, he was recognized, as chief Bishop of Leinster. He is said to have written a Hymn, partly panegyrical, and partly historical, in which he briefly relates some principal incidents of St. Patrick's life. This composition, Colgan translated, from the original Irish, into Latin. He printed both versions, in collateral columns.<sup>59</sup> A much more correct version of this Hymn has recently appeared,<sup>60</sup> with interesting illustrations, by a highly competent translator and writer.<sup>61</sup> If this Poem be really Fiecc's composition, it is the oldest monument extant, for the illustrating of St. Patrick's memoirs.<sup>62</sup> There are thirty-four Irish stanzas, in this Hymn.<sup>63</sup> Colgan drew his version, from the Franciscan "Liber Hymnorum,"<sup>64</sup> and, he endeavoured scripts of Ireland," selected and edited under the direction of the Rt. Hon. Edward Sullivan, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, by J. T. Gilbert, F.S.A., M.R.I.A.

<sup>52</sup> At fol. 16.

<sup>53</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 426.

<sup>54</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxvi.

<sup>55</sup> Where the Lives of our saint are noted, simply and in numerical order, through the course of these chapters, it must be known to the reader, that reference is had to the foregoing volume, its parts, classifications, and paging.

<sup>56</sup> In his celebrated collection, the "Trias Thaumaturga," published at Louvain, A.D. 1647, fol.

<sup>57</sup> This must be apparent, to the careful historic investigator, from closely studying the General Preface to Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," as also the notes and observations, he has appended to the several Lives.

<sup>58</sup> Bishop of Sleibhte, or Sletty.

<sup>59</sup> See Vita Prima S. Patricii, pp. 1 to 3, with notes, pp. 4 to 10.

<sup>60</sup> A translation, in the Appendix to the "Life of St. Patrick," published by Mr. Patrick Lynch, in Dublin, A.D. 1810, differs, in some points, from that given by Colgan.

<sup>61</sup> See the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv. March, 1868. St. Fiecc's Poem, on the Life of St. Patrick, pp. 269 to 293.

<sup>62</sup> The xi. Vol. of O'Longan's MSS., in the R.I.A., includes St. Fiach's Metrical Life of St. Patrick, 34 verses, at p. 329. Messrs. Hodges' and Smith's small 4to paper MS. (No. 185) in the R.I.A., contains an imperfect Hymn of St. Fiach of Sletty, in praise of St. Patrick.

<sup>63</sup> Besides Colgan's edition, we have one, by Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor, in "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," toms i. Prolegomina, part i., pp. 88 et seq.; one by Henry Leo, "Commentatio de Carmine Vetusto Hibernico in S. Patricii laudem," Halis Saxonium, 1845; one by Vallancey, in the first edition of his "Irish Grammar," Dublin, 1773; one by Mr. Patrick Lynch, in the Appendix to his "Life of St. Patrick," Dublin, 1810, and in subsequent editions; one by Martin A. O'Brennan in his "Antiquities," vol. i., p. 484; and one by Richard Plunket, with the Irish title, "Himhin Phadruig Absdab," &c., printed at Dublin, 1791.

<sup>64</sup> This is the copy, now preserved in the Franciscan Convent, Dublin.

<sup>65</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd unhesitatingly prefers Colgan's edition, to any other that has since appeared. Subsequent editions and to render the Irish literally into Latin.<sup>65</sup> The poem itself is of ancient date, although the remote origin claimed for it, by Colgan, has been questioned.<sup>66</sup> Its narrative, however, is smooth and regular; nor do we find there, many of those incredible fictions, that are met with, in more recent Lives of our saint.<sup>67</sup> A supposition has been offered, that St. Fiech left some memorials behind him at Sletty, perhaps, and that from these, by a later writer, the Hymn may have been composed, so as thus to bear his name.<sup>68</sup> It is not readily proved, that the Hymn could have been of St. Fiach's time; yet, in reference to it, pending the doubt, we may be permitted to give its received denomination. With regard to the Scholia, or commentaries, accompanying this Hymn, an opinion has been advanced, that they are even referable to the middle, or to an earlier part, of the sixth century.<sup>69</sup> A very judicious critic<sup>70</sup> has asserted, that although some of them indicate high antiquity; yet, others bear traces of a later composition.<sup>71</sup> On collation, they do not seem to have been prepared, solely by one person.<sup>72</sup> As we read them, at present, those glosses are fairly supposed to have been compiled, from observations of various writers, some more, and some less, ancient.<sup>73</sup> In proportion as we remove from the early date, assigned for the composition of St. Fiech's Hymn, so, in a corresponding degree, must we diminish antiquity for the Scholia.<sup>74</sup> Colgan thinks the commentator flourished, about A.D. 580, or, at least, before the close of the sixth century. He wrote, partly in Irish and translations have added nothing of value, philologically or historically, and serving for its illustration. They are nearly all taken from Colgan's text and version; some with arbitrary alterations of the original, and translations, the offspring of ignorance, for the most part, where they differ from his edition. See the Leabhar Imunn, "The Book of Hymns of the Ancient Church of Ireland," Fasciculus ii., No. xix. The Hymn of St. Fiacc, in praise of St. Patrick, pp. 287 to 289, with notes. It is only right to observe, that Dr. Todd seems not to have been aware, that a really valuable version of this Hymn, with an Introduction, appeared in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., March, 1868, pp. 269 to 293.

<sup>66</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo Apostolo et Primate Hiberniæ. Commentarius prævius, sect. iii., num. 15, pp. 519, 520. Father Daniel Papebroch is said to have been the author of this commentary.

<sup>67</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. i., p. 80.

<sup>68</sup> See Rev. Dr. Todd's Leabhar Imunn, "The Book of Hymns of the Ancient Church of Ireland," Fasciculus ii., No. xix., pp. 298, 299.

<sup>69</sup> Such has been the conclusion arrived at, by the late Professor O'Curry. See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 279, 280

<sup>70</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>71</sup> In the beginning to these, the Scholiasts gives us an account of the family, race and virtues of Fiech, as also of the place and time, where and when the Hymn had been composed.

<sup>72</sup> As for instance, in Scholion 5, there is a Letha, mentioned in the Hymn, at Strophe 5, thus Englished, in the periodical already quoted, at p. 285: "He (i.e. Victor) sent him (i.e. Patrick) across all the Alps: over the sea marvellous was his course, until he staid with Germanus in the south, in Southern Letha." Here, this place has been properly explained by Armorica, or the maritime part of Gaul, to the N.W. But, in Scolion 11, it is interpreted Latium, i.e. Italy. In the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., p. 9, it has been shown, that St. Patrick was a disciple to St. Germanus, when in the North of Italy. The name Letha or Latium is said to have been applied, by early Irish writers, to Armorica, or to Brittany, as well as to Italy. See O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," Appendix, No. xviii., p. 502; Todd's "Irish version of Nennins," p. 69. Hence, "in Southern Letha" does not mean, in the South of Italy, as some have erroneously supposed; but, rather, in Italy, all of which was called Southern Letha. It was thus distinguished from Armorica, which was called Northern Letha. Colgan also made a similar mistake, in translating Letha, Latium. This is not his only mistranslation of passages in the Hymn.

<sup>73</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. i., nn. 1, 2, 3, pp. 80, 81.

<sup>74</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd seems to think, that to the original Scholiasts' draft, later notes may have been added, by different scribes.

<sup>75</sup> By Ussher, this Scholiast is placed among the biographers of St. Patrick, pro-

partly in Latin, and the Codex in which his comments are found was very old and worn. He is said to have been well versed in Irish antiquities.<sup>75</sup> Perhaps, the date given by Colgan is of too early a stage; yet, those notes and the introduction are supposed to have been written, not later than the eighth century,<sup>76</sup> from their peculiar idiomatic structure, and from internal evidences of great antiquity. However this may be, the Scholiast states, that Dumh-gabhla,<sup>77</sup> near Sleibhte,<sup>78</sup> was the locality, where Fiech's Hymn had been composed. The time assigned for its composition, moreover, was that of Lugaidh,<sup>79</sup> son to Laeghaire, for then he was king over Erin. The reason for composing it, also, was to praise St. Patrick. Hence, after his death, as some assert, this Hymn was produced by St. Fiech.<sup>80</sup> The lamented death of Rev. Dr. Todd,<sup>81</sup> and the suspension of the Irish Archæological Society's publications, have prevented the appearance of his version of this Hymn, and of its Scholia, an introduction to both having been left incomplete.<sup>82</sup>

The Second, Third and Fourth Lives of St. Patrick, as published by Colgan, are filled with fables. Those Acts seem to have been borrowed, one from another, or they are copies of versions, taken from some common source. Occasionally, quotations from St. Patrick's "Confession," with sensible remarks, appear; but, it has been thought, that those Lives belong to a more recent period, than that assigned to them.<sup>83</sup> A St. Patrick, called the junior,<sup>84</sup> or some other disciple of the great Irish Apostle, was the author of the Second Life,<sup>85</sup> according to Colgan.<sup>86</sup> However, it is inferred very justly, that the writer was either an Irishman, or, at least, one versed in the Irish language,<sup>87</sup> that he lived after the death of St. Patrick,<sup>88</sup> and even after the death of his earlier biographer, St. Fiech.<sup>89</sup> Certain modes of expression have caused Colgan to make mistakes, which have served to confuse his own naturally correct opinions. Those phrases have led him into serious anachronisms.<sup>90</sup> On the whole, however, it may safely be asserted, that obscurity still hangs around the writer, and the exact period when he wrote, bably because he rendered more clear, what St. Fiech had left rather unintelligible, and because he added other particulars. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 427 et seq.

<sup>76</sup> This seems, also, to be the opinion of Father Daniel Papebroke.

<sup>77</sup> This denomination is probably obsolete.

<sup>78</sup> To this the Scholiast in Colgan adds, "versus Chorum," or towards the choir.

<sup>79</sup> He reigned, from A.D. 479 to A.D. 503, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 150 to 165.

<sup>80</sup> See the Prolegomena to this Hymn, in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., March, 1868, pp. 282, 283, and notes.

<sup>81</sup> This sad event took place, June 28th, 1869, at Silverton, near Rathfarnham.

<sup>82</sup> It ends at p. 304, and it was the last of a sheet, by the author, corrected and signed for the press. The Second Fasciculus was published, in November, 1869.

<sup>83</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. iii., p. 84.

<sup>84</sup> It seems strange, that in the first note to the Third Life, Colgan contradicts, in a measure, this opinion, for there, he makes Patrick junior a Briton. However, he might have been a good Irish scholar.

<sup>85</sup> It is comprised, in forty-one chapters. The twentieth chapter, however, is defective; but, its sense may be supplied, from the Third Life, at chapter xvii.

<sup>86</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," auctore (ut videtur) S. Patricii Juniore, aliove Magni Patricii Discipulo. Ex MS. Monast. S. Huberti in Ardvenna, pp. 11 to 20, with notes.

<sup>87</sup> Thus, in cap. xv., xx., xxxii., xxxiv., he uses Irish words and phrases, with a full knowledge of their meaning.

<sup>88</sup> At cap. xvii., he gives the whole chronology of St. Patrick's Acts, before and after he had come to Ireland.

<sup>89</sup> Allusion is made, in the Life, to his relics having been preserved at Sletty.

<sup>90</sup> For instance, when citing a passage of the Second Life, a Bishop Lorn, St. Patrick's contemporary, is said to be in Inreathan. See Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxi., p. 14. But, Colgan did not reflect, that such was a mode of writing, frequently occurring in our old ecclesiastical historic tracts. It only relatively meant, that the person's remains there reposed, when thus mentioned. For example, a little before, in this same Second Life, Sylvester and Selonius, two of Palladius' companions, are reported to have been in Domnach-Ard. See cap. xxiv., p. 13. It

The author of the Third Life of St. Patrick, as published by Colgan,<sup>91</sup> is unknown. Yet, it has been inferred, that he was an Irishman,<sup>92</sup> and that he wrote in Ireland.<sup>93</sup> It is thought, also, that he must have flourished before A.D. 527.<sup>94</sup> However, the proofs advanced do not establish this conjecture. Again, it is supposed, that Jocelyn had this book, as an authority, and that from it, some of his statements had been drawn. Colgan has noticed, that Jocelyn names Benignus, Mel, Luman, and a disciple, named Patrick, as the authors of four Tracts, on St. Patrick, and which were extant in his time.<sup>95</sup> He infers, likewise, and endeavours to show, from certain data, that Mel, nor Luman, nor Patrick junior, could have composed the Third Life,<sup>96</sup> which, he says, must be ascribed, in his opinion, to Benignus.<sup>97</sup> However, he had no means for proving, that Jocelyn even referred to those various Lives. Nor would it be worthy a sensible critic's attention, to accept implicitly the authority of an injudicious and a credulous writer, in such an enquiry; especially, when those Tracts furnish abundant internal evidences, to prove they are not so very ancient.<sup>98</sup> Now after the death of St. Patrick, Benignus was his successor, as Archbishop, in the See of Armagh. He died, as has been supposed, in the year 468.<sup>99</sup> But, the writer, concerning whom we now treat, when he wrote the Life of St. Patrick,<sup>100</sup> informs us, there were sixty Lives of that Apostle already in circulation. In his work, it may be observed, the writer mentions St. Earc,<sup>101</sup> son of Dego, whose memory, he tells us, had been revered at Slane. Even Colgan himself places the death of this latter saint, at the year 512.<sup>102</sup> Hence, we must regard the question, regarding the true authorship of the Third Life, as yet unsettled.

The Fourth Life of St. Patrick has been attributed, by Colgan, to St. Aile-ran or Eleran, called "the wise."<sup>103</sup> This Life is comprised in ninety-seven chapters.<sup>104</sup> This was taken from an old parchment, belonging to the fine signifies, only, as appears from the sequel, these had been there interred.

<sup>91</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, pp. 21 to 29. Colgan's notes succeed to p. 35. This Life was taken from an old Manuscript, found at Biburg, in Bavaria, and it was sent to Colgan, by Father Stephen White, S.J. In the first eleven chapters, it agrees, almost word for word, with the Second Life; in the succeeding chapters, it differs for the most part. See n. 1, p. 29.

<sup>92</sup> Thus he inserts Irish words or phrases, at cap. xx., xxv., xxix., xxxvii., xl., xlviii. Again, he alludes to Ireland, as being "hanc insulam," in cap. xxvi.

<sup>93</sup> This especially appears, from cap. xciii.

<sup>94</sup> This inference, Colgan draws from certain passages, in the Tract, at cap. xliii., lxi., lxiii.

<sup>95</sup> From these writers, Jocelyn professes to have drawn whatever he deemed worthy of being reproduced by him. See the Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxvi., p. 106, and nn. 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, p. 116.

<sup>96</sup> Especially, since these were Britons, and the writer of this Life was an Irishman. It is comprised, in ninety-four chapters.

<sup>97</sup> An objection is proposed, by Colgan, since our Annals state Benignus to have died A.D. 487, that he must have written the Acts of St. Patrick, while the latter was living. However, Colgan maintains, that the Benignus thus noticed was not the Archbishop of Armagh, who succeeded St. Patrick, and who sat for ten years, but a relation to him, as our hagiologist promised to show, in a Life, to be inserted at the 9th of November. The Life of St. Macteus, and other authorities, were to support these assertions. See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, n. 1, p. 29.

<sup>98</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. iii., p. 84.

<sup>99</sup> See Index Chronologicus, at A.D. CCCCLXVIII., in Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 522. Some writers state, he died in Armagh, others in Glastonbury, while the "Annals of Innisfallen" make him die in Rome.

<sup>100</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxvii., p. 28.

<sup>101</sup> His festival is held, on the 2nd of November.

<sup>102</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, n. 39, p. 31. Also see Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 166 to 169.

<sup>103</sup> Dr. Lanigan has naively remarked, that he should not deserve such an epithet, had he been the compiler of all the fooleries this tract contains. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. iii., p. 83.

<sup>104</sup> See Quarta Vita S. Patricii, ex Veteri Cod. Pergam. MS. Alnensis Cænobii. S. Elerano Sapiente, Autore (ut videtur), pp. 35 to 47. Colgan's notes extend to p. 50.

Monastery of Alna, in Haunonia.<sup>105</sup> It has been noticed, that this Life must have been written, after the middle, if not, after the end of the sixth century;<sup>106</sup> and, again, it is thought, that it must have been composed, not long after the commencement of the seventh century.<sup>107</sup> The elegance of its style is also supposed, by Colgan, to be an indication of Eleran having been the author. Yet, it would seem, the editor had no warranty for this opinion. He only found a Life of St. Patrick, which could not have been written before the seventh century.<sup>108</sup> Now, St. Aleranus, or Eleran, who died in 664,<sup>109</sup> is said to have written a Life of St. Patrick.<sup>110</sup> But, it by no means follows, that we should regard St. Patrick's Fourth Biography, as the genuine production of St. Eleran, without more convincing reasons, than Colgan has advanced.

It was very generally supposed, that the work attributed<sup>111</sup> to Probus—

<sup>105</sup> Another copy Colgan had, and which agreed very generally, with the Second Life, he published, to the end of the forty-first chapter. This Second Life, he thinks, may have been left unfinished, or mutilated, at the words, "erit de semine tuo in aeternum." Afterwards follows the sentence, "Explicit Vita S. Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris." See Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xli., p. 16. Another conjecture is, that this Life had been written, while St. Patrick himself was living; yet, for special reasons, Colgan does not adopt it. See ibid., n. 68, p. 20. However, in this Fourth Life, a new arrangement of chapters and their subjects intervenes, so that from chapter 1. to chapter lxxxv. there are additions, which, in the Alna Manuscript, continue to these words, "Scio quia sermo bonus apud Christianos est graticum. Graticum enim in dato dono, et graticum in sublato, dixit." There a space is left, and the Acts seem mutilated. Hence arises the suspicion, that some librarian may have taken the intermediate chapters, from some other, if not from the former, Life, and transferred them to this account. Now, that they might have been thus removed, and added to this possibly imperfect Life, is inferred from the difference in style detected, between the first fifty chapters, which are deemed to be more elegant and idiomatic in Latinity, than those which are presumed to have been added. Colgan ends these observations by stating: "Sed quia nostrum non est antiquitates propter has vel alias conjecturas immutare, sed qua licet illustrare; hinc hanc exhibemus, ut in illo Codice jacet."—Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. 1., lxxxv., pp. 41, 46, and n. 1., pp. 47, 48.

<sup>106</sup> This is inferred, because St. Patrick is related in it, at cap. lxxix., to have prophesied, regarding the birth and holiness of St. Brendan, who died about A.D. 576, of St. Senan, who died about A.D. 581, and of St. Columba, who died about A.D. 597. Again, there is an appearance of the author having lived, after the sixth century, because he alludes to St. Baithen, and to his monastery, at Inis-Baithen, at cap. xxviii.

<sup>107</sup> The evidence for this assumption is rather weak, however, and it is chiefly founded, on the author's words, that he inserted no actions or miracles of St. Patrick, in his Life, except what he found to have been written, or what he had learned, "veracium relatione virorum." See ibid., cap. i., p. 41. Now, Colgan supposes, that the latter statement can only mean, that the writer must have got his account, from those truthful men, who had witnessed the actions of St. Patrick, or who had conversed with witnesses, that had such opportunity; and, consequently, that the author's period cannot be extended, beyond the earlier part of the seventh century. In the Preface to his "Trias Thaumaturga," p. iv., Colgan had already enumerated six or seven writers of St. Patrick's Acts, and who were synchroni, or disciples, viz.: St. Secundinus, St. Loman, St. Mel, St. Patrick's nephew, St. Benignus, St. Fiech, and St. Kienan. St. Evin is supposed to have flourished, very near this period. Now St. Ultan, St. Tirechan, and St. Eleran, lived, in the beginning of the seventh century. As the style of St. Ultan's Life of St. Brigid differs from that of the Fourth Life, and, as St. Tirechan's Life of St. Patrick, where Ussher quotes it, is also quite different, so it is thought, only to St. Eleran their contemporary can the Fourth Life be ascribed. See ibid., p. vi. Now, he died, at a very advanced age, A.D. 664, as our ancient Annalists relate. See Quarta Vita S. Patricii, n. 2, p. 44.

<sup>108</sup> There is a MS. copy of it, Philipps, 4705, vel. fol. xii. cent., ex Bibl. Monasterii de Alna. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 67, 69.

<sup>109</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 276, 277.

<sup>110</sup> He also wrote, it is said, an allegorical Exposition of Christ's genealogy, which Sedulius acknowledges he had inserted in a collection of illustrations on St. Matthew. This has been regarded, as a testimony of its superior excellence, in that line of writing.

<sup>111</sup> By Colgan.

the Fifth Life of our saint, according to Colgan's arrangement<sup>112</sup>—had been composed—in part, at least—during the tenth century. It consists of Two Books: the First Book contains forty-seven, and the Second, forty-one, chapters. It has been established, beyond cavil, that this work was composed, in the ninth century.<sup>113</sup> The learned Ussher<sup>114</sup> thought it worth alluding to; the Bollandists refused to print it, however, considering it abounded too much in fables.<sup>115</sup> Attributed to him, as the real author, it was first published, among the works of Venerable Bede.<sup>116</sup> By John Pitts,<sup>117</sup> however, it had been ascribed to Giraldus Cambrensis.<sup>118</sup> A Manuscript copy of this Life is extant.<sup>119</sup> In it, the Acts of our saint are arranged, with great attention to regularity. Colgan supposes<sup>120</sup> Probus to have been identical with Cæineachair,<sup>121</sup> who was a Lector in the College of Slane, and whose death is recorded, at the year 948, when he was murdered by the Danes.<sup>122</sup> Several other writers, such as Sir James Ware,<sup>123</sup> Bishop Nicolson,<sup>124</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan,<sup>125</sup> &c., incline to Colgan's opinion,<sup>126</sup> in reference to the age when Probus lived. It has been thought, that the Paulinus, whom he addresses, and at whose request the book had been composed,<sup>127</sup> can have been no other than Mæl Poil,<sup>128</sup> or Mal-Paulinus,<sup>129</sup> Bishop and Abbot over Indenen,<sup>130</sup> not far removed from Slane.<sup>131</sup> He died, A.D. 920. Yet, the Paulinus mentioned was no other than the Patriarch of Aquileia, who died January 11th, A.D. 804. Messingham places Probus, in the eighth century.<sup>132</sup> However, in reality he belonged more to the ninth, and Probus was a native of Ireland;<sup>133</sup> but, he settled

<sup>112</sup> See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, with notes, at pp. 51 to 60. The paging, however, is quite incorrect: the notes follow, at pp. 61 to 64.

<sup>113</sup> Colgan thinks, however, that this work had been interpolated by others, and that its text had been corrupted, by ignorant persons.

<sup>114</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 426.

<sup>115</sup> Tillemont also condemned it. See "Historia Ecclesiastica," tomus xvi., p. 782.

<sup>116</sup> See the edition of his works, printed at Basil, A.D. 1563, vol. iii.

<sup>117</sup> See "Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis," c. 299.

<sup>118</sup> Probably, because he found it in a Manuscript, containing the Works of Cambrensis. However, the latter does not name it, in that Catalogue he gives of all his Works. See Wharton's "Anglia Sacra," tom. ii., De Libris a se scriptis, pp. 439 to 446.

<sup>119</sup> It is described, as a "Vita S. Patricii Episcopi." It is classed, MS. Bibl. Pub. Cant., ff. i. 27. 21., vell. fol., xiii. cent. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., p. 66.

<sup>120</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. iii., p. 219.

<sup>121</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., p. 662, 663.

<sup>122</sup> Others again, such as Pitts, calling him Eluodugus Probus, make him a Briton. See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 426.

<sup>123</sup> See "De Scriptioribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. vi., p. 49.

<sup>124</sup> See "Irish Historical Library," chap.

iv., p. 38.

<sup>125</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. ii., p. 82.

<sup>126</sup> See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, n. 2, p. 61.

<sup>127</sup> See ibid., lib. ii., cap. xli.

<sup>128</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 606, 607. Rev. Dr. O'Connor, in his edition of the "Annals of the Four Masters," thinks this was the Paulinus, to whom Probus dedicated his Life of St. Patrick. Hence, we should infer, that Probus wrote either before, or, at the very latest, in the year A.D. 920.

<sup>129</sup> Colgan remarks, that the names are identical, according to the structural peculiarities of the Irish language. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 38, p. 64, and Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, p. 219.

<sup>130</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," at Indenen, in the county of Meath, p. 540.

<sup>131</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Vita S. Patricii, n. 38, p. 64.

<sup>132</sup> See "Florilegium Insulæ Sanctorum." The supposed testimony of Alcuin has proved, according to some writers, that in the eighth century, a Probus had been held in repute; for, he is named, among respectable authors, whose works were preserved, at that period, in the library, attached to York Cathedral. See Gale's "XV. Scriptores," De Pontificibus et Sanctis Ecclesiæ Eboracensis, p. 730. See also Rt. Rev. Dr. Milner's "Tour in Ireland," p. 94. Additional note.

<sup>133</sup> See Baronius, in his notes to the "Martyrologium Romanum," at March xvii., p. 128, Romæ, 1586, fol.

<sup>134</sup> All that is known, regarding himself in Germany. He was a distinguished Poet, and an inmate of St. Alban's Monastery, at Mayence, and he became intimate with Lupus of Ferrieres, several of whose epistles are addressed to Probus.<sup>134</sup> His death is assigned to the 25th of June, A.D. 859, in the Annals of Fulda.<sup>135</sup> Probus adheres very closely to St. Patrick's "Confession," and to that Letter, which had been written to Coroticus, as some of his chief materials for narrative. His books have been elaborated, with some taste, if failing in judgment; while they are regarded with favour, by discriminating critics. Probus omits all mention of various miracles, attributed to St. Patrick; and, hence in his accounts, we do not find exact concordance, with some of our Apostle's later Acts. Yet, this ought not render them the less acceptable, to persons of discretion and discernment.<sup>136</sup> However, the Bollandists regard it, as an interpolated production.<sup>137</sup> Various opinions have been entertained, concerning the country and period of Probus' birth;<sup>138</sup> but, there are intrinsic evidences, in those Two Books of which the work consists, to show that he must have been a native of this Island. He remarks, that St. Patrick entered upon our sea,<sup>139</sup> when leaving Great Britain for Ireland. Again, he calls St. Patrick, our most holy father.<sup>140</sup> He represents, that haven, where St. Patrick landed, as having been a very celebrated one with us.<sup>141</sup> From the mention Probus makes of Normandy, in his work,<sup>142</sup> it appears pretty certain—in the opinion of Dr. Lanigan—that his era cannot be assigned to any period, previous to the tenth century. Some writers have imagined, however, that this author flourished so early, as the sixth<sup>143</sup> or seventh;<sup>144</sup> yet, our best critics have good reasons, for deeming his biography of our saint a much later compilation. Quite different from him was a certain Probus, mentioned in a Poem,<sup>145</sup> published by Gale, and attributed to Alcuin;<sup>146</sup> but, he was a celebrated grammarian, M. Valerius Probus,<sup>147</sup> and, he is classed with others, who treated such subjects.<sup>148</sup> and his writings, has been carefully collected, by the authors of the "Histoire Litteraire de la France," tome v., pp. 209 et seq.

<sup>135</sup> See Pertz's "Monumenta Germaniæ Historica," vol. i., Rudolphi Fuldensis Annales, p. 373.

<sup>136</sup> See, Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. ii., and notes, pp. 81 to 83.

<sup>137</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. Commentarius Prævius ad Acta S. Patricii, sect. iv., num. 20, p. 521.

<sup>138</sup> See, Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 817, and Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Vita S. Patricii, n. 2, p. 61.

<sup>139</sup> See ibid., where he calls it "mare nostrum in nomine S. Trinitatis adiit," lib. i., cap. xxv., p. 49.

<sup>140</sup> See lib. ii., cap. xli. of Probus' Life, p. 61.

<sup>141</sup> "Utique apud nos clarissimum," lib. i., cap. xxvii. Ibid.

<sup>142</sup> See lib. i., cap. i. and x., p. 51. Ibid.

<sup>143</sup> In reference to his period, Colgan writes: "quod floruerit aliquantò ante annum 646, quod suaderi potest, ex eo quod in calce hujus vitæ dicat eam se scripsisse instantia vel rogatu cujusdam Paulini: quem opinari licet fuisse S. Paulinum Episcopum Roffensem, qui juxta Matthæum Florilegium in suo Chronico defunctus est anno 646, sed hanc sententiam tenentem oporteret asserere nomine Angliæ et Nort-

manniæ quæ in hac vita habentur, fuisse non a Probo, sed ab aliquo librario interserta, vel pro aliis substituta."—Ibid., n. 1, p. 61. Pitts says Probus flourished, A.D. 590.

<sup>144</sup> Dempster styles him, Mellanius Probus Scotus, who wrote two books on St. Patrick's Life, although he acknowledges, that these he had not seen. Yet, by Dempster Probus is said to have been a very old writer. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xv., num. 1001, pp. 523, 524, 527. Elsewhere, Dempster most absurdly contradicts his statement, where he asserts, that St. Mellanius Probus, to whom he assigns a feast at the 22nd of October, flourished A.D. 260. See num. 924, pp. 487, 488, ibid. How then could he have written the Acts of St. Patrick? Colgan also questions Dempster's authority for the statement, for it rests not on that of certain authors he quotes. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, n. 1, p. 61.

<sup>145</sup> "Quid Probus, atque Focas, Donatus, Priscianusve," Verse 1556.

<sup>146</sup> Here Gale was mistaken, for it is sufficiently plain, that this Poem had been written after his time. Not to adduce further proofs, it will suffice to remark, Alcuin's own works are mentioned in it, as having been preserved in the library. See v. 1552.

<sup>147</sup> He is mentioned, by Suetonius, "De Illustribus Grammaticis," 24. See, also,

The Sixth Life of St. Patrick,<sup>149</sup> as placed in Colgan's collection, was written, by Joceline, or Jocelyn, a Welchman,<sup>150</sup> about the commencement of the thirteenth century. The author received his education, at the celebrated Abbey of Furness—now known as Dalton-in-Furness, in the union of Ulverston, and hundred of Lonsdale, Lancashire, England.<sup>151</sup> It is said to have been founded, at the instigation, and by the labours, of some Irish monks, in 1127, by Stephen, afterwards King of England. To colonize this valley, he removed some Cistercian monks, from Tulketh, in Amounderness. From the Monastery of Furness,<sup>152</sup> Joceline is said to have returned to Blackfriars' Abbey, at Chester. With a great number of his brother monks, he thence removed to Down,<sup>153</sup> in Ireland, at the invitation of John De Courcy. The latter placed them, in the monastery of Secular Canons, whom he had driven away, and most unjustly dispossessed of their property.<sup>154</sup> Their patriotism, in animating the hostile army of Dunlevy—the legitimate but unsuccessful chieftain, resident in that part of Ulster—is the cause assigned for their expulsion.<sup>155</sup> Regarding the demerits and misleading tendency of this work, Harris has spoken,<sup>156</sup> and it precludes the necessity, for any further comments, in reference to it.<sup>157</sup> We are told, that it had been compiled, at William a Beckett's "Universal Biography," vol. iii., pp. 541, 766.

<sup>148</sup> Casimir Oudin thought it probable, the author was Fridegod, a monk, who lived early in the tenth century. See "Commentarius de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis," toms ii., col. 467, 468.

<sup>149</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, Archiepiscopi, Primatis et Apostoli Hiberniæ. Autore Jocelino Monacho Furnesio. After the Prologue follows the Life, in one hundred and ninety-six chapters, pp. 64 to 108. Colgan's notes succeed to p. 116; and, he tells us, that he corrected some mistakes, found in previous editions, and that he transferred, with some words changed, the headings of chapters to the margin. We are told, too, that this Life of St. Patrick was first published, at Antwerp, A.D. 1514, through the care of the Rev. Franciscan Father, Cornelius Hugon, or Fitz-Hugh—as Harris renders the name—Vicar Provincial of the Irish Province. The following sentence is found, at the end: "Explicit vita gloriosi Archipræsulis Patricii Hiberniæ Primatis, et Apostoli, per venerandum Patrem Fratrem Cornelium Hugonis, Fratrem Minorem de observantia, Provinciæ Hiberniæ Provinciale Vicarium castigata sollicitudine atque correcte ac impressoris artificiosa sagacitate studiosè oblata: ac per Adrianum Bergensem in mercuriali oppido Antuerpiensi solerti cura impressum, ac inter signum Missalis aurei commorantem. Juxta ambitum Divæ Virginis Mariæ, anno a Nativitate Domini quingentesimo quarto decimo supra millesimum 10. Kalendas Septembris." See n. 1, pp. 108, 109. It was afterwards printed, in Messingham's "Florilegium Insulæ Sanctorum," at Paris, A.D. 1624.

<sup>150</sup> Bishop Tanner says he was, "sive Anglus sive Cambro-Britannus."—"Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," p. 429.

<sup>151</sup> See an interesting account of it, in Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. ii., pp. 5, 6.

<sup>152</sup> At the time it was suppressed, the value is set down as £966 7s. 1d. See John Speed's "History of Great Britaine," book ix., chap. 21, under the heading of Lancashire.

<sup>153</sup> Colgan's authority, for calling him a "monk of Chester, and afterwards of Down," has not been discovered. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., p. 64, note.

<sup>154</sup> This is stated, by Pembroke. See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix P., p. 229.

<sup>155</sup> It has been asserted, that to conciliate the affections of the northern people, and to conquer, if possible, their very prejudices, before his invading Ulster, De Courcy had Columkille's Prophecies, predicting the successful invasion of a foreigner from Britain, proclaimed and published by his heralds. This they did, with great effect, at the head of his army. See Patrick Lynch's "Life of St. Patrick," chap. v., p. 36.

<sup>156</sup> See Harris Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 3, 4.

<sup>157</sup> The following Manuscript Lives of St. Patrick appear to be copies of Jocelyn's work:—Vita S. Patricii, MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 485, ff. 1-46, b. vell. 4to. xiv. cent. This Life is followed by another, imperfect at the beginning and at the end, ff. 47-74. Again, Vita S. Patricii, MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 505, ff. 1-89 b. vell. fol. dble. cols. xiv. or xv. cent. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 64, 65.

the request of John De Courcey,<sup>158</sup> the Anglo-Norman conqueror of Ulster. It has been written, in a style of classic elegance,<sup>159</sup> very much admired, for the age in which it was produced. However, this writer filled his work, with nearly all that could be gleaned, either from books or from tradition. He even added, what cannot be found, in other collections. His Life of St. Patrick thus became better adapted, for gratifying weak, ignorant, and imbecile minds, than for forming the religious sentiment, or for improving the understanding of persons, living in a critical or an enlightened age. It is incomparably the worst of all St. Patrick's Latin Lives, in a historic point of view, and, it deserves the least attention. Notwithstanding, it has been published, much oftener, than his other biographies,<sup>160</sup> and, we may suppose here, as in other cases, the glamour of style led many to prefer its reading, to what might have contained more instructive matter. This Life has also been translated, into English,<sup>161</sup> and, perhaps, into other languages.

The Seventh Life of St. Patrick,<sup>162</sup> as published by Colgan, has been assigned, by him, to St. Evin's authorship. This Life was edited, from three very ancient Irish Manuscripts: the first and chief of these having belonged to the O'Clerys, antiquaries in Ulster; the second to one Deoran, or Doran, in Leinster; and, it was not known, from what more ancient copy, the third had been derived. In some particulars, they differed one from another,<sup>163</sup> one occasionally relating in a diffuse manner, what the other gave more succinctly, while one gave in Latin, that which others related in Irish.<sup>164</sup> The latter was written, in a very archaic style; and, Colgan declares, that in rendering the Irish into Latin, he adhered to a literal form, neither omitting nor adding anything, that he judged to have been left by the original author, or that affected the truth of the narrative, however much this might seem to be inelegant.<sup>165</sup> The Seventh Life may properly be regarded, as a purely Irish work;<sup>166</sup> for, the proportion of Latin in it, as compared with Irish,<sup>167</sup>

<sup>158</sup> This leader availed himself of Jocelyn's great abilities for compiling, to engage on the Life of St. Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland, with the encouragement of Tumultac, or Thomas O'Connor, who was installed Archbishop of Armagh, A.D. 1185, and of Malachy, who then presided over the See of Down. This is most generally believed to have been the year, when Jocelyn composed St. Patrick's Life. See Thomas Wright's "Biographia Britannica Literaria; or Biography of Literary Characters of Great Britain and Ireland, arranged in Chronological Order," p. 257.

<sup>159</sup> It must be observed, in the Preface, that while Jocelyn professes a cynical contempt for the style and substance of other Lives, previously written, he displays a sufficiency of self-esteem, in his own ability for treating the subject of St. Patrick's biography. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii. Prologus Jocelini, p. 64, and nn. 2, 3, p. 109.

<sup>160</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., sect. iv., p. 88.

<sup>161</sup> See Edmund L. Swift's "Life and Acts of St. Patrick," &c., published in Dublin, A.D. 1809, 8vo.

<sup>162</sup> The Septima Vita S. Patricii, is given in three distinct parts, or books, with a preface to each part, or book, and hence, it is most generally called the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. The First Part, comprised in seventy-one chapters, extends from pp. 117 to 128; the Second Part, containing one hundred and forty-three chapters, reaches from pp. 129 to 148; while, the Third Part, comprising one hundred and eight chapters, extends from pp. 149 to 169. Several typographical errors are to be detected, in numbering the chapters. Colgan's notes to those Three Parts follow, from pp. 169 to 188.

<sup>163</sup> Colgan says: "Nos autem fidem res fusius et latine referentis secuti sumus. Et hinc Lector advertat si forte offenderit seriem rerum gestarum vel modum narrationis aliter in aliis codicibus referri, quam hic reserantur, causam discrepantia esse, quam jam insinuavimus."

<sup>164</sup> These Manuscripts, compounded from both languages, often gave Latin and Irish, not alone in the same chapters, but even in the same lines.

<sup>165</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 1, p. 169.

<sup>166</sup> About A.D. 1477 was transcribed a Life of St. Patrick (Hibernicé). This is now preserved, among the Egerton MSS., and it is marked 93. It is a large 4to vellum copy, in double columns. The first page is almost entirely obliterated; folios 2 and 6 have been abstracted, and the tract ends at fol. 18. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's was very insignificant,<sup>168</sup> before Colgan or his assistants had translated it into Latin.<sup>169</sup> Ussher had seen it, in the original.<sup>170</sup> Seldom, however, does he refer to it; yet, he calls it an Irish work, and written in the old Irish language.<sup>171</sup> On account of its very great antiquity, we are informed, that the Irish text can only be understood, with exceeding great difficulty, and that this tract used formerly be read and explained, as a School Class-book, for the instruction of students, who felt desirous of learning the pure and ancient native dialect.<sup>172</sup> Hence, it is thought, that certain masters may have added glosses and observations, better to explain its meaning to their scholars, so that those comments may have crept into the text by degrees, and thus have imparted an appearance of novelty, in the real author's ancient work. Thus, some words or phrases may have been changed from Latin into Irish; some may have been abbreviated, or wholly omitted by scribes.<sup>173</sup> The Irish Life, in the British Museum, is written with frequent alternations of Gædhlic and Latin sentences; the latter are sometimes explained by the former, but, generally the narration continues on through both languages. The reputed author, St. Evín, was Abbot of Ross MicTreoin, in southern

"Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., p. 65. It is identical with the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, published by Colgan, in his "Trias Thaumaturga." This Life is followed by the Hymn, or Prayer of St. Patrick, as published by Dr. Petrie, in the "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy."

<sup>169</sup> The Latin portions are principally Scriptural quotations, with extracts from St. Patrick's "Confession," from St. Jerome, or from old Latin documents, treating about the subject of biography.

<sup>168</sup> Different versions of this work remain, both in Irish and in Latin. These are supposed to be identical with that one, generally denominated, "The Tripartite Life," or the seventh, as published by Colgan.

<sup>169</sup> From three old Irish MSS. The Egerton MS., 93, is probably a transcript from one of these. Among the Egerton MSS., there is a Life of St. Patrick, in Irish, and it is compiled from older Lives of the saint. It is a paper copy, in 4to, and it is classed 170. At p. 94, reference is made to Probus and Jocelyn. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., p. 66.

<sup>170</sup> There is yet preserved, in Irish, a MS. intitled, "Beatha Naomh Pattraic," or a Life of St. Patrick. This, however, is imperfect. It is among the MSS. of Stowe, No. xxxiii., 4to paper, xviii. cent. The pages are 6. St. Patrick's pedigree, as preserved in this MS., is quoted by Ussher, and from a very ancient Poem, to be found in the "Annals of the Four Masters." See Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Bibliotheca MS. Stowensis," vol. i., p. 157.

<sup>171</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvi., p. 812, and cap. xvii., p. 818.

<sup>172</sup> The original Irish was stated to have been lost; and, by some, it was held to have been a fabrication of Colgan, to give a Catholic tone to the doctrines of the early Irish Church. Fortunately for religion and truth, and for the justification of Colgan, an Irish copy was discovered, by Professor O'Curry, May, 1849, in the British Museum. See Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xvi., p. 345. Since Mr. O'Curry wrote, another copy of the Irish Tripartite was found, in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Regarding the British Museum copy, the learned Irish scholar writes: "The antiquity of this Life, in all its parts, may be well understood from the fact that, in the middle ages, it required an interlined gloss, by the most learned masters, in order to make it intelligible to their pupils and to other less learned readers. I have myself fortunately recovered an ancient copy of these glossed passages (in MS. H. 3. 18. T.C.D.) by which I am enabled to form an opinion of the antiquity of the text, which it has not perhaps fallen to the lot of other Gædhlic scholars to do. The antiquity of the tract may be also inferred from Michael O'Clery's introduction to his glossary of obsolete Gædhlic words, published in Louvain in the year 1643, in which he classes the old Life of St. Patrick with several other ancient tracts which required explanations; explanations which it had received from various eminent scholars, even down to his own time; indeed anyone intimately conversant with ancient Gædhlic writings will perceive at once, that this tract is one of great antiquity."—Ibid., p. 347.

<sup>173</sup> Colgan declares, in editing this Tract, when collating his three Manuscripts, that wherever he thought insertions were made in the original, he took care to distinguish these, by a small type, called Garmond; but, wherever he entertained a doubt concerning this matter, no change was made in

Leinster, and he lived, in the latter part of the sixth century. It has been asserted, but on very insufficient grounds, that he lived and wrote contemporaneously with some of St. Patrick's disciples. Colgan thinks his conjecture may be established, owing to the following chain of circumstances. St. Evin, or Emhin, according to Jocelyn<sup>174</sup> and Ware,<sup>175</sup> wrote the Acts of St. Patrick. Again, in addition to what Jocelyn drew from Benignus, Mel, Luman and Patrick junior, he also took his account from Evinus; and, indeed, he has few incidents recorded, that do not correspond with those in the Tripartite Life, from which they seem to have been derived. However, he voluntarily omits several things, in reference to the proper names of persons, places, countries and church foundations.<sup>176</sup> It is argued, that the author lived, about the middle or end of the sixth century, because he had been visited,<sup>177</sup> by St. Molua, or Luan,<sup>178</sup> Abbot of Clonfert Molua,<sup>179</sup> and because he departed from this world,<sup>180</sup> during the reign of Brandubh,<sup>181</sup> in Leinster.<sup>182</sup> It seems not improbable, that St. Evin's Life of St. Patrick should have been seen by Jocelyn, when he wrote, A.D. 1185; nor is it likely, that it should have perished, or have been lost, in Ireland; nor was any other Life of our saint, partly written in Irish, and partly in Latin, known to Colgan, except the Tripartite. Again, it seems to be well established, that the author belonged to the Irish race,<sup>183</sup> and by profession, that he was a monk, or a priest.<sup>184</sup> Then, it is supposed, that when he wrote, certain early saints had not departed from life.<sup>185</sup> However, as we have already observed, Colgan seems to have mistaken an applied form of expression, est, "is," for one being alive, when in reality it signifies, "rests," in the sense of one being buried.<sup>186</sup> That copy of the Irish Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, found in the British Museum,<sup>187</sup> has lately been translated into English, in an accurate the printed characters. Wherever, the Italian or cursive letters are found is an indication of Latin words, used by the ancient author. Colgan adds: "quæ communi et mediano, esse a nobis ex Hibernico in Latinum versa."—Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. I., p. 169.

<sup>174</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxvi., p. 106.

<sup>175</sup> Ware has Evin at the seventh century, only on the mere authority of Jocelyn. Yet, he says nothing about the Tripartite Life. See "De Scriptoris Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. iii., p. 16.

<sup>176</sup> This he states, in Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxviii., pp. 79, 80, and cap. xciii., p. 86, &c.

<sup>177</sup> This is stated, in the Life of St. Molua, chap. 42.

<sup>178</sup> His feast occurs, at the 4th of August.

<sup>179</sup> He flourished, A.D. 560, and died A.D. 605.

<sup>180</sup> This is the statement, in St. Evin's own Life, at the 22nd of December.

<sup>181</sup> He was son to Enochod.

<sup>182</sup> He died, A.D. 601.

<sup>183</sup> Thus, he writes in Irish, and he seems to have had a singular good knowledge of native proper names of men, of places, of families, and of territories.

<sup>184</sup> This seems to follow, from the fact of his quoting various Scriptural passages; and, again, because after the manner of an exordium to a popular sermon, he introduces each one of his three Books, in a preface. Nay more: it is thought, he spoke these respectively, in a narrative series, to the people, and from the pulpit, to eulogize St. Patrick, while each Part seems to close with a suitable peroration.

<sup>185</sup> Thus regarding St. Loarn, a disciple of St. Patrick, at pars. i., cap. lii., p. 125, pars. ii., cap. lvii., p. 137. Also, in reference to St. Guasact, another disciple, at pars. i., cap. xx., p. 120. St. Fiech, another disciple, is alluded to, at pars. i., cap. lxi., p. 126. Again, referring to another disciple St. Mucna, pars. ii., cap. lxxxiii., p. 141.

<sup>186</sup> Colgan argues, however, that this must be a strained meaning. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. I., pp. 169, 170.

<sup>187</sup> The finder, Professor O'Curry, describes it as a thin book of large 4to size, in a brass cover, consisting of two plates, lapping nearly half an inch over the edges of the leaves, at the front and ends. The brass was rather clean, and it had a modern appearance. The plates measured, about twelve inches in length, nine in breadth, and three-eighths in thickness. The front plate had a plain cross etched upon it, about eight inches long, with the arms in proportion. At the back, the brass plates were connected, by a pair of hinges; thus giving the volume perfect freedom of opening, and on a principle, not much practised by ordinary bookbinders. This Tripartite copy and a scholarly manner, by the eminent Celtic scholar, William M. Hennessy, M.R.I.A.<sup>188</sup> It has been annotated, likewise, and thus published, in the admirable Life of our saint, by Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack.<sup>189</sup> It cannot be admitted, at least, in its present state, that the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick had been composed, so early as Colgan imagined. It appears much more probable, its compilation was somewhere, about the tenth century; for, certain persons, who flourished, at such a period, are named, in the body of that work. It is remarked, by Colgan, that although the Tripartite writer has confounded very much the order of places and territories, with that of time and sequence, in his Acts of St. Patrick; still, it is the most accurate of all these, that has come down to us.<sup>190</sup> Wherefore, he inserted it last, in his collection, not that it was by a later author than such as had precedence; but, because, it served distinctly and briefly to relate and confirm most accounts, given by the former Acts. Moreover, it produced many things, omitted in them, while it was the only Life, which gave a complete history of our great Patron Saint.<sup>191</sup> Perhaps, the chief value, attaching to the Tripartite Life of our glorious Apostle, arises from the fact of its having been compiled, with a scrupulous fidelity, and from much older records. Instead of giving their substance, even their very phrases are retained; and, we often meet with passages, where the present tense occurs, although the past might have been appropriately used, besides finding collateral allusions, having no apparent textual connexion. This work seems to have been the foundation, on which Jocelyn prepared his biography; for, in many places, he follows it verbatim. Still, he frequently inverts the statements it contains, while most generally, his arrangement of them is arbitrary and distorted. We cannot be sure, however, about this being the exact work alluded to, by Jocelyn, as having been written by St. Evin,<sup>192</sup> nor is it even clear, at what time the Evin he speaks of might have flourished. No doubt, the force of those objections, and innumerable passages, compiled after the sixth century, are admitted, by Colgan; but, he considers, these latter were interpolations of St. Evin's original text.<sup>193</sup> Yet, the composer sets down or the writers of this work give us twice over the names of authors, whom they followed.<sup>194</sup> These are Colum-occupied originally twenty folios, or forty pages, of the book; but, of these, the second and sixth folios were cut out, at some time unknown. Besides our Saint's Life, this Book contains fragments of two ancient tales, namely, Fledh Brickrin, or "Brickrin's Feast," and the celebrated Táin Bó Chualigné: these Tracts are written in a different hand from that in the Tripartite, and they must have been originally part or parts of different Books. Before this Codex had been sold to the British Museum, it belonged to Mr. James Hardiman; and, in his Catalogue, it is classed, No. 93. Egerton. Excepting some interpolations, Professor O'Curry thinks it to have the antiquity, assigned by Father John Colgan.

<sup>188</sup> Besides this Life, we have another in Irish, in the "Leabhar Breac," but properly, the "Leabhar Mór Dúna Doighré," Royal Irish Academy, and another in the "Book of Lismore," kept at Lismore Castle. See Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xvi. pp. 339 to 350.

<sup>189</sup> See "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," Kenmare, 1869, 4to, with several fine illustrations.

<sup>190</sup> He adds: "Non solum enim innumera Sanctorum nomina et gesta aliqua, Ecclesiarum fundationes, Patricii itinera, labores, miracula, aliaque gesta ab aliis, quorum opera extant, omnia fideliter et distincte recenset, sed et historias sacras et prophanas Hiberniæ a suscepta fide usque ad finem sæculi quinti ita comprehendit, ut facili omnes simul sumptos qui de rebus Patricii, et historiis domesticis tum sacris cum prophanis istius sæculi scripserunt, facili æquaverit, nisi et superaverit."

<sup>191</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 1, p. 170.

<sup>192</sup> John O'Connell, of Kerry, who wrote a long Poem on the History of Ireland, about 1650, refers to a Life of St. Patrick, written by St. Eimhin. This indicates a tradition of its authorship.

<sup>193</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 1, p. 170.

<sup>194</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. i., cap. lxi., p. 128, in the small type. See again, lib. iii., cap. xcix., p. 167.

kille, Ultan, son of O'Conchaur,<sup>195</sup> Adamnan, nepos Tinneus,<sup>196</sup> Eleran the Wise, Kieran of Belachduin, Hermedus or Jeremias,<sup>197</sup> Bishop of Clogher, Colman Huamacnensis, and Collatus, a priest of Druim-Relgeach,<sup>198</sup> in the territory of Meath. There is no mention whatever of St. Evin, in the Life, and this seems an omission, not easily reconciled, with his being the original author; even, though it had been enlarged, and interpolated, at a subsequent period. Kieran died A.D. 770;<sup>199</sup> Collatus may have been identical with Conlatha, who departed in the year 868;<sup>200</sup> Kinactus, son to Feargal, Prince of Meath, was probably not living, when the work had been written, for he is mentioned historically,<sup>201</sup> and he is known to have died in 868;<sup>202</sup> while Kenngegan, King of Cashel, is noticed,<sup>203</sup> and he was killed, in A.D. 897.<sup>204</sup> Besides, the work, as it now stands, must have been compiled, at a time, when the Irish Church had its staff of ecclesiastical dignitaries, and when its splendour had been fully recognised. In it, we find allusion to a bishop's Vicar-General, to a Suffragan, to an Archpriest, to a Chancellor, to a Chaplain, to Almoners, and to a Judge in spiritual affairs.<sup>205</sup> In addition to this, we find the writer states, that no less than sixty-six Books of St. Patrick's Acts, and all written by respectable and very ancient authors, had been issued before the writing of his own work; while he speaks, also, of much more ancient and much more recent compilers, than those named by him.<sup>206</sup> There are no internal evidences, to show that the writer or writers of the Tripartite Life lived, so late as the eleventh century. It contains a great variety of details and topographical denominations, concerning St. Patrick's Irish mission. Although it relates some fabulous accounts, especially of the Apostle's younger days, this work is highly useful, for the biographer's purpose. Nor must it be confounded, with another Latin work, often quoted by Ussher, and to which he gives the similar title of Tripartite.<sup>207</sup> In referring to this latter, Dr. Lanigan calls it Ussher's Tripartite. However, it is thought, that this copy must be assigned to a later period. Most certainly, we find some portions of it to have been written, and at a time, when the name Scotia was used for that part of Britain, which now is called Scotland,<sup>208</sup> and Hibernia is set down for Ireland, or Hiberni,<sup>209</sup> as a designation for its inhabitants.<sup>210</sup>

<sup>195</sup> Otherwise called Hua Conchobhair.

<sup>196</sup> Otherwise called Hua Tinne.

<sup>197</sup> Also called Hieremias.

<sup>198</sup> Also called, Druim-reilgeach.

<sup>199</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 48, p.

172.

<sup>200</sup> Colgan does not think this unlikely.

See ibid., p. 173.

<sup>201</sup> Ibid., lib. ii., cap. v., p. 130.

<sup>202</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga,"

Septima Vita S. Patricii, nn. 17, 18, p. 175.

<sup>203</sup> See ibid., lib. iii., cap. xxx., p. 156.

<sup>204</sup> See ibid., n. 57, p. 186, where it is noticed, that this prince lived, until the ninth century's close. As Rev. Dr. Lanigan remarks, a Manuscript note of Roderick O'Flaherty, at the passage, assigns the exact date, as given in the text.

<sup>205</sup> See ibid. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xvi., p. 167.

<sup>206</sup> See ibid., cap. xcix., p. 167. However, as the names are in small type, perhaps we are to regard them, as possible interpolations, and consequently the latter words can only have reference to the writers of the sixty-six various Books of St. Patrick's Acts.

<sup>207</sup> Harris seemed to think, that this was a similar work. Alluding to a passage, quoted by Ussher, from his own Tripartite copy, Harris observes, that it is not to be found in the printed copy. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 35. This only means, in reality, that the printed edition differed, with regard to the passages quoted, from Ussher's Manuscript copy of the Tripartite.

<sup>208</sup> In it we read, about Palladius in the province of the Picts, "quæ modo est Scotia in Britannia," ended his life. Therefore, it is inferred, from these Latin expressions, that the author did not live before the eleventh century. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvi., p. 813, and compare it with the passage, in the Tripartite Life.

<sup>209</sup> See also Ussher, "De Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Primordiis," cap. xvi., pp. 812, 813. By this title, or by "De Primordiis," or "Primordia," it is to be understood, throughout these notes, we quote the Dublin edition of 1639, 4to.

<sup>210</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. iv., and notes, pp. 85 to 88.

The admirable edition of St. Patrick's Acts, by Colgan, is followed by seven different Appendices. The first Appendix contains the divers Offices, which were celebrated, in honour of St. Patrick.<sup>211</sup> The second has the various fragments of his Acts, as taken from the works of old writers, sometimes additions, sometimes mutilated excerpts, from books, not always seen by the editor.<sup>212</sup> The third has certain actions and miracles, not found in the seven published Lives of St. Patrick, at least, in part, yet contained in other saints' Lives;<sup>213</sup> and, to this are added his various prophecies,<sup>214</sup> and references to the merits of St. Secundinus' Hymn,<sup>215</sup> with the composition itself.<sup>216</sup> The fourth Appendix treats about some of his actions, described in his writings, by St. Patrick,<sup>217</sup> a dissertation on his writings,<sup>218</sup> and another, on the writers<sup>219</sup> of St. Patrick's Acts.<sup>220</sup> In the fifth Appendix are introduced and discussed some difficulties and doubts, referring to the Acts of St. Patrick.<sup>221</sup> The sixth Appendix treats about St. Patrick's Purgatory.<sup>222</sup> The seventh Appendix relates to the Metropolitan Church of Armagh and gives its history.<sup>223</sup> Then follows an Epilogus Magnalium Magni Patricii.<sup>224</sup>

It would seem an almost endless task, to enumerate all the separate Manuscript Lives or biographical notices, relating to the holy missionary; since, not alone in Ireland, and in the British Islands, but over the European Continent, numbers of exemplars, especially in Irish and Latin, are described as existing.<sup>225</sup> These are not all of equal antiquity, or originality; and, indeed, in many cases, they are rather only modern copies—as compared with the age of their subject—and taken from Acts, previously well known. Thus, in the Dublin Libraries, alone, several such recently transcribed tracts are to be found. In the Royal Irish Academy, we meet with them in the Betham collection,<sup>226</sup> among the Messrs. Hodges and Smith's Manuscripts,<sup>227</sup> as also, in others, described

<sup>211</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Appendix i., pp. 189 to 196.

<sup>212</sup> See ibid. Appendix ii., pp. 196 to 199.

<sup>213</sup> The first Part.

<sup>214</sup> The second Part.

<sup>215</sup> The third Part.

<sup>216</sup> See ibid. Appendix iii., pp. 199 to 212.

<sup>217</sup> The first Part.

<sup>218</sup> The second Part.

<sup>219</sup> The third Part.

<sup>220</sup> See ibid. Appendix iv., pp. 212 to 219.

<sup>221</sup> These questions are comprised, in twenty-four distinct chapters. See ibid. Appendix v., pp. 219 to 272.

<sup>222</sup> In four Parts. See ibid. Appendix vi., pp. 273 to 289.

<sup>223</sup> In four Parts. See ibid. Appendix vii., pp. 289 to 311.

<sup>224</sup> In forty-eight separate sections. See ibid., pp. 312 to 315.

<sup>225</sup> Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy has only enumerated some, and detailed these, in his "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, to the end of the Reign of Henry VII.," vol. i., part i., pp. 62 to 84.

<sup>226</sup> In the Betham classification of the O'Longan Manuscripts, and in the First Volume of the O'Longan collection, there is a copy of the Life of St. Patrick, translated into Irish, from the Latin of Joceline, in 22 chapters, pp. 1 to 59. It was written, by Michael Oge O'Longan, between A.D. 1791 and 1799, also it is classed, 23. G. 20., according to the Academy's present library arrangement. In the Tenth Volume of the O'Longan Manuscripts, classed 23. E. 16., and commencing, at p. 329, there is a copy of St. Fiach's Metrical Life of St. Patrick, in 134 verses, beginning with, Seanaor patrúic i n-Emtor, "Patrick was born at Emtor." In the Eighteenth Volume of the O'Longan Manuscripts, there is "Hymnus Sancti Secundini seu Seachlan in Laudem Sancti Patricii." It seems to have been taken from Colgan, and it begins with, "Audite omnes amantes Dominum sancta merita," pp. 79 to 82. It is classed 23. N. 15. There is to be found, likewise, at pp. 90 to 92, a Latin translation of St. Fiach's Hymn, beginning with, "Natus est Sanctus Patricius Nemturi."

<sup>227</sup> Among Hodges and Smith's collection of Manuscripts, according to the old Catalogue, there is, in No. 12, a small 4to paper, at p. 186, the beginning of an Irish "Life of St. Patrick," which states, that our Apostle was born in a town, called Tiburnia, in Britain, near to the city called Emtor. The whole is divided, into 22 chapters, and it ends with St. Patrick's pedigree, at p. 277. Its place in the Academy's Library is 23. B. 1. This seems to have been transcribed, in 1815, by Timothy O'Connell, at Sundays' Well, near Cork. In No. 40, a in the General Catalogue,<sup>228</sup> compiled by the late Professor Eugene O'Curry. Although several of these are only mere transcripts; yet, it is useful to have the modern rendering of old tracts, as this helps to explain the precise mean-small 4to paper, there is an imperfect Life of St. Patrick, from p. 1, in 20 chapters—at the latter chapter it breaks off unfinished, in 50 written pages, but it is a Life similar to the foregoing one. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. M. 52. In No. 41, small 4to paper, at pp. 1 to 3, there is a brief history of St. Patrick's birth and of his mission to Ireland. This little tract states, that he was born in the town called Eptor, Provence, in France. This was transcribed, by Michael Mahony of Ardee, in the county of Kerry, A.D. 1821. Its place, in the Aca. Lib., is 23. B. 13. In No. 54, small 4to paper, at p. 99, begins a Life of St. Patrick, of which only chap. i. and part of chap. 2 are given, leaving blank paper to be filled up, which, however, was not done. The writing ends, at p. 107. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. M. 20. In No. 57, small 4to paper, after p. 87 is a page, numbered 3, and beginning; Ἡ βίη τοῦ ἁγίου πατρὸς, i.e. Life of St. Patrick. This page and three following pages are written, in a different hand, and in varying ink and paper. It then appears to go on, in the handwriting of Philip Waters, who transcribed, about 1776, or 1777, to p. 82, where the tract ends. It is somewhat soiled, but not illegible, at p. 48. Its place, in the Aca. Lib., is 23. C. 32. In No. 61, small 4to paper, from pp. 397 to 498, there is a Life of St. Patrick, transcribed by Dermot O'Mulqueen, of the county of Clare, between the years 1766 and 1769. The writer lived to be a very old man, about 1808, when he was seen by Mr. O'Curry. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. L. 24. In No. 150, 4to paper, there is a Life of St. Patrick, pp. 1 to 54, supposed to have been translated from Jocelyn. This was written by John Murphy, of Raithneach, near White Church, in the county of Cork, A.D. 1740. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. M. 50. In No. 154, 4to paper, from pp. 257 to 290, there is a good Life of St. Patrick, but, in Mr. O'Curry's opinion, not an original one. It is thought, rather to have been made up from Colgan's and from others' published Lives. It was transcribed, about 1800. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. L. 29. In No. 168, small 4to paper, from fol. 145 a. to fol. 148 b. there is a Life of St. Patrick, after Jocelyn, but imperfect, and several blank leaves follow. This was written, by Eugene Cavanagh, in 1817. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. A. 44. In No. 179, small 4to paper, there is a sketch of the Life of St. Patrick, pp. 169 to 194, supposed by Mr. O'Curry, to have been written by Patrick Den, of Modeligo, in the county of Waterford, about the year 1800. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. L. 12. In No. 185, small 4to paper, there is the Hymn of St. Fiach, in praise of St. Patrick, but, this copy is inaccurate and imperfect, containing only 116 verses, while the beautiful copy on vellum, in Trinity College Library, contains 136 verses. It begins with, Ἐκείνην ἡμέραν ἡ νεαμτορ, "Patrick was born at Neamtora," pp. 57 to 60. It is written, in a good hand. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. L. 16. In a small 4to paper is St. Seachnall's Hymn on St. Patrick, pp. 79 to 82. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. N. 15. In No. 191, a small 8vo paper volume of 45 pages, but only alternate pages written on, there is the versification of a great part of St. Patrick's Life, by Jocelyn, but 9 pages are wanting, at the beginning, and it ends imperfectly. It is in the handwriting of Humphry O'Sullivan, of Callan, and apparently composed by himself, in the earlier part of the present century. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. A. 34. In No. 219, a small 4to paper, there is at the commencement, imperfect, the conclusion of the eleventh chapter of St. Patrick's Life, translated from Jocelyn. There is also a chasm, at the end of the fourteenth chapter; but, from that, to the end of the 22nd and last chapter, at p. 43, there is no interruption. This volume seems to have been transcribed, by John O'Connell, of the county of Cork, A.D. 1766. Its place in the Aca. Lib. is 23. N. 19.

<sup>228</sup> The Book of Lismore, of which Professor O'Curry's transcript is in the Royal Irish Academy, contains an ancient Life of St. Patrick; or, rather, an abstract for his festival day, fol. 1 to 8. It states, that he was born at Nemthur, near Alcluaid, in Britain, that his mother was a French woman, and that his father was of Jewish or Israelite extraction, having descended from a refugee, who came from Jerusalem, at the time of its destruction, by Titus and Vespasian. The style is brief and forcible, and the language pure and classic. Folios 4 and 5 are missing, from this tract. Its place in the Aca. Cat. is 23. Q. There is another ancient sermon, on the Life of St. Patrick, in the Leabhar Breac, and differing in some details, from the foregoing. This serves to show, that there was no standard sermon, on our saint, in ancient times. His panegyrics seem to have varied, according to the written evidences used, or the local recollections of each district. In the Leabhar Breac sermon, fol. 11 to 15, St. Patrick's pedigree is carried to Britti, from whom Britain derived its name, and, he is said to have been born, at Nemthur, near Alcluaid. The small 4to paper, classed 23. A. 15., commences, at p. 323, an ancient Life of St. Patrick, begin-ings of obsolete words, and of old phrases, which, otherwise, might be rather difficult to understand. There is another singular circumstance to be observed, in those various copies of the Life of St. Patrick. Although, in a great measure, they have some similarity, in the quantity and kind of details; they differ considerably, notwithstanding, in their arrangement and order. They appear, for the most part, as if collected, by various authors, from some general source, but taken at different times and from diverse points of view. Or, perhaps, one person compiled an original, and, in the lapse of ages, local additions were frequently made. However, for purposes of historical research, they are uninviting. Among the Manuscripts of Trinity College,<sup>229</sup> of the Catholic University,<sup>230</sup> and of the Franciscan Convent,<sup>231</sup> we possess many Codices, containing different Lives of St. Patrick. Some of these, however, are mostly of a legendary character; while others are only fragmentary, or contain short notices, relating to our saint. Nor do those depositories preserve all the various Manuscripts, which are to be found in Ireland alone; as even Irish scribes have copied tracts in the vernacular, for their own and for the use of others. Thus, I may be permitted to state, that Mr. Andrew O'Sullivan, of Cahirciveen,<sup>232</sup> among his collection of seven beautifully transcribed Irish Manuscripts, had one, containing Lives of the Irish Saints, with Poems and other Tracts, relating to our national hagiology.<sup>233</sup> In the British Museum Library,<sup>234</sup> in Lambeth,<sup>235</sup> and in the Bodleian Library,<sup>236</sup> at Oxford, there are ning with the following Latin sentence, "Populus qui sedebat in tenebris videt lucem magnam." The Life ends, at p. 356. The Lives of St. Patrick, preserved in the Leabhar Breac, pp. 24 to 29, and, in the Book of Lismore, begin with precisely the same Latin sentence, and all three proceed with little difference to the end, except that the introductory part is abridged, in the present copy, while the language is much modified and corrupted. This copy contains some few details, not to be found in the other copies. None of them, however, is the Tripartite Life, published by Colgan. In the folio paper, classed 24. D. 4., from pp. 145 to 148, there are translations, by Edward O'Reilly, from the Irish Sketch of St. Patrick's Life, preserved in the ancient Book of Armagh. The Irish of this translation will be found published, in Sir William Betham's "Irish Antiquarian Researches," part ii. Appendix, p. xl. to xliii. The Latin Poem of St. Sechnall on St. Patrick, beginning with, "Audite omnes," with an Irish gloss, is in the published "Leabhar Breac," at fol. 238 a to 238 b. According to Mr. O'Curry's "Catalogue of Irish Manuscripts in the Royal Irish Academy," Hodges and Smith's collection has two missing folios of this Manuscript. See First Series, vol. ii., pp. 590, 710.

<sup>229</sup> Thus, the Manuscript, classed B. 1. 5., contains an Office of St. Patrick, at fol. 122 a.; the Manuscript, classed B. 1. 16, has a Vita S. Patricii, Epis. et Confes., in 40 columns, with a tract, "De Purgatorio Hiberniae," in 24 columns, with at least one leaf, if not more leaves than one, missing, at the end; the Manuscript, classed C. 4. 3., contains a Legend of St. Patrick; the Manuscript, classed E. 3. 28., includes an English extract from a Life of St. Patrick, as also Fiach's Irish Hymn in praise of St. Patrick, with English notes; the Manuscript, classed F. 4. 6., has a Vita S. Patricii, by Jocelyn; the Manuscript, classed H. 1. 11., has a Life of St. Patrick, beginning with, "Populus qui sedebat," &c.; besides these chief tracts, there are genealogies, notices in Kalendars, and tracts, serving to illustrate St. Patrick's Acts.

<sup>230</sup> Those Manuscripts, transcribed by Professor Eugene O'Curry.

<sup>231</sup> Here are yet preserved some of the original Lives of St. Patrick, with notes, as printed in the "Trias Thaumaturga." Also, the original of St. Fiech's Hymn, with the scholia, as published by Colgan, is to be found, in the Franciscan copy of the "Liber Hymnorum."

<sup>232</sup> This highly intelligent man was over 80 years of age, in July, 1871, when the author had the pleasure of being invited to inspect his Manuscripts, and to hear from the owner an account, regarding their transcribers and contents. About this time, also, the writer met with Mr. J. D. Nagle, an Irish scholar and antiquary of Dingle, who had transcribed some pages of Irish historical Manuscripts.

<sup>233</sup> This large paper Manuscript contained 463 elegantly and closely-written pages, in the Irish character, in the handwriting of Andrew O'Sullivan. It opened with a Life of St. Patrick, and gave a short preparatory account of Calphurnius, his father, as also of his mother, and alluding to the saint having been born at Tabernia and Emptor. It contained 8 pages. At some interval removed,

Manuscript Lives of St. Patrick. Thus, in the collection of John Leland, the antiquary, we find, "Ex duobus libris Gul. Meldunensis, quos de Vita S. Patricii ad Monachos Glassoburgenses scripsit."<sup>237</sup> This Tract appears to consist of 8 folios, or pages, and it was procured, from the Canons of Twinham, "sive Medinenses in Provincia Avoniæ littoralis." The writer promised to produce, "De Reditu Patricii in Britanniam;" but, it is not known, if the latter intended work be extant.<sup>238</sup> Again, at Cambridge,<sup>239</sup> and in various other places, throughout England,<sup>240</sup> we find various and distinctive memoirs of our saint. Among the Stowe Manuscripts, there is a folio paper Irish there was another brief account of Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, pp. 60, 61. It also contained a Tract, Patrick's Benediction to the Men of Munster.

<sup>234</sup> The late Professor Eugene O'Curry has catalogued the valuable collection of Irish Manuscripts here preserved. And, from a copy of this Catalogue, now kept in the Royal Irish Academy, the following several Lives of our saint are thus described: In the library classification, noted Egerton, 112, there is a paper folio of 1,066 pages, written by Maurice O'Connor; and, it begins with an Irish Life of St. Patrick, translated from Jocelyn, pp. 1 to 68. This has allusion to Tiburnia, Empter, and Caliphurnus. The Manuscript was commenced 13th June, 1780, on the Belle Rock, in Cork. Again, in Egerton, 138, there is a small paper 4to, of 127 pages, and it contains, at p. 51, a spurious and an imperfect poetic Dialogue, between Oisín and Patrick. Also, a poem, Rules for a Life of Piety, as practised by St. Patrick, and beginning with, Ṭṛí cāozā ppaílm luatocap úb. "Thrice fifty psalms remember ye." It begins at p. 74, and it purports to be taken, from an ancient Life of St. Patrick. This Manuscript was written, about the year 1807, chiefly in one Michael O'Clery's handwriting. Again, in Egerton, 154, is a quarto paper MS. of 166 pages, and it was written by the late Edward O'Reilly of Dublin. It contains the Life of St. Patrick, in verse, by Fiech, first Bishop of Sleibhte, At p. 78, it begins with, Ṣenap pāpāic in emcūp, "Patrick was born at Emor." Also, in Egerton, 170, there is a paper 4to, of 111 folios, in different hands, and it has an Irish Life of St. Patrick, and compiled in modern times, but from older Lives. Probus and Jocelyn are quoted in it, at p. 94, fol. 63, and one Owen McGrath, an Irish bard of the fourteenth century, at p. 100. It begins with, "Ecce Sacerdos Magnus qui in diebus suis placuit Deo." Then commences in Irish, as peo, &c. It ends, by asking the blessing of God, on the soul of Teige O'Sullivan.

<sup>235</sup> St. Patrick's Life, is thus mentioned, as a MS. of Lambeth, and classed, 623, ff. 13-15, vell. 4to. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, to the end of the Reign of Henry VII.," vol. i., part i., p. 69.

<sup>236</sup> Besides those elsewhere noticed, we find described a Vita S. Patricii Episcopi, MS. Bodl. 285. (2430) ff. 143-149. vell. folio. dble. col. xiii. cent. This is the same text, as that in the Cambridge Library, to which Ussher refers, Ff. 1. 27. 21. Again, a Vita S. Patricii MS. Bodl. Laud. Misc. 315, (1055) ff. 100 b.—103. vell. 4to. xiii. cent. De S. Patricio MS. Bodl. 336. (2337) f. 78, vell. folio. dble. col. xiv. cent. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 66 to 70.

<sup>237</sup> In vol. ii., p. 29. No. 5103.

<sup>238</sup> To the foregoing notices, we find added, "Nescio an quod ille opus forsitan imperfectum reliquerit, an quod Codices in quos incidi mutili fuerint, quorum duos Glassoburgi inveni, ubi Patricium prædicant Monachi sepultum esse, reclamante hoc disticho ex Beda (nisi fallor) Epigrammatibus desumpto

Calpurnus genuit istum, alma Britannia misit, Gallia nutrit, tenet artus Scotia felix.

<sup>239</sup> In addition to what is elsewhere noted, we find a Tract, De S. Patricio, thus classed: MS. C.C.C. Cant. 145. sm. fol. vel. xiv. cent. It is in old English, followed by the account of the Purgatory of St. Patrick, and nearly the same as Robert of Gloucester's Life. Again, there is a Vita S. Patricii, comprised in 200 chapters, and described in MS. Trin. Coll. Cant. B. 15, 25. vell. folio, xv. cent. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 68, 69.

<sup>240</sup> There is S. Patricii Libellus, MS. Moore Norwic. Epis. This is mentioned in Montfaucon's "Bibliotheca," and it is probably the same as No. 924 or MS. 55, in the "Catalogi Librorum Manuscriptorum Angliæ et Hiberniæ," &c. Some of Bishop Moore's MSS. are in the Public Library, at Cambridge. See ibid., p. 71.

<sup>241</sup> Dr. Charles O'Connor, when describing the Duke of Buckingham's Manuscripts, names it, "Leabhar Gabhallas, et Vita Hibernica SS. Patricii, et Calieni, cum Carminibus nonnullis S. Columbæ." Although he describes this Manuscript, however, he does one,<sup>241</sup> in the Irish characters,<sup>242</sup> having two leaves lost, at the beginning,<sup>243</sup> and it contains a Life of St. Patrick. In the Library of Middlehill,<sup>244</sup> we also find a Life of St. Patrick.<sup>245</sup> In the Roman<sup>246</sup> and Parisian<sup>247</sup> Libraries, other Acts of our saint are deposited. In Florence,<sup>248</sup> in the Benedictine Library of Monte Cassino,<sup>249</sup> in the Library of Charleville,<sup>250</sup> as also in the Public Library of Bruxelles,<sup>251</sup> there are Lives of the Irish Apostle. Among the Manuscripts of St. Gall's Monastery, there are, Excerpta ex Vita Patricii; and, in addition, there is a MS. Genealogia Sci Patricii. Several short pieces are passed over, for the present, as only relating to some particular phases of the Irish Apostle's career, or, as having only a doubtful application, to the real incidents of his life. Those enumerated Manuscript biographies, or tracts, however, by no means exhaust the list of unpublished materials, for illustrating our saint's Acts; since the public libraries, at home and abroad, as also private collections, abound in further interesting mementoes concerning him, and which might serve the diligent student's purpose, in the matter of investigating his history.

It formed one of many curious paradoxes of a pseudo-Irish antiquary, the Rev. Edward Ledwich,<sup>252</sup> to maintain, that St. Patrick was a purely mythical personage, and that he had no real existence.<sup>253</sup> It seems most incomprehensible to understand, how any man, with the slightest pretensions to Irish historical knowledge,<sup>254</sup> could ignore the numerous native writers, from the fifth to the present century, who have treated, about the illustrious Apostle of Ireland, in their respective works. Nor is this all, for even some of the most celebrated Irish, English, Scotch, and foreign writers, at times remote, allude to his life and labours, in terms of the highest commendation. Foremost among these, we may mention, besides the writers already quoted, St.

any special account of the portion of it, referring to St. Patrick's Life.

<sup>242</sup> This was transcribed, in the reign of Charles I.

<sup>243</sup> The remaining written pages are 492, and it is a transcript from the original of O'Duвеgan, a learned Irish antiquary. There is also "Beatha Naomh Pattraic; or Life of St. Patrick," imperfect 4to paper. Six pages. See Rev. Charles O'Connor's "Bibliotheca MS. Stowensis," No. xxii., vol. i., pp. 115 to 118, and No. xxxiii., p. 157.

<sup>244</sup> Belonging to Sir Thomas Phillipps.

<sup>245</sup> This is a Vita Sancti Patricii, and described, as a MS. Phillipps, 4705. vel. fol. xii. cent. ex Bibl. Monasterii de Alna. See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., p. 69.

<sup>246</sup> Thus described: Vita Patricii, MS. Bibl. Petavii in Vaticana, and Quædam de Sancto Patricio, Bibl. Reginae Christianæ in Vaticana. 345. (964.) 1282 (1694.) Also, Vita S. Patricii MS. Vaticellan. H. 7. See ibid., p. 70.

<sup>247</sup> Thus described: Vita S. Patricii. MS. Bibl. du Roi 1773. 19. olim Bethune. vell. xiii. cent. See ibid., p. 70.

<sup>248</sup> There is "Anonymi Carmina quædam Anepigrapha de S. Patricio, Calpurnio, et Cellano." MS. Laurentianæ Medicæ ii. 812. Cod. vi. See ibid., p. 70.

<sup>249</sup> Thus described: De S. Patricio Legenda MS. Montis Cassinensis 406. ff. 1—3 vell. folio xv. cent. See ibid., p. 70.

<sup>250</sup> Thus described: Vie de S. Patrice. (This appears to have been written in French.) MS. Bibl. de la Ville de Charleville, 3933, paper, folio. See ibid., p. 69.

<sup>251</sup> In the "Catalogue des Manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Royale des Ducs de Bourgogne, publié par ordre du Ministre de l'Intérieur," tome i. Résumé Historique, Inventaire, No. 2326, in a series of Lives of Irish Saints, is the Life of St. Patrick, beginning with "Populus qui sedebat in tenebris." See p. 47.

<sup>252</sup> See his "Antiquities of Ireland," sect. vi., Of the Introduction of Christianity, and of St. Patrick, pp. 54 to 69.

<sup>253</sup> No doubt, Dr. Ledwich cites an opinion, to this effect, of one Dr. Ryves, an Irish Master in Chancery, A.D. 1618, in his work, Regim. Anglic. in Hib., p. 47, et seq.

<sup>254</sup> Ledwich most presumptuously has asserted, "It is an undoubted fact, that St. Patrick is not mentioned by any author or in any work of veracity, in the 5th, 6th, 7th, or 8th centuries."—Ibid., p. 67. Another ridiculous argument of Ledwich is, that because many fables are to be found in St. Patrick's Acts, and because doubts are entertained about the writers, we are therefore to deny the saint's actual existence.

<sup>255</sup> His festival occurs on the 25th of June. An interesting account of him, and of his

Prosper<sup>255</sup> of Aquitaine, in Gaul, who was born about the beginning of, and he belonged to, the fifth century. He was a learned theologian, and historian, as also a poet. He mentions the mission of St. Palladius,<sup>256</sup> in his Chronicle, to the Scots or Irish, at A.D. 431, and its failure;<sup>257</sup> but, Prosper<sup>258</sup> declares, also, that upon the news of his death, in the land of the Picts, Patrick, another agent, is sent by Celestine, the Bishop and Pope of Rome, to convert the Scots to the faith of Christ. He, states, moreover,<sup>259</sup> that having ordained a bishop for the Scots, while Celestine endeavoured to keep the Roman Island, or Britain, Catholic,<sup>260</sup> he also made the barbarous island, by which he means heathen Ireland, Christian.<sup>261</sup> The death of St. Prosper is commonly assigned, to A.D. 455;<sup>262</sup> others extend his life, however, to after the year 463.<sup>263</sup> Again, St. Fiech, his old Scholiast, and other writers, supposed to have flourished in the sixth century, have noticed the incidents of St. Patrick's career. St. Cumman, who flourished in the seventh century, mentions "Sanctus Patricius Papa noster,"<sup>264</sup> when he wrote the celebrated Paschal Epistle, about the year 634. Allusion is made to the holy Briton, St. Mochta,<sup>265</sup> or Maucteus, the disciple of St. Patrick, the Bishop,<sup>266</sup> by St. Adamnan,<sup>267</sup> who was born in or about the year 624, and who died, A.D. 704. Besides these, we have an account of our holy patron, in that ancient native author, whose notes on St. Patrick's Acts, Latin and Irish, are first met with, in the Book of Armagh. This Memoir, however, is defective, at the commencement. Those notes are stated, to be among the most ancient specimens known of narrative composition, in Irish and in Hiberno-Latin; while, they constitute some of the oldest writings, now extant, in connexion with St. Patrick. They purport to have been originally taken down, by Bishop Tirechan, from Ultan, Bishop of Ardraccan, towards A.D. 650, and, by Muirchu Maccu Machteni, at the request of his preceptor, Aed, Bishop of Sletty, in the same century.<sup>268</sup> The Venerable Bede,<sup>269</sup> who flourished in the seventh and eighth centuries, has entered the festival of St. Patrick, in his Martyrology, at the 17th of March.<sup>270</sup> He lived from about writings, will be found, in the Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. vi. June xxv.

<sup>256</sup> His festival occurs, at the 6th of July.

<sup>257</sup> See the "Chronicon Imperiale," A.D. 431.

<sup>258</sup> See a very complete account of him, and of his writings, in the Benedictine "Histoire Littéraire de la France," tome ii., sects. i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi., pp. 369 to 406.

<sup>259</sup> See Prosper, Cont. Collator. cap. 41, in fine.

<sup>260</sup> See Rev. Dr. Ed. Stillingfleet's "Origines Britannicæ, or, the Antiquities of the British Churches," chap. ii., pp. 52, 53.

<sup>261</sup> See on this subject, "An Historical Account of Church Government, as it was in Great Britain and Ireland, when they first received the Christian Religion," by William Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, chap. ii., sects. 1, 2, 3, 4, pp. 48 to 60.

<sup>262</sup> The best edition of his works is the Benedictine folio, Paris, A.D. 1711. See "The Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography," vol. vi., p. 740.

<sup>263</sup> See M. le Dr. Hoefer's "Nouvelle Biographie générale depuis les Temps les plus reculés jusqu'à nos Jours," tome xli., cols. 89 to 91.

<sup>264</sup> See Ussher's "Veterum Epistolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge." Epist. xi., p. 32.

<sup>265</sup> Of Lughmagh, or Louth. His feast occurs, on the 19th of August.

<sup>266</sup> See the Second Preface, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," p. 6.

<sup>267</sup> His festival is kept, on the 23rd of September.

<sup>268</sup> See "Facsimiles of National Manuscripts of Ireland," by J. T. Gilbert, F.S.A., M.R.I.A., part i. Introduction, p. xiv.

<sup>269</sup> In some Martyrologies, he has a festival, at the 26th of May.

<sup>270</sup> There, he states, at xvi. Kal. Apr., "In Scotia S. Patricii Confessoris." See the Bollandists' "Martyrologium Bedæ," in "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii. Martii. Prefacio, &c., p. xix. With this edition, the Bollandists place the additions of Florus and of other old Martyrologists. Yet, the foregoing extract, referring to our Apostle's feast, is an original entry from Bede himself; and, again, in a Metrical Martyrology, found at Rheims, with his name attached, under the title of MARTIUS, we read:

"Patricius Domini servus conscendit ad aulam."

<sup>271</sup> There is a fragment of the "History

672, or 673, to A.D. 735. Again, the old Celtic, or, British, author, generally known as Nennius,<sup>271</sup> has declared, in his "Historia Britonum,"<sup>272</sup> that no British writers could furnish him with records, and that his materials for history had been borrowed, from neighbouring nations. The work, which goes under his name, is of obscure origin, but the writer is said to have been Nennius, on the authority of a Prologue, or Prologues, in some Manuscript copies. He is called, likewise, the disciple of Elbodus, or Elvodugus, supposed to have been Elbodus, Bishop of North Wales.<sup>273</sup> Nennius thus says, we are to thank strangers for anything that we know, in those more ancient times, of our people, of our religion, or of our island.<sup>274</sup> Such a statement occurs, in his Preface and Apology.<sup>275</sup> This ancient historian, who had been styled "another Gildas," by many monkish writers, it is thought, lived in West Britain, or Wales. Gale states, that he flourished A.D. 620.<sup>276</sup> Other writers assign his period, to about the year 760. He flourished, as Ussher supposed, in 808.<sup>277</sup> However, this work has been interpolated, by different writers. It is related, there, that when St. Palladius left Ireland, he went to Britain, and died in Pictland. Nennius then declares, that on receiving an account of Palladius' death, Patrick, another agent, was sent by Celestine, to convert the Scots to the faith of Christ.<sup>278</sup> Besides the different Latin copies of Nennius extant, we find, that Irish versions were in circulation.<sup>279</sup> One of these has been ably edited, for the Irish Archæological Society,<sup>280</sup> and, it contains very curious references, to the Pagan and Christian history of Ireland,<sup>281</sup> of the Britons," by Nennius; translated into Gaelic, by Gilla Caomhain, the poet and chronologist, who died A.D. 1072. This is to be found, in one of the oldest, among our Irish Manuscripts now preserved, and which is known by the name of "Leabhar na h-Uidhre," or the "Book of the Dun Cow." Of this, however, only a fragment, at present remains, and it is kept in the Royal Irish Academy. It has been lately, most elegantly and accurately reproduced in lithograph, and edited, by Professor Bryan O'Looney, and Mr. Joseph O'Longan. As the edition had been limited to two hundred copies, it is already scarce. This Manuscript had been originally compiled, by Maelmuire, son of the son of Conn-na-m-Bocht, and the author was killed, in the middle of the great stone church of Cluainmacnoise, by a party of robbers, in the year 1106, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 982, 983, and n. (d.) Ibid. The contents of the MS., as they stand now, are of a mixed character, historical and romantic, and relate to the Tuatha Dé Danann and ante-Christian, as well as to the Christian period. A description of this Codex, and of its contents, is prefixed, by the editors, at pp. viii. to xxv. Another copy of the "Leabhar Breathneach," was to be found in the Book of Hy-Many, which formerly belonged to Sir William Betham.

<sup>272</sup> Among the Stowe Manuscripts, under Charles O'Connor's original correspondence, there is one thus described: Nos. lv. and lvi. 12. Index Rerum quæ in MSS. Codicibus Vallicellianis continentur, et de quibusdam Britannicis et Hibernicis. Amongst these is "Historia Brittonum, edita ab Anachoreta Marco, ejusdem Gentis S. Episcopo."—Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Bibliotheca MSS. Stowensis," vol. i., p. 184.

<sup>273</sup> He died, A.D. 809. See Henry Morley's "English Writers," vol. i., book i., chap. xi., p. 386.

<sup>274</sup> See the edition, published by Thomas Gale, in his "Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxoniciæ, Anglo-Danicæ, Scriptores xv.," ex vetustis Codd. MSS. editi, p. 93. This work extends, through the following pages, to p. 139.

<sup>275</sup> The printed Latin editions of this work, are that edition, issued by Gale, at Oxford, A.D. 1691, that by C. Bertram, jointly with St. Gildas, at Copenhagen, in 1757, and 1758, in that by W. Gunn, B.D., London, 1819, and that by Jos. Stephenson, London, 1838.

<sup>276</sup> See, Prefacio ad Lectorem. Ibid.

<sup>277</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 494.

<sup>278</sup> See Nennii "Historia Britonum," cap. liv., lv., p. 112.

<sup>279</sup> The reader will find an account of Nennius and of his writings, in Thomas Wright's "Biographia Britannica Literaria," &c. Anglo-Saxon Period, sect. i., pp. 135 to 142.

<sup>280</sup> It is intitled: Leabhar breathneach annro pp. "The Irish Version of the Historia Britonum of Nennius." Edited with a Translation and Notes, by James Henthorn Todd, D.D., M.R.I.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, &c. The Introduction and Additional Notes, by the Hon. Algernon Herbert, Dublin, 1848, 4to.

<sup>281</sup> As explained in the Editor's Preface, the text of this published version has been and of the British nations. Various Manuscript copies of this work are to be found in different libraries, and great diversity exists, in the several copies preserved.<sup>282</sup> A most honourable account of St. Patrick's existence, mission, based chiefly on a MS. of Trinity College, Dublin, class H. Tab. 3. No. 17. xiv. or xv. cent. This was compared with the copy of a MS. in the Royal Irish Academy, found in the Book of Ballymote, and written in the xiv. cent.; as also, with another copy, in a MS. of the Royal Irish Academy, written in the xv. cent., and known as the Book of Lecan.

<sup>282</sup> Among these are the following, sometimes attributed to Gildas, in one instance to Caradoc, and sometimes to Nennius. They are thus noted, by Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy: Nennii Eulogium Britanniae MS. Coll. S. Trin. Cant., O. x. 18. f. 3., paper folio, xvii. cent. The copy from which Gale's edition was printed. Nennii Historia Britonum. MS. Bibl. Pub. Cant., Ff. i. 27. 2. pp. 14 b. 41. vell., small folio, dbl. cols., xii. cent. This was the copy, selected by Petrie, for his text, in the "Monumenta Historica Britannica." Nennii Historia Britonum; cum Appendice et Chronico subjectis, necnon tractatu de Mirabilibus Britanniae. Exemplar plenius, ut mihi videtur, quam alia quæ citantur et in pretio habentur, quamquam hucusque omnino ignotum. MS. Harl. 3859., Ff. 174 b-198., vell., small folio, x. or xi. cent. This is thought to be, the oldest copy known of Nennius. Res Gestæ Britonum, a Gilda Sapiente compositæ, a Bruto nempe ad Regem Arthurum, cum nominibus Civitatum quæ sunt in Britannia, et Enumeratione Mirabilium Britanniae. MS. Cott. Calig. A. viii., ff. 41-43 b., vell. 4to., xii. cent. This MS. is marked H, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia de Britannia, emendate scripta. MS. Cott. Vespas., D. xxi., Ff. 1-34 b., vell., small 4to., xii. cent. This MS. is marked Y, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia Britonum, a cap. 2. editionis Galeanæ. Exemplar antiquum et nitidum. MS. Cott. Vitell., A. xiii., Ff. 90 b.-99 b., vell. 4to., xiii. cent. This MS. is marked AA, in Petrie's list. De Britannia et ejus Mirabilibus; inscribitur Gildæ. MS. Cott. Vespas. B. xxv., Ff. 126 b.-143 b., vell., small folio., xii. cent. It is marked Z, in Petrie's list. Gildas Minor aut Nennius. MS. Bodl. 163. 3. (2016). vell. 8vo., xii. cent. This MS. is marked K, in Petrie's list. Gesta Britonum, a Gilda Sapiente composita, MS. Eccl. Dunelm., B. ii. 35. b., vell., large folio, xii. cent. This MS. is denoted as C, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia Britonum. MS. Bibl. Pub. Cant., Mm. 1. 29, vell., xii. cent. This MS. is marked L, in Petrie's list. Gesta Britonum a Gilda Sapiente edita. MS. Bibl. du Roi., 6274. 1. (Reg. 10. 508) olim Baluz. 852., vell. 4to., xii. cent. It is noted as N, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia Britonum.

MS. Bibl. du Roi., Suppl. Lat. 165-16, vell. folio, xii. cent. This professes to have been written, A.D. 994. MS. Bibl. du Roi., S. Victor., 567, vell. xii. cent. This MS. is marked Q, in Petrie's list. Res Gestæ a Nennio Sapiente compositæ. MS. C. C. C. Cant., 139, vell., small folio., dbl. cols., xiii. cent. It is B, in Petrie's list. Exceptiones de Libro Gildæ Sapiensis, quem composuit de primis Habitatoribus Britanniae et de Excidio ejus. Sic inscribitur in Rubrica, est enim, revera, Nennii Historia Britonum; cui subjungitur Tractatus de Mirabilibus Britanniae, quæ sunt xxi. MS. Cott. Nero, D. viii., Ff. 63-71, vell. folio., xiii. cent. It is marked Q, in Petrie's list. Gilda Sapiensis de Gestis Britonum Liber. MS. Bibl. Reg., 13. D. v. 2. Ff. 38-43, vell. folio., dbl. cols., xiii. cent. It is marked S, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia Britonum. MS. Coll. S. Johan. Baptist., Oxon., 99, 3. vell., small folio, xiii. cent. It is noted as F, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia Britonum. MS. Bibl. Pub. Cant., II. vi. 11., vell., small folio., xiii. cent. This is marked M, in Petrie's list. Gildæ Sapiensis Liber de Gentis Britonum Origine. MS. Bibl. du Roi., 5232., olim Colbert. vell. xiii. cent. It is marked P, in Petrie's list. Gildæ Historia de Gestis Anglorum. MS. Bibl. Pub., Rothomag., 123, vell., xiii. cent. It is marked R, in Petrie's list. Nennii Apologia Gentis Britonum. MS. Burney., 310. Ff. 315-330 b., vell. folio., dbl. cols., written, A.D. 1381. Gildæ Sapiensis, de Rebus Gestis Britonum, Historia. MS. Cott., Jul. D., v. Ff. 1-12 b., vell. small 4to., xiv. cent. Petrie marks it I, in his list. Historia Britonum, a Gilda Sapiente. MS. Coll. Arm. Norf. 30. vell. 4to., xiv. cent. Petrie marks it W. Nennii Historia Britonum. MS. Conybeare (olim Dering). vell., xiv. cent. It is marked T, in Petrie's list. Liber Gildæ Sapiensis, de Gestis Britonum. MS. C. C. C. Cant., 363, vell., xv. cent. This is marked O, in Petrie's list. Caradoci Lancarvanensis Historia Britonum. MS. Bibl. Reg., 13. B. vii. Ff. 1-19 b., paper, small folio., xiv. cent. The text is marked D, in Petrie's list. Gildæ Sapiensis, de Gestis Britonum, Liber. MS. Bibl. Reg., 13. B. xv., Ff. 1-16, paper, folio., xvi. cent. It is marked U, in Petrie's list. Exceptiones de Libro Gildæ Sapiensis de primis Habitatoribus Britanniae. MS. Cott., Vitell. F. ix. ff. 241 b.-251., paper, folio., xvi. cent. Gildas, rectius Nennius, Chronicon Britanniae. MS. Sloane, 4787, f. 111., paper, large 4to., xvii. cent. A modern transcript. Nennii Res Gestæ Britonum. MS. C. C. C., Cant. 101., pp. 7-43, apostolical labours, and sanctity, may be found in that work, of St. Eric,<sup>283</sup> or Heiric, of Auxerre, and which relates poetically the Life and Miracles of St. Germanus, Bishop of Tours.<sup>284</sup> Born about the year 834, Eric finished this work, after the middle of that century, and he died about the year 881.<sup>285</sup> St. Rabanus Maurus,<sup>286</sup> St. Ado,<sup>287</sup> and Usuard,<sup>288</sup> who flourished in the ninth century,<sup>289</sup> in their respective Martyrologies, as also Notker or Notger,<sup>290</sup> the monk of St. Gall, in the ninth and tenth centuries, record St. Patrick. In the learned Chronicle<sup>291</sup> of St. Marianus Scottus,<sup>292</sup> who lived in the eleventh century, an account of St. Patrick is to be found, at A.D. 372, 388, 394, 402, 431, and 491.<sup>293</sup> Again, Ricemarc, who flourished in the eleventh century,<sup>294</sup> mentions our Apostle. Sigibert was born about the year 1030, and he became a monk at Gemblours, in Flanders. He was esteemed the best poet, and the most universal scholar, of the eleventh century. He makes honourable mention of our saint, in his Chronicle. This work is held in high estimation, for its accuracy. Sigibert died at Gembloux, on the 5th of October, A.D. 1112.<sup>295</sup> Towards the end of the eleventh century, William of Malmesbury was born.<sup>296</sup> He wrote the Lives of St. Patrick<sup>297</sup> and of St.

paper, folio., xvi. cent. Marked E, in Petrie's list. Nennii Historia de Britonibus, a vetustissimo ejusdem Historiæ exemplari, in publica Academiæ Cantabrigiensi Bibliotheca reposito, descripta. MS. Harl., 624. f. 35., paper, folio, xvii. cent. Nennii Historia Britonum. MS. Hunter, Glasgow, 329 (469), 4to. Nennii, Britonum Historiographi, Eulogium Britanniae, sub. Gildæ Sapiientis larva diu exceptum. MS. Trin. Coll., Dublin, 329 (469), 4to. Nennii, Britonum Historiographi, Eulogium Britanniae, sub. Gildæ Sapiientis larva diu exceptum. MS. Trin. Coll., Dublin, 460 (600). Gesta Britonum, codex a Gilda compositus. MS. olim More Ep. Norwic. 91 (927?), vell. folio. Liber S. Gildæ Abbatis de Gestis Anglorum. MS. olim More. Ep. Norwic. 289 (9475). vell. Gildas Sapiens, qualiter Angli inhabitant, sive de Gestis Britonum. MS. olim More. Ep. Norwic. (p. 390 a.) among the "omissa." Gildæ Sapiientis, aut potius Nennii, Historia. A.D. 687. Britonum. MS. Trin. Coll., Dublin, 284 (424). f. 524. Gildas de primis Habitatoribus Britanniae, MS. Bibl. Publ., Bale. Nennii Historia Britonum, ex Libro de Ballimote. MS. Phillippis, 10272, paper, 4to, xix. cent. See "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials, relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 318 to 337.

<sup>283</sup> His festival is assigned, to the 24th of June, when the Bollandists have an account of him.

<sup>284</sup> This is comprised, in Six Books. St. Germanus was born, about the year 380, and, after rendering great services to Religion, he died, on the 31st of July, A.D. 448. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," vol. vii., xxvi. July.

<sup>285</sup> See an admirable account of his Life and works, in the "Histoire Littéraire de la France," tome v., sect. i., ii., pp. 535 to 543.

<sup>286</sup> His festival occurs, at the 4th of February, on which day he died, about A.D. 856.

<sup>287</sup> He died in the year 875. See an account of him, in Moreri's "Grand Dictionnaire Historique," tome i., pp. 148, 149. A Paris, 1759, fol.

<sup>288</sup> He died, on the 8th of January, A.D. 876 or 877.

<sup>289</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 427.

<sup>290</sup> He was born, about the year 830, and he died on the 16th of April, A.D. 912. See M. le Dr. Hoefer's "Nouvelle Biographie Générale, depuis les Temps les plus reculés jusqu'à nos Jours," tome xxxviii., col. 300.

<sup>291</sup> See the valuable edition of G. Waitz, in Georgius Henricus Pertz's "Monumenta Germaniæ Historica," tomus v., pp. 481 to 564.

<sup>292</sup> His festival is kept, on the 30th of January.

<sup>293</sup> It must be observed, however, that the editor deems these notices to be insertions, by some writer unknown; and, as such, they are placed, within brackets, in his edition.

<sup>294</sup> He became Bishop of St. David's, A.D. 1088. He wrote, "Vita S. Davidis," some MS. copies of which are extant. See Bishop Tanner's "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," pp. 623, 624.

<sup>295</sup> See M. le Dr. Hoefer's "Nouvelle Biographie Générale, depuis les Temps les plus reculés jusqu'à nos Jours," tome lxiii., cols. 969, 970.

<sup>296</sup> See an account of him, and of his literary productions, in Henry Morley's "English Writers," vol. i., book i., chap. xiv., pp. 491 to 495.

<sup>297</sup> There is no known Manuscript of this Life, nor of the miracles of St. Benignus, by William of Malmesbury. However, there are extracts from his Life of St. Patrick, in Leland's "Collectanea."

Dunstan,<sup>298</sup> the Martyrdom of St. Indract,<sup>299</sup> and the Miracles of St. Benignus. Besides the foregoing, he compiled many valuable historical works, and he died, about A.D. 1142. Again, Giraldo Cambrensis,<sup>300</sup> who lived in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries,<sup>301</sup> alludes to St. Patrick. Also, a Life of St. Patrick, in verse, was written by Robert of Gloucester,<sup>302</sup> an English poet and historian.<sup>303</sup> It begins with these words: "Seyn Patric com thorn Godes grace to preci in Irlonde." Of him, Fuller says very quaintly, "They speake truly, who term him a Rhimer; whilst such speake courteously, who call him a Poet. Indeed, such his language, that he is dumb in effect to the Readers of our age, without an Interpreter, and such a one will hardly be procured." He lived under King Henry II., and he may be presumed to have continued until 1200.<sup>304</sup> In addition to the foregoing, Mathæus Florilegus, who is also known, as Matthew of Westminster, was a Benedictine monk, and he flourished in the fourteenth century.<sup>305</sup> In his Chronicle, we find an interesting account of St. Patrick, where his death is recorded, at A.D. 491.<sup>306</sup> Many other mediæval writers might be quoted, in whose works, allusion has been made to the great Patron of Ireland. We do not pretend, to make a perfect enumeration of such authors here; but, it may be desirable to notice some of those, who have treated on his history.

Among the special writers of St. Patrick's Acts, in various languages, may be mentioned, Jacobus De Voragine, who lived in the thirteenth century, and who died towards its close. He left a Life of St. Patrick,<sup>307</sup> in the Legenda Aurea.<sup>308</sup> John of Teignmouth,<sup>309</sup> or Tinnmouth, a Benedictine monk, left a Manuscript collection, known as the "Sanctilogium, sive de Vitis et Miraculis Sanctorum Angliæ, Walliæ, Scotiæ et Hybernæ,"<sup>310</sup> in which several Saints' Acts are found,<sup>311</sup> arranged in Calendar order.<sup>312</sup> One of these Lives

<sup>298</sup> In the Bodleian Manuscript, Rawlinson, 263.

<sup>299</sup> This was abridged, from the Anglo-Saxon, in the Bodleian Manuscript, Digby, 112.

<sup>300</sup> In "Vita S. Davidis."

<sup>301</sup> See the account of him, in the Preface to the latest edition, "Giraldi Cambrensis Opera," edited by J. S. Brewer, vol. i., pp. ix. to xcv.

<sup>302</sup> These are copies of it: MS. Bodl. Tanner, 17. ff. 31—39 vell. 4to, xv. cent. This MS. has a full length painting of St. Patrick, fairly executed. MS. Ashmole, 43. ff. 34—41 b. vell. 4to, A.D. 1300. MS. Bodl. 779. ff. 10—17. paper 4to, xv. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. Misc. 315 (1055.) ff. 100 b.—103, vell. 4to, xiii. cent.

<sup>303</sup> See Bishop Tanner's "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," p. 636.

<sup>304</sup> See Thomas Fuller's "History of the Worthies of England," vol. i., Gloucestershire, p. 383. This work was first printed, in 1662. A new edition appeared, with a few explanatory notes, by John Nichols, F.S.A., at London, Edinburgh and Perth, A.D. 1811. 4to.

<sup>305</sup> See Henry Morley's "English Writers," vol. i., book i., chap. xxii., p. 711. Also, S. Austin Allibone's "Critical Dictionary of English Literature, and British and American Authors," vol. ii., pp. 1245, 1246.

<sup>306</sup> See "Flores Historiarum," pp. 176 to 178.

<sup>307</sup> See, De Sancto Patricio et de Purgatorio Suo, where a rude woodcut illustrates the text, at p. 114. Milan, A.D. 1519. In the edition of this work, printed A.D. 1505, we have also a Vita S. Patricii, at fol. xlix.

<sup>308</sup> At present, among the Stowe Manuscripts, there is a fine folio parchment copy of this work, in 484 pages. It is a Manuscript of the xiv. cent. The Life of St. Patrick commences, at fol. 57. For a further description, the reader is referred to Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Bibliotheca MS. Stowensis," vol. ii. No. xxxiv., pp. 44 to 46.

<sup>309</sup> He flourished, about the year 1366. See an interesting account of himself and of his works, in Bishop Tanner's "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," pp. 439, 440.

<sup>310</sup> Lib. ii.

<sup>311</sup> Each of these Lives is generally followed by a collect, styled "Narratio," but which has scarcely any connexion with the preceding subject.

<sup>312</sup> He begins with Edward the Confessor, at the 5th of January, and he ends apparently with Egwin, at the 30th of December. After this follow five more Lives, apparently omitted from their proper places, or else added as surplage.

<sup>313</sup> There is a MS. Life of St. Patrick, thus described: "De Sancto Patricio Episcopo et Confessore, MS. Cott. Tiber. E. i. ff. 61—65 b." In his Sanctilogium, No. 35, it is printed, as likewise in Capgrave's "Nova Legenda," ff. 259. b.—264 b. See has St. Patrick as the subject.<sup>313</sup> Omitting many of the collects, John Capgrave<sup>314</sup> seems only to have arranged alphabetically those Lives, although, indeed, his celebrity as a writer has eclipsed that of the original author. We find an account of St. Patrick, by Petrus de Natalibus,<sup>315</sup> by John Bale, Protestant Bishop of Ossory,<sup>316</sup> by the Centuriators of Magdeburgh,<sup>317</sup> by Edmund Campion,<sup>318</sup> by Pietro Galesini,<sup>319</sup> by Richard Stanihurst,<sup>320</sup> by Cardinal Baronius,<sup>321</sup> by Dr. Meredith Hanmer,<sup>322</sup> who died in Dublin, 1604,<sup>323</sup> by the Dominican Father, Alphonsus Ciaconius,<sup>324</sup> by Zacharias Lippeloo,<sup>325</sup> by William Thyer,<sup>326</sup> by Thomas Messingham,<sup>327</sup> who also compiled St. Patrick's Office,<sup>328</sup> by Thomas Dempster, who published his Menologium Scotorum,<sup>329</sup> and a History of the Scottish Church,<sup>330</sup> by Camerarius,<sup>331</sup> by Rev. Dr. Geoffry Keating,<sup>332</sup> in the early part of the seventeenth century,<sup>333</sup> and when the Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 20, note, 68, 69.

<sup>314</sup> His "Nova Legenda Angliæ" contains a Life of St. Patrick, Bishop and Confessor, at sexto decimo Kalendis Aprilis. See fol. cclx., cclxi., cclxii., cclxiii., cclxiiii., cclxv.

<sup>315</sup> See "Catalogus Sanctorum," fol. lxxiiii. Lugduni, 1514, small fol.

<sup>316</sup> See his "Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Britanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus," &c. Cent. i., No. xliiii., p. 43. Basileæ, 1557, folio.

<sup>317</sup> See "Quinta Centuria Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ," tomus ii., cent. v., cap. ii., col. 18, cap. v., cols. 641, 642, cap. vi., col. 682, cap. x., cols. 1427 to 1429. Basileæ, 1559 et seq. fol.

<sup>318</sup> See "A Historie of Ireland, written in the yeare 1571," cap. xii., xiii., pp. 51 to 61. Dublin, Reprint 1809. Royal 8vo.

<sup>319</sup> In his notes, to the Roman Martyrology, printed at Milan, in 1577.

<sup>320</sup> See "De Vita S. Patricii, Hiberniæ Apostoli," Libri ii. nunc primum in lucem editi, Auctore Richardo Stanihvrsto Dubliniensi, Antverpiæ, A.D. 1587, 12mo, a small work of only 86 pages, including a Dedication to Alexander Farnese, Duke of Parma and of Placentia, with a Preface, addressed to the reader.

<sup>321</sup> In "Annales Ecclesiastici," tomus v., sect. clxxxviii., p. 518, et seq., tomus vi., sect. xx., p. 399, Venetiis, 1705 et seq. The first edition of this celebrated work appeared, in twelve folio volumes, at Rome, A.D. 1588 to 1593. It brings the Annals of the Church down to the year 1198.

<sup>322</sup> See "Chronicle of Ireland," pp. 76 to 89, Dublin, Reprint 1809, Royal 8vo.

<sup>323</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book ii., chap. v., p. 328. Hanmer wrote an "Ephemeris of the Saints of Ireland," as we learn from the same authority.

<sup>324</sup> See "Vitæ et Gesta Summorum Pontificum a Christo Domino usque ad Clementem VII., pp. 118, 119, Romæ, 1601, fol.

<sup>325</sup> The First Volume of Lippeloo's "Vitæ

Sanctorum" records St. Patrick, Confessor, at the 17th of March. See pp. 981 to 984, Cologne, 1602, 12mo.

<sup>326</sup> See "Discursus Panegyrici de Nominibus Tribulationibus et Miraculis S. Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli," cum exhortatione ad Persecutiones pro fide patienter ferendas, et Apostrophe ad Iberniam, qui auctore eximio Domino ac Magistro Guilielmo Thyræo Ibero Corcagiensi Sacre Theologiæ Doctore, habiti sunt in Collegio Ibernorum Duaci, anno 1616. Duaci, 1617, 18mo.

<sup>327</sup> He published a Prologue, with Jocelyn's Life of St. Patrick, in 196 chapters. See "Florilegium Insulæ Sanctorum," pp. 1 to 85. Then follows, with Preface, Tractatus de Purgatorio Sancti Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli, by Henricus Salteriensis, xiii. chapters, pp. 86 to 109. Then follow, Elucidationes in Jocelinum, by David Roth, Bishop of Ossory, pp. 110 to 140. Parisiis, 1624, 4to.

<sup>328</sup> It was printed, in a work, "Officia SS. Patricii, Columbæ, Brigidæ, et aliorum quorundam Hiberniæ Sanctorum," Parisiis, 1620.

<sup>329</sup> It appeared, at Bologna, A.D. 1622, 4to: Bishop Forbes has republished it, in his "Kalendars of Scottish Saints."

<sup>330</sup> It first was issued at Bologna, A.D. 1627, 4to. A later edition has appeared, at Edinburgh, in 1829, 4to. We refer to the latter. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xv., num. 1001. S. Patricius, pp. 520 to 528.

<sup>331</sup> See "De Statu Hominis, Veteris simul ac novæ Ecclesiæ, et Infidelium Conversione," lib. i., pars. ii., cap. iii., sect. 2, pp. 166, 167. Catalavni, 1627, 4to.

<sup>332</sup> See "General History of Ireland," book ii. Duffy's edition, 1854, 8vo.

<sup>333</sup> We are told, he finished his History, in the Irish language, shortly after King Charles I. became king, which was in the year 1625. This History was multiplied, in Irish Manuscripts, by copyists. At last, one Dermot O'Connor translated it into English, and published it, in London, A.D. 1723, folio. The same year, it was printed in Dublin. Numerous editions of it have since appeared.

author was considerably advanced in years,<sup>334</sup> by Philip O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>335</sup> by Archbishop Ussher,<sup>336</sup> and by Juan Perez de Montalvan.<sup>337</sup> An anonymous Life of St. Patrick was published, at St. Omers, A.D. 1625.<sup>338</sup> This seems to have been re-issued, under the title, "Life of S. Patricke, Apostle and Primate of Ireland; together with the Lives of the Holy Virgin S. Bridget, and of the glorious Abbot S. Columbe, Patrons of Ireland."<sup>339</sup> St. Patrick's Purgatory,<sup>340</sup> and St. Patrick, his Purgatory,<sup>341</sup> were published in the seventeenth century, as also Colgan's celebrated Acts and Dissertations on our saint. Besides these are to be met with, Von der Fegfeuer Patricy in Ybernia,<sup>342</sup> and again, there is a folio of two leaves, De Purgatorio S. Patricii in Ybernia.<sup>343</sup> Again, François Bouillon,<sup>344</sup> published a "Histoire de la Vie et du Purgatoire de S. Patrice, archevesque et primat d'Hibernie;"<sup>345</sup> and, in the Italian language, Celso Falconi<sup>346</sup> produced another Tract, relating to St. Patrick. Various allusions to him are contained, in the works of Sir James Ware.<sup>347</sup> In the Anglo-Saxon Ecclesiastical History of Michael Alford,<sup>348</sup> he has noticed chronologically the incidents of St. Patrick's life. The great Bollandist collection,<sup>349</sup> as we may well suppose, contains a

<sup>334</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. xiv., pp. 105, 106.

<sup>335</sup> Among other valuable Irish works, he wrote, "Patriciana Decas, sive Libri Decem, quibus de Divi Patricii Vita, Purgatorio, Miraculis, rebusque gestis, de Religionis Ibernicæ Casibus, Constantia, Martyribus, Divis: De Anglorum lubrica fide; De Anglo-Hæreticæ Ecclesiæ sectis, Cacopresulibus, Jubileis plenissimis, liturgia, Sacra Pagina, Cæremoniis, et institutis accurate agitur," Matriti, 1629, 4to.

<sup>336</sup> See especially his "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii. The first edition of this work was issued, in Dublin, A.D. 1639, 4to, and the second, in London, A.D. 1687, fol.

<sup>337</sup> See "Patricio Vida y Purgatorio," por. Juan Perez de Montalvan. The first edition of this work appeared, A.D. 1627, the second, at Madrid, 1636, 8vo. Another edition was issued, at Seville, A.D. 1695, 12mo., and one at Segovia, A.D. 1780, 12mo. See also, "Le Vie admirable du grand S. Patrice Patriarche d'Hibernie," avec l'Histoire de son fameux, et tant renommé Purgatoire. Par Perez de Montalvan. Traduit en François, par F. A. S. Chartreux a Bruxelles, 1638. Bruxelles, A.D. 1640, 12mo. Another version of this work is to be met with: "Vita e Purgatorio de S. Patricio, Arcebispo, e Primaz de Hibernia," Escrita no idioma Castelhana pelo doutor Joam Perez de Montalvan, Natural da Villa de Madrid, e Notario da Santa Inquiçãõ de Castella: Exposta no Portuguez pelo Padre Manoel Caldeira a Offerecida a Gloriosissima S. Brisida, Princeza de Nericia, Viuva de Ulfo, Principe de Nericia por bento soares. Lisboa Occidental na Officina de Antonio Pedrozo Galraõ, M.DCC.XXXVII. Com todas as licenças necessarias, 18mo. Besides the Dedication and Preface, with an Index, this little work has Nine Chapters, in 137 pages.

<sup>338</sup> It bears for title, "Life of the Glorivous Bishop S. Patricke, Apostle and Primate of Ireland, together with the Lives of the Holy Virgin S. Bridgit and of the Glorivous Abbot Saint Colmbe, Patrons of Ireland," in 4to.

<sup>339</sup> At the end of Villegas' "Lives of the Saints," A.D. 1628, 4to.

<sup>340</sup> By Henry Jones, Bishop of Clogher, A.D. 1647, 4to.

<sup>341</sup> This has neither date, nor paging. It is a 4to, and a copy is to be found, in the British Museum.

<sup>342</sup> This is a folio of three leaves only, with a woodcut of Purgatory.

<sup>343</sup> It includes a woodcut. But neither of these Tracts has a date.

<sup>344</sup> This was published, at Paris, A.D. 1651, 12mo.

<sup>345</sup> See "Histoire de la Vie et du Purgatoire de S. Patrice, mise en François," par F. Bouillon, Troyes, 12mo, no date. It was published at Avignon, A.D. 1642, at Rouen, A.D. 1701, in 8vo, and at Rouen, without a date, in 8vo.

<sup>346</sup> See "Teatro delle glorie e Purgatorio de viventi del gran Patriarca ed Apostolo dell' Ibernica S. Patricio," Bologna, 1660, 4to sm.

<sup>347</sup> See his "Opuscula adscripta S. Patricio," already referred to. Londini, 1656, 12mo. Also, in "De Præsulibus Hiberniæ Commentarius, a prima Gentis Hibernicæ ad Fidem Christianam Conversione, ad nostra usque Tempora," pp. 1, 2, Dublinii, 1665, fol.

<sup>348</sup> See "Annales Ecclesiæ Anglo-Saxonicæ," Leodii, A.D. 1663, fol.

<sup>349</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo Apostolo et Primate Hiberniæ, A.D. 1668, pp. 517 to 592.

<sup>350</sup> There is a previous commentary, in 11 sections, and 84 paragraphs; the Confessions of St. Patrick, in 5 chapters, and in 24 paragraphs; an epistle of the Saint to series of dissertations<sup>350</sup> and documents,<sup>351</sup> serving to set forth the chief known incidents of St. Patrick's history. Accounts of our Apostle have been published, likewise, by Richard Archdekin,<sup>352</sup> in Latin, and by Levin,<sup>353</sup> in Low Dutch, by the Benedictine Father S. Cressy,<sup>354</sup> and by the learned Dr. William Cave.<sup>355</sup> Abbate D. Giacomo Certani has written and published a large Italian Life of our saint.<sup>356</sup> It abounds very much, in an account of his miracles, from which the writer draws devout and mystic reflections. The first edition of Louis Moreri's<sup>357</sup> great Historical Dictionary<sup>358</sup> appeared, at Lyons, A.D. 1674, in folio, and it contains an account of St. Patrick.<sup>359</sup> We find, also, "The delightful History of the Life and Death of St. Patrick, Champion of Ireland."<sup>360</sup> This is a book we have not seen, nor can we believe, from the strange title, that it has any historic value. The Abbé Claude Fleury<sup>361</sup> has only a few general remarks, about St. Patrick and his Irish mission,<sup>362</sup> in his General History of the Church.<sup>363</sup> In addition, Adrien Baillet,<sup>364</sup> has a special Life of our saint. "Ristretto breve della vita, morte, e miracoli del S. vescovo et apost. dell' Ibernia * * * S. Patricio,"<sup>365</sup> appeared in the Italian language. Likewise, the learned Breton Benedictine, Dom Guy Alexis Lobineau,<sup>366</sup> in his hagiographical work,<sup>367</sup>

Carotic, with an introduction; the Life of the Saint, by Jocelyn, in 19 chapters, and 171 paragraphs, with an Appendix, in 6 sections, and 51 paragraphs.

<sup>351</sup> The Bollandists seem to have preferred the Life of St. Patrick, by Jocelyn, the monk of Furness; but, why they have selected this, as their Acts for St. Patrick, it is difficult to understand.

<sup>352</sup> See "Vitæ et Miraculorum Sancti Patricii Hiberniæ Apostoli, Epitome. Cum brevi notitia Hiberniæ, et prophetia S. Malachie," Louvain, 1671, 8vo.

<sup>353</sup> See "Het Wonderlyck, van der grootten H. Patricius, Patriarch van Irlandt: met de * * * historie van het Vaghevier van den Selven Heylighen." Brussel, 1672, 8vo.

<sup>354</sup> See "The Church History of Britanny," &c., book ii., chap. v., pp. 24, 25, book viii., chap. ix., pp. 150, 151, chap. xiv., pp. 155, 156, book ix., chap. vi., vii., viii., ix., pp. 178 to 182, chap. xv., xvi., xviii., pp. 190 to 194, book x., chap. viii., x., pp. 210 to 213, London, 1688, fol.

<sup>355</sup> See "Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Historia Literaria, Christo Nato usque ad Sæculum xiv. facile Methodo digesta," &c., vol. i., pp. 331, 332, Londini, 1688 and 1698, fol.

<sup>356</sup> It bears for title: "Il Mose dell' Ibernia, Vita del glorioso S. Patrizio Canonico Regolare Lateranense, Apostolo, e primate dell' Ibernia," descritta dall' Abb. : D. Giacomo Certani Can. Reg. Lat. Dottore Filosofo, e Teologo Collegiato, e nell' Vniuersità di Bologna Pubblico Professore di Filosofia Morale. It is dedicated, in some few introductory pages, to Illustrissimo Sig. Conte Rainiero Marescotti, Senatore di Bologna. It is a 4to vol. of 519 pp., excluding the Dedication, an address Diuoto Curioso Lettore, and a concluding Indice, with Errori più notabili scorsi nell' Opera.

His authorities are all to be found, in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." The work is contained, in Fourteen Books, and it was published, at Bologna, A.D. 1686.

<sup>357</sup> He was born in 1643, and he died at Paris, in 1680.

<sup>358</sup> Several other editions were issued, afterwards, and this work was translated into German, Italian, English and Spanish.

<sup>359</sup> See "Le Grand Dictionnaire Historique, ou le Mélange Curieux de l'Histoire Sacrée et Profane," tome viii., p. 123. A Paris, 1758 et seq. This is considered to be the best edition of Moreri's celebrated work.

<sup>360</sup> Printed at London, 1685, 12mo, black letter, with woodcuts.

<sup>361</sup> He was born at Paris in 1640, and he died on the 14th of July, 1723.

<sup>362</sup> See "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome vi., liv. xxvi., pp. 151, 152. Nouvelle edition. A Paris, 1758 et seq. 12mo.

<sup>363</sup> The first volume of this work, published in twenty 4to volumes, appeared toward the close of the seventeenth century, and the other tomes followed in gradual succession, to the time of the writer's death. The last volume ends, with the year 1414.

<sup>364</sup> See "Le Vies des Saints," tome iii., Mars xvii. S. Patrice, sect. i. Sa Vie, sect. 2. Son Culte, pp. 429 to 441, Paris edition, 1701, 8vo. And, again, at March 17th, the Life of St. Patrick, Bishop and Apostle of Ireland, is in tome i., pp. 215 to 221, of the Paris edition of 1739, 4to.

<sup>365</sup> Estratto del Viaggio di B. di Burgo. Bergamo, 1717, 12mo.

<sup>366</sup> He was born, at Rennes, A.D. 1666, and, he died, A.D. 1727.

<sup>367</sup> His "Histoire des Saints de la Province de Bretagne, et des Personnes qui s'y sont distinguées par une éminente piété," first appeared, in two folio volumes, A.D. 1723, 1724, Paris (Rennes).

<sup>368</sup> In the late edition of Lobineau's "Les classes our Apostle, among the saints of his province.<sup>368</sup> At Prague, in 1737, appeared a small work, "Sacer Ignis Flammante zelo D. Patricii Gloriosissimi Hiberniæ Apostoli orbi Hiberno," etc., per P. Germanum, A. S. Adalberto. This assumes the class of a Panegyric.<sup>369</sup> A "Life of St. Patrick" was published, in Dublin, A.D. 1743.<sup>370</sup> Again, Walter Harris,<sup>371</sup> Bishop Challoner,<sup>372</sup> and Bishop Tanner,<sup>373</sup> relate various particulars, regarding St. Patrick's Acts. Much about the same time was published a "Chronology of some memorable Incidents from the Creation of the World, to the year 1742, containing much curious and interesting Information, relative to St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland."<sup>374</sup> Also, there appeared, in Italian, "Vita del Prodigioso, S. Patricio, Primate dell' Ibernica, divisa in xiv. libri con la relazione del rinomata sua Purgatorio," Scritta da Marco Parisiense e la Veridica Storia di Luigi Ennio.<sup>375</sup> In French, the Abbé Ma-Geoghegan<sup>376</sup> notices our saint; and, soon after, we find issued, in Ireland, "An Essay on the Ancient and Modern State of Ireland, including a particular Account of the Great and Glorious St. Patrick."<sup>377</sup> In London appeared a small tract, "The Memorial of Ancient British Piety,"<sup>378</sup> having reference to our Apostle. In the English translation of Father Peter Ribadeneira's work on the saints, we find a Life of St. Patrick,<sup>379</sup> but with many inaccuracies of statement and of chronology, at the 17th of March. The learned Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>380</sup> as also, Antoine Henry Bérault-Bercastel, who was successively Jesuit, Curé of Omer-ville, and Canon of Noyon,<sup>381</sup> have treated on the events of St. Patrick's mission.<sup>382</sup> Among other Irish historians, Dr. Sylvester O'Halloran<sup>383</sup> relates his Acts. A "Panégérique de St. Patrice, Apôtre de l'Irlande, prononcé le Jour de sa Fête,"<sup>384</sup> par M. Siret, Vicaire de Saint-Méry,<sup>385</sup> contains an interesting history of our Irish Apostle, with illustrative notes appended. Besides, Edmund L. Swift<sup>386</sup> has published a Life of our saint. But, in the Vies des Saints de Bretagne," tome i., we find the Acts of St. Patrick, Archbishop of Armagh, and Apostle of Ireland, at March 17th, A.D. 464. See pp. 39 to 51.

<sup>369</sup> It is in 4to, about 20 pages.

<sup>370</sup> It appeared, as a 12mo volume.

<sup>371</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 1 to 34. Dublin, 1745, fol.

<sup>372</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 175 to 181. London, A.D. 1745, 4to.

<sup>373</sup> See "Bibliotheca Britannica Hibernica; sive de Scriptoribus, qui in Anglia, Scotia, et Hibernia ad Sæculi xvii. initium floruerunt," &c., pp. 578 to 580. London, 1748, fol.

<sup>374</sup> It was published, at Dublin, A.D. 1745, 12mo.

<sup>375</sup> Published at Venezia, A.D. 1757, 8vo.

<sup>376</sup> See "Histoire de l'Irlande," tome i., Seconde Partie, chap. i., ii., pp. 227 to 271. A Paris, 1758. 4to.

<sup>377</sup> This work was published, A.D. 1760, in 8vo, and, it was dedicated to Matthew M'Namara, of Limerick, Counsellor-at-Law.

<sup>378</sup> Published, in 1761, 12mo.

<sup>379</sup> See "The Lives of Saints, with other Feasts of the year, according to the Roman Calendar." Written in Spanish, by the Rev. Father Peter Ribadeneira, Priest of the Society of Jesus. Translated into English, by W. P., Esq. The third edition, corrected and amended, part i., pp. 156 to 160. Dublin, 1763, folio.

<sup>380</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xvii. The first edition of this work, without notes, was issued at London, A.D. 1745, in five 4to volumes. A great number of editions have since appeared, in England, Ireland, Scotland, and America. It has been translated into French; and, we believe, into other European languages. See Robert Watt's "Bibliotheca Britannica," vol. i., col. 177 k.

<sup>381</sup> Besides some Poems, this writer produced a "Histoire de l'Eglise," at Paris, A.D. 1778 to 1790, vols. 24, in 12mo. Several editions of it have since appeared.

<sup>382</sup> See "Histoire de l'Eglise," tome iii., liv. xv., p. 108. Nouvelle Edition, par M. Pélier de Lacroix, Paris, 1829 and 1830, 8vo.

<sup>383</sup> See his "General History of Ireland, from the earliest Accounts to the close of the Twelfth Century," vol. ii., book vii., chaps. i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi., pp. 1 to 46. London, 1778, two volumes, 4to.

<sup>384</sup> The 16th of April, 1806. The feast of St. Patrick is movable, in the Diocese of Paris, where by ecclesiastical Decree it falls on the Wednesday of Quasimodo Week.

<sup>385</sup> Published in Paris, A.D. 1806. 8vo.

<sup>386</sup> See "The Life and Acts of St. Patrick, the Archbishop, Primate and year 1810, there appeared a volume, from the pen of Patrick Lynch, the Secretary of the Gaelic Society, which was a decided advance upon its predecessors. This soon became a popular work.<sup>387</sup> It was in the right direction, for the author drew his materials, from some of the Latin Lives, published by Colgan. It has been frequently reprinted, at home, in various forms, and in America. It was wanting, however, in critical elucidation, and the rare power of distinguishing legend from true history; but, it must be acknowledged, likewise, that when he wrote, Lynch laboured under a want, since, in a great measure, supplied, by the works of more historically learned archæologists and topographers. James Stuart, A.B.,<sup>388</sup> gives a very interesting account of the Irish Apostle, in his local history. "St. Patrick; a National Tale of the Fifth Century,"<sup>389</sup> appeared, much about the same time. Probably, the most valuable of all researches are those, by the Rev. John Lanigan,<sup>390</sup> in his work, denoting such rare erudition. "The Catholic Religion of St. Patrick and St. Columb-Kill,"<sup>391</sup> is the title of a small work, which also appeared. Again, Sir William Betham, F.S.A., and Ulster King-at-Arms, produced an important contribution, towards the illustration of our saint's biography.<sup>392</sup> Besides this, "The Life of St. Patrick, Patron, Primate and Apostle of Ireland, with a Catalogue of all the Popes of Rome,"<sup>393</sup> was issued. In like manner, the Rev. P. J. Carew,<sup>394</sup> our national poet, Thomas Moore,<sup>395</sup> our accomplished antiquary, George Petrie,<sup>396</sup> the Rev. James Wills, A.M.,<sup>397</sup> and T. Wright,<sup>398</sup> have severally some notices of St. Patrick. It is a singular circumstance, likewise, that in the Danish language, several Legends, relating to our Patron Saint, are to be found.<sup>399</sup> Some of these have been privately printed,<sup>400</sup> by George Stephens, Esq., in Stockholm, A.D. 1844. They are dedicated to Sir William Betham, Apostle of Ireland," translated from the Latin of Jocelin, Dublin, 1809, 8vo.

<sup>387</sup> It is intitled, "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, To which is added, St. Fiech's Irish Hymn: also a copious Appendix of the various ecclesiastical institutions, &c., in Ireland. The Life proper is comprised in Fifteen Chapters. It was also published, at Dublin, 1828, 12mo. This latter is the edition we have most generally used.

<sup>388</sup> See "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh, for a Period of 1373 years," &c. Introduction, pp. v. to lxx., and chap. i., pp. 75 to 90. Newry, 1819. 8vo.

<sup>389</sup> By an Antiquary. This work was published, A.D. 1819, in three volumes, 8vo.

<sup>390</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i. passim. Dublin, 1822 and 1829, 8vo.

<sup>391</sup> Published at Dublin, A.D. 1822, 8vo.

<sup>392</sup> See "Irish Antiquarian Researches," part ii., pp. 243 to 442. Also, Appendix, pp. i. to lv. Dublin, 1827. 8vo.

<sup>393</sup> Published at Dublin, A.D. 1827, 8vo.

<sup>394</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," chap. i., ii., iii., iv., pp. 13 to 146. Dublin, 1835, 8vo.

<sup>395</sup> See his "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. x., pp. 202 to 226. London, 1835 et seq. 8vo.

<sup>396</sup> See his Essay "On the History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," pp. 27 to 94.

Dublin, 1839, 4to. The copy I have chiefly used is that belonging to the Franciscan Library, Dublin, and the presentation one to John O'Donovan, with inserted note of the author, and also annotations in manuscript, in Dr. O'Donovan's handwriting.

<sup>397</sup> See "Lives of Illustrious and Distinguished Irishmen, from the earliest Times to the present Period, arranged in Chronological Order, and embodying a history of Ireland in the Lives of Irishmen," vol. i., part i. First Period, St. Patrick, pp. 84 to 98. Dublin, 1839 et seq. 8vo.

<sup>398</sup> See "St. Patrick's Purgatory; an Essay on the Legends of Purgatory," London, 1844, 8vo.

<sup>399</sup> These are under the generic title, "S. Patriks-Sagan."

<sup>400</sup> Under the headings: Företal. I. Om Helgona-Sagor i Allmänhet. II. Om S. Patriks-Saga och Bihängen Dertill. III. Beskrifning öfver de Begagnade Handskrifterna, pp. i. to xxiv. Also, A. Skärselds-Sagan inom Norden. B. Tungulus-Sagens Litteratur. These latter articles have appended the name J. A. Ahlstrand, pp. xxv. to li. Then follows: Samlingar utgifna af svenska Fornskrift-Sällskapet. I. S. Patrik och hans Järtecken. II. Nicolaus i S. Patriks skärs-eld. III. Tungulus. Some illustrative pieces and an Appendix succeed, pp. i. to 89.

<sup>401</sup> In his work, "Did the Early Church of Ireland acknowledge the Pope's Supre-

M.R.I.A. The Rev. Daniel Rock, D.D.,<sup>401</sup> and Rev. William Gowan Todd, D.D.,<sup>402</sup> before his conversion to the Catholic Church,<sup>403</sup> have published very opposite views, in reference to St. Patrick's mission. In French, Elias Regnault has a notice,<sup>404</sup> while H. Leo,<sup>405</sup> the Rev. M. J. Brennan, O.S.F.,<sup>406</sup> the Rev. Matthew Kelly, D.D.,<sup>407</sup> Henry J. Monck Mason, LL.D.,<sup>408</sup> the Very Rev. William Reeves,<sup>409</sup> and Mrs. Anastasia O'Byrne,<sup>410</sup> have various historic illustrations of the saint's Acts. C. G. Schoell<sup>411</sup> has allusions to him, but in a manner to exhibit doubt, respecting the authenticity of his writings, and the incidents of his life. An anonymous "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, with those of St. Bridget, Virgin and Abbess, and of St. Columba, Abbot, and Apostle of the Northern Picts,"<sup>412</sup> appeared in London, but having no date affixed. The ecclesiastical historian, M. l'Abbé Rohrbacher,<sup>413</sup> treats about our Apostle. There is a Life of St. Patrick, in the Young Christian's Library,<sup>414</sup> published by James Duffy. In the works of the Rev. Robert King,<sup>415</sup> of L. Tachet de Barneval,<sup>416</sup> of Le Comte de Montalembert,<sup>417</sup> of Martin Haverty,<sup>418</sup> of Le Vicomte Hersart de la Villemarqué,<sup>419</sup> of M. le Dr. Hoefler,<sup>420</sup> and of Thomas D'Arcy M'Gee,<sup>421</sup> we find different macy? answered in a Letter to Lord John Manners," London, A.D. 1844.

<sup>402</sup> See "The Church of St. Patrick, an Historical Inquiry into the Independence of the Ancient Church of Ireland," London, A.D. 1844, 12mo.

<sup>403</sup> See especially chap. i., ii., pp. 1 to 51.

<sup>404</sup> See "Histoire de l'Irlande," liv. i., chap. iv., pp. 42 to 51. Paris, 1845, 18mo.

<sup>405</sup> See "De Carmine Vetusto Hibernico in Laudem St. Patricii. Dissert.," Halæ, 1845, small 4to. This is simply a translation of St. Fiach's Hymn.

<sup>406</sup> See "An Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, from the Introduction of Christianity into that Country to the Year 1829." The first edition, in two volumes, was published in Dublin, A.D. 1840. 8vo. A new edition, revised, with notes, chap. i., pp. 7 to 25. Dublin, 1864. Duffy, 8vo.

<sup>407</sup> See an able refutation of the former writer's book, in an article contributed to the Dublin Review, in 1846, "The Church of St. Patrick." Since the writer's death, it has been republished in Rev. Matthew Kelly's "Dissertations chiefly on Irish Church History," edited by the present learned Bishop of Kerry, Rt. Rev. Daniel M'Carthy, D.D. See pp. 220 to 271. Dublin, 1864. Duffy, 8vo. See also Rev. Matthew Kelly's "Kalendar of Irish Saints," pp. 96 to 98.

<sup>408</sup> See "The Testimony of St. Patrick against the false Pretensions of Rome to primitive Antiquity in Ireland," Dublin, 1846, 8vo.

<sup>409</sup> See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," &c., with notes and illustrations, passim. Dublin, 1847. 4to.

<sup>410</sup> See "The Saints of Ireland," March xvii., pp. 36 to 50. Dublin, 1849. 12mo.

<sup>411</sup> See "De Ecclesiasticæ Britonum Scottorumque Historiæ Fontibus," pp. 61 to 77, Berolini, 1851.

<sup>412</sup> This small work is denominated, "A Triple Leaf, just collected from the purest sources," in 18mo.

<sup>413</sup> See "Histoire Universelle de l'Eglise Catholique," tome viii., liv. xxxix., pp. 19, 20. Troisième Edition, Paris, 1857, et seq. 8vo. Also, "Vies des Saints tous les Jours de l'Année," tome ii., pp. 174, 175, Paris, 1853, 1854, 8vo.

<sup>414</sup> Or otherwise called "Lives of eminent Saints and Servants of God." In it, there is a Life of St. Patrick, No. 19. This series was written by Rev. Charles P. Meehan, Dublin, 1853, 18mo.

<sup>415</sup> See "A Primer of the History of the Holy Catholic Church in Ireland," &c., vol. i., book i., chap. i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi., vii., pp. 1 to 63. Third edition. Dublin, 1858, small 4to. See, also, "Mémorial introductoire to the Early History of the Primacy of Armagh," &c., passim, Armagh, 1854, folio.

<sup>416</sup> See "Histoire Légendaire de l'Irlande," chap. iv., v., pp. 26 to 47, Paris, 1856, 8vo.

<sup>417</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident depuis Saint Benoît jusqu'à Saint Bernard," tome ii., liv. ix., chap. i., pp. 454 to 461. Deuxième Edition. Paris, 1863, et seq. 8vo.

<sup>418</sup> See "The History of Ireland, Ancient and Modern," chap. viii., pp. 60 to 72. Dublin, 1860, 8vo.

<sup>419</sup> See "La Légende Celtique de la Poesie des Cloîtres en Irlande, en Cambrie, et en Bretagne," Première Partie. La Légende de Saint Patrice, Apôtre et Patron de l'Irlande. Nineteen sections, pp. 3 to 123. Nouvelle édition. Paris, 1864, 8vo.

<sup>420</sup> See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," &c., tome xxxix., cols. 338, 339. Paris, 8vo.

<sup>421</sup> See "A Popular History of Ireland: from the earliest Period to the Emancipation of the Catholics," vol. i., book i., chap. iii., accounts of this holy man. The Rev. Michael J. O'Farrell, Pastor of St. Peter's Church, New York, has written a very interesting and learned Life of our Saint.<sup>422</sup>

With admitted great learning and a profound knowledge, especially of Irish ecclesiastical history and its best sources, the Rev. Dr. James Henthorn Todd entered on the composition of St. Patrick's Life and Acts.<sup>423</sup> When it was announced, that Dr. Todd had been engaged on this important work, the most hopeful anticipations were universally entertained. It appeared in 1864, but public expectation was doomed to be disappointed, in many respects, and to be satisfied in others, with the labours of that great scholar. The work, though highly valuable in some portions, in others is blotted with mistakes, and with singularly misplaced theories. His extraordinary attempts, at originating a new chronology, disproved from the very evidence, by which it was attempted to be supported, and the theory, that we had no regular system of diocesan episcopacy, in Ireland, till after the Synod of Rathbresail, are statements, at complete variance with entries and successive returns, in Irish Annalistic accounts. However, great critical acumen and research are conspicuous, throughout this biography, which is treated in a scholarlike and well-ordered style. A very able and critical examination of his misstatements will be found, in a work, which soon afterwards appeared. It was written, by Rev. Denis Gargan, D.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History, in the College of St. Patrick, Maynooth.<sup>424</sup> The Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran has, in more than one of his literary works, ably illustrated the Acts of Ireland's national Apostle.<sup>425</sup> In addition, the following writers have, in various ways, given us expositions of St. Patrick's biography, in a historical, controversial, literary, or legendary manner, viz.: Robert Steele Nicholson,<sup>426</sup> Mrs. M. C. Ferguson,<sup>427</sup> A. G. Richey,<sup>428</sup> Arthur West Hadden, B.D., and William Stubbs, M.A.,<sup>429</sup> Trinity College, Dublin, William Waterworth,<sup>430</sup> Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack,<sup>431</sup> the Rev. John Lynch,<sup>432</sup> and D. P. Conyngham.<sup>433</sup>

But, the most complete and elegant biography of St. Patrick, that has yet appeared, in an English form, is that issued by a Religieuse of Kenmare pp. 10 to 17. New York, 1863, two vols., 8vo.

<sup>422</sup> It is intitled, "A Popular Life of St. Patrick, Apostle and Patron of Ireland," New York, 1863, 12mo.

<sup>423</sup> It is intitled, "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, A Memoir of his Life and Mission, with an introductory Dissertation on some early Usages of the Church in Ireland, and its historical position from the establishment of the English Colony to the present Day." Dublin, 1864, 8vo.

<sup>424</sup> It is intitled: "The Ancient Church of Ireland: a few Remarks on Dr. Todd's 'Memoir of the Life and Mission of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland.'" Dublin, 1864, Duffy, 8vo.

<sup>425</sup> See especially "Essays on the Origin, Doctrines and Discipline of the early Irish Church," part i., chap. ii., part ii., chap. i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi., vii., pp. 8 to 79. Dublin, 1864, 8vo. Also, Articles in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., pp. 7 to 18, and 191 to 197. Notes on the Life of St. Patrick.

<sup>426</sup> See "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, in the Third Century," Belfast, A.D. 1868, 8vo.

<sup>427</sup> See "Story of the Irish before the Conquest," London, 1868, 12mo.

<sup>428</sup> See "Lectures on the History of Ireland, down to A.D. 1534," vol. i., lect. ii., pp. 25 to 40, Dublin, 1869, 8vo.

<sup>429</sup> See "Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, relating to Great Britain and Ireland," vol. ii., part ii., pp. 289 to 361, Oxford, 1869, et seq., 8vo.

<sup>430</sup> See "The Church of St. Patrick; or, a History of the Origin, Doctrines, &c., of the Ancient Church of Ireland," London, A.D. 1869, 12mo.

<sup>431</sup> See "The Illustrated History of Ireland," chap. viii., ix., pp. 108 to 136. Kenmare, A.D. 1868, 8vo.

<sup>432</sup> See "The Life of St. Patrick, from Walter Harris's Translation of Sir James Ware's Works, together with the 'Confessio S. Patricii,' and the 'Epistola ad Christianos Tyranni Corotici Subditos Sti. Patricii,'" Dublin, 1870, 8vo.

<sup>433</sup> See "Lives of the Irish Saints: from St. Patrick down to St. Laurence O'Toole."

Convent, in 1870.<sup>434</sup> The authoress, Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack, principally bases this Life, on those tracts, published in the names of Fiech and of Probus, as given by Colgan—collated with early copies in Rome—on that of Muirchu Maccu Machteni, and on Tirechan's Annotations, in the Book of Armagh. The Irish Tripartite Life,<sup>435</sup> translated by William M. Hennessy, Esq., M.R.I.A., and the "Confession," with other assumed productions of the saint himself, have been used.<sup>436</sup> This publication leaves little to be desired, so far as narrating the recorded Acts of our great Apostle is concerned; its critical investigations, and the identifications of localities, in it, likewise, are very satisfactory. Need we say, great use of this valuable work has been made, by the present writer. Especially must he observe, how indispensable for reference has been the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, which is there included. The authoress deserves, and ought to obtain, moreover, marked respect and admiration from Irish Catholics, on account of her indefatigable literary labours, for Faith and Fatherland.<sup>437</sup> Aubrey de Vere<sup>438</sup> has celebrated, in verse, the praises of St. Patrick. In continuation, we may observe, that the Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>439</sup> Bishop Forbes,<sup>440</sup> the Rev. Hubert M'Laughlin, M.A.,<sup>441</sup> the Rev. John Francis Shearman,<sup>442</sup> James Walsh,<sup>443</sup> the Rev. Thomas Walsh,<sup>444</sup> Whitley Stokes,<sup>445</sup> the Rev. W. D. Killen, D.D.,<sup>446</sup> Alfred Webb,<sup>447</sup> and the Rev. William Bullen Morris, Priest of the Oratory,<sup>448</sup> have severally contributed important biographies, and notices, to illustrate our Irish Apostle's mission and Acts.

The foregoing productions have not equal degrees of merit to recommend

St. Patrick, pp. 25 to 108. In Four Sections. New York. 8vo, A.D. 1870.

<sup>434</sup> This work is intitled, "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," By M. F. Cusack, Kenmare, 1869, 4to.

<sup>435</sup> This was the one, discovered by Professor O'Curry, in the British Museum.

<sup>436</sup> Several valuable Essays, on the early Hymns of the Irish Church, on the Chorepiscopi, on the relics of St. Patrick, independently of those, on special subjects, are found in the body of the work. Among the documents given are the Hymn of St. Patrick, at Tara, that of St. Fiech, from the O'Curry Manuscripts, and that of St. Sechnall, with a metrical translation, from the pen of the gifted writer. There is also an annotated list of St. Patrick's successors, in the See of Armagh.

<sup>437</sup> Another and a more compendious work, "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," by M. F. Cusack, has more lately appeared, London, 1877, 8vo.

<sup>438</sup> See "The Legends of St. Patrick," London, 1872, crown 8vo.

<sup>439</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March xvii. St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, pp. 285 to 306. London, 1872, et seq. 8vo.

<sup>440</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 431 to 434. Edinburgh, 1872, 4to.

<sup>441</sup> See "Biographical Sketches of Ancient Irish Saints," sect. i. St. Patrick, pp. 1 to 13. London, 1874, 8vo.

<sup>442</sup> See a series of papers in "Loca Patriciana," published in successive Parts of "The Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland :

originally founded as the Kilkenny Archæological Society in the Year M.DCCC.XLIX," commencing in vol. ii., p. 339, et seq., in Fourth Series, A.D. 1873.

<sup>443</sup> See "History of the Catholic Church in Scotland, from the Introduction of Christianity, to the present Time," chap. iii., p. 41. Glasgow, 1874, 8vo.

<sup>444</sup> See "History of the Irish Church, with the Monasteries of each County, Biographical Notices of the Irish Saints, Prelates and Religious, compiled from the most authentic Records, Foreign and Domestic," chap. ii., iii., iv., v., vi., pp. 6 to 29, chap. xvi., pp. 99, 100, chap. xx., pp. 188 to 191, chap. xxvii., pp. 253 to 258. New York, 1876, 8vo.

<sup>445</sup> He published, at Calcutta, in 1877, Roy. 8vo, with Irish text, from the Leabhar Breac, and with an English Translation, The Lives of St. Patrick, St. Columba, and St. Brigid.

<sup>446</sup> See "The Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, from the earliest Period to the present Times," vol. i., book i., chap. i., pp. 1 to 24. London, two volumes, 1875, 8vo.

<sup>447</sup> See his most admirable work, lately issued, "A Compendium of Irish Biography, comprising Sketches of Distinguished Irishmen, and of eminent Persons, connected with Ireland, by Office or by their Writings," pp. 430 to 432. Dublin, 1878, 8vo.

<sup>448</sup> See "The Life of Saint Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, with a preliminary Enquiry into the Authority of the traditional History of the Saint," London, 1878, 8vo.

them, for purposes of elucidating the saint's history, or that of the times, in which he lived. But, it must always be borne in mind, that the more ancient documents, especially those more nearly approaching his own period, and written by persons, supposed to have some immediate connexion with it, and with the subject of their compositions, ought naturally possess most interest and value, for all future investigators. On those documents, deemed to be of best authority, and most accessible, we shall endeavour to rest our statements, in succeeding chapters. We must try, likewise, to preserve unity of narrative, by compressing or intertwining facts recorded, or traditional circumstances set forth, into that especial place and sequence, they seem most naturally to occupy.

CHAPTER II.

VARIOUS CONJECTURES AS TO THE COUNTRY OF ST. PATRICK'S BIRTH—THE ANCIENT EXTENT OF BRITAIN—DIFFERENT LOCALITIES ASSIGNED FOR THE IRISH APOSTLE'S BIRTHPLACE—FRANCE, SCOTLAND, WALES AND ENGLAND CONTEND FOR THIS HONOUR—EXAMINATION OF THE QUESTION.

THE circumstance, where St. Patrick was born, has been a subject of difference and of doubt, among historians and biographers; but, it cannot lead the judicious reader to such an absurd conclusion, as that the great Irish Apostle never existed.<sup>1</sup> Yet, we find so-called antiquaries, who arrived at such an extravagant inference. The total silence of Platina, who wrote the Life of Celestine, regarding St. Patrick's Irish mission, while giving an account of Palladius and of Germanus, having been sent respectively to Scotland, and to England, has furnished the negative argument,<sup>2</sup> in one case; while, the silence of early writers, and the incredible number of miracles ascribed to our saint,<sup>3</sup> are alleged as very silly reasons for the Irish Apostle's non-existence. However, the negative and positive objections, here advanced, are most easily disposed of, when we consider the early evidences yet extant, in reference to St. Patrick's career.

The question of St. Patrick's native country and birthplace has an interest, for all candid investigators, far beyond the claims of rival nations, for the honour it should confer. It has been debated, indeed, with considerable learning and earnestness, both by Irish, and by foreign writers; yet, as Ireland does not prefer any serious claim to a distinction, of which she might well feel proud, so can an Irishman afford to be impartial, in prosecuting such an enquiry. It is interesting, not merely because, in reality, it offers a curious archæological problem; but, also, because, in some measure, it may afford illustrations, regarding the character of one, among the greatest saints and men, produced by his own, or by any other, age. Without sufficient grounds to establish their position, some writers have considered St. Patrick, as a native of Ireland; however, most biographers, historians, and antiquaries, treating about him, incline to the belief, that he was by birth a Briton. This generic title, notwithstanding, will not determine the particular country, to which we should turn, in order to find the origin of his family and race.

Ere the dawn of historic light, an ancient people<sup>4</sup> seems to have inhabited

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> Such hypothesis has been advanced by one Maurice, in his "Defence of Episcopacy," published about 1700, by Ryves. Dr. Ledwich, and, some few other writers of little judgment, or authority, prefer to adopt this opinion.

<sup>2</sup> For Ryves.

<sup>3</sup> Such are Ledwich's chief motives, for denying St. Patrick's existence.

<sup>4</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: a History of Ancient Alban," vol. i., book i., chap. iv., pp. 164, 165.

insular Britain, even before the Picts,<sup>5</sup> Caledonians,<sup>6</sup> Britons,<sup>7</sup> Albainns,<sup>8</sup> Cymri,<sup>9</sup> Scots,<sup>10</sup> and Saxons,<sup>11</sup> appear on the theatre of action.<sup>12</sup> In the heroic period, many nations have derived name, from some distinguished leader; and, if we seek for the oldest forms of British and Irish traditions, it will be found, that Briotan Maol—an Irishman of Scythian descent—or Britinia,<sup>13</sup> or Britan,<sup>14</sup> gave denomination to his followers, and to that country, where they dwelt. Another account has it, that one Brutus,<sup>15</sup> the younger son of Æneas—the celebrated Trojan leader and founder of the Roman Empire<sup>16</sup>—came with his followers, from Bretagne,<sup>17</sup> into the island, afterwards named Britannia, from him. However, there are writers, who question the foregoing accounts,<sup>18</sup> as deeming them inconsistent, with genealogical and chronological calculations.<sup>19</sup> Iberians or Basques<sup>20</sup> are supposed to have preceded the historic people, in Britain; but, from Ireland, our old records relate, that the early waves of population first spread over to the neighbouring island. Perhaps, too, other colonists reached it, from the European Continent. Through

<sup>5</sup> These are also called Cruithnigh.

<sup>6</sup> A very learned Dissertation, on the Caledonian tribes and their Antiquities, will be found, in George Chalmers' "Caledonia, or an Account, Historical and Topographic of North Britain," vol. i., book i., chap. ii., pp. 57 to 102.

<sup>7</sup> Regarding the insular Britons, the reader may consult, what is stated, in Sir Winston Churchill's "Divi Britannici." Britains, pp. 41 to 68.

<sup>8</sup> Or Albannaich. We are told, by Lieutenant-Colonel Forbes Leslie, that Albion was the name first applied to Britain—"evidently the same as Albainn, by which name Caledonia was known to the Gaels of Ireland."—"The Early Races of Scotland, and their Monuments," vol. i., chap. ii., p. 25.

<sup>9</sup> By Sir William Betham, this race is derived from the Cimric Chersonesus, or Jutland, in the north of Europe. See "The Gael and the Cymbri, or an Inquiry into the Origin and History of the Irish Scoti, Britons, and Gauls, and of the Caledonians, Picts, Welsh, Cornish and Bretons." The Cymbri, chap. xi., pp. 379 to 418.

<sup>10</sup> "The proper Scots, as no one denies, were a Gaelic colony from Ireland, the original Scotia."—Edward A. Freeman's "History of the Norman Conquest of England, its causes and its results," vol. i., chap. ii., p. 14, n.

<sup>11</sup> See Sharon Turner's learned "History of the Anglo-Saxons: comprising the History of England from the Earliest Period to the Norman Conquest," in three volumes, 8vo., 4th edition. See regarding them, also, that admirable work of John Mitchell Kemble "The Saxons in England, a History of the English Commonwealth till the Period of the Norman Conquest," in two volumes, 8vo.

<sup>12</sup> In reference to the subject of this insular ethnological enquiry, the reader should consult "Britannia: or a Chorographical Description of the flourishing Kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Islands adjacent, from the earliest Antiquity." By William Camden. Translated from the edition, published by the Author in MDCVII., Enlarged by the latest discoveries, by Richard Gough, F.A. and R.S.S., in three folio volumes, Illustrated with Maps and other copperplates.

<sup>13</sup> He is called, "the son of Isocon," in one account.

<sup>14</sup> See "The Irish Version of the Historia Britonum of Nennius," edited by Dr. Todd and by the Hon. Algernon Herbert, pp. 26, 27. See, also, Dr. Geoffrey Keating's "General History of Ireland," part i.

<sup>15</sup> According to some accounts, he was the son of Sylvius, the son of Ascanius, son to Æneas. He is said, to have been driven out of Italy, to the Islands of the Torrian or Tyrrhene (Mediterranean) sea. Thence, he was expelled, by the Greeks; and, afterwards, he went to France, where he founded Torinis, or Tours. At length, it is stated, he passed to the northern Island, and when himself, his followers, and his descendants, had filled it with inhabitants, the country received the name of Britannia.

<sup>16</sup> This account is said to depend on the statements of one Guanach—probably an unknown Irish historiographer—as also on the Chronicles of the Romans.

<sup>17</sup> Some writers state, that Brutus first conquered this part of Gaul, and called it Bretagne. See that early black-letter book, "Le Grandes Croniques de Bretagne," printed at Paris, in the seventeenth year of Louis XII.'s reign, in the year 1514. Livre Premier, fol. iiii.

<sup>18</sup> Amongst these is William Camden, who concludes, "Et facilius sane est in hisce et hujusmodi falsa arguere, quam verum adstruere."—"Britannia," p. 2. Edition, Amstelodami, apud Joannem Janssonium, Anno CLD. LXXIX.

<sup>19</sup> See John Speed's "History of Great Britaine," book v., chap. iii., pp. 161 to 166. London edition, 1659, fol.

<sup>20</sup> See W. Boyd Dawkins' "Cave Hunting," p. 214.

the Phœnicians, and their Carthaginian colonists, the Greeks had obtained some indistinct knowledge of the Iernian—rather than the British—Islands, so early as the sixth century before the Christian era. They were then called the Iernian—corresponding with the idea Irish—Isles;<sup>21</sup> and, in the subsequent century, they were very imperfectly known to Herodotus,<sup>22</sup> as the Cassiterides, or Tin Islands. In the fourth century before Christ, the two chief islands of the Britanic group are called Albion and Ierne, by Aristotle;<sup>23</sup> while, the Greek Polybius,<sup>24</sup> who lived in the second century before Christ, has allusion to them. But, until the year 55, before the Christian era, little had been known, to the Greeks and Romans, regarding the manners, usages and tribal divisions of the Britons. Then the invasion of Julius Cæsar,<sup>25</sup> and the subsequent writing of his celebrated Commentaries,<sup>26</sup> add much to our information, on this subject. Tacitus,<sup>27</sup> with several other Greek and Latin historians, has increased our early knowledge of the Britanic Islands, and to such accounts, the student of their history must direct attention. From the Albiones,<sup>28</sup> the most ancient inhabitants of classically known Britain, the Picts and Caledonians<sup>29</sup> were the sole remaining descendants, in Scotland.<sup>30</sup> Before the birth of Christ, we have few authentic records of their social state, and still less of their historic life; however, an Irish or a Scots' migration introduced the people of our island, as very early colonizers of the southern and western parts of Scotland.<sup>31</sup> The Britons extended their inroads, in a corresponding measure, so that a varied population must have been in possession of Caledonia, before the Romans began to establish settlements within it.<sup>32</sup> Few and very doubtful are the accounts of Diodorus Siculus<sup>33</sup> and of Strabo,<sup>34</sup> in reference to those distant islands. After the birth of Christ, our information becomes more ex-

<sup>21</sup> A Greek poet, supposed to have been Orpheus—but, in reality, his name was Onomacritus—about this period, alludes to them:—

“ἦν νήσους Ἰερνίων ὄσσον ἔκωμαι.”

—Argonaut. v. 1171. Leipzig edition, 1764, 8vo. This proves, that then Ireland was the chief, most distinctive, and, perhaps, most populous island of the entire group.

<sup>22</sup> He flourished 445 years before Christ. See Liber, “Historiarum,” iii., sect. 115. Ed. Schweighæus, Argentorati, A.D. 1796.

<sup>23</sup> He flourished 345 years, A.C. See “De Mundo,” lib. iii., Ed. Kappii, Altenb. 1792.

<sup>24</sup> In his celebrated History, written in Forty Books, of which only five are preserved, with some fragments of others. See lib. iii., cap. 57. Ed. Schweighæus, Lipsiæ, 1828.

<sup>25</sup> This remarkable man was born, at Rome, the 12th of the month, Quintilis, A.U.C. 653, and after becoming the first Roman Emperor, he was assassinated, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, 43 years before the Christian era. The late Emperor of the French, Napoleon III., has produced a most interesting and learned “Histoire de Jules Cæsar,” in two large 8vo volumes, but this work only brings his life events to the passage of the Rubicon. A large 4to Atlas of Maps and of Plates serves to illustrate the ancient Topography of places mentioned, in reference to his expeditions. Paris, 1865.

<sup>26</sup> See “De Bello Gallico,” lib. iv., v.

<sup>27</sup> See “Annalium,” lib. xii., cap. xxxi., xxxii., xxxiii., xxxiv., xxxv., xxxvi., xxxvii., xxxviii., xxxix., xl.; “Historiarum,” lib. iii., cap. xlv., xlv.; also “Vita Agricolæ.”

<sup>28</sup> This seems to have been the classic term for Albanach.

<sup>29</sup> These names were not acknowledged by themselves, but they were imposed on them by the Romans and Britons.

<sup>30</sup> See William F. Skene's “Highlanders of Scotland, their Origin, History and Antiquities; with a Sketch of their Manners and Customs,” vol. i., part i., chap. i., p. 14.

<sup>31</sup> A legendary account of this migration—and probably in the main well based on history or tradition—will be met with, in the Irish Version of the “Historia Britonum” of Nennius. Edited, with a translation and notes, by Dr. James Henthorn Todd, and by the Hon. Algernon Herbert, pp. 120 to 167. Also, see Appendix.

<sup>32</sup> For the most satisfactory accounts and illustrations of this matter, we refer to William F. Skene's “Chronicles of the Picts, Chronicles of the Scots, and other Early Memorials of Scottish History.” Also to his admirable work, “Celtic Scotland: a History of Ancient Alban,” vol. i., book i., chap. iv., v., pp. 164 to 274, with accompanying Map.

<sup>33</sup> He lived about the year 44, before Christ. See “Bibliothecæ Historice,” lib. i., cap. 4., lib. iii., cap. 38, and lib. v., cap. 21, 22. Ed. Dindorfii, Lipsiæ, 1828.

<sup>34</sup> He flourished in the year 30, A.C. See tended, through allusions made thereto, by Pomponius Mela,<sup>35</sup> and by the second Pliny.<sup>36</sup> Caius Julius Solinus<sup>37</sup> not only presents an account of Britain, but also of Hibernia, of Caledonia, of the Hebudan and Orcaden Islands, and of the distant Thyle or Thylen. Geographically speaking, the whole statement abounds with inaccuracies; but, the writer details many curious rumours, especially in reference to Hibernia.<sup>38</sup> However, the Geographer Claudius Ptolemy,<sup>39</sup> quoting more ancient authorities, was one of the earliest Continental writers known, who gave a detailed, but still inaccurate, description of the two Britannic Islands, Ibernica and Albion.<sup>40</sup> Again, the Greek Poet, Dionysius Periegetes,<sup>41</sup> places these two Britannic Islands opposite the mouths of the Rhine;<sup>42</sup> while the Greeks, Marcianus Heracleota,<sup>43</sup> and Agathemer,<sup>44</sup> with a Latin "Cosmographia," composed about the end of the fourth century, relate many curious particulars of both those islands.<sup>45</sup> Again, Festus Rufus Avienus,<sup>46</sup> a Latin poet,<sup>47</sup> from the account of Hamilcar,<sup>48</sup> the Carthaginian, alludes to the plains of the Britons, and to the distant Thule—he even writes, concerning the sacred isle,<sup>49</sup> inhabited by Hiberni, and the adjacent island of Albion. But, perhaps, the most valuable of all the early topographical descriptions of Britain is that, called the "Itinerarium Antonini Augusti,"<sup>50</sup> by an anonymous writer;<sup>51</sup> also, the fragment of Peutinger's Map,<sup>52</sup> relative to Britain, and the "Notitia Utriusque Imperii."<sup>53</sup> Besides these, we have, at a later period, an interesting account of his "Geographiæ," lib. i., p. 92, lib. ii., pp. 107, 110, 130, 142, 153, 156, 159, 167, 168, lib. iii., pp. 197, 239, lib. iv., pp. 261, 263, 268, 269, 271, 277, 278. Ed. Oxford, 1807, tomus i.

<sup>35</sup> He flourished A.D. 45. See "De Situ Orbis," lib. i., cap. 3, lib. ii., cap. 6, lib. iii., cap. 6. Ed. Gronovii, Lugd. Batav. 1748.

<sup>36</sup> He lost his life A.D. 79. See his "Historia Naturalis," lib. ii., sect. 77, 99, lib. iii., sect. 20, lib. iv., sect. 30, 33, 36, lib. vii., sect. 57, lib. ix., sect. 57, 79, lib. x., sect. 29, lib. xv., sect. 30, lib. xvi., sect. 76, lib. xvii., sect. 4, lib. xxii., sect. 2, lib. xxv., sect. 6, lib. xxvii., sect. 1, lib. xxx., sect. 3, 4, lib. xxxii., sect. 21, lib. xxxiii., sect. 6, 16, lib. xxxiv., sect. 49, lib. xxxvii., sect. 11. Ed. Harduini, Paris, 1723.

<sup>37</sup> He flourished about A.D. 80, as generally believed.

<sup>38</sup> See "Polyhistoriæ," cap. xxii., xxiii., llii. Ed. Salmassii, Traject. ad Rhenum, A.D. 1689.

<sup>39</sup> He flourished A.D. 120.

<sup>40</sup> See "Geographiæ," lib. i., cap. 7, 11, 15, lib. ii., cap. 1, 2, 3, lib. vii., cap. 5, pp. 214, 215, lib. viii., cap. 2, pp. 223, 224. Apud Bertium, Lugd. Batav. 1618. Also, the "Syntaxis Mathematicæ," tom. i., lib. ii., p. 85. Apud Halma, Paris, 1813.

<sup>41</sup> He flourished, as is generally supposed, towards the close of the second century of the Christian era.

<sup>42</sup> See "Orbis Periegesis," versibus 283 et seq., 561 et seq. Apud Hudson, "Geographi Minores," tomus iv., p. 50, Oxonii, 1712.

<sup>43</sup> He is thought to have lived, in the third century. See his "Peripli," lib. i., pp.

9, 35, 48, 49, 57. Apud Hudson, "Geographi Minores," tomus i. Ibid.

<sup>44</sup> He is supposed to have written, in the third century. See "Geographiæ," lib. ii., cap. 4, 8, 14. Ibid.

<sup>45</sup> An edition of this work has been issued by Gronovius, Lugd. Batav. 1722, pp. 711, 728, 729. This work is composed, with excerpts, from Julius Honorius and from Orosius.

<sup>46</sup> Only fragments of his Geographical Poem "Descriptio Orbis Terræ" have been preserved. They were first published, A.D. 1634. These were included in Wernsdorf's "Poetæ Latini Minores." Helmstadie, 1791, tome v.

<sup>47</sup> He flourished, about the latter end of the fourth century after Christ.

<sup>48</sup> He flourished, in the sixth century, B.C.

<sup>49</sup> "Hæc inter undas multa cespitem jacet, Eamque late gens Hibernorum colit.
Propinqua rursus insula Albionum patet."

— "Oræ Maritimæ."

<sup>50</sup> It is otherwise known as the "Iter Britannicarum." See the Editio Wesselingii, Amstetæd, 1735, p. 463.

<sup>51</sup> Some think he composed it, in the second, and others, in the beginning of the fourth, century.

<sup>52</sup> This is thought to have been traced, about the close of the fourth century. See Editio Mannerti, Lipsiæ, 1824.

<sup>53</sup> It is supposed, that this account had been drawn up, in the beginning of the fifth century. See it in Jean-Georges Grævius "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanorum," tomus vii. In Partibus Orientis, cap. lv., cxliv. In Partibus Occidentis, cap. i., ii., it, in the anonymous Geographer of Ravenna,<sup>54</sup> who is presumed to have flourished, in the seventh century.<sup>55</sup> But, it is probable, that the native writers, Gildas,<sup>56</sup> the Wise, who lived and wrote in the sixth century,<sup>57</sup> and the authors of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle<sup>58</sup>—of uncertain date—give us the most reliable ancient accounts, regarding the Britons and their history.<sup>59</sup> Venerable Bede gives us an account of divers nations, who came from other countries, and who occupied, by degrees, the whole British island.<sup>60</sup> The first settlers were Britons, as he informs us; and, from these, the island is said to have derived its name of Britain. Then, he adds, the Pictish nation migrated from Scythia; and, according to him, they had been called Picts, even before they arrived in Great Britain.<sup>61</sup> After these colonists came the Scots, already known by that name, in Ireland. But, the father of English history relates, that the Albion Britons were said to have derived their descent from Gaulish Britons, who migrated from Armorica.<sup>62</sup> Yet, certain writers, who treated the much-disputed subject, regarding the first settlement of the Britons in the country, now called Britany,<sup>63</sup> would have us believe, Bede did not mean to say, that the island of Britain derived its name from those colonists.<sup>64</sup> Speaking of people, dwelling on the south-eastern and maritime parts of xix., xxvii., xxxiv., xli., lxviii., lxxi., lxxii., lxxxvii. In twelve folio volumes. Utrecht, 1694 to 1699.

<sup>54</sup> See the Editio Gronovius Lugd. Batav. 1696. The London edition of T. Gale, 1709, has various readings of places named. See lib. i., cap. 3, lib. v., cap. 31, 32.

<sup>55</sup> For further particulars, in reference to the foregoing authorities, the reader is referred to that valuable work, "Monumenta Historica Britannica, or Materials for the History of Britain, from the earliest Period." vol. i. Edited by Henry Petrie, Esq., F.S.A., and Rev. John Sharpe, B.A. London, 1848, fol. See the introductory Part, "ex Scriptoribus Græcis atque Latinis Excerpta de Britannia," with notes, pp. i. to cxx. Very admirable and learned illustrations of Ptolemy, and of those works, just mentioned in the text, as having reference to Britain, will be found in "Britannia Romana: or the Roman Antiquities of Britain." By John Horsley, M.A. and F.R.S. London, 1732, fol. See book iii., 353 to 520.

<sup>56</sup> He is venerated as a saint, at the 29th day of January, and he died about A.D. 570.

<sup>57</sup> In his "Liber Querulus," or "De Excidio Britanniae," and in his "Epistola."

Mon. Hist. Brit., pp. i to 46.

<sup>58</sup> See ibid., pp. 291 to 466.

<sup>59</sup> A very interesting work, to elucidate this subject, is "Britannia Antiqua Illustrata: or, the Antiquities of Ancient Britain, derived from the Phœnicians: wherein the Original Trade of the Island is discovered, the Names of Places, Offices, Dignities, as likewise the Idolatry, Language and Customs of the Primitive Inhabitants are clearly demonstrated from that Nation, many old Monuments illustrated, and the Commerce with that People, as well as the Greeks, plainly set forth and collected out of approved Greek and Latin Authors. Together with a Chronological History of this Kingdom, from the First Traditional Beginning, until the year of our Lord 800, when the name of Britain was changed into England; faithfully collected out of the best Authors, and disposed in a better Method than hitherto hath been done; with the Antiquities of the Saxons, as well as Phœnicians, Greeks and Romans." By Aylett Sammes, of Christ's College in Cambridge. Since, of the Inner-Temple. London, 1676, fol.

<sup>60</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. i., pp. 21 to 24. Editio Cantabrigiæ, 1644, fol.

<sup>61</sup> See Camden's "Britannia," col. xvi., xvii., and following passages. A. Du Chesne has also treated the same subject, at great length. See "Histoire d'Angleterre," liv. i. Yet, he has given us scarcely any original observation, having followed Camden, almost to the letter.

<sup>62</sup> Bede says: "In primis hæc insula Britones solum, a quibus nomen accepit, incolas habuit, qui de tractu Armoricano (ut fertur) Britanniam advecti, australes sibi partes illius vindicarunt."—"Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. i., p. 23.

<sup>63</sup> See Dom. Guy-Alexis Lobineau.

<sup>64</sup> In answer to such remarks, it may be difficult to explain, if that had not been his intention, why he touched upon the name at all. A reason, which induced those writers to resort to such a quibble, was probably, that, in their opinion, no foundation could be discovered, for placing Britons in the province, now called Britany, before the middle of the fifth century. But, it does not thence follow, should we admit this supposition, that there were not Britons, living in some other parts of the Continent. The Armorican tract, mentioned by Bede, was far more extensive, than the province of Britany. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclethe present England, Cæsar had already derived their descent from the Belgæ.<sup>65</sup> Again, Diodorus Siculus, Tacitus<sup>66</sup> Dion Cassius,<sup>67</sup> and other ancient writers, agree; still, on such a subject, the classic authors are poor authorities.<sup>68</sup>

The first authentic account of a Roman invasion, beyond the northern boundaries of England, must be referred to the expedition of Agricola, about A.D. 80.<sup>69</sup> As a measure of precaution, he established a line of forts, between the Friths of Clyde and of Forth, when those hardy Caledonians, who had dared to oppose his progress, were obliged to retire, as it were, into another island.<sup>70</sup> Those defensive works seem to have been the commencement of that larger fortified rampart, renewed and strengthened, from time to time, and, of which, remnants are yet to be found.<sup>71</sup> Beyond these works, however, the Roman army penetrated, and even their fleet sailed northwards, to the Orkneys, so that Britain was then discovered, by the Romans, to have been an island, if any doubt of that fact had heretofore remained.<sup>72</sup> But, little had been done, towards the annexation of that district of Scotland, south of the Clyde and of the Forth. The Emperor Hadrian<sup>73</sup> raised a barrier, to define the boundaries of his British Empire, about the year 119;<sup>74</sup> but, this defensive work,<sup>75</sup> it is presumed, ran along the line of the famous Roman Wall, from the Tyne to the Solway.<sup>76</sup> The ancient and present state of the Roman wall, in Scotland, with those forts, whereby the position had been secured, have engaged the curiosity and lively interest of antiquaries.<sup>77</sup> Through his Lieutenant, Lollius Urbicus,<sup>78</sup> the Emperor Antoninus Pius<sup>79</sup> is said to have siastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xii., n. 122, pp. 108, 109.

<sup>65</sup> Speaking of Britain and of its colonization, he observes, "maritima pars ab iis qui, prædæ ac belli inferendi causa, ex Belgis transierant, qui omnes fere iis nominibus civitatum appellantur, quibus orti ex civitatibus eo pervenerunt."—"De Bello Gallico," lib. v., sect. 10. Yet, it seems very strange, that in commenting on a passage of Dionysius Periegetes, Hill could assert, that there were no Britons in his time, except such as lived in the British Islands. He refers on this occasion to Camden's "Britannia." However, this latter writer distinctly admits a Britain, to have been near Boulogne.

<sup>66</sup> See "Vita Agricolaë," sect. xi.

<sup>67</sup> Dion Cassius flourished A.D. 230. See "Historiæ Romanæ," lib. xxxix., sect. 50, 51, 53, lib. xl., sect. 1, 2, 3, 4, lib. xli., sect. 30, 32, 34, lib. xlii., sect. 42, 43, 49, lib. xlix., sect. 38, lib. l., sect. 24, lib. liii., sect. 7, 22, 25, lib. lv., sect. 23, lib. lix., sect. 21, 25, lib. lx., sect. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 30. Editio Reimari, Hamburgi, 1750.

<sup>68</sup> See Whitaker's "History of Manchester," vol. i. Corrections, p. 152.

<sup>69</sup> Tacitus has given a most interesting narrative, regarding this remarkable expedition, as also touching on the bravery of the Caledonians, the progress of a partial conquest, and the results of Agricola's military and political arrangements. See "Vita Agricolaë," cap. x. et seq.

<sup>70</sup> An admirable account of Caledonia will be found in Joseph Ritson's "Annals of the Caledonians, Picts and Scots, and of Strathclyde, Cumberland, Galloway, and Murray."

In two volumes.

<sup>71</sup> See Charles Merivale's "History of the Romans under the Empire," vol. vii., chap. lxi., p. 83.

<sup>72</sup> See Le Sieur Le Nain de Tillemont's "Histoire des Empereurs, et des autres Princes qui ont régné durant les six premiers siècles de l'Eglise, de leurs guerres contre les Juifs, des Écrivains profanes, et des personnes les plus illustres de leur temps." Justifiée par les citations des auteurs originaux. Avec des Notes pour éclaircir les principales difficultez de l'Histoire. Tome ii. L'Empereur Domitien. Art. v., p. 32. Ed. Second. A Bruxelles, 1732, et seq. fol.

<sup>73</sup> He ruled, from A.D. 117 to 138.

<sup>74</sup> See Merivale's "History of the Romans under the Empire," vol. vii., chap. lxvi., pp. 434 to 437.

<sup>75</sup> For an account of it, the reader is referred to Ælius Spartianus, and to Julius Capitolinus, in "Monumenta Historica Britannica," pp. lxiv., lxv.

<sup>76</sup> See the laboured and elegant Disquisition, on this subject, in John Hill Burton's valuable "History of Scotland, from Agricola's Invasion to the Revolution of 1688," vol. i., chap. i., pp. 1 to 19.

<sup>77</sup> Their chief features, with highly interesting diagrams, may be traced, in the learned folio volume of John Horsley, M.A. and F.R.S.: "Britannia Romana: or the Roman Antiquities of Britain," in Three Books. See book i., chap. x., pp. 158 to 175.

<sup>78</sup> An inscription, found near the northern wall, commemorates his name; but, little more is known, regarding him.

conquered Britain, and to have built a second wall, in order to restrain the northern natives.<sup>80</sup> The date, most prominently connected with this structure, is 139, as many inscriptions, found near its ramparts, testify. The profile of this fortified line is either of earth, or of stone, in the shape of a ditch, and mound, which had been well garrisoned, at intervals.<sup>81</sup> For a period of about twenty years, during which Lollius Urbicus governed the province, peace appears to have prevailed; and, during his time, within the present bounds of Scotland, municipal or maritime seats may have been established, by the Roman colonists.<sup>82</sup> In the reign of Commodus,<sup>83</sup> when Christianity is supposed to have taken its hold on North Britain, a violent outbreak of the natives happened, A.D. 181. They broke through that rampart, separating them from their more civilized invaders, they killed a Roman commander, with his followers, and they committed other damage.<sup>84</sup> Whether, they carried a portion of the walls, or a Roman Station, at this time, is not easily ascertainable, from the fragment of history left us.<sup>85</sup> These troubles are said to have been suppressed, by a certain legate, named Marcellus Ulpus, probably between the years 193 and 196. This secured a few years of doubtful peace, for the northern province.<sup>86</sup> The Emperor, Severus,<sup>87</sup> is thought to have restored or improved, in detail,<sup>88</sup> the great defensive engineering position of Hadrian.<sup>89</sup> About A.D. 208, he entered Caledonia,<sup>90</sup> at the head of a formidable force, and penetrated, so far as the Moray Firth. But, with numbers greatly reduced, he was obliged to abandon this part of northern Britain.<sup>91</sup> Thenceforth, restless Caledonians and Picts made inroads on the southern province. It has been stated,<sup>92</sup> that although the first introduction of Christianity into Scotland cannot be clearly ascertained; it is possible, the persecution raging against it, in every part of the Roman Empire, urged many Christians to take refuge, among the unconquered people and districts of Ireland and of Scotland. Other writers assert, that nominally Christianity became the religion of the Roman province, in Scotland, during the reign of Constantine the Great.<sup>93</sup> Yet, it seems strange, that among existing Roman relics, great or small, not one can be pronounced

<sup>79</sup> He ruled, from A.D. 138 to 161.

<sup>80</sup> See Julius Capitolinus, in "Vita Antonini Pii," sect. v.

<sup>81</sup> See General Roy's "Military Antiquities," p. 154.

<sup>82</sup> See Daniel Wilson's "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part iii., chap. ii., p. 365.

<sup>83</sup> This lasted, from A.D. 180 to 192.

<sup>84</sup> See John Speed's "History of Great Britaine," book vi., chap. xxi., p. 224.

<sup>85</sup> This is related, by Xiphilinos, who abridged a work of Dion Cassius. The latter died, some eighty years old, at the conclusion of the third century. He had written eighty books of a Roman History; but, only a small portion of these has been preserved.

<sup>86</sup> See Wilson's "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part iii., chap. ii., p. 366.

<sup>87</sup> He ruled, from A.D. 193 to 211.

<sup>88</sup> The wall he built is said to have extended, "per centum triginta et duo millia passuum a mari ad mare;" the ditch and rampart were strengthened with numerous turrets. See Paulus Orosius—who flourished

A.D. 417—"Historiæ," lib. vii., cap. 17. Editio Havercampi Lugd. Batav. 1738.

<sup>89</sup> An interesting work, by the Rev. John Collingwood Bruce, published in 1853, and intitled, "The Roman Wall," throws much light on this subject.

<sup>90</sup> See Edward Gibbon's "History of the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire," vol. i., chap. vi., p. 219. With Notes by the Rev. H. H. Milman, Prebendary of St. Peter's, and Vicar of St. Margaret's, Westminster. London, 1838, 1839, 8vo.

<sup>91</sup> He died at York, A.D. 211, in his fifty-sixth year, and in the eighteenth of his reign. See ibid., p. 222.

<sup>92</sup> By the Rev. W. M. Hetherington, LL.D. See his "History of the Church of Scotland, from the Introduction of Christianity to the Period of the Disruption, May 18, 1843," vol. i., chap. i., p. 67.

<sup>93</sup> He was the first Christian Emperor of Rome, and he ruled with supreme command, from A.D. 312, to the 22nd of May, A.D. 337, when, after a glorious reign, he died, in the sixty-third year of his age.

<sup>94</sup> Wilson acknowledges, that there is a remarkable paucity of Roman remains, in a recognizable vestige of their Christianity.<sup>94</sup> Indeed, we are told, that Ninian,<sup>95</sup> a Briton, by birth, had been ordained just towards the close of the fourth century; <sup>96</sup> and, that, afterwards, he became the Apostle of Southern Scotland, where he built a church for himself, at the promontory Whithorn, in Galloway. It was called Candida Casa, or the White House, because it had been built of stone.<sup>97</sup> This material is supposed, by some antiquaries, not to have been in common use, for a long time afterwards, not even for the erection of ecclesiastical edifices. Ninian died, at Whithorn, where he was buried, about the year 432.<sup>98</sup> How far he was successful, in extending the Faith among the Britons, Picts and Scots, is at present imperfectly known. In 369,<sup>99</sup> during the reign of the Emperor Valentinian I.,<sup>100</sup> Theodosius and the Roman legions recovered and converted into a Roman province that district, between the walls of Antoninus and of Severus. In honour of the Emperor, this conquered province, was called Valentia. Still the Picts were formidable foes, and they continued to ravage the colonizers' settlements. About the beginning of the fifth century, the Celtic and Britannic races revolted from the Romans, lived independent of them, and refused to obey their laws.<sup>101</sup> In the year 422, it was found impossible to maintain the colony of Valentia. Then, the legionary colonists and the Romanized Britons were advised to abandon it, for that line of defence, which was south of Hadrian's wall.<sup>102</sup> However, the Christianity, which Ninnian represented, together with the Roman civilization, is thought, by some writers, to have been swept away from Scotland, from this time, nearly to the age of the Venerable Bede.<sup>103</sup>

The denomination of Britain embraced a larger extent of territory, in former times, than at present.<sup>104</sup> This extension of British name and race, on the European Continent, seems to have prevailed from a time very remote; although this fact has been overlooked, by several of the French geographers<sup>105</sup> and historians. In the time of Cæsar, Gaul, as known to the Romans, had been distinguished, by its including three principal divisions.<sup>106</sup> These were inhabited by a people, called the Belgæ, the Aquitani, and the Celts or Gauls,<sup>107</sup> speaking different languages, and regulated by differing Scotland, and that a trifling influence was exercised by Roman civilization, on its ancient arts. Of these, however, illustrations and inscriptions are given; but, none of them seem objects of purely Christian design. See "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part iii., chap. ii.

<sup>95</sup> His feast occurs, at the 16th of September.

<sup>96</sup> He is said to have been ordained, in Rome, by Pope Siricius, who began his pontificate, A.D. 384. From Ninnian's native Cumberland, he crossed the Solway, and preached the Gospel, in the southern parts of Scotland.

<sup>97</sup> Some two hundred and fifty years subsequently, when Venerable Bede wrote, the ruins of this church were traditionally pointed out.

<sup>98</sup> See Wilson's "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part iv., chap. i., pp. 480, 481.

<sup>99</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: A History of Ancient Alban," vol. i., book i., chap. ii., p. 100.

<sup>100</sup> He was a Christian, and he ruled, from A.D. 364 to 378.

<sup>101</sup> See Zosimus, who flourished about this time. "Historiæ Novæ," lib. vi., cap. v.

<sup>102</sup> See Wilson's "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part iii., chap. ii., p. 367.

<sup>103</sup> See Rev. W. M. Hetherington's "History of the Church of Scotland, from the introduction of Christianity to the Period of the Disruption, May 18, 1843," vol. i., chap. i., p. 67. This statement, however, is purely conjectural.

<sup>104</sup> See Hadrian Valesius, or Adrien de Valois, "Notitia Galliarum ordine Litterarum Digesta," Paris, 1675, fol., at Aremorica.

<sup>105</sup> In the very exhaustive and researchful work, now in course of publication, by Ernest Desjardins, of the French Institute, we find no account of the Britons, in Gaul, during the times immediately before and immediately after the birth of Jesus Christ. See "Géographie Historique et Administrative de la Gaule Romaine," tome i., ii. Paris, 1876, 1878. 8vo.

<sup>106</sup> See his work, "De Bello Gallico," lib. i., cap. i.

laws and institutes. Their boundaries, also, are tolerably well defined.<sup>108</sup> It has been asserted, that the name of Britain was not given to any part of Gaul, until after St. Patrick's mission to Ireland.<sup>109</sup> However, a people, called Armoricans,<sup>110</sup> lived near the ocean, on the extreme boundaries of Gaul, and these were subdued by Cæsar. In the third century, Christianity seems to have spread among them.<sup>111</sup> Their name seems to be drawn, from a Celtic root; <sup>112</sup> for, Ard Mor means "maritime," in the Gaulish, British,<sup>113</sup> and Irish<sup>114</sup> languages, since, merely the ocean-bound districts of West Gaul had been called Armorica.<sup>115</sup> Even Aquitain went by such a designation.<sup>116</sup> For a long time, such usage continued.<sup>117</sup> Again, in olden times, that people, who inhabited the sea-coast of Gaul, about Boulogne, and lying nearest to Britain, in their own language, were called Morini.<sup>118</sup> They lived, on the northern coast of France, and on the south-western shore of the present Belgium. Their name appears derivable from a root, similar to that of the Armorici.<sup>119</sup> There is allusion to the Brittani,<sup>120</sup> in this part of Gaul, and to the British harbour of the Morini,<sup>121</sup> by Pliny Secundus, or the Elder.<sup>122</sup> This latter port is thought to have been identical with Gessoriacus or Gessoriacum, otherwise known as Portus Iccius,<sup>123</sup> or Ictius, in modern times known as

<sup>107</sup> See on this subject, Henri d'Arbois de Jubainville's "Les Celtes, les Galates, les Gaulois," Paris, 1875, 8vo.

<sup>108</sup> Thus: "Gallos ab Aquitanis Garumna flumen, a Belgis Matrona et Sequana dividit." The Belgæ and Helvetians are lauded for their superior valour. Regarding the Helvetians, he adds: "Eorum una pars, quam Gallos obtinere dictum est, initium capit a flumine Rhodano; continetur Garumna flumine, Oceano, finibus Belgarum; attingit etiam a Sequanis et Helvetiis flumen Rhenum; vergit ad Septentriones. Belgæ ab extremis Galliæ finibus oriuntur; pertinent ad inferiorem partem fluminis Rheni; spectant in Septentriones, et orientem solem. Aquitania a Garumna flumine ad Pyrenæos montes, ad eam partem Oceani, quæ est ad Hispaniam, pertinet; spectat inter occasum Solis et Septentriones."—Cæsar, "De Bello Gallico," lib. i., cap. i.

<sup>109</sup> See Rev. Daniel Rock's "Letter to Lord John Manners." Appendix, p. vi.

<sup>110</sup> Thus, we find, in Cæsar, "cætæræque civitates positæ in ultimis Galliæ finibus, oceano conjunctæ, quæ Armoricæ appellantur."—"De Bello Gallico," lib. viii., cap. 31.

<sup>111</sup> According to Dom Guy Alexis Lobineau.

<sup>112</sup> Aremorica, in the old Gaulish and British dialects, signifies, "by the sea-side." See Camden's "Britannia," col. xxix. Gibson's edition.

<sup>113</sup> In British, Mor signifies "the sea."

<sup>114</sup> In Irish, muir means "the sea." Moir is said to have a like meaning.

<sup>115</sup> Certain geographers have placed Aremorica between the Seine and the Loire. See Cluverius and Martinière. However, they regard rather the usage of a certain period, and not the more ancient acceptance of the name.

<sup>116</sup> See Pliny's "Historia Naturalis," lib.

iv., sect. 31. Hardouin's edition.

<sup>117</sup> Eutropius says: "Carausius cum apud Bononium per tractum Belgicæ et Armoricæ pacandum mare accepisset, quod Franci et Saxones infestabant."—Lib. xix.

<sup>118</sup> The Britons call such as live, upon the sea-coast, Morinwyr.

<sup>119</sup> "Par le terme d'Armorique les anciens entendoient toutes les cotes occidentales des Gaules, habitées par les Aquitains, les Armoriciens, et les Morins, tous noms qui signifient la même chose, c'est à dire, peuples maritimes."—Lobineau's "Histoire de Bretagne," vol. ii., p. 7.

<sup>120</sup> Pliny gives these words, "Deinde Menapii, Morini, Oromansaci juncti pago, qui Gessoriacus vocatur; Brittani, Ambiani, Bellovacii." See Plinii Secundi "Historia Naturalis;" De Galliæ, lib. iv., sect. 31. The editors of the Dauphin's edition have a note on the word "Brittanni," which is worth quotation. "Ita libri omnes. Hi inter Gessoriacenses Ambianosque medii, in ora similiter positi, ea loca tenere certè, ubi nunc oppida Stapulæ, Monstrolium, Hesdinum, et adjacentem agrum, Ponticum ad Somonam amnem. Cluverius hic Briannos legi mavult." See "Germania Antiqua," lib. ii., cap. 27. Leyden, 1616, two vols., fol. Ussher follows him, in reading Brianni for Britanni. See "Primordia," p. 471.

<sup>121</sup> A glance at the map will show the close relation of the district, marked by the present towns of Etaples, Montreuil, Hesdin and Ponthieu, to localities, named in the previous note.

<sup>122</sup> He styles it, "Portum Morinorum Britannicum," lib. iv., sect. 37. Some are of opinion, this port had been so distinguished, because it was the place for Continentals debarking, when on a voyage to Great Britain, or because it was near the Straits. See Hardouin's note.

<sup>123</sup> Baudrand makes Gessoriacum the

Boulogne.<sup>124</sup> The Britanni have been placed, by Pliny, in its vicinity,<sup>125</sup> or, as Camden has expressed it, in the country, adjoining Boulogne.<sup>126</sup> The Greek writer, Dionysius Periegetes<sup>127</sup> distinguishes this Briton district,<sup>128</sup> with sufficient accuracy.<sup>129</sup> Indeed, the Welsh Triads declare, that people of Great Britain originally came from this quarter.<sup>130</sup> We have been thus particular, in alluding to what is stated, regarding the Britanni,<sup>131</sup> thought to have been living near Boulogne, since some writers of great authority consider this to have been the native country of St. Patrick.

There can be no manner of doubt, that other indigenous or idiomatic denominations, unknown to the classic writers, prevailed among those people. Thus, we find the Britons of Britany are distinguished from the Gauls.<sup>132</sup> Again, the old Belgian Alobrites, or Gallo-Britons,<sup>133</sup> lived in Walloon, near Germany, or in the Low Countries,<sup>134</sup> during the time of Dionysius, the African. In early times, Pliny has styled that part of the northern sea Britannic,<sup>135</sup> which flows between the Seine<sup>136</sup> and the Rhine. He also alludes to the Herba Britannica,<sup>137</sup> which grew on the Continent, and probably had been indigenous to some parts of the country, which is now known as Belgium.<sup>138</sup> The same writer was inclined to think,<sup>139</sup> the Frisians had been considered Britons; <sup>140</sup> nay, that even in the beginning, all the Belgians were denominated, in like manner.<sup>141</sup> same as Bononia. Portus Iccius, however, he distinguishes from Boulogne. See "Novum Lexicon Geographicum," tomus i., pp. 125, 322, 370.

<sup>124</sup> See Hadrian Valesius, at Gessoriacum, Cellarius, "Geographia Antiqua," lib. ii., cap. 3, and other writers. Iena, 1691, fol.

<sup>125</sup> Following Pliny, for "Britannicus portus," Ricardus Corenensis has, "Britannicæ gentis portus." See "De situ Britannicæ," lib. i., sect. 4.

<sup>126</sup> See "Britannia," Gibson's edition, col. xvi.

<sup>127</sup> In his poem Periegesis, alluding to the African and European Continents, having first invoked the Muse, Dionysius treats of Islands, at v. 447. Then, he describes the British Islands, opposite the mouths of the Rhine, as being the largest insular lands, known at the time when he wrote:—

Δισσαι νῆσοι ἔασι Βρετανίδες ἀντὶ Πήνον—
Τάων τοι μέγθος περιώσιον· οὐδέ τις ἄλλη Νήσους ἐν πάσῃσι Βρετανίῳν ἰσοφαρίζει.

—Vv. 566-569.

<sup>128</sup> See ibid., vv. 283-287.

<sup>129</sup> The commentator, Eustathius, at this passage, remarks, that opposite to Continental Britain the British islands lay, and that their people had been formerly of the old Belgic race, or Walloons.

<sup>130</sup> Thus—"The three beneficent tribes of the Isle of Britain. The first was the nation of the Cymmy who came with Hu the mighty to the Isle of Britain, who would possess nor country nor lands through fighting and persecution, but of equity and in peace; the second was the stock of the Lloegrians, who came from the land of Gwasgwyn (Gascoigne), and were descended from the primitive stock of the Cymmy; the third were the Brython, and from the land of Llydaw they came, having their descent from the primary stock of the Cymmyr." And again, Cynan is spoken of as lord of Meirion (probably a Celtic form of the word Morini) in Llydaw. Taliessin also mentions the Morini Brython in his Prif Cyfarch. It is supposed, that Lydaw, latinized Letavia, is one of the early Celtic names of the country of the Morini, as Neustria was that given in the Merovingian period to the whole province, between the Meuse and Loire, including Boulogne.

<sup>131</sup> See a learned Essay on this subject, in the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ix. Octobris xxi. Acta S. Ursule.

<sup>132</sup> When St. Maclovius, Bishop of St. Malo, had been expelled from his See, we have added to the account, "maledictis Britannis in Gallias abiit." See Sigebert's "Chronicon," and Matthesu Florilegus, "Flores Historiarum," p. 195, at A.D. 561.

<sup>133</sup> In the Vatican Codex, they are incorrectly, or, at least, synonymously, called Alobriges. See William Baxter's "Glossarium Antiquitatum Britannicarum," at the denomination, Alobrites, 1719 and 1733. London, 8vo.

<sup>134</sup> This is stated, by a certain very ancient, but by an anonymous author.

<sup>135</sup> It is supposed, this name might be as well derived from continental as from insular Britain.

<sup>136</sup> He remarks, too, that the ocean "inter eum et Pyrenaeum" was called "Gallicus." See lib. iv., sect. 33.

<sup>137</sup> See ibid., lib. xxv., cap. 3.

<sup>138</sup> Hardouin says, it was so called, from Britannia, in Friesland. Hadrian Junius and some writers otherwise account for the name.

<sup>139</sup> Where he writes about the Britannic herbage having been shown, by the Frisian soldiers of Germanicus.

Towards the close of the fourth century, a large accession of insular and armed Britons had been brought to the Continent, by Maximus,<sup>142</sup> who landed at the mouths of the Rhine.<sup>143</sup> Yet, another account of their arrival at its estuaries is current.<sup>144</sup> Opposite these, in the ocean, and lying not more than two hundred stadia, or about twenty-five miles, from the Continent, over against the furthestmost parts of Gaul, an island, called Brittia, is said<sup>145</sup> to have been situated, between Britannia<sup>146</sup> and Thule, where were also islands. Brittia was inhabited, likewise, by three very numerous nations, living under their several kings. Those people were called Angles, Frisons,<sup>147</sup> and insular Britons. Their country contained a vast multitude of inhabitants.<sup>148</sup> Here, moreover, a long wall had been formerly built.<sup>149</sup> This description, it is held, cannot suit any island, in or near Holland;<sup>150</sup> but, it agrees exactly with Great Britain. In those early times, geographic science had made only a slight progress; while, the distance and relative situation of distinct countries were very imperfectly known.<sup>151</sup> We are also informed,<sup>152</sup> that many of these followers obtained tracts of land, on different parts of the Continent.<sup>153</sup> Some of those were near a place, known as Canacuc,<sup>154</sup> or Cantguic.<sup>155</sup> It has been ingeniously conjectured,<sup>156</sup> that by such etymon must be meant Catwyck,<sup>157</sup> or Katwick,<sup>158</sup> in Holland; and, that it must be sought for, about two leagues below Leyden,<sup>159</sup> where a middle branch of the Rhine

<sup>140</sup> Procopius, in his work, "De Bello Gothico," says the Frisians are stated to have inhabited Britain, together with the Angli.

<sup>141</sup> Pliny even mentions the Belgic Britons. The anonymous writer of Ravenna also speaks of Gallic Belgium, or Rhenish France, as having for inhabitants the Allobrites, so called, and tantamount to Gallo-britones.

<sup>142</sup> These youths, who followed the tyrant, never again returned to their own homes. See the celebrated work of Gildas, "De Excidio Britannie," cap. xi. Maximus died A.D. 384.

<sup>143</sup> See Camden's "Britannia," col. 1504.

<sup>144</sup> Thus, Dom. Guy Alexis Lobineau tells us, that the Britons, probably carried thither by a storm, established themselves at the mouths of the Rhine. Their isle and abandoned fortress are now destroyed by the waters, like many others on these coasts. See "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. i., sect. xv., p. 6.

<sup>145</sup> By Procopius Cæsariensis, who flourished A.D. 560. He wrote a work, "De Bello Vandalico," and another, "De Bello Gothico." See Editio Maltreti, Parisiis, 1662.

<sup>146</sup> It is added: "Etenim Britannia ad solem occidentem, qua extremam Hispaniam spectat, a continente stadia circiter quatuor millia distat." It will not be easy to explain this location, except that by Britannia the writer probably meant Ireland.

<sup>147</sup> By the anonymous geographer of Ravenna, the Frisones are called, Frixi, and Frigoines.

<sup>148</sup> Caesar had said, that Britain, in his time, had been well peopled.

<sup>149</sup> See Procopius, "De Bello Gothico," lib. i., cap. 20.

<sup>150</sup> This is a conjecture hazarded by Ussher. See "Primordia," pp. 400, 419.

<sup>151</sup> Thus Tacitus places Hibernia in a site, between Britannia and Hispania. See "Vita Agricolaë," cap. xxiv. Again, the Venerable Bede has our Island, near Spain, and about 500 miles from the Continent. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. i. In like manner Procopius.

<sup>152</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xii., p. 107.

<sup>153</sup> See the Irish Version of the "Historia Britonum" of Nennius. Edited by Rev. James Henthorn Todd and the Hon. Algonon Herbert, pp. 66, 67. And Appendix No. x., pp. xvii. to xix.

<sup>154</sup> In the Irish Version of the "Historia Britonum," it is called Canacuc, or Centumoi.

<sup>155</sup> Speaking of Maximus, he says, this leader would not disband the soldiers, who came from Britain, nor allow them to revisit their wives, nor children, nor lands; but, he bestowed on them large tracts, near a marsh, "quod est super verticem montis Jovis usque ad civitatem, qui vocatur Cantguic, et usque ad cumulum Occidentalem, id est, Cruc-ochident." Perhaps le Mont Jou, and Ouessant, west of Brittany.

<sup>156</sup> By Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>157</sup> Priscius has Cantguic, in Hist. Bryt. Def. p. 50, and Gale's edition reads "Tantguic." The latter adds, "et ipsi sunt ad cumulum occidentalem, i.e. Crutchidenit."

<sup>158</sup> See Martiniere, at Katwick.

<sup>159</sup> In reference to the settlements of those colonists, the reader is referred to the Additional Notes, No. x., xi., pp. xvii. to xx., appended to the Irish Version of the "Historia Britonum."

<sup>160</sup> Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xii., p.

formerly joined the sea.<sup>160</sup> A Dutch chronicler places a British settlement there, and from it, the fortress, since called Het huys te Britten,<sup>161</sup> is thought to have had its origin.<sup>162</sup> It is not so easy, now, to identify those places, mentioned by the ancient writers.<sup>163</sup>

Several ancient<sup>164</sup> and modern<sup>165</sup> writers have derived the Armoric Britons from the followers of Maximus,<sup>166</sup> who appear to have spread along and ravaged the northern coasts of France, to their remote extremity of Brittany.<sup>167</sup> The Bretons of this province, however, have an obscure history; but, after the time of Maximus, the westernmost corner of Gaul began to be styled Britannia.<sup>168</sup> Again, we are told, that the conquests of the Saxons brought a great number of fugitive insular Britons, under the leadership of one of their princes, named Reith, or Riwal, to seek an asylum among the Armoricans, their allies. This happened, about the middle of the fifth century; and, soon after, new accessions of immigrants gradually crowding into north-western Gaul, Armorica changed its name for Bretagne. Another British Prince, Riothime,<sup>169</sup> at the head of 12,000 men,<sup>170</sup> is said to have landed, at the mouth of the Loire,<sup>171</sup> and to have ascended this river to Berri, where, at Bourdeols, he was attacked and defeated, by Euric, King of the Visigoths, A.D. 470.<sup>172</sup> The Britons were probably dispersed, and settled in northern France, until such time as they became united to the Franks, under their king, Clovis,<sup>173</sup> about the beginning of the sixth century. Other writers have denied, that there were Bretons, in Bretagne, so early as the middle of the fifth century. Vertot<sup>174</sup> contends, that they had not been fixed there, until the sixth century, when they were received as fugitives, by Childebert and by 107, and Ussher's "Primordia," pp. 400, 419.

<sup>161</sup> Baudrand says, "Britanni etiam pop. Belgii, quorum tractus apud ostium Rheni, Thays te Bretten appellatur, teste Ort." See "Novum Lexicon Geographicum," tomus i., p. 134.

<sup>162</sup> Ussher ascribes this British settlement to refugees who fled from Britain to avoid the Saxons. But, Dr. Lanigan rather thinks, it owes origin to the youths, who followed Maximus to the Continent, and who were left there to defend his points of communication with Great Britain. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xii., p. 108.

<sup>163</sup> According to Hadrian Valesius, Mons Jovis is the great St. Bernard. Cruc-ochidient, means, "western mountain," according to Camden. See "Britannia," col. 561. Could Nennius have meant the Pyrenees? asks Dr. Lanigan. Gildas writes, in his History, that Maximus extended one of his wings to Spain and the other to Italy. See cap. x.

<sup>164</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," p. 421. Also, Baronius, Malbranque.

<sup>165</sup> See Gifford's "History of France," vol. i., p. 34.

<sup>166</sup> After what has been quoted above, in the account of this trans-oceanic expedition of Maximus, Nennius continues, "Hi sunt Britones Armorici, et numquam reversi sunt ad proprium solum usque in hodiernum diem."

<sup>167</sup> "Britones namque Armorici, qui ultra mare sunt, cum Maximo tyranno hinc in expeditionem exeuntes, quoniam redire nequiverant, occidentales partes Galliae solo tenus vastaverunt—acceptisque eorum uxoribus et filiabus in conjugiam," &c. Dr. Lanigan, however, thinks this passage an interpolation of Nennius, having been originally only a comment on his work. Certainly, it does not appear, in the Irish Version of the "Historia Britonum."

<sup>168</sup> See Daru's "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., pp. 40 to 54. Britannia Gallicana, Minor, Citerior, Cismarina, are terms applied to it, by Eginhard, and by other early writers.

<sup>169</sup> He is also called Riothamus or Riothimus. He went, as an auxiliary to the Romans. See Jornandes, "De Rebus Geticis," cap. 45.

<sup>170</sup> C. S. Apollinarus Sidonius who flourished A.D. 470, styles them, "armatos tumultuosos, virtute, numero, contubernio contumaces."

<sup>171</sup> According to Apollinarus Sidonius, Britons were seated near this river. "Britannos supra Ligerim sitos."—"Epistolarum," lib. i., Epist. 7. Note ad loc. The best edition of this writer's works is that of Sirmond, Paris, 1652.

<sup>172</sup> See F. Guy Alexis Lobineau's "Histoire de Bretagne," tome i., liv. i., sect. i. to xxviii., pp. 1 to 9.

<sup>173</sup> This monarch was the first Christian King of France, and he reigned, from A.D. 481 to 511.

<sup>174</sup> His History, regarding the Establishment of the Britons, was a political work, and Clotaire, the sons of Clovis. Another opinion has been advanced,<sup>175</sup> that the soldiers of Riethimus were undoubtedly Continental Britons; since, at this time, the insular Britons were struggling against the Saxons,<sup>176</sup> for a bare existence at home; or, they were flying away, to more distant countries. This great contest was continued, from about A.D. 455<sup>177</sup> to 492. That great victory, gained by the Britons, near Bath, happened during the latter year, according to prevailing historical accounts. Consequently, they could not then have organized such a powerful force, to serve as Roman auxiliaries. About the middle of the ninth century, in the time of Nennius, the name of Armorican Britons appears to have been usually applied, only to the people of Brittany. Yet, it must be observed, this writer could not mean, that those territories, which the followers of Maximus subdued, had been confined to that province; since, he mentioned, a little before, many and extensive tracts, in which they were settled. At a period, long subsequent to that of St. Patrick, north-western Gaul, and a part of Belgium, had been called Britain.<sup>178</sup> Nor could the country, thus named, have been identical with the modern French district of Brittany; for, it would seem, that at a subsequent time, it had been called Normandy.<sup>179</sup>

As the infancy and early life of St. Patrick are not sufficiently known, it was necessary, in a measure, to institute the previous investigation of Britain's former extent; so that, his being admittedly of British race, and even of Roman extraction, may serve to give us the comparative conditions required, for our attempt to solve the much debated question, regarding that country, in which his birth took place. An opinion, that St. Patrick had been born in France, has there held a traditional vogue, as also in Ireland, from times very remote. On the other hand, a theory of ancient origin, most generally accepted, and having the greatest weight of favouring authority, assumes St. Patrick had been born in Scotland. Indeed, were we to regard the arguments of respectable authorities, in reference to the country of St. Patrick's birth, it seems that either Scotland or France must advance the most probable claims, in the assertion of such an honour. Other writers contend for South Britain, as having been the country of St. Patrick's birth; but, all are not agreed, regarding the exact locality. Some make him a Welshman; others will have it, that his nativity must be referred to a south-western locality in England. Not alone St. Patrick is said to have been an Irishman, but his father and sisters are set down, as natives of this island, by Matthew of Westminster.<sup>180</sup> No authority is cited for this statement; and, yet, it has misled other writers, such as Possevin,<sup>181</sup> and Baronius.<sup>182</sup> Into this mistake, perhaps, some it was undertaken, to show the original dependence of the Britons on the French kings. This work is at issue, with the theory of Lobineau.

<sup>175</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>176</sup> See Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. 16, as likewise Smith's notes.

<sup>177</sup> See Dr. Lingard's "History of England," vol. i., chap. ii., p. 63.

<sup>178</sup> Thus, in the old Life of St. Fursey, it is related, that he arrived in such a province, on the Continent; and, on his way, he proceeded towards Rome, by a south-eastwardly direction, through Ponthieu, not far from Boulogne. This Life has been published by Colgan, and by the Bollandists. It was compiled from older documents, as appears, on comparing it with the very ancient Life of Fursæus, published by Mabillon. See "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus i., sec. 11, p. 299, and the following pages.

<sup>179</sup> Thus, in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Januarii, we read in the Vita S. Fursei, "Britanniam Provinciam, quæ a modernis Normannia nuncupatur."—Lib. ii., cap. i., p. 83. The words, "Britanniam provinciam," are supposed to have been taken from some old document. This compiler of St. Fursey's Life is supposed to have been Arnulfus, the Abbot of Lagny, a town between Paris and Meaux, who lived in the eleventh century. Those words indicate a writer, who lived, not earlier than the tenth century.

<sup>180</sup> See "Flores Historiarum," at A.D. CCCCXCI., p. 177.

<sup>181</sup> See "Apparatus Sacer."

<sup>182</sup> See "Annales Ecclesiastici."

writers may have been led, by that equivocal expression, which martyrologists use,<sup>183</sup> for designating the commemoration of a saint's death, as a Natalis. Such misapprehension may have arisen, likewise, from the fact of St. Patrick having been called Scotus.<sup>184</sup> However, the whole tenor of St. Patrick's Acts is quite sufficient to disprove the supposition, of his having been an Irishman, by birth. Nor does it appear to have been a received tradition, in Ireland,<sup>185</sup> and, therefore, we may dismiss the consideration of such theory, in all subsequent phases of the present enquiry.

There are many proofs advanced, regarding the probability of St. Patrick having been a native of the European Continent. His French extraction is supposed to be asserted, in one of the oldest of his Lives—that ascribed to St. Eleran. However, a succeeding part of the narrative shows, that the author of this biography refers the fact of his birth to another, and to a more distant, country.<sup>186</sup> The Aremoric Gauls, notwithstanding, are said to have claimed him, as their countryman.<sup>187</sup> Don Philip O'Sullivan Beare has attempted to reconcile the fact of his being a Briton, with the circumstance of his birth occurring in France, by supposing the Irish Apostle to have been a Briton, of Brittany.<sup>188</sup> Other Irish writers have adopted the same opinion. Thus, Bishop David Roth,<sup>189</sup> Rev. Geoffry Keating, D.D.,<sup>190</sup> and Roderick O'Flaherty,<sup>191</sup> are among <sup>183</sup> Most frequently, they adopt a Latin word, which denotes "nativity," or "natal day," that is, the day, on which a saint is released from mortality here, and born, as it were, to eternal life. See Lynch's "Life of St. Patrick," chap. vii.

The City of Boulogne, France.

<sup>184</sup> It is recorded, by Baronius, that in A.D. 431, lived St. Patrick, a Scotchman. The same writer afterwards explains, that by such expression, "an Irishman" is meant. Thus he writes, under A.D. 491, for the death of St. Patrick he has referred to that year.

<sup>185</sup> Yet, Dempster states this, in his "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xv., num. 1001, pp. 520, 521.

<sup>186</sup> See "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. i.

<sup>187</sup> "Galli Aremorici civem suum faciunt."—Dempster's "Apparatus ad Historiam Scotiæ," p. 520.

<sup>188</sup> See "Patriciana Decas," p. 4.

<sup>189</sup> "Quamquam non desint, qui eum in Britannia Armorica genitum dicant."—"Hibernia Resurgens," p. 199.

<sup>190</sup> See "General History of Ireland," book i., p. 156. Dublin Edition, A.D. 1723.

the number. ' One of the ablest historians, who contends for this theory, is the Rev. Dr. Lanigan, while his high authority and acute arguments have determined many attentive readers, to adopt his conclusions. However, before the publication of his Irish Ecclesiastical History, few modern writers seem to have attempted an identification of those localities, named in various original documents, and concerning the saint's personal biography, in the same detailed and laboured manner. An eloquent and a modern French historical writer<sup>192</sup> claims our saint, as the Gallo-Roman Patrick.<sup>193</sup> Later still, an accomplished writer and a learned investigator,<sup>194</sup> adopting similar views, has examined with great care the general state of this question, and in an admirable Essay,<sup>195</sup> he endeavours to prove, that St. Patrick's birth took place, near Boulogne,<sup>196</sup> on the northern coast of France. By the present writer, this Essay has been freely used, in the course of this special enquiry.

The saint himself tells us,<sup>197</sup> in his "Confessions," that his place of birth was called Enon—if we are to trust some readings—a supposed villa, near the town of Bonava,<sup>198</sup> or Benava Taburnia.<sup>199</sup> To these localities, the Hymn of St. Fiech<sup>200</sup> adds, that Patrick was born, at a place, called Nem-tur.<sup>201</sup> The ancient Lives of our Apostle cite these localities, and with little substantial variation. The Second Life, given in Colgan's collection, declares, likewise, his nativity to have been at Nempthur; and, in the plain of Taburna.<sup>202</sup> The Third Life is nearly word for word with the First, on this point.<sup>203</sup> The Fourth suggests, that he was of Jewish descent, through a colony allowed by the Romans, to settle in Armorica;<sup>204</sup> but, that his parents were driven thence, to the region of Strato

<sup>191</sup> See "Ogygia," lib. iii., cap. lxxxv.

<sup>192</sup> Le Vicomte De Montalembert.

<sup>193</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome ii., livre ix., chap. i., p. 454.

<sup>194</sup> Mr. John Cashel Hoey.

<sup>195</sup> "On the Birthplace of St. Patrick."

It was published among the "Essays on Religion, and Literature." By various writers. Edited by H. E. Manning, Archbishop of Westminster, and published in London, A.D. 1865. It embraces, from pp. 106 to 137 of this volume.

<sup>196</sup> The accompanying view of the city of Boulogne, taken from a French photograph, was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard. The foreground represents the church of St. Nicholas, and the Market Place, in the Grande Rue; the Cathedral appears, in the distance.

<sup>197</sup> His words are, according to one rendering, "Patrem habui Calphurnium (or Calpornium) Diaconum (or Diacurionem) qui fuit e vico Bonaven (or Benaven) Tabernæ; villam Enon propè habuit, ubi ego in capturam decidi." Short as is the foregoing sentence, there are various readings of it, in different Manuscript and printed copies.

<sup>198</sup> The Bollandists, in their edition of the Confession, read Banaven. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii., cap. i., sect. i., p. 533.

<sup>199</sup> See Dr. Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Confessio S. Patricii, cap. i., p. 184.

<sup>200</sup> The first line of this Hymn reads,

Ἐναῖρ πατρίαις ἡ Νεμθῦρ, and, the Latin translation runs, "Natus est Patricius Nemturri."—"Hymnus seu Prima Vita S. Patricii," stanza I., p. 1. The version of this Hymn, contained in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," has Ἐναῖρ πατρίαις in nemthῦρ; and, it is translated, "Patrick was born at Emptur." To the latter word, a note is appended: "Many have imagined that the name of Patrick's birthplace was Nemthur, from the Irish phrase in nemthῦρ; however, Eugene Carry well remarked, that the initial n in this case is euphoniou and belongs to the preceding preposition, precisely as we find in the old MSS. in nepenn for in Erin; in naibann for in Albania; in neman for in Emania, etc." A very ancient Irish Manuscript, states, that "in a village, the name of which is Hurnia, in Britain, near the city of Empter." The text is, ἡ μῆσις τῶν βαρὺν ἡμῶν τῶν μῆρεσταιν λαὶν πε καταῖρ empter, St. Patrick's birth took place. See vol. iv. March, 1868, pp. 282, 283, and n. (c.)

